¹ See Mitteis, Hist. Controversiæ de Processione Spiritus Sancti, subjoined to his Codex Canonum Eccles. Roman. p. 355, &c.; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, tom. iii. p. 354; Vossius, De Tribus Symbolis, diss. iii. p. 65, but especially Walch, Hist. Controversiæ de Processione Spiritus Sancti, Jena, 1751, 8vo. [Respecting the opinion of the fathers of the first six centuries on this point, see München's Dogmengeschichte, vol. iii. p. 500—505.—Mur.]

² We here subjoin a few facts, from which it will appear how much superstition then dis honoured this holy ordinance of Christ. Pope Gregory III. among his decisions (in Harduin, Concilia, tom. iii. p. 1826, No. 23) gives the following:—"If any one through negligence shall destroy the eucharist, i.e. the sacrifice, let him do penance one year or three Quadragesimas. If he lets it fall on the ground carelessly he must sing fifty Psalms. Whoever neglects to take care of the sacrifice, so that worms get into it, or it lose its colour or taste, must do penance thirty or twenty days; and the sacrifice must be burned in the fire. Whoever turns up the cup at the close of the solemnity of the mass must do penance forty days. If a drop from the cup should fall on the altar, the minister must suck up the drop, and do penance three days; and the linen cloth which the drop touched must be washed three times over the cup, and the water in which it is washed be cast into the fire." This same passage occurs in the Capitula of Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, cap. II.—Schl.

³ See Charlemagne, De Imaginibus, lib. II. p. 245; Calixtus, De Missis Solitariis, section 12, and others. [The private or solitary masses were so called to distinguish them from the public, or those in which the eucharist was imparted to the congregation; and they were masses in which the priest alone partook of the eucharist. The introduction of these private masses led to a more rare distribution of the eucharist to the assembly; at first only on the three principal festivals, and at length but once a year.—Schl.] forbidding the worship of images as we have already seen, he limited the number of holidays,⁴ rejected the consecration of bells with holy water,⁵ and made other commendable regulations. Yet he did not effect much, and chiefly from this cause, among others, that he was excessively attached to the Roman pontiffs, who were the patrons of the lovers of ceremonies. His father, Pepin, had previously required the mode of singing practised at Rome to be everywhere introduced.⁶ Treading in his steps, and in obedience to the repeated exhortations of the pontiff Hadrian, Charlemagne took vast pains to induce all the churches of Latin Christians not only to copy after the Romish church in this matter, but to adopt the entire forms of the Romish worship.⁷ There were however a few churches, as those of Milan, Chur, &c. which could not be persuaded by any arguments or inducements to change their old forms of religious worship.

CHAPTER V.

HISTORY OF HERESIES.

1. THE ancient sects, the Arians, Manichæans, and Marcionites, though often depressed by the operation of penal laws, acquired new strength in the East, and allured many to join them amidst those perpetual calamities under which the Greek empire had to struggle.⁸ The Monothelites, to whose cause the emperor Philippius and other persons of distinction were well-wishers, made advances in many places. The condition also of the Nestorians⁹ and

⁴ At the Council of Mentz, A.D. 813 (Harduin, Concilia, tom. iv. p. 1015, Can. 24—28), the number of fast and feast days was defined, according to the pleasure of Charlemagne, as follows:—"Four great fasts—namely, the first week in March, the second week in June, the third week in September, and the last full week in December previous to Christmas-day. In all these weeks there were to be public litanies and masses at nine o'clock on the Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays. The festivals, in addition to all the Sundays of the year, were to be Easter-day with the whole week, Ascension-day, Whitsunday, the nativity (martyrdom) of St. Peter and St. Paul, of St. John Baptist, the Assumption of St. Mary, the dedication of St. Michael, nativities of St. Remigius, St. Martin, St. Andrew; Christmas, four days; the first day of January, Epiphany, and the purification of St. Mary, together with the festivals of the martyrs and confessors interred in each parish, and the dedication of a church.—Mur."]

⁵ Among the Capitula of Charlemagne, as given by Harduin (Concilia, tom. iv. p. 846) there is one, No. 18, "Ut cloaca non baptizetur."—Mur.

⁶ See the Capitula Aquisgranense, No. 80, in Harduin, Concilia, tom. iv. p. 843.—Mur.

⁷ So, Charlemagne, De Imaginibus, lib. I. p. 52; Eginhard, De Vita Caroli Magni, cap. xxvi. p. 94, ed. Bessel, and others.

⁸ Among the barbarous nations of Europe also, there were still some Arians remaining.

⁹ From Assenman we obtain some knowledge of the Nestorian patriarchs, the most distinguished of whom were the following. Ananjes, under whom the Sigan monument was erected A.D. 781. Timotheus who suc-

Monophysites' was easy and agreeable under the dominion of the Arabians; nor were they without ability to annoy the Greeks, their foes, and to propagate their faith abroad.

2. In the new Germanic churches collected by Boniface, there were many perverse men who were destitute of true religion, if confidence can be placed in Boniface and his friends. But this can scarcely be the case; because it appears from many circumstances that the persons whom he calls patrons of error were Irishmen, Franks, and others, who would not subject themselves to the control of the Roman pontiff, which Boniface was labouring to extend. Among others the most troublesome to him was Adalbert, a Frenchman, who obtained consecration as a bishop against the will of Boniface, and also Clement, a Scot or Irishman. The former, who created disturbance in Franconia, appears to have been not altogether free from error and crime;² for, not to mention other instances of his disregard to truth, there is still extant an Epistle which he falsely asserted was written by Jesus Christ, and brought down from heaven by Michael the archangel.³ The latter excelled perhaps Boniface himself in knowledge of the true religion of Christ, and he is therefore not improperly placed by many among the witnesses for the truth in this barbarous age.⁴ Both were condemned by ceeded Ananjesu, and greatly extended the sect by the conversion of pagan nations near the Caspian sea and in Tartary. He left many sermons, an exposition of John's Gospel, ecclesiastical canons, polemic writings, a treatise on astronomy, and two hundred letters. From him we get a knowledge of several other writers and of the divisions caused by them. But as these had no influence on the churches of Europe we may pass them by. See Baumgarten's Auszug der Kirchengesch. vol. iii. p. 1315, &c.—Schlt.

1 Of the Monophysite patriarchs and writers we also obtain some knowledge from Asseman. Conspicuous as writers among them were Elias of Sighra who commented on the books of Gregory Nazianzen, and Theodosius of Edessa who wrote poems. Among the Maronites, the patriarch Theophilus obtained renown. He appears to have been the same person with that Maronite author of the same name who lived about A.D. 785, and who not only translated Homer into Syriac but also composed large historical works. See Baumgarten, ubi supra, p. 1318.—Schlt.

² See Ilist. Littér. de la France, tome iv. p. 82, &c.

³ The Epistle is published by Baluze in the Capit. Regum Francorum, tom. ii. p. 1396. [Semler in his Ilist. Ecclésiast. selecta Capita, tom. ii. p. 185, &c. conjectures that this Epistle was fabricated by the enemies of Adalbert, and joined upon him for the sake of injuring him. This however is doubtful. The caption of the epistle purports that it is an Epistle of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, which fell down at Jerusalem, and was found by the archangel Michael near the gate of Ephraim; that a priest read it, transcribed it, and sent it to another priest who sent it into Arabia. After passing through many hands it came at length to Rome, &c. Accompanying this letter, as transmitted by Boniface to the pope, was a biography of Adalbert, which stated that his mother had a marvellous dream before his birth, which was interpreted to signify that her child would be a distinguished man; also a prayer said to have been composed by him, in which he invoked four or five angels by name who are not mentioned in the Bible. The letter of Boniface containing the accusation against both Adalbert and Clement, states that Boniface had now laboured thirty years among the Franks, in the midst of great trials and opposition from wicked men; that his chief reliance had been on the protection of the Roman pontiffs whose

pleasure he had always followed; that his greatest trouble had been with "two most base public heretics and blasphemers of God and the Catholic faith," Adalbert a Frenchman, and Clement a Scotchman, who held different errors but were equal in amount of criminality. And he prays the pontiff to defend him against these men, and to restrain them by imprisonment and excommunication from annoying the churches. "For," said he, "on account of these men I incur persecution, and the enmity and curses of many people; and the church of Christ suffers obstructions to the progress of the faith and holy doctrine." Of Adalbert he says:—"The people say respecting him that I have deprived them of a most holy apostle, patron and intercessor, a worker of miracles, and an exhibitor of signs. But your piety will judge from his works, after hearing his life, whether he is not one clad in sheep's clothing but within a ravening wolf. For he was a hypocrite in early life, asserting that an angel in human form brought to him from distant countries relics of marvellous sanctity but of whom it was uncertain; and that by means of these relics he could obtain from God whatever he asked. And then with this pretence, as Paul predicted, he entered into many houses and led captive silly women laden with sins and carried away by divers lusts; and he seduced a multitude of the rustics who said that he was a man of apostolic sanctity and wrought signs and wonders. He next hired some ignorant bishops to ordain him contrary to the canons, without assigning him a specific charge. He now became so insolent as to assume equality with the apostles of Christ, he disdained to dedicate a church to any apostle or martyr, and reproached the people for being so eager to visit the thresholds of the holy apostles. Afterwards he ridiculously consecrated oratories to his own name, or rather defiled them. He also erected small crosses and houses for prayer in the fields, and at fountains and wherever he saw fit, and directed public prayers to be there offered; so that great multitudes despising the bishops and forsaking the ancient churches, held their religious meetings in such places and would say:—'The merits of St. Adalbert will aid us. He also gave his nails and locks of his hair to be kept in remembrance of him, and to be placed with the relics of St. Peter, the prince of apostles. And finally what appears the summit of his wickedness and blasphemy against God, when people came and prostrated themselves before him to confess their sins, he said: I know all your sins, for all secrets are known to me, return securely and in peace to your habitations. And all that the holy Gospel testifies as done by hypocrites he has imitated in his dress, his walk, and his deportment.'" The Epistle then describes the wickedness of Clement thus:—"The other heretic, whose name is Clement, opposes the Catholic church and renounces and confutes the canons of the church of Christ. He refuses to abide by the treatises and discourses of the holy fathers, Jerome, Augustine, and Gregory. Despising the decrees of councils, he affirms that in his opinion a man can be a Christian bishop and bear the title, after being the father of two sons begotten in adultery [i.e. in clerical wedlock]. Introducing Judaism again he deems it right for a Christian, if he pleases, to marry the widow of his deceased brother. Also contrary to the faith of the holy fathers he maintains that Christ, the Son of God, descended into hell and liberated all that were there detained in prison, believers and unbelievers, worshippers of God and worshippers of idols. And many other horrible things he affirms respecting divine predestination and contravening the Catholic faith." See Harduin, Concilia, tom. iii. p. 1936—1940.—Mur.

⁴ The errors of Clement are enumerated by Boniface, Epist. cxxxv. p. 189. [See them stated in the concluding part of the preceding note.—Mur.] Among these errors there is certainly no one that is capital. See Ussher, Synloge Epist. Hiber. p. 12, and Nouveau Diction. Histo. Crit. tome i. p. 133, &c. [For the history of the controversy with both Adalbert and Clement, see Walch's Ilist. der Ketzer, tom. x. p. 3—66.—Mur.]

the Roman pontiff Zacharias, at the institution of Boniface, in a council at Rome A.D. 748; and both it appears died in prison.

3. Much greater commotions were produced in Spain, France, and Germany, towards the close of the century by Felix, bishop of Urgel in Spain, a man distinguished for his piety. Being consulted by Elipandus, archbishop of Toledo, respecting his opinion of the Sonship of Christ, the Son of God, he answered in the year 783 that Christ, as God, was by nature and truly the Son of God, but that as a man he was the Son of God only in name and by adoption. Elipandus imbibed this doctrine from his preceptor, and disseminated it in the provinces of Spain, while Felix spread it in Septimania [or Languedoc.] But in the view of the pontiff Hadrian and of most of the Latin bishops, this opinion seemed to revive the error attributed to Nestorius, or to divide Christ into two persons. Hence Felix was judged guilty of heresy, and required to change his opinion; first in the council of Narbonne A.D. 788, then at Ratisbon in Germany A.D. 792, also at Frankfort on the Maine A.D. 794, afterwards at Rome A.D. 799, and lastly in the council of Aix-la-Chapelle. And he revoked his opinion ostensibly but not in reality, for he died still maintaining it at Lyons, where he was banished by Charlemagne.¹ No creed could be imposed upon Elipandus by the Christians, because he lived under the Saracens of Spain. Many believe, and not without reason, that the disciples of Felix, who were called Adoptionists, differed from other Christians not in reality but only in words, or in the mode of stating their views;² but as Felix was not uniform in his language, those who accuse him of the Nestorian error have some grounds of argument.³

tome ii. p. 79, and by the Benedictine monks in Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iv. p. 434, &c. [This sect is fully treated of in Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. ix. p. 667—940, and in his Hist. Adoptionorum, Götting. 1755, 8vo. See also Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xx. p. 459—498.—Mur.

² Dorscheus, Collat. ad Concilium Francof. p. 101; Werenfels, De Logomachiis Eruditor. in his Opp. p. 459; Basnage, Præf. ad Etherium, in Canisius, Lectio. Antiq. tom. ii. par. i. p. 284; Calixtus in his Tract on this subject, and others. [Walch in his Hist. Adoptionorum, considers Felix as not a Nestorian; and yet he regards the controversy as not merely about words. The substance of Felix's views he thus states. Christ as a man and without regard to the personal union of the two natures, was born a servant of God though without sin. From the condition of a servant he passed into that of a free person, when God at his baptism pronounced him his dear Son. This transaction was his adoption and likewise his regeneration. The title of God belongs to him indeed as a man, but not properly, for he is God only nuncupatively. Thus did Felix utter something unsuitable and new; but his innovation was not a ground for so great an alarm throughout the whole church, as if he had assailed the fundamental doctrines of Christianity.—Mur.

³ The Adoptionists having lost their leaders soon sank into oblivion. In the middle ages Folmar, about 1160, defended the Adoptionist notions; and Duns Scotus about 1300 and Durandus about 1320, admit the expression, filius adoptionis, in a certain sense. Walch, Hist. Adopt. p. 247 and 253. In later times the Adoptionists have been defended among the Roman Catholics by the Jesuit Gabr. Vasquez, Comment. in Thomam, Ingols. 1606, fol. par. iii. diss. 89, cap. vii.; and among the Protestants by Geo. Calixtus, De persona Christi, &c. Helmst. 1663, p. 96, and by others. Walch, Hist. Adopt. p. 256, &c.; Gieseler, Lehrbuch, &c.; Cunningham's transl. vol. II. p. 45.—It.

¹ The authors who have treated of the sect of Felix are enumerated by Fabricius, in his Biblio. Lat. Mediæ Evæ, tom. ii. p. 482. To these add De Marca in the Marca Hispanica, lib. iii. cap. xii. p. 368, &c.; De Perregas, Hist. Générale d'Espagne, tome ii. p. 518, 523, 28, 535, &c. 560; Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. v. Præf. p. 2, &c. Of Felix in particular, an account is given by Colonia, Hist. Littér. de la Ville de Lyon, CENTURY NINTH.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

1. So long as Charlemagne lived, which was till the year 814, he omitted no means which he deemed requisite to propagate and establish Christianity among the Huns, the Saxons, the Frieslanders, and others.¹ But it is to be regretted that he did not omit to employ violence and war. His son, Lewis the Meek, had the same zeal for propagating Christianity, though greatly his inferior in other respects. Under his reign a convenient opportunity was presented for planting Christianity among the northern nations, especially the Danes and Swedes.² Harald Klack, a petty sovereign of Jutland, being expelled his kingdom by Regner Lodbrock in the year 826, applied to the emperor for his assistance. Lewis promised him aid on condition that he would embrace Christianity himself, and admit teachers of the Christian religion into his country. Harald acceded to the terms, was baptized at Mayence, A.D. 826, together with his brother, and took along with him to Jutland two preachers of Christianity, Ansgarius, a monk and schoolmaster of Corbey in Saxony, and Autbert, a monk of old Corbey [in France]; and these monks preached among the inhabitants of Jutland and Cimbria for two years with great success.

2. On the death of his fellow-labourer Autbert in the year 828, the indefatigable Ansgarius went over to Sweden; and there he pleaded the cause of Christ with equal success.³ Returning into Germany in the year 831, Lewis the Meek constituted him archbishop of the new church of Hamburg,⁴ and of all the North; and in the year 844 the episcopal see of Bremen was annexed to that of Hamburg. The profits of this high station were small,⁵ while its perils

¹ Among these may be reckoned the Carinthians.—They had indeed partially received Christianity in the preceding century from Virgilius, bishop of Salzburg. For Boruth, the duke of Carinthia, when he committed his son Corastus to the Bavarians as a hostage, requested that he might be baptised and educated as a Christian; and he also requested the same in regard to his nephew Chetimar. Now as both these afterwards became dukes of Carinthia, it may be readily conceived that the Christian religion had made considerable progress there before this century. In the present century A.D. 803, Charlemagne came to Salzburg, and confirmed to Arno his ecclesiastical jurisdiction over Slavonia, or Carinthia in lower Pannonia. The presbyters whom Bishop Arno sent into Carinthia to build up the churches there, adopted a singular artifice to render Christianity respectable and paganism contemptible in the eyes of the people. They allowed Christian slaves to sit at table with them, while their pagan masters had to eat their bread and meat without the doors, and had to drink out of black cups whereas the servants drank from gilded cups. For the presbyters told the masters—“You unbaptised persons are not worthy to eat with those who are baptised.” This kindled such a desire to become Christians that great numbers of them were baptised. The story does as little credit to these missionaries as to their converts. See the Life of St. Ruprecht in Canisius, Lectiones Antiq. tom. vi. of the old ed. 4to.—Schl.

² Ebbo, archbishop of Rheims, who had travelled as an imperial envoy in the northern countries, made an attempt as early as A.D. 822 to spread Christianity there, and together with Hailigarius of Cambray he obtained from Pope Paschal a full power for this purpose. See the Acta Sanctor. An. v. ad 3 Februar, and Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. secul. iv. par. ii. tom. vi. p. 91, 107, 122.—Schl.

³ The Christians who were carried into captivity by the Normans in their frequent plundering expeditions, undoubtedly contributed much to give this people a favourable disposition towards Christianity; and especially by recounting to them the wealth and power of the Christian countries, which was ascribed to their religion. This will account for what historians affirm that Swedish ambassadors came to King Lewis, and stated among other things that many of their people had an inclination towards Christianity, and that their king would cheerfully permit Christian priests to reside among them. Ansgarius and Vitmar were sent thither with rich presents. Their voyage was unfortunate, for they fell into the hands of pirates who plundered them; yet they finally reached the port of Bjork which belonged to the king, Bern or Biörn. There they collected a congregation and built a church in the course of six months, the king having given liberty to his subjects to embrace the new religion. On the return of these missionaries the congregation in Sweden was without a teacher, till Ebbo sent them his nephew Gausbert, who at his ordination to the episcopacy of that see took the name of Simon; but he was soon after driven out of Sweden.—Schl.

⁴ The see of Hamburg was then very small, embracing but four parish churches. Lewis sent Ansgarius to the pope, who conferred on him the archiepiscopal pall, and constituted him his legate for Sweden, Denmark, the Faro Islands, Iceland, &c. as also among the Slavonians and the northern and eastern tribes. See the Acta Sanctor. Feb. tom. i. and Mabillon, ubi supra—Schl.

⁵ Lewis the Meek assigned him the revenues of a

were very great and its labours immense. For Ansgarius while he lived took frequent journeys among the Danes,¹ the Cimbrians, the Swedes,² and other nations; and laboured, though at the peril of his life, to collect new churches and to strengthen those previously formed, till death overtook him A.D. 865.³

3. About the middle of this century two Greek monks, Methodius and Cyril, being sent as missionaries from Constantinople by the empress Theodora, taught first the Mosians, Bulgarians, and Gazari, and afterwards the Bohemians and Moravians, to renounce their false gods and to embrace Christ.⁴ Some knowledge of Christianity had indeed been previously imparted to these nations, through the influence of

Baumgarten, contains the most material results of modern investigation. The seeds of Christianity had been previously scattered among the Bulgarians by some Christian captives. In the year 814 Crummus, the Bulgarian king, captured Adrianople and carried the bishop, Mamel, with other of the citizens, into captivity; and his successor afterwards put this bishop with other Christian captives to death, because they made proselytes among the Bulgarians. After this it appears that both the monk Theodorus Eupharus who was a captive in that country, and a sister of the Bulgarian king Bogoris, who had been taken prisoner and carried to Constantinople, where she was educated and taught the Christian religion and then exchanged for the monk Theodorus, contributed much to recommend Christianity to that people. The way being thus prepared Bogoris admitted several artists from Constantinople; among whom was the famous painter Methodius, who instead of drawing worldly scenes for the king formed religious pictures, and among them one of the judgment-day, and instructed him in the principles of Christianity. Not long after, the king in a time of famine openly professed Christianity, and invited teachers from abroad. But his subjects made insurrection against him for it; and he caused fifty-two of the ringleaders to be put to death, and at length brought the rest to embrace the new religion. In the year 843 (for thus Assmann has ascertained the true year in his Kalendar. Eccles. Universe, tom. iii. p. 13, &c. whereas Kohl and Stredowsky state the year 843), Constantine, the brother of this Methodius, had been sent among the Chazari (or Gazari), whose king had likewise desired to have Christian teachers. Constantine laid the foundation of the Christian Church among this people, translated the Scriptures into the Slavonic language, and taught that barbarous nation the use of letters. After this he came to the aid of his brother among the Bulgarians; and in the year 861 baptised King Bogoris, who assumed at the font the name of the Greek Emperor Michael. The two brothers, Constantine and Methodius, were natives of Thessalonica. The former, who was the oldest, afterwards took the name of Cyril, and on account of his learning was surnamed the Philosopher. The younger brother was distinguished as a painter. It is probable that both of them in early life fled from Constantinople to avoid the persecution which befel the worshippers of images, and especially the painters of them; and that they took refuge among the Slavonic tribes and there learned their language, which was afterwards of use to them in the propagation of Christianity. From the Bulgarians, Constantine, it is stated, travelled among the adjacent Dalmatians and Croats, and baptised their king Budimir. See Baumgarten's Auszug der Kirchengesch. vol. iii. p. 1379, and Semler's Selecta Hist. Eccles. Capita, tom. ii. p. 263, 269. As to the Bohemians the Chronicles of Fulda ad ann. 845 state that under Lewis, King of the Germans, fourteen Bohemian lords with their subjects embraced the Christian religion. And it is well known that towards the close of the century the Bohemian Prince Borivoj or Borsivoj was baptised. Suanopluc or Zwentibold, king of the Moravians, appears to have greatly aided this conversion. For having been baptised himself, he treated this pagan prince roughly while residing at his court, and would not allow him to sit at his table; because as he told him it was not suitable for a pagan to eat with Christians. Perhaps also the assurance given him by Methodius may have contributed to his conversion; for he told him that if he embraced Christianity, he would become a greater man than any of his ancestors. In short he consented to be baptised, and returning home he persuaded his wife, Ludomilla, with many others to receive baptism also; and afterwards, with the aid of his wife, greatly promoted the spread of Christianity—among other means, by erecting a famous school at Budec. See Semler, ubi supra, p. 261, 265. The Moravians were converted under their king, Radislav. He sent for the two monks, Constantine and Methodius, and they erected a school at Vetrav, baptised the king and his most distinguished subjects, translated many books into the Slavonic language, and set up public worship in this tongue. They erected churches in several places, particularly at Olmutz and Brünn; and they introduced also image wor-monastery in Brabant, in order to meet the expenses of his missionary efforts. But the income of the monastery was very small, and soon after ceased altogether when the kingdom fell into disorder. Ansgarius must therefore have been in want of resources. He at last received a small estate from a pious widow in Ramelsloh near Bremen, which however yielded him but a small income.—Schll.

1 The violent persecutions to which the Danish Christians were exposed was one cause of his repeatedly visiting that country. He was himself driven from Hamburg (by an invasion of the Normans), and the city being wholly laid waste he had to reside some time at Bremen. He was at length permitted to enter Denmark by King Erich, and being allowed to preach there, he erected a church at Hadeby or Schleswig in the year 850; but this king being slain in 856, during the minority of his son Erich Boern, there was fresh persecution and the church of Schleswig was shut up. When this king began to reign in person he was more favourable to the Christians, and permitted Ansgarius to return and to erect a new church at Ripen A.D. 860.—Schll.

2 To Sweden he sent the priest Ardgarius, and likewise went there himself a second time in the character of envoy from King Lewis to King Olaus, who was induced by presents to support Ansgarius in two imperial Swedish diets, at which the establishment of Christianity was decided by casting lots. He now re-established Christian worship at Björk, and left Hesimbret there as a Christian teacher.—Schll.

3 The writers who treat of the life and labours of this holy and illustrious parent of the Cimbrian, Danish, and Swedish churches, are enumerated by Fabricius, Biblioth. Latin. Mediæ Evæ, tom. i. p. 292, &c. and Lex. Evangelicæ totæ Orbis evæ, tom. p. 425, &c. To these add the Benedictine monks' Hist. Littér. de la France, tom. v. p. 277; Acta Sanctor. mens. Februar. tom. i. p. 391, &c.; Pontoppidan, Annales Eccles. Dancæ Diplomatiæ, tom. i. p. 18, &c.; Möller's Cimbria Literata, tom. iii. p. 8, &c. From these writers a knowledge may be gained of the others also, namely, Ekbo, Withmar, Rembert, &c. who were either the companions and assistants of Ansgarius, or his successors in the field of labour. [The life of Ansgarius, well written by Rembert, his disciple and successor in the see of Hamburg, is in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. vi. p. 78, &c. Among the recent writers see Schmidt, Kirchengesch. vol. iv. p. 108—119; Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xxi. p. 314, &c. and Archibishop Münter's Kirchengesch. von Dänem. und Norweg. vol. i. page 319, Leps. 1823.—Mur.

4 Stredowsky, Sacra Moravia Historia, lib. ii. cap. ii. p. 94, &c. Compare Kohl, Introduct. in Historiam et Rem Literar. Slavonarum, p. 124, &c. and others. [A much ampler account of the missions and conversions mentioned in this and the following sections is given by Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xxi. p. 396, &c. and by Schmidt, Kirchengesch. vol. iv. p. 120, &c.; also by Assmann, Kalendaria Ecclesie Universalis, tom. iii. p. 3, &c. Rome, 1756, 4to. See likewise Gieseler's Text-Book by Cunningham, vol. ii. p. 128, &c. The following summary by Schlegel, derived from Semler and Charlemagne and some of the bishops; but that knowledge produced little effect and gradually became extinct. As the missionaries above named were Greeks, they inculcated on those new disciples the opinions of the Greeks, their forms of worship, and their rites;² from which the Roman pontiffs afterwards by their legates were able but partially to reclaim them. And from this source great commotions occasionally arose.

4. Under the Greek emperor, Basil the Macedonian, who ascended the throne A.D. 867, the Slavonic nations, the Arentani and others who inhabited Dalmatia, sent ambassadors to Constantinople and voluntarily placed themselves in subjection to the Greek empire; and at the same time they professed a readiness to receive Christianity. Greek priests were therefore sent among them who instructed and baptized them.³ The same emperor, after concluding a peace with the warlike nation of the Russians, persuaded them by presents and other means to promise him by their ambassadors that they would embrace Christianity. The nation stood to their promise; and admitted not only Christian teachers among them, but also an archbishop commissioned by Ignatius, the Greek patriarch.⁴ This was the commencement of Christianity among the Russian people. They were inhabitants of the Ukraine, and a little ship, to which they were addicted. See Baumgarten's Auszug der Kirchengesch. vol. iii. p. 1429, &c.—Schl.

¹ Stredowsky, ubi supra, lib. i. cap. ix. p. 55, &c.—[When Charlemagne in his wars with the Huns and Avars was victorious, he compelled the Moravian king Samoslaw to embrace Christianity; and Arno of Salzburg in particular undertook to convert these tribes. In this business the monk Godwin was employed, and also under Lewis the Pious, Orolph the archbishop of Lorch. See Pagi, Critic. ad ann. 824. In the year 822, Mogemir, the successor of Samoslaw, became a confederate of the Emperor Lewis, and gave free toleration to the Christian worship, on which he himself attended. This good beginning in the conversion of the Slavonic nations in Moravia, was however much interrupted by the contests which arose between the bishops of Salzburg and those of Passau; and besides, the ignorance of the Christian missionaries of the Slavonic language, and their introducing the Latin formulas of worship, were serious obstacles to success. At last the wars between the Germans and the Moravians—the latter having wholly renounced the dominion of the former—put a full stop to the progress of the Gospel among that people. See Baumgarten's Auszug, &c. vol. iii. p. 1430, &c.—Schl.

² Lenfant, Hist. de la Guerre des Hussites, liv. i. chap. i. p. 2, &c. and compare the Biblioth. Germanique, tome xxi. p. 2—4.

³ This we learn from Constantine Porphyrogenitus, De Administrando Imperio, cap. xxix.; in Banduri's Imperium Orientale, tom. i. p. 72, 73. Constantine also relates the same in his life of his grandfather, Basil the Macedonian, sec. liv. Corpus Hist. Byzantin. tom. xvi. p. 133, 134.

⁴ Constantine Porphyrogenitus, De Vita Basilii Macedon. sec. xvi. in the Corpus Hist. Byzant. tom. xvi. p. 157; and Narratio de Ruthenorum Conversione, published Gr. and Lat. by Banduri, Imperium Orientale, in his notes to Porphyrogenitus, De Administrando Imperio, tom. ii. p. 62.

before had fitted out a fleet at Kiow, in which they appeared before Constantinople to the great terror of the Greeks.⁵

5. The Christian missionaries to the heathen in this century, were men of more piety and virtue than many of those who undertook the conversion of the pagans in the preceding century. They did not resort to coercive measures; they either disregarded altogether or promoted only in a moderate degree the private interests of the Roman pontiff; and their lives were free from arrogance, insolence, and the suspicion of licentiousness. Yet the religion they inculcated was very different from that simple rule of truth and holiness which the apostles of Christ preached, and was debased by many human inventions and superstitions. Among the nations which they converted, these preachers also allowed too many relics of the old superstitions to remain; and in truth they were more intent on inculcating an external form of piety than piety itself. Yet it must be allowed that these pious and good men were obliged to yield several things to the rudeness of those savage nations.

CHAPTER II.

THE ADVERSE EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

1. THE Saracens were in possession of all Asia as far as the borders of India, a few regions only excepted. They also held the best parts of Africa, and in the West, Spain and Sardinia. In the year 827, relying on the treason of individuals, they subjugated the very fertile island of Sicily.⁶ And near ⁵ Le Quien, in his Christianus Oriens, tom. i. p. 1257, gives account of this conversion of the Russians to Christianity in the reign of Basil the Macedonian; but he has made a number of mistakes as others had done before him. He first tells us that the Russians here intended were those who bordered on the Bulgarians, but a little after he tells us they were the Gazari. For this opinion he has but one reason, namely, that among the teachers sent to instruct the Russians was that Cyril who was active in the conversion of the Gazari. The learned author was ignorant of both the Russians and the Gazari. He has made also other mistakes. The subject is developed much better and more accurately by Beyer, Diss. de Russorum primæ Expeditionis Constantinopolitaneæ, published in the sixth volume of the Commentar. Acad. Scientiar. Petropolitaneæ, A.D. 1738, 4to. [See also Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xxi. p. 507, &c. and Schmidt's Kirchengesch. vol. iv. p. 166, &c.—Mur.

⁶ Euphemius, a general in Sicily, became enamoured with a nun and forcibly took her to his bed. Her brothers complained to the viceroy, who laid the case before the emperor, and he ordered the nose of Euphemius to be cut off. Euphemius repelled the force sent to arrest him and fled to Africa. There he offered the Saracen governor to put him in possession of all Sicily if he would entrust him with an army and allow him to assume the title of a Roman Emperor. The governor consented, and Euphemius fulfilled his promise; but he had scarcely accomplished his design when he lost his life at Syracuse by assassination. See the ac-

the close of the century, the Asiatic Saracens got possession of many cities in Calabria, and spread terror to the very walls of the city of Rome. They also either ravaged or seized upon Crete, Corsica, and other islands. How great was the injury which the Christian cause everywhere sustained, from these successes of a nation accustomed to wars and rapine and hostile to the Christians, every one can easily comprehend. In the East especially numberless families of Christians embraced the religion of their conquerors, to render their lives comfortable. Those possessed of more resolution and piety gradually sunk into a wretched state, being not only stripped of the principal part of their property, but what was still more lamentable they fell by degrees into a kind of religious stupor and an amazing ignorance; so that they retained almost nothing Christian except the name and a few religious rites. The Saracens in Europe, and particularly those of Spain, became divested in a great measure of their ferocity, and they suffered their Christian subjects to live quietly, according to their own laws and institutions. Yet instances of cruelty were not wanting among them.¹

2. Another and a more direful tempest came upon the European Christians from the regions of the North. The Normans, that is, the people inhabiting the shores of the Baltic, in Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, who were accustomed to rapine and slaughter, and whose petty kings and chieftains practised piracy, had infested the coasts along the German and Gallic oceans as early as the reign of Charlemagne; and that emperor established garrisons and camps to oppose them. But in this century they became much more bold and made frequent descents upon Germany, Britain, Friesland, but especially France, plundering and devastating with fire and sword wherever they went. The terrific inroads of these savage hordes extended not only to Spain,² but even to the centre of Italy; for it appears from the writers of those times that they destroyed the city of Luna in the year 857, and Pisa and other cities of Italy in the year 860.³ The early histories of the Franks detail and deplore at great length their horrid enormities.

3. The first views of these savages extended only to collecting plunder and slaves in the countries they invaded;⁴ but by degrees becoming captivated with the beauty and fertility of those countries, they took up their residence in them, nor could the European kings and princes prevent their doing so. In this very century Charles the Bald was obliged, A.D. 850, to cede a considerable part of his kingdom to these bold invaders.⁵ And a few years after in the reign of Charles the Fat, king of France, Godfred one of their most valiant chieftains persevered in his military enterprises till he had subdued all Friesland.⁶ Yet those who permanently settled among Christians gradually became civilized, and intermarrying with them, they exchanged the superstitions of their ancestors for the religion of the Christians. Godfred, the conqueror of Friesland, did so in this century, when he had received for his wife Gisela; the daughter of King Lothaire junior, from the hands of Charles the Fat.

count given by John Curopalata, as cited by Baronius, Annal. tom. ix. ad ann. 827, sec. xxiv. &c.—Mur.

¹ See for example the martyrdom of Eulogius of Corduba, in the Acta Sanctor. ad d. xi. Martii, tom. ii. p. 88, and those of Roderic and Salomon, Spanish martyrs of this century, in the same vol. ad d. xiii. Martii, p. 328. [The Saracens of Spain were tolerant to the Christians so long as they denominated themselves as quiet and peaceable citizens, and they allowed them the free exercise of their religion; but they would not allow them to revile Mohammed and his religion, and this was the source of all the difficulties. Aïdalrahman consulted Reccafid, a Christian bishop, on the subject. The bishop stated that when Christians traduced the Mohammedan religion without urgent cause, and laboured to introduce their own in place of it, if they thereby lost their lives they could not be accounted martyrs. A number of Christians agreed with Reccafid, but the majority dissented. And Eulogius wrote against Reccafid, and compiled histories of the Spanish martyrs. He and those in his sentiments exerted all their efforts to run down Mohammedism, and to make converts to Christianity. They also courted martyrdom, and in several instances invited the judges to put them to death. The particular offence of Eulogius for which he was put to death was detaining and secreting a Spanish-girl whom he had converted from the Musliman to the Christian faith, and not giving her up to her parents and friends. See his three books—De Martyribus Cordubensibus, his Apologeticus pro Martyribus ado. Calumniantes, and his Exhortatio ad Martyrium, in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xv. p. 666, &c. also Schroëckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xxi. p. 294, &c. and Gieseler's Text-Book by Cunningham, vol. ii. p. 15, &c.—Mur.

² Ferreras, Hist. Générale d'Espagne, tome ii. p. 583.

Piracy was esteemed among these northern nations a very honourable and laudable profession, and to it the nobility and the sons and the kindred of kings were trained. Nor will this surprise us if we consider the religion of those nations and the barbarism of the times. See Holberg, Historia Danorum et Norvegorum napolis, in the Scripta Societ. Scient. Hafniensis, tom. iii. p. 349, where he relates many interesting accounts respecting these maritime robberies from the annals of the Danes and Norwegians.

³ See the Scriptores Rerum Italicar. by Muratori, in various passages.

⁴ This object of the Normans [plundering] occasioned the destruction of a vast number of churches and monasteries in England, France, Germany, and Italy; for in these places were deposited large treasures, partly belonging to the establishments and partly placed there for safe keeping. These places were therefore generally fortified; and the bishops and abbots, who were also bound to do military service for their lands, were obliged to defend them against the incursions of foreign enemies.—Schl.

⁵ Annals by an unknown author in Pithæus, Scriptores Francici, p. 46.

⁶ Regino Prumiensis, Annales, lib. ii. p. 60, in Pistorius, Scriptor. German.

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE STATE OF LEARNING AND SCIENCE.

1. AMONG the Greeks many things occurred in this century which could not but damp their ardour for learning and knowledge. Still however the munificence of the emperors, some of whom were devoted to study, and the precautions of the patriarchs, among whom Photius shone conspicuous for erudition, prevented an absolute dearth of learned men, particularly at Constantinople. Hence there were among the Greeks some who excelled both in prose and in poetic composition, who showed their skill in argumentation by their writings against the Latins and others, and who composed histories of their own times not altogether destitute of merit. In particular, when their disputes with the Latins became warm, many who would otherwise have suffered their talents to be eaten up of rust were roused to cultivate elegance and copiousness of diction.

2. That the study of philosophy among the Greeks of this century continued for a long time neglected, is testified expressly by John Zonaras. But under the emperors Theophilus and his son Michael III. the study of it revived through the influence especially of Bardas, the Cæsar,¹ who, though himself not learned, was the friend of Photius, who was a very learned man and a great Mæcenas, and by whose councils no doubt Bardas was guided in this matter. At the head of all the learned men to whose protection he intrusted the interests of learning, Bardas placed Leo the Wise, a man of great learning, and afterwards bishop of Thessalonica.² Photius himself expounded what are called the Categories of Aristotle, and Michael Psellus wrote brief explanations of the principal books of that philosopher. Others I pass over.

3. Hitherto the Arabians, intent solely on making conquests, had entirely neglected the sciences; but now the kaliph of Babylon and Egypt, Al Mamun or Abu Gaafar Abdallah, by his love of learning and munificence to learned men, aroused them to make greater advances. For this excellent kaliph, who began to reign about the time that Charlemagne died and ended his days A.D. 833, founded celebrated schools at Bagdad, Cufa, Basora, and other places, drew learned men around him by conferring on them great rewards, established ample libraries, procured at great expense the translation of the best works of the Greeks into Arabic, and neglected no means which would do honour to a prince greatly attached to literature and science, and himself a distinguished proficient.³ Through his influence the Arabians began to find pleasure in Grecian science, and to propagate it by degrees not only in Syria and Africa, but also in Spain and even in Italy. Hence they celebrate a long list of renowned philosophers, physicians, astronomers, and mathematicians of their nation, extending through several centuries.⁴ Yet we must not take all that the modern Saracenic historians tell us of the merits and endowments of these men in the most literal sense.⁵ From the Arabians the European Christians afterwards profited in the sciences, for what knowledge of mathematics, astronomy, medicine, and philosophy, was taught in Europe from the tenth century onward, was derived principally from the schools and the books of the Arabians in Italy and Spain. And hence the Saracens may in some measure be considered as the restorers of learning in Europe.

4. In the part of Europe subject to the Franks, Charlemagne while he lived cherished and honoured learning of all kinds with great earnestness. If his suc-

¹ Abulpharajus, Hist. Dynastiæ, p. 246; Elmæcin, Hist. Saracen. lib. ii. p. 139; Herbelot, Biblioth. Orientale, article, Mamun, p. 645.

² See Leo Africanus, Tract. de Medicis et Philosophis Arabibus, republished by Fabricius, in his Biblioth. Græca, vol. xii. p. 259, &c.

³ In the abstruse sciences they are said to have been mere copyists or rather plagiarists from the Greeks and Latins, particularly from Aristotle, Euclid, Galen, &c. Even Avicenna, whose Canon or system of physic was a classic in the European medical schools so late as the sixteenth century, we are told, advanced nothing very important but what is to be found in Galen and others. Their astronomy was more properly astrology or divination from the starry heavens. See Schroëckh, Astr.-gesch. vol. xxi. p. 279—282.—Mur.

¹ Annales, tom. ii. lib. xvi. p. 126, in the Corpus Byzant. tom. x.

² Among the Greek emperors who advanced science, Basil the Macedonian should not be forgotten. He was himself not without learning, as is evident from his speeches, letters, and counsels to his son Leo, which are still extant. This son of his, who was surnamed the wise and the Philosopher on account of his learning, composed largely; the most important of his works are the sixty books of his Basilicon or Imperial Laws, his Tactica, and his speeches.—Schl.

cessors had followed him with equal strides or been capable of doing so, ignorance and barbarism would have been expelled; and indeed his example was partially imitated. Lewis the Meek, copying after his father, devised and executed several projects, suited to promote and advance the useful arts and sciences.¹ His son, Charles the Bald, went beyond his father in this matter, for this emperor was a great patron of learning and learned men; he invited men of erudition to his court from all quarters, took delight in their conversation, enlarged the schools and made them respectable, and cherished in particular the Palatine or court school.² In Italy his brother Lothaire, emperor after A.D. 823, laboured to restore the entirely prostrate and languishing cause of learning by founding schools in eight of the principal cities.³ But his efforts appear to have had little effect, for during this whole century Italy scarcely produced a man of genius.⁴ In England King Alfred obtained great renown, by promoting and honouring literary enterprise.⁵

5. But the infelicity of the times pre-

¹ See the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iv. p. 583, &c. [The palatine school continued to flourish under Lewis the Meek. Also many monasteries were re-established or instituted anew in which the sciences were studied. From his Capitul. ii. (in Harduin, Concilii, tom. iv. p. 1251, No. 5) may be seen how desirous this emperor was of promoting learning and the establishment of schools. He there says to the bishops:—"The institution of schools in suitable places for the education of children and the ministers of the church, which you formerly promised us and which we enjoined upon you, wherever it has not been done must not be neglected by you."—Schl.

² Conringius, Antiq. Academ. p. 320; Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. i. p. 178; Lavuol, De Scholis Caroli II. cap. xi. xii. p. 47, &c.; Hist. Littér. de la France, tome v. p. 483.

³ See his ordinance or Capitulaire, which is published by Muratori, Rerum Italicar. Scriptor. tom. i. par. ii. p. 151. [In this ordinance the emperor represents the cultivation of literature as wholly prostrate in the Italian states, in consequence of the negligence of the clergy and the civil officers; that he had therefore appointed teachers who should give instruction in the liberal arts, and whom he had directed to use all possible diligence to educate the rising generation. He also mentions the cities in which he had stationed these teachers—namely, Pavia, Ivrea, Turin, Crenona, Florence, Fermo, Verona, Vicenza, and Forum Julii or the modern Ciudad del Friuli.—Schl.

⁴ See Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Medii Ævi, tom. lii. p. 829, &c.

⁵ See Wood, Hist. et Antiq. Oxon. lib. i. p. 13, &c.; Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. i. p. 211, and Notre-Dame Diction. Histor. Crit. tome i. article Alfred, page 234. [This excellent prince not only encouraged by his protection and liberality such of his own subjects as made any progress in the liberal arts and sciences, but invited over from foreign countries men of distinguished talents, whom he fixed in a seminary at Oxford, and of consequence may be looked upon as the founder of that noble university. Johannes Scotus Erigena, who had been in the service of Charles the Bald, and Grimbold, a monk of St. Bertin in France, were the most famous of those learned men who came from abroad; Asser, Werforth, Plegmund, Dunwulf, Wnltisg, and the abbot of St. Neot's, deserve the first rank among the English literati who adorned the age of Alfred. See

vented these plans and efforts from imparting that prosperity to learning, which the rank and power of the noble actors might lead us to expect. In the first place, the wars which the sons of Lewis the Meek waged with their father and afterwards between themselves, interrupted very much the prosperity of the countries subject to the Franks. In the next place, the incursions and victories of the Normans, which afflicted a large portion of Europe during the whole century, were such an obstruction to the progress of learning, that at the close of the century in most of these countries and even in France itself, few remained who deserved to be called learned men.⁶ What little, incoherent knowledge remained among the clergy was chiefly confined to the episcopal and monastic schools. But the more the priests and monks increased in wealth and riches, the less they attended to the cultivation of their minds.

6. And yet a large part of this century was adorned with the examples and the labours of men, who derived a literary spirit from Charlemagne and his institutions and laws. Among these, Rabanus Maurus held perhaps the first rank in Germany and France, and to his lectures the studious youth resorted in great numbers. As historians and not wholly without merit, appeared Eginhard, Freculphus, Theganus, Haymo, Anastasius, Ado, and others. In poetry, Florus, Walafrid Strabo, Bertharius, Rabanus, and others, distinguished themselves. In languages and philology, Rabanus (who wrote acutely concerning the causes and origin of languages), Smaragdus, Bertharius, and others, possessed skill. Of Greek and Hebrew literature, William, Servatus Lupus, John Scotus, and others, were not ignorant. In eloquence or the art of speaking and writing with elegance, Servatus Lupus, Eginhard, Agobard, Hincmar, and others, were proficient.⁷

7. The philosophy and logic taught in the European schools in this century scarcely deserved the name; yet there were in various places, and especially among the Irish, subtle and acute men who might not improperly be called philosophers. At the head of these was John Erigena¹ Scotus, i. e. the Irishman, a companion and friend of Charles the Bald, a man of superior genius, and not a stranger to either Grecian or Roman learning. Being acquainted with Greek he expounded Aristotle to his pupils, and also philosophized with great acuteness without a guide. His five books on The Division of Nature (De Divisione Naturæ) are still extant, an abstruse work, in which he traces the causes and origination of all things, in a style not disagreeable and with no ordinary acumen; and in which he so explains the philosophy of Christianity, as to make it the great aim of the whole system to bring the minds of men into intimate union with the Supreme Being. To express the thing in words better understood—he was the first of those who united Scholastic theology with that which is called Mystic. Some have viewed him as not very far from the opinion of those who suppose God to be connected with nature as the soul is with the body. But perhaps he advanced nothing but what the Realists, as they were called, afterwards taught, though he expressed his views with less clearness.² He did not so far as I know found a new sect. About the same time one Macarius, also an Irishman or Scot, disseminated in France that error concerning the soul which Averroes afterwards professed, namely, that all men have one common soul, an error which Ratram confuted.³ Before these men, and in the times of Charlemagne and Lewis the Meek, Dungal, a Scot and a monk, taught philosophy and astronomy in France with great reputation.⁴ Nearly contemporary with him was Heiric or Heric, a monk of Auxerre, a very acute man, who is said to have pursued his investigations in the manner of Des Cartes.⁵

Collier's Eccles. Hist. vol. i. book iii. p. 165, 166, &c.; Rapin, in the reign of this illustrious monarch.—MacL.

⁶ Servatus Lupus, Epistolæ, p. 69, ep. xxxiv.; Conringius, Antiq. Acad. p. 322; Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iv. p. 251, &c.

⁷ Suitable illustrations of these remarks may be derived from the Hist. Littér. de la France, by the Benedictine monks, tome iv. p. 251, 271, &c. and especially from Le Beuf, Etat des Sciences en France depuis Charlemagne jusqu'à Roi Robert; in his Recueil de divers Ecrits pour servir d'éclaircissement à l'Hist. de France, tome ii. p. 1, &c. Paris, 1738, 8vo.

¹ Erigena signifies properly a native of Ireland, as Erin or Irin was the ancient name of that kingdom.—Muel.

² This book was published by Thomas Gale, Oxon. 1681, fol.; Heumann made some extracts from it and treated learnedly of Scotus himself in the German Acta Philosophorum, tom. iii. p. 858, &c. [See also respecting his philosophical opinions Brucker's Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. iii. p. 614—25, and in the Appendix or tom. vi. p. 573. His life and works are noticed in the next chapter.—R.

³ See Mabillon, Præf. ad Sæccl. iv. par. ii.; Acta Sanctor. Ord. Benedicte, sec. 156, p. 53, &c. [It is not to be supposed that Macarius held the numerical unity of all human souls, but only their specific unity or identity; i. e. their sameness of essence or sameness of nature. The doctrine of the sameness of all generals was often so stated as apparently to deny the separate existence of individuals, and even to approximate to pantheism. See Bayle, Dictionnaire, art. Synœza, note P.—Mur.

⁴ Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iv. p. 493. [But Muratori, Hist. of Italy, vol. iv. p. 611; German ed. and elsewhere thinks this Dungal taught at Pavia in Italy, and not in the monastery of St. Denys, France.—Mur.

⁵ Le Beuf, Mémoires pour l'Hist. d'Auxerre, tome ii.

CHAPTER II.

HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS, AND OF CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

1. THE ungodly lives of most of those entrusted with the care and government of the church, are a subject of complaint with all the ingenious and honest writers of this age.⁶ In the East, intrigues, rancour, contentions, and strife, were everywhere predominant. At Constantinople or New Rome those were elevated to the patriarchal chair who were in favour at court; and upon losing that favour, a decree of the emperor hurled them from their elevated station. In the West, the bishops frequented the courts of princes, and indulged themselves in every species of voluptuousness;⁷ while the inferior clergy and the monks were sensual, and by the grossest vices corrupted the people whom they were set to reform. The ignorance of the clergy in many places was so great that few of them could read and write, and very few could

p. 481; Acta Sanctor. tom. iv. in. Junii, ad diem xxiv. p. 829, et ad diem xxvi. Julii, p. 249. For this philosopher obtained a place among the saints.

⁶ See Agobard, De Privilegiis et Jure Sacerdotii, sec. 13, p. 137, tom. i. of his Opp. ed. Baluze.

⁷ See Agobard, passim; and laws (or canons) enacted in the councils of the Latins; also Servatus Lupus, Epist. xxv. p. 73, 281, and the annotations of Baluze, p. 371. [The council of Pavia A.D. 850, canon third, says:—"It is our opinion that bishops should be contented with temperate meals, and should not urge their guests to eat and to drink, but rather set examples of sobriety. Let all provocations to debauchery be removed from their conviviality; let no ludicrous shows, no vain garrulity, no buffoonery of wits, no scurrilous tricks, there find a place." Harduin, Concilia, tom. v. p. 25. In a subsequent canon they forbid bishops keeping hounds and hawks for hunting, and their having superfluous trains of horses and mules and gaudy dresses for vain display. The council of Aix-la-Chapelle A.D. 836 forbade bishops getting drunk. Harduin, Concilia, tom. iv. p. 1392, No. 6. And they state with reprobation the fact that some of their order neglected their charges and travelled here and there, not from necessity but to gratify their avarice or their love of pleasure. Ibid. p. 1393, No. 12. Of presbyters and the inferior clergy they complain that they kept women in their houses to the great scandal of the ministry; and this notwithstanding the attempts of former councils and princes to remove the evil. Also that presbyters turn balliffs, frequent taverns, pursue filthy lucre, practise usury, behave shamefully and lewdly in the houses they visit, and do not blush to indulge in revelry and drunkenness. Ibid. p. 1397, No. 7, 8. They say of the nunneries that "in some places they seemed to be rather brothels than monasteries." Ibid. p. 1398, No. 12. The council of Mayence A.D. 888 decreed:—"That the clergy be wholly forbidden to have females resident in their houses. For although there were canons allowing certain females [mothers and sisters] to reside in clergymen's houses, yet what is greatly to be lamented we have often heard that by such permission numerous acts of wickedness have been committed; so that some priests cohabiting with their own sisters have had children by them. (Sæpe audivimus, per illam concessionem plurima scelera esse commissa, ita ut quidam sacerdotum cum propriis sororibus concubentes, filios ex eis generassent.) And therefore this holy synod decrees that no presbyter shall permit any female to live with him in his house; so that the occasion of evil reports or of iniquitous deeds may be wholly removed." Ibid. vol. vi. p. 408, No. 10.—Mur.

express their thoughts with precision and clearness. Hence whenever a letter was to be penned or anything of importance was to be committed to writing, recourse was generally had to some one individual, who was supposed to excel common men by possessing some dexterity in such matters. The example of Servatus Lupus is evidence of the fact.¹

2. In Europe various causes operated to produce and to foster this corruption among persons who ought to have been examples to others. Among the principal must be reckoned the calamities of the times, such as the perpetual wars between Lewis the Meek and his sons and posterity, the incursions and ravages of the barbarous nations, the gross ignorance of the nobility, and the vast wealth which was possessed by the churches and monasteries. To these leading causes others of less magnitude may be added. If a son of an illustrious family lacked energy and talent, an elevated place was sought for him among the rulers of the church.² The patrons of churches, not wishing to have their vices exposed and reprov'd, gave the preference to weak and inefficient men for parish ministers and guardians of the souls of men.³ The bishops and heads of monasteries held much real estate or landed property by a feudal tenure; and therefore whenever a war broke out they were summoned to the field, with the quota of soldiers which they were bound to furnish to their sovereigns.⁴ Kings and princes moreover that they might be able to reward their servants and soldiers for their services, often seized upon consecrated property and gave it to their dependents; and the priests and monks who had before been supported by it, to relieve their wants now betook themselves to every species of villany, fraud, and imposition.⁵

¹ See his Works; Epist. xcvi. c. 126, 148, 149; also his Life. To these add Rodolphus Bitoricensis, Capitula ad Clerum suum, in Baluze, Miscellanea, tom. vi. p. 139 and p. 148.

² Hincmar, Opus Posterior contra Godeschalcum, cap. xxxvi. In his Opp. tom. i. p. 318; Servatus Lupus, Epist. lxxix. p. 120.

³ Agobard, De Privilegiis et Jure Sacerdotum, cap. xi. In his Opp. tom. i. p. 341.

⁴ Baluze, Appendix Actorum ad Sernatum, p. 508; Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Medii Ævi, tom. ii. p. 446, &c.; Mabillon, Annal. Benedict. tom. vi. p. 587; Du Fresnoy, ad Joannellii Hist. Ludovici I. p. 75, 76. [Yet military service was not always required for church lands, some donations expressly granting exemption from it. See Mabillon, ubi supra.—Mur.]

⁵ Agobard, De Dispens. Rerum Eccles. sec. xiv. Opp. tom. x. p. 270; Flodoard, Hist. Eccles. Rhemensis, lib. iii. cap. ix.; Servatus Lupus, Epist. lxxv. p. 87, 437, &c.; but especially Muratori, Antiq. Italica, tom. vi. p. 302, &c. and Thomassin, Disciplina Eccles. vet. et nova circa Beneficia, par. ii. lib. iii. c. xi. The custom prevailed also among the Greeks and the Lombards. See Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, tom. i. p. 142.

3. The Roman pontiffs were elected by the suffrages of the whole body of the clergy and people [at Rome], but the emperors must approve of their appointment before they were consecrated.⁶ There is indeed extant an edict of Lewis the Meek dated A.D. 817, in which this right of the emperors is relinquished, and power given to the Romans not only of electing a pontiff, but of installing and consecrating him without waiting for the consent of the emperor;⁷ but eminent men have shown by arguments entirely satisfactory that this document is a forgery.⁸ Yet I readily admit that after the time of Charles the Bald, who obtained the imperial dignity by the good offices of the Roman pontiff, the state of things was materially changed and the consent of the emperors was not asked by the Romans. It is at the same time true beyond a question, that from the time of Eugene III.⁹ who was placed in St. Peter's chair A.D. 884, the election of a pontiff was nearly destitute of any rule or order, and was for the most part tumultuous; and this irregularity did not cease until the times of Otto the Great.

4. Few of those who in this century were raised to the highest station in the church, can be commended for their wisdom, learning, virtue, and other endowments proper for a bishop. The greater part of them by their numerous vices, and all of them by their arrogance and lust of power, entailed disgrace upon their memories. Between Leo IV. who died A.D. 855 and Benedict III. a woman who concealed her sex and assumed the name of John, it is said opened her way to the pontifical throne by her learning and genius, and governed the church for a time. She is commonly called the papeess Joan. During the five subsequent centuries the witnesses to this extraordinary event are without number; nor did any one, prior to the reformation by Luther, regard the thing as either incredible or disgraceful to the church.¹⁰ But in the

⁶ See the illustrious De Bünau, Hist. Imperii German. tom. iii. p. 28, &c. 32, &c.

⁷ Harduin, Concilia, tom. iv. p. 1236; le Cointe, Annales Ecclesie Francor. tom. vii. ad ann. 817, sec. 6; Baluze, Capitular. Regum Francor. tom. i. p. 591.

⁸ Muratori, Droits de l'Empire sur l'Égl. Eccles. p. 54, &c. and Antiq. Ital. Medii Ævi, tom. iii. p. 29, 30, where he conjectures that this document was forged in the eleventh century. Bünau, Hist. Imper. German. tom. iii. p. 34. And yet some popish writers, e. g. Fontanini and others, most earnestly defend this edict of Lewis, though ineffectually. [The evidence of the spuriousness of this edict is well summed up by Pagi, Critica in Baron. ad ann. 817, No. 7, vol. iii. p. 492.—Mur.]

⁹ Here is a mistake. It was Hadrian III. who became pope in the year 884, and not Eugene III. who was not raised to that dignity till A.D. 1145; Von Einem.

¹⁰ The arguments of those who hold the story to be true are carefully and learnedly collected and stated by seventeenth century learned men not only among the Roman Catholics but others also, exerted all the powers of their ingenuity both to invalidate the testimony on which the truth of the story rests, and to confute it by an accurate computation of dates.¹ But still there are very learned men who, while they concede that much falsehood is mixed with the truth, maintain that the controversy is not wholly settled. Something must necessarily have taken place at Rome, to give rise to this most uniform report of so many ages; but what it was that occurred does not yet appear.²

Spanheim, in his Exercit. de Papa Formina, Opp. tom. ii. p. 577; and Lenfant has exhibited them in a French translation better arranged and with various additions, in a third ed. at the Hague, 1736, 12mo.

¹ The arguments of those who deny the existence of a pope after David Blondell's appropriate treatise and some others, are ingeniously stated by Bayle, Dictionnaire, tom. iii. art. Pape, p. 2162. See also Eccard, Hist. Francie Oriental, tom. ii. lib. xxx. sec. 119, &c. p. 436, &c. who however so far as we know has followed the reasoning of Leibnitz on the subject. Le Quien, Orien. Christianus, tom. iii. p. 777, and in the Lutheran church, Heumann, in his Sylloge Diss. Sacrar. tom. i. par. ii. p. 352, &c. The arguments on both sides of the question are neatly stated by Wagenstel, in Schelhorn's Amenitates Literar. par. i. p. 146, &c. and by Basnage, Hist. de l'Eglise, tom. i. p. 408. The names of the other writers, who are very numerous, may be seen in Sagittarius, Introductio in Hist. Eccles. tom. i. c. xxv. p. 676, &c. and in the Bibliotheca Bremensis, tom. viii. par. v. p. 935. (See also Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xxii. p. 75—110; Schmidt, Kirchengesch. vol. iv. p. 274—279; and Bower's Lives of the Popes, vol. iv. p. 246—260.—Mur.

² So thought Sarpi, Lettere Italiane, lett. lxxxii. p. 452; Lenfant, Biblioth. Germanique, tome x. p. 27; Haesius, Biblioth. Bremens. tom. viii. par. v. p. 935; Paff, Instit. Hist. Eccles. p. 402, &c. To whom might be added Wernsdorf, Boecler, Holberg, and many others. I will not undertake the office of judge in this controversy, yet I am of opinion there was something in this affair which deserves further investigation.—[Few if any in modern times admit the reality of a female pope, and among the English Pope Joan has become a proverbial epithet for a fictitious character too ridiculous to be mentioned in serious earnest. None of the contemporary writers mention such a pope, for the passage in Anastasius Bibliothecarius, who then lived at Rome and wrote the Lives of the Popes, is undoubtedly spurious. It was nearly two centuries before any writer affirmed the fact. But from that time to the reformation it was generally believed; yet not universally as Mosheim intimates. Platina (Lives of the Popes, John VII.) after relating the story says:—"Hæc quæ dixi, vulgo feruntur, incertis tamen et obscuris auctoribus: quæ ideo ponere breviter et nude institui, ne obstinate et pertinaciter omisissæ videar, quod fere omnes affirmant." This surely is not the language of one who does not question the truth of the story. Yet Platina wrote before Luther was born. The history of this pope is briefly this, as stated by writers of the twelfth and following centuries. She was the daughter of an English missionary who left England to preach among the newly-converted Saxons. She was born at Ingelheim, and according to different authors was named Joanna, Agnes, Gerbert, Isabel, Margaret, Dorothy, and Jurt. She early distinguished herself for genius and love of learning. A young monk of Fulda conceiving a passion for her which was mutual, she eloped from her parents, disguised her sex, and entered the monastery of Fulda. Not satisfied with the restraints there, she and her lover eloped again, went to England, and then to France, Italy, and finally to Athens in Greece, where they devoted themselves to literary pursuits. On the death of the monk Joanna was inconsolable. She left Athens and repaired to Rome. There she opened a school and acquired such reputation for learning and

5. Great as the vices and enormities of many of the pontiffs were, they did not prevent the growth of the pontifical power and influence both in church and state during these unhappy times. It does not indeed appear from any authentic documents, that they acquired any new territories in addition to those they had received from the bounty of the French kings. For what they tell us of the donations of Lewis the Meek is destitute of probability;³ nor is there more certainty in what many state that Charles the Bald in the year 875, when John VIII. had enabled him to gain the rank of emperor, relinquished all right and jurisdiction over the city of Rome and its territory, and bestowed various other gifts of immense value upon the pontiffs. Yet to all who read the history of those times it must be obvious, that the Roman pontiffs advanced in power, influence, wealth, and riches, from the age of Lewis the Meek onward, and especially after the commencement of the reign of Charles the Bald.⁴

6. Upon the decease of Lewis II. [A.D. 875] a violent war broke out among the descendants of Charlemagne, each of them contending for the imperial dignity. The Roman pontiff, John VIII., and with him the Italian princes, eagerly seized this opportunity to exclude the voice of all foreigners, and make the election of emperors depend wholly on themselves. Hence Charles the Bald, King of the Franks, by a vast amount of money and other presents, and by still greater promises, induced the Roman pontiff and the other Italian princes, to proclaim him King of Italy and Emperor of the Romans in a public assembly A.D. 876. His successors in the kingdom of Italy and in the imperial feigned sanctity that on the death of Leo IV. A.D. 855, she was chosen pope. For something more than two years she filled the papal chair with reputation, no one suspecting her sex. But she had taken one of her household whom she could trust, to her bed, and by him she became pregnant. At length, being nearer her time than she had supposed, she ventured on Whitsun-week to join in the annual procession with all her clergy. While passing the street between the church of St. Clement and the Amphitheatre she was seized with violent pains, fell to the ground amidst the crowd, and while her attendants were endeavouring to minister to her, was delivered of a son. The child died, and some say the mother too, on the spot. Others say she survived but was sent immediately to prison, the object of universal execration. See Bower and Platina, ubi supra.—Mur. [The student will see an excellent summary of the controversy in Gieseler, Lehrbuch, &c. Cunningham's Transl. vol. ii. p. 20, 21. This eminent historian and critic has no hesitation in characterising the story of Pope Joan as "a fabrication of later times."—R.

³ See above sec. 3.

⁴ Bünan, Hist. Imp. German. tom. iii. p. 482, &c.; Eccard, Hist. Francie Oriental, tom. ii. lib. xxxi. p. 606, &c. (See Gieseler's Text-Book by Cunningham, vol. ii. p. 70, &c.—Mur.

dignity, Carloman and Charles the Fat, were likewise chosen by the Roman pontiff and the Italian princes. Afterwards turbulent times came on, in which those who promised most or who gave most, generally ascended the royal and imperial throne by the aid of the pontiffs.¹

7. The power of the Roman pontiffs in matters of a religious nature, was augmented with equal rapidity and success, and nearly from the same causes. The wisest and most impartial among the Roman Catholic writers acknowledge and prove, that from the time of Lewis the Meek, the ancient system of ecclesiastical law in Europe was gradually changed, and a new system introduced by the policy of the court of Rome. Kings and emperors suffered their rights in matters of religion, which had been handed down to them from Charlemagne, to be insensibly taken from them. The power of bishops to make regulations in matters of religion was prostrated, and the authority of ecclesiastical councils was diminished. For the Roman pontiffs, exulting in their prosperity and the daily accessions to their wealth, endeavoured to instil into the minds of all, and notwithstanding the opposition of the reflecting and of those acquainted with the ancient ecclesiastical constitution, they actually did instil into many the sentiment, that the bishop of Rome was constituted by Jesus Christ a legislator and judge over the whole church; and therefore that other bishops derived all their authority solely from him, and that councils could decide nothing without his direction and approbation.²

8. To bring men to listen and assent to this new system of ecclesiastical law, so very different from the previous system, there was need of ancient documents and records with which it might be enforced and defended against the assaults of opponents. Hence the Roman pontiffs procured the forgery, by their trusty friends, of conventions, acts of councils, epistles, and other documents; by which they might make it appear that, from the earliest ages of the church, the Roman pontiffs possessed the same authority and power which they now claimed.³ Among these fraudulent documents in support of the Romish power, the so-called Decretal Epistles of the pontiffs of the early centuries hold perhaps the first rank. They were produced by the ingenuity of an obscure man who falsely assumed the name of Isidore, bishop of Seville.⁴ Some vestiges of these fabricated epistles appeared in the preceding century;⁵ but they were first published and appealed to in support of the claims of the Roman pontiffs in this century.⁶ Of similar origin and value are the decrees of a Roman council said to have been held under Sylvester (A.D. 324), but

Lewis the Meek, were fabricated with the privacy and approbation of the Roman pontiffs. For who can believe that the pontiffs, who made use of these writings during many ages to substantiate their authority and their prerogatives, would have ventured to confront kings, princes, ecclesiastical councils, and bishops, with the fictions and impositions of private individuals? In that age frauds for the benefit of the church and of God were deemed lawful: so that it is not strange that the Roman pontiffs should suppose they did no moral wrong, by permitting and approving the fabrication of such papers as would be a rampart and bulwark to the see of St. Peter.

⁴ That the author of these Epistles wished to be regarded as Isidore, a distinguished Spanish bishop of the sixth century, or to speak more definitely, that he wished to make the world believe that these Epistles were collected by Isidore, is perfectly clear. See Fabricius, Biblioth. Lat. Medii Aevi, tom. v. p. 561. The bishops were accustomed in token of their humility to subjoin to their names the word peccator (sinuer); hence the author of this forgery annexed the surname Peccator to the assumed name of Isidore. Some of the transcribers, ignorant of the ancient customs and literature, corrupted this signature by exchanging Peccator for Mercator. And hence the fraudulent compiler of the Decretal Epistles is called Isidorus Mercator. [On the whole subject of these Epistles, their origin, character, and effects, see Planck's Gesch. d. Christl. Kirch. Gesch. Uebersicht, vol. ii. p. 800—28; and Gieseler's Text-Book by Cunningham, vol. ii. p. 64—69.—Mur.]

⁵ See Calmet, Hist. de Lorraine, tome i. p. 528; Böhmer, Præf. ad Novam Editionem Juris Canon. tom. i. p. 10, 19. Notes. [Fleury says of them that "they crept to light near the close of the eighth century."—Fleury, in Hist. Eccles. Diss. iv. sec. 1; and in the History itself, livr. xlv. sec. 22.—Mur.]

⁶ The spuriousness of these Epistles has been demonstrated, not only by the Centuriatores Magd.-burgenses and some others, but most learnedly and in an appropriate treatise by David Blondell, in his Pseudo-Isidorus et Turrianus rapulantes, Geneva, 1628, 4to. And at the present day the friends of the Roman pontiffs who follow reason and truth confess the cheat. See Buddeus, Tragödie in Theologium, tom. ii. p. 762. Add Constant, Prolegom. ad Epistolæ Pontificum, tom. i. p. 130, &c.; Fleury, Diss. prefixed to his Hist. Eccles. tome xvi. [and still better in his Hist. Eccles. livr. xlv. sec. 22. These Epistles bearing the names of various Romish bishops from Clement I. to Damasus I. A.D. 384, are in the early collection of councils by Binnius; but are not inserted in the Bullarium Magnum of Cherubini, published by authority of the court of Rome near the close of the seventeenth century. It is believed they are now universally given up even by the Roman Catholics. The oldest papal Epistles now admitted by any to be genuine are those collected by Dionysius Exiguus, who says he could find none by the pontiffs anterior to Symlicus, who succeeded Damasus I. A.D. 385. The earliest in the Bullarium Magnum are those of Leo I. A.D. 447.—Mur.] [The best edition of this authentic collection of bulls, &c. is that of Luxembourg in 19 vols. fol. 1727—1758. There is now in course of publication at Rome a continuation of this collection, of which 10 vols. fol. have already appeared, A.D. 1835—47 and that portion of the 12th vol. which is published brings down these public documents of the Roman court to July, 1804.—R.]

¹ This is illustrated by Sigonius, De Regno Italia, and by the other writers of German and Italian history.

² See the excellent work of an unknown writer who signs himself D. B. entitled, Hist. du Droit Ecclesiast. Publique François; first published, London, 1737, 2 vols. 8vo, and lately republished splendidly in a larger form. The author neatly and acutely points out the steps by which the Roman pontiffs advanced their power. Of the ninth century he treats in vol. i. p. 160, &c. [Bower's Lives of the Popes, vols. iv. and v.; Planck, Gesch. d. Christl. Kirch. Gesellschafts-Verfassung, vols. ii. and iii.—Mur.]

³ It is no improbable supposition that these and other documents, such as the donations of Constantine and which was never heard of by any one till the ninth century, and than which nothing could be better suited to enrich and exalt above all human authority the Roman pontiff.¹

9. There were indeed among the western bishops some discerning men who perceived that designs were formed against them and the church; in particular, the French bishops vigorously opposed the admission of these Epistles, and other spurious productions, among the received books of ecclesiastical law. But these men were overcome by the pertinacity of the Roman pontiffs, especially by Nicholas I. And as in the subsequent times all science and learning forsook the Roman world, there scarcely remained any one able or even disposed to controvert these pious frauds. How great the evils to which they gave rise, and how audaciously the Roman pontiffs abused them to overthrow the ancient system of church government, to weaken the authority of bishops, to increase their own revenues and emoluments, and to abridge the prerogatives of kings and princes, numberless facts in the history of the subsequent centuries will show. Nor is this denied at the present day by respectable and honest men, even though in other respects favourably disposed towards the Romish church and its supreme head.²

10. The estimation in which a monastic life was held was astonishingly great, both in the eastern and western empire. In the former, this excessive estimation had long existed; but among the Latins, it dates only from the preceding century. Hence even kings and dukes and counts, abandoning their honours and their wealth, voluntarily retired to monasteries, to devote themselves to the service of God. Of this a large number of examples occurred in Italy, France, Spain, and Germany, during this century; and there were several also in the preceding century. Those who in their lifetime could not bring themselves to the resolution of abandoning society, would yet demand the monastic garb when dying, and actually put it on before they left the world, that they might enjoy the prayers and spiritual succours of the fraternity among whom they were received. Another and a striking proof of the high estimation in which monks were held, was the custom of the emperors and kings of the Franks in this century of calling monks and abbots to their courts, and intrusting them with civil affairs and business of great moment, both at home and in foreign countries. For those unsuspecting princes thought that no persons could more safely be entrusted with the management of public affairs, than men of such sanctity and piety—men who had subdued all their natural desires and become free from all concupiscence. Hence it is that in the history of these times we read of so many abbots and monks who performed the functions of ambassadors, commissioners or extraordinary judges, and ministers of state, often indeed successfully, but not seldom unsuccessfully.

11. And yet those who conferred such honours upon monks and the monastic life, did not deny that most of that class led vicious lives; and they laboured to reform their morals and render them obedient to their monastic rules. The efforts of Lewis the Meek, especially, in this particular deserve notice. That emperor employed Benedict, abbot of Aniane and afterwards of Indre, a man distinguished for piety and the fear of God, to reform the monasteries, first in Aquitaine and then throughout the kingdom of France, and to purge them of the enormous vices which had crept into them; and afterwards in the council [of abbots assembled] at Aix-la-Chapelle A.D. 817, in which the same Benedict presided, he caused excellent canons to be enacted for restoring the prostrate discipline of the monasteries. This Benedict therefore who has been called the second father of the western monks, subjected all of them to the single rule of St. Benedict of Monte Cassino, suppressing all diversities of rites and customs and introducing one uniform rule; he also banished the grosser vices from the monasteries; and he brought all associations of monks, who had before been bound together by no ties, to become in a sense one body or society.¹ This discipline flourished for a while, but from various causes it gradually declined; and at the end of this century such devastations had everywhere occurred both in church and state, that only some slight traces of it remained in a few places.

¹ See Launoi, De Cura Ecclesie erga Pauperes et Miseros, cap. i. observ. 1. p. 576, of his Opp. tom. ii. par. ii. [Likewise Cabassut, Notitia Eccles. p. 132, and Pagi, Critica in Baron. ad ann. 324, sec. 17, 18, who do not hesitate to pronounce this council a fiction.—Mur. [The view of these decretals and other forgeries taken by German Roman Catholics of the present day may be seen in Döllinger's History of the Church, translated by Cox. vol. ii. p. 197, &c. He admits them to be spurious, but the reasons he assigns for their having been forged are different from those usually put forward by the French Romanist writers.—R.]

² See Launoi, De Regia Potestate in Causis Matrimonial. in his Opp. tom. par. ii. p. 764; and Constant, Prof. ad Epist. Rom. Pontif. tom. i. p. 127, &c. [Fleury, Diss. vii. sec. 5, in Hist. Eccles. [Latin trans.] says:—"Falsis Isidori Decretales, circa octavi finem sæculi invecæ, jurisdictionem ecclesiasticam in tribus articulis admodum concusserunt, scilicet quoad concilia, judicia episcoporum, et appellationes." See also diss. iv. sec. 1, &c.; De Marca, De Concordia Sacerd. et Imp. lib. vii. cap. xx. sec. 1, &c. "Sub secunda Regum nostrorum dynastia novum jus canonicum in ecclesiam Gallicanam, æque ac in ceteras Occidentis provincias, introduci ceptum est, inventis eam in rem suppositis illis veterum Pontificum Romanorum epistolis. In quibus extant quam plurima constituta prorsus adversa veterum canonum statutis." But while these and other Catholic writers trace the commencement of a great revolution in the constitution of the Catholic church to the Decretal Epistles, and other forgeries of the eighth and ninth centuries, they say it was only the commencement; for the revolution was not completed till after the publication of the Decretum of Gratian in the twelfth century.—Mur.

12. The order of canons, which was devised by Chrodegang and had been extensively introduced in the preceding century, Lewis the Meek cherished with great care and extended through all the provinces of his empire. He also added an order of canonesses, which had been unknown in the Christian world till that time.² For both he caused rules to be drawn up in the council of Aix-la-Chapelle, A.D. 817, superseding the rule of Chrodegang; and these new rules continued to be followed in most of the convents of canons and canonesses till the twelfth century, although they were disagreeable to the court of Rome. The compiler of the rule for canons was undoubtedly Amalarius, a presbyter of Metz; but whether he also drew up that for canonesses is uncertain.³ From this time onward numerous convents of canons and canonesses were founded in every part of Europe, and endowed with ample revenues by pious individuals. But this institution degenerated like the others, and very soon became widely different from what it was designed to be.⁴

13. Of the writers among the Greeks the following were the most distinguished. Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, a man of superior talents and of various and extensive knowledge. His Bibliotheca,⁵ Epistles, and other writings are yet highly valuable. Nicphorus, also patriarch of Constantinople, who wrote against the opposers of images and some other monks they should avoid all vices and practise virtue. They should live in well secured cloisters containing dormitories, refectories, and other necessary apartments. The number of canons in each cloister should be proportioned to the exigencies of the church to which it belonged. In their dress they should avoid the extravagances of ornament and finery, and likewise uncleanness and negligence, &c. The second part of the rule relates to canonesses, and contains twenty-eight articles. The first six are extracts from the fathers, and relate to the duties of ladies who consecrate themselves to God. They may have private property, yet must commit the management of it to some kinsman or friend by a public act or assignment. They may also have waiting-maids, and eat in the refectory and sleep in the dormitory. They are to be veiled and to dress in black. Their business must be prayer, reading, and labouring with their hands; and especially they must fabricate their own clothing from the flax and wool given to them.—Mur.

⁴ Calmet, Hist. de Lorraine, tome i. p. 591; Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iv. p. 536, &c.

⁵ See Camusat, Hist. des Journaux, tome i. p. 87, &c. [Photius was of noble parentage, well educated, and perhaps the greatest genius of his age. He certainly was a great scholar. While in civil life he cultivated all learning sacred and profane. He was commander of the imperial body-guards, first senator of Constantinople, and chief private secretary to the emperor. He was also employed on embassies. During a Syrian embassy he wrote his famous Bibliotheca or Μυσιόγραφος, giving a critical account of 280 authors whom he had read, and frequently also summaries of their contents with considerable extracts. As many of these authors are no longer extant, the account of them by Photius is extremely valuable. In the year 858 the emperor Michael III. deposed Ignatius, the patriarch of Constantinople; and Photius was ordained sub-deacon, deacon, priest, and patriarch, in four successive days. The friends of Ignatius and the bishops of Rome refused to acknowledge Photius as a legitimate patriarch. Yet he held the office till A.D. 867, when having offended the emperor, he was deposed and Ignatius was restored. But in the year 877 Ignatius died, and Photius again took the chair till A.D. 886, when the new emperor, Leo the Philosopher, deposed and banished him to a convent in Armenia, where he died about A.D. 890. The Bibliotheca of Photius, Gr. and Lat. with the notes of Hæschellus (the very faulty Latin by Schott), was first published 1601, fol. and has been several times reprinted. The latest edition is that by Bekker, Berlin, 1824, in 2 vols. 4to. His treatise against the new Manichæans or Paulicians, is in Wolfius Anerdota Græca, and in Gallandius Biblioth. Vet. Patrum, tom. xiii. p. 603, &c. His Epistles to the number of 248 were published, Gr. and Lat. by R. Montague, Lon. 1651, fol. His Nomocanon or collection of canons, with the Commentary of Balsamon, was published, Gr. and Lat. by both the Justells; the last in his Biblioth. Juris Canon. Paris, 1602, tom. ii. p. 789. Several additional letters and tracts have crept to light in different collections; but his extensive commentaries on Scripture, his large lexicon, and several smaller works remain still in MS. For an account of his writings see Fabricius, Biblioth. Græca, vol. ix. p. 311—519. Of his public life and the controversies in which he was involved, notice will be taken in the next chapter, sect. 27, &c.—Mur.]

¹ See Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. sæcul. iv. par. i. præf. p. 27, and præf. ad sæcul. v. par. xxv. also his Annal. Ord. S. Bened. tom. ii. p. 430, &c. and many other places in that volume; Calmet, Hist. de Lorraine, tome i. p. 596. Concerning Benedict of Aniane and his merits generally, see the Acta Sanctor. tom. ii. Febr. p. 606, and Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iv. p. 447, &c. [Also the Life of Benedict by Ardo, one of his disciples, in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. sæcul. iv. par. i. tom. v. p. 183—215. This Benedict appears to have been a very sincere man and a great reformer of the monasteries; that is, one who brought them to greater uniformity in dress, living, worship, and usages. He was himself most rigorous in voluntary mortifications; and the rule of St. Benedict he revered, as if it had come immediately from God and was the only true guide to heaven.—Mur.]

² See Mabillon, Annal. Ord. Bened. tom. ii. p. 428, &c.

³ Thomassin, Disciplina Eccles. Vet. et Nova, par. i. lib. iii. cap. xlii. xliii. &c.; Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Medii Ævi, tom. v. p. 185, 540, &c. and all the writers who treat of the order of canons, though they are not all of equal value. The least worthy of credit are those who, belonging themselves to the order of canons, have treated of the origin and progress of that order; as e.g. Raymund Chapponel, Hist. des Chanoines, Paris, 1699, 8vo. For these writers are so attached to the order that they usually trace its origin back to Christ himself and his Apostles, or at least to the first ages of the Christian church. [This ordinance of Lewis for regulating the order of canons is in Harduin, Concilia, tom. iv. p. 1055—1180. The following abstract by Schlegel contains its most essential features:—"It contains 145 articles, of which the first 114 are mere extracts from the fathers, and acts of councils describing the duties of bishops and priests. These are followed by two sermons of Augustine on living in associations. Then commence the rules framed by this council. First the prevailing error, that the prescriptions of the Gospel were obligatory only upon monks and clergymen, is confuted; and then the distinction between monks and canons is defined. The latter may wear linen, eat flesh, hold private property, and enjoy that of the church; the former cannot. Yet equally with the works.¹ Theodorus Studites is likewise indebted to the controversy respecting images, for the greater part of his reputation among those who have come after him.² Not much better or more learned were Theodorus Graptus, who suffered much in defence of image-worship;³ Methodius, entitled the Confessor, because no penalties or pressure could induce him to abandon the defence of images;⁴ Theodorus Abucara;⁵ Petrus Siculus;⁶ Nicetas David,⁷ and others, whose names would perhaps have not been handed down to this day, had not the Greeks been involved in contests with the Latins on several subjects, and among themselves respecting image-worship.—Among the Syrians the name of Moses Barcephala is famous, and not undeservedly. For he possessed genius and skill in writing beyond most others, as his works evince.⁸

nus, Annal. tom. ix; and in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xxii.—Mur.

⁷ Nicetas David, a learned bishop of Paphlagonia, flourished about A.D. 880, and was strongly attached to the party of Ignatius, whose life he composed full of reproaches against Photius. He also wrote encomiums on the twelve apostles and several other saints, a defence of the synod of Chalcedon, and a commentary on some parts of Gregory Naz. His life of Ignatius was published, Gr. and Lat. with the Acts of the eighth general Council, Ingol. 1604, 4to; and in Harduin, Concilia, tom. v. p. 944—1009.—Mur.

⁸ Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vatic. tom. ii. p. 127, &c. [Moses Barcephala was a Syrian bishop of Beth-Raman, and inspector of the churches in Babylonia. He probably flourished near the close of this century; Cave says about A.D. 900. His three books, De Paradiso, in a Latin translation from the Syriac by Masius, were published, Antw. 1569, 8vo; and then in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xvii. p. 456.—Mur.]

The Greek writers omitted by Mosheim are the following:—

Nicephorus, Charthophylax, who flourished perhaps A.D. 801 and wrote two Epistles to Theodosius, a monk of Corinth, containing solutions of several difficult questions in ethics; extant, Gr. and Lat. in the Jus Gr. et Roman. lib. v. p. 341, and Lat. in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xii.

Josephus, archbishop of Thessalonica, brother of Theodorus Studites and also a zealot for image-worship. He was deposed A.D. 809, exiled, and died after A.D. 816. Gretzer (De Cruce, tom. ii. p. 1200) has published, Gr. and Lat. an Oration of his on the Exaltation of the Holy Cross; and Baronius (Annal. ad ann. 808, sec. 22) has given us an Epistle of his in Latin.

Ignatius, a grammarian and deacon at Constantinople and then metropolitan of Nice. He flourished A.D. 810 and was alive A.D. 828. His life of the patriarch Tarasius is extant, Lat. in Surius and in Bolland on Feb. 25th. His life of the patriarch Nicephorus was published, Gr. and Lat. by Henschenius and Papebroch, on March 12th.

Naucratius, a monk of Constantinople, very active in favour of image-worship for which he was often imprisoned. He flourished from A.D. 813 till after A.D. 820. Several letters addressed to him are given us by Baronius; and a very long one containing an account of the sufferings of the image-worshippers is inserted, Latin, in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xiv. p. 903. Cave (Hist. Lit. tom. ii.) gives a specimen of the Greek, but did not deem it worth publishing entire.

Theophanes, the brother of Theodorus Chlaptus (see note 3, on this page), and of the same character, conduct, and fortune. Yet he became metropolitan of Nice about A.D. 845. We have a Hymn consisting of nine odes in memory of his brother; edited by Combes, Gr. and Lat. in his Orig. Constantinop. p. 224.

Michael Syncellus, leader of the choir at Constantinople, a zealot for image-worship, in which cause he suffered much. He flourished about A.D. 830, and wrote an Encomium on St. Dionysius Areop. which is extant, Gr. and Lat. in the Opp. Dionys. Areop. tom. ii. p. 207; also an Encomium on the holy angels and archangels of God, extant, Gr. and Lat. in Combes, Auctor. Nor. tom. i. p. 1525.

George Hamartolus, an Archimandrite, who flourished about A.D. 842, and wrote a Chronicon from the creation to A.D. 842, which still exists in MS. From it the succeeding chronologists, Cedrenus, Theophanes, Glycas, &c. have copied all that is valuable.

Ignatius, son of the emperor Michael Curopalata, castrated and banished by Leo the Armenian, lived a monk about thirty years, was made patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 847, quarrelled with Barda, and was

¹ See the Acta Sanctor. tom. ii. Martii, ad diem xiii. p. 293; Oudin, Scriptoria Eccles. tom. ii. p. 2, &c. [Nicephorus, after being secretary of state at Constantinople and in high honour, retired from the world and became a monk. He was learned, devout, and exceedingly zealous for image-worship. He was made patriarch of Constantinople A.D. 806, but was expelled his see ten years after by the emperor Leo V. who was opposed to image-worship, and died in exile A.D. 828. His best work is a Compendious History from Maurice A.D. 600, to A.D. 769, extant in the Corpus Hist. Byzantine. He also wrote a Chronologia Tripartita or a Catalogue of public men among the Hebrews, Greeks, Latins, &c. and a Συναγωγία or Index of canonical, ecclesiastical, and apocryphal books; annexing to each the number of lines (στίχοι) it contained. Besides these historical works he wrote a long Epistle to Pope Leo III. containing his creed, several small collections of canons, and a number of books in defence of image-worship.—Mur.

² Theodorus Studites was born at Constantinople A.D. 759, became a monk in 781, and abbot in 794, and four years after head of the monastery of Studium in Constantinople, whence his surname Studites. He was zealous even to madness in favour of image-worship; and for thirty years was the instigator of rebellions, and the dauntless leader of them (when out of prison) against the government which was opposed to image-worship. He died A.D. 826 aged 67. Besides a few tracts on monky and monkish saints, he has left us 134 catechetical Discourses, and a vast number of inflammatory letters in defence of image-worship, most of which or at least parts of them Baronius has inserted in his Annals. He was a man of some learning and talent, but wasted all his strength on the controversy respecting images.—Mur.

³ Theodorus Graptus was a monk of Palestine, went to Constantinople A.D. 818, to plead the cause of image-worship; was banished four times for his abuse of emperors and others and his seditious movements in favour of images; and at last died in exile about A.D. 840. He has left us a Dispute, an Epistle, and Creed, all in defence of images.—Mur.

⁴ Methodius Confessor was well born at Syracuse in Sicily, went to Constantinople, and there became a monk. About A.D. 820 the patriarch sent him as his envoy to Rome. Here he was guilty of adultery and did penance. Returning to Constantinople he became very zealous in defence of image-worship, was banished and imprisoned and whipped. But in 842 he was made patriarch of Constantinople. He died A.D. 847, and has left us five orations in praise of monky, and a collection of Canones Pœnitentiales. Some of his orations have passed for works of Methodius Patensis who flourished A.D. 290.—Mur.

⁵ Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome i. p. 35, &c. art. Abucaras. [The word Abucara signifies bishop of Caria. He followed the party of Photius, but afterwards renounced it and joined that of Ignatius. According to Cave he flourished A.D. 867. He has left us about forty Dissertations, doctrinal and polemic, against heretics, Jews, and Muhammedans, which were published, Gr. and Lat. by Gret. with the Hodegus of Anastasius, Ingol. 1606, 4to.—Mur.]

⁶ Petrus Siculus (flourished A.D. 392) was a learned nobleman whom the emperor Basil I. sent to negotiate an exchange of prisoners in Armenia. There he became acquainted with the sect of the new Manichæans or Paulicians, the history of whose origin, progress, and decline he afterwards composed; published Gr. and Lat. Ingol. 1604, 4to, and partially in Latin, by Baro-

14. At the head of the Latin writers may justly be placed Rabanus Maurus, whose last office was that of archbishop of Mentz. He was the common preceptor of Germany and France, with whom no one in this century can be compared, either for genius or extent of learning or the multitude of books he composed. Whoever acquaints himself with the opinions of Rabanus Maurus, learns all that the best of the Latins thought and believed for about four centuries; for his writings were in the hands of all the learned.¹ Agobard of Lyons, a man of character and discernment and not destitute of learning, would have deserved more commendation, if he had not been a defender of the rebellion of the sons of Lewis the Meek against their own father.² Hilduin obtained notoriety by his work entitled *Areopagitica*³ Eginhard, abbot of Seligenstadt, the celebrated author of the life of Charlemagne and of other works, was particularly attentive to the elegance of deposed and banished A.D. 858. In the year 867 Photius, his competitor, was deposed and Ignatius restored. He died in 878 aged 80 years. Two letters and one discourse of his are extant, Latin, in Harduin, Concilia, tom. v. p. 791, 872, 937.

Metrophanes, metropolitan of Smyrna, A.D. 858, 859, and A.D. 867—880. He was a strenuous opposer of Photius and rose as he fell. He has left us a letter giving us the history of Photius from A.D. 858 to 870, which is extant, in Latin, in Baronius, Annales, ad ann. 870, sec. 453, and Gr. and Lat. in Harduin, Concilia, tom. v. p. 1111.

Basil the Macedonian, Greek emperor from A.D. 867—886. He wrote exhortations to his son Leo, some orations, addresses, and epistles, still extant, besides some things which are lost.

Michael Psellus, a philosopher who flourished A.D. 870, is supposed to have written some of the pieces which go under the name of another Michael Psellus who lived in the eleventh century; particularly a paraphrase on most of the books of Aristotle, a Dialogue on the operations of demons, a tract concerning demons, &c.

Stylanus, surnamed Maja, metropolitan of Neocesarea in the Provincia Euphratensis, who flourished about A.D. 870. He was a strong partisan of Ignatius in opposition to Photius, for which he suffered a temporary deprivation of his see. He has left us two Epistles Gr. and Lat. in Harduin, Concilia, tom. v. p. 1122, 1130.

Michael, the monk, Syncellus to the patriarch, Ignatius, flourished A.D. 874, and wrote an Encomium on Ignatius, extant, Gr. and Lat. in Harduin, Concilia, tom. v. p. 1069, and a life of Theodorus Studites, from which Baronius in his Annales has made various extracts.

George, chartophylax of the great church at Constantinople, and archbishop of Nicomedia about A.D. 880. He was a warm friend of Photius. Several orations and some poems of his in praise of saints are extant, Gr. and Lat. in Combès, Auctor. Nov. Paris, 1648, tom. i. p. 995.

Leo the Philosopher, Greek emperor from A.D. 886 to A.D. 911. He has left us sixteen sacred orations, some letters and tracts, Προσφωνοὶ καὶ βιβλὶον Delectus Legum in ix. Tituli, a huge digest of the laws of the Greek empire, published, Paris, 1647, Gr. and Lat. in 7 vols. fol. Noellæ Constitutiones iii. and Tactica seu de Re Militari.

Nicolaus, surnamed Mysticus, patriarch of Constantinople from A.D. 892 to A.D. 903, when he was deposed and banished for opposing the divorce of the empress and the marriage of another. But in 911 he was restored and lived till 924. He has left us eight Epistles, extant in the Concilia, or in Baronius, Annales.—Mur.

¹ See the Acta Sanctorum. tom. i. Febr. p. 500; Hist. Littér. de la France, tome v. p. 151. [Also Mabillon, Acta Sanctorum. Ord. Bened. tom. vi. p. 1—45. Rabanus, or Irabanus, surnamed Maurus, was of French extract and born of respectable parentage at Mentz, A.D. 776. He studied first at Fulda, where he was made deacon in 801. The next year he removed to Tours to study under the famous Alcuin. After one or two years he returned to Fulda, and was made head of the school there at the age of twenty-five. As an instructor he was so celebrated as to draw young men of talents from a great distance. Among his pupils were

Walafrid Strabo, Servatus Lupus, and others, who were among the first scholars of their age. In the year 822 he was made abbot of Fulda, in which office he was for a time popular; but at length the monks complained that he was so engaged in writing books as to neglect his active duties. He now resigned his abbacy and retired to a literary life. This was in 842. Five years after he was made archbishop of Mentz; in which office he continued till his death A.D. 857. He wrote commentaries on all the canonical books and several of the apocryphal; also, sermons, letters, and tracts.—Most of his works as published are comprised in 6 vols. fol. Cologne, 1627.—Mur. [This celebrated writer is entitled to a more extended notice than is here given. Those who are desirous to obtain further information on his life, character, and works, will find the amplest details in Bähr, Geschichte der Röm. Littér. suppl. vol. part. iii. p. 415—443. For a brief notice of his poetical writings see the same vol. p. 105. See also Conringius, De Scripturis, sive. ix. cap. i. p. 104, and Brucker, Hist. Crit. Phil. tom. i. p. 612.—R.]

² Colonia, Hist. Littér. de la Ville de Lyon, tome ii. p. 93; Nouveau Dictionnaire Histor. Critique, tome i. p. 178; Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iv. p. 667, &c. [and Cave's Hist. Littér. tom. ii. Agobard was a Frank, called from Spain to be coadjutor of Leidrad, archbishop of Lyons A.D. 813, whom he afterwards succeeded. He was a man of an ardent, independent mind, of great learning and inflexibility. He attacked the superstitions of the age, so far as he discovered them, with boldness; was very zealous against the Jews, to whom the French kings were disposed to grant privileges; and taking sides with Lothaire and Pepin against their father, Lewis the Meek, he went so far that on a reconciliation between those sovereigns he was deprived of his bishopric. However he was restored and held his office till his death in 840. He attacked Felix of Urgel, wrote against image-worship, against the trial by ordeal, and against the belief that evil spirits can produce storms and hail and thunder; and when some pretended witches were arraigned before him he caused them to be whipped till they confessed that they deceived the people in order to gain a livelihood. His works were first published by Masson, Paris, 1605, 8vo; and much better, together with those of Leidrad his predecessor and Amulo his successor, by Baluze, Paris, 1666, 2 vols. 8vo.—Mur. [And in Galland's Biblioth. Vet. Patr. tom. xiii. p. 405, &c. On his life and writings see Bähr, Geschichte der Röm. Littér. suppl. vol. part. iii. p. 383, &c.; Brucker, Hist. Crit. Phil. tom. iii. p. 629.—R.]

³ Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iv. p. 607 [and Cave, Hist. Littér. tom. ii. Hilduin was made abbot of St. Denys about A.D. 814, and of St. Germain near Paris in 816; also arch-chaplain of the palace. After being in great favour with Lewis the Meek, he joined the rebellion of his sons and was deprived of his offices, and banished to Corbey in Saxony A.D. 830. But soon after he was restored to his Parisian abbeys. Lewis now directed him to write a full history of St. Dionysius, the founder of his monastery and the reputed first bishop of Paris. This Hilduin executed in his famous Areopagitica. He there makes Dionysius the Areopagite, mentioned Acts xvii. 34, after being bishop of Athens, to have travelled to Rome, thence to Arles, and at last to Paris where he founded the monastery of St. Denys (Dionysius), converted vast numbers, was bishop of that region, and at length suffered martyrdom in the reign of Donitian. To him also he ascribes all the works which go under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite. This is his famous Areopagitica, a mere bundle of idle tales once indeed generally believed, but now universally rejected.—Mur.]

his style and was not destitute of other excellences.¹ Claudius of Turin is in reputation at this day for his exposition of certain books of Scripture, and for his Chronology.² Freculphus of Lisieux, whose Chronicon is still extant compiled almost entirely in the very words of the ancient writers.³ Servatus Lupus, whose

¹ Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iv. p. 550; and his Life of Charlemagne, as published by Schinnecko. [See above, p. 276; note 2.—Mur.]

² See Simon, Critique de la Biblioth. Eccles. de M. Du Pin, tome i. p. 281. [Claudius was a native of Spain, and educated under Felix of Urgel. In 812 or 813 he became a presbyter in the court of Lewis the Meek, and commenced writing commentaries. In 821 Lewis made him bishop of Turin. He immediately set himself against all image-worship, and even removed and destroyed the pictures and images throughout his diocese. This excited strong opposition and involved him in controversy all his life. Yet he persevered, denounced image-worship as idolatry, denied that the cross was to be honoured, disapproved of pilgrimages, questioned the supremacy of the pope, &c. Hence some have considered him as a great reformer, and as the founder of the sect of the Waldenses. He certainly opposed some of the superstitions of the age; and probably contributed to preserve more independence of the pope and greater purity of doctrine and worship in the Alpine countries, than in most other parts of Europe. The catholics have never been partial to him. Indeed they tax him with great errors. Yet he was never arraigned as a heretic, nor removed from his bishopric till his death about A.D. 839. His commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians is in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xiv. p. 134. His other commentaries, though not inferior perhaps to those of Rabanus, still lie in MS. Probably they are unfavourable to popery, for it appears that he maintained the original parity of bishops and presbyters. He wrote on Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, on the Gospel of Matthew, on the Epistles of Paul, a short Scripture Chronology, and tracts on the worship of images and saints which are lost except large fragments quoted by his antagonists. See Cave, Hist. Liter.; Fleury, Hist. Eccles. livr. xvii. chap. xx. xxi. Schrockh, Kirchengesch. vol. xxiii. p. 281, 407, &c. and Milner's Church Hist. cent. ix. chap. iii.—Mur. [See Simon, Hist. Crit. des principaux comment. du Nœ. Test. p. 353. The Præfationes of Claud, to his exposition of Leviticus and of the Epistle to the Ephesians, and his Dieta in Leviticum on Matthew's Gospel are given by Mabillon, Vet. Anal. tom. i. p. 40. Attention has been recently directed to his unpublished works; see Rudelbach, Claudii Taur. Epist. ineditorum operum specimina, with a preliminary dissertation on his doctrines and works, Copen. 1824, 8vo. His Prologus to his commentaries on St. Paul's Epistles has been lately published by Cardinal Mai in his Scriptorum Vet. nom. collectio, tom. vii. p. 274. Respecting this remarkable man, whose character has been viewed under opposing aspects by Romanists and Protestants, Bähr, Ges. der Röm. Lit. Suppl. vol. part. iii. p. 372, refers to Oudin's, Comment. de Script. Eccl. tom. ii. p. 27, &c. Nicol. Anton. Biblioth. Vet. Hist. tom. vi. p. 5; Tiraboschi, Storia della letterat. Ital. vol. iii. p. 205, &c.; and some other authorities.—R.]

³ Freculphus was a Benedictine monk of Fulda, and was made bishop before A.D. 824. Lewis the Meek sent him as an envoy to the pope A.D. 829. He was present in various councils A.D. 829, 835, 837, 846, and 849, and died about A.D. 850. His Chronicon is in twelve books; the first seven extend from the creation to the Christian era, the other five reach to A.D. 606. The work was published, Cologne, 1639, fol. Heidelb. 1697, 8vo, and in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xiv. p. 1061.—Mur. [See also Bähr, Geschichte der Röm. Lit. Suppl. vol. part. iii. p. 181. Freculphus was not a mere chronicler and compiler; he had also a high character for learning. Trithemius describes him as "vix in divinis scripturis studiosissimus et valde peritus, atque in docenda plebe satis idoneus, non minus conversatione quam scientia insignis." Of the first or scriptural portion of his Chronicon, Sigbertus Gemblacensis in

Epistles and tracts are still extant, ranks among the most agreeable writers of those times; nor was he so much lacking in acuteness of mind as in elegance and extent of learning.⁴ Drepanius Florus, called also Florus Magister, has left us Poems, Expositions of some books of Scripture, and a few other writings.⁵ Christian Druthmar expounded the Gospel of St. Matthew.⁶

his De Script. Eccles. cap. xc. says:—"Difficultatem etiam intercurrentium questionum enodare non neglexit et Interponendo divina historia secularis historias, contemporaneitates regnorum sibi coaptans, consummavit hoc opus in septem libris."—R.

⁴ Hist. Littér. de la France, tome v. p. 255. [Lupus surnamed Servatus was a French Benedictine monk of Ferrara. From about A.D. 828 he spent eight years at Fulda under Rabanus; then some time at Seligenstadt with Eglinhard. He next went to court, and in 842 was made abbot of Ferrara. He was in several councils and once envoy to Rome. His death was after A.D. 861. He wrote Libro de Tribus Questionibus, free will, predestination, and the superabundance of Christ's merits; also a Collectaneum on the same subjects, the life of St. Wighbert, the life of St. Massimin of Treves, and one hundred and thirty Epistles; all well edited by Baluze, Paris, 1664, 8vo, and then in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xiv. p. 1.—Mosheim's account of his style seems not very consistent. Lupus wrote in an easy, flowing style, tolerably chaste for that age, but not very vigorous nor very brilliant, yet on the whole agreeable.—Mur. [His works appeared in an improved edition at Antwerp, 1710, 8vo. Du Pin in his Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccles. tome vii. p. 175, gives a still more favourable view of his learning and his style of composition. "En considérant Loup comme docteur ecclésiastique, je puis dire que non seulement il étoit très versé dans les belles lettres et dans les sciences profanes, mais aussi dans la doctrine et dans la discipline de l'Eglise, et dans les écrits des pères latins; et qu'il n'écrivoit pas seulement avec pureté, avec agrément et avec politesse, mais aussi avec beaucoup de solidité d'esprit et de justesse." Bähr, a still more competent critic of Latin style, describes this opinion of Du Pin as "ein gerechtes und nicht wohl zu bestreitendes Urtheil;" and he afterwards speaks in very decided terms of the eloquence and purity of Lupus's epistolary style:—"welcher die lateinische sprache mit eben so grosser Leichtigkeit als selbst Zierlichkeit zu behandeln verstand." Geschichte der Röm. Lit. Suppl. vol. part. iii. p. 457 and 459.—R.]

⁵ Colonia, Hist. Littér. de Lyon, tome ii. p. 135; Hist. Littér. de la France, tome v. p. 213, &c. [Florus was a deacon in the church at Lyons, and flourished about A.D. 837, yet he was a writer as late as A.D. 862. His commentaries on all the epistles of Paul are printed as the work of Bede. They are a compilation from Cyprian, Hilary, Ambrose, and about nine other fathers. He also wrote on the canon of the mass, on using compulsion with the Jews, on the election and duties of a bishop, a commentary on the Psalms, three books on predestination against John Scotus, nine poetic paraphrases of some psalms, Hymns, and Epitaphs, and five other poems. Some of these are published in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. viii. and xv. Mabillon, Analect. tom. iv.; D'Achery, Sacileg. tom. xli.; Maignan, Vindicie Gratie, &c. tom. i. &c. The rest were never printed.—Mur. [See a full account of his life and an analysis of his various works in Bähr, Gesch. der Röm. Lit. Suppl. vol. part. iii. p. 447, &c.—R.]

⁶ Hist. Littér. de la France, tome v. p. 84. [Druthmar was a French Benedictine monk of Corbeiy and flourished about A.D. 840. His commentary on Matthew is so opposed to the doctrine of transubstantiation that the friends of that doctrine have laboured hard to prove the work corrupted by the Lutherans, but in vain, for it was first published before Luther began to assail popery in the year 1514, by Edm. Albertin. It is now in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xv. p. 86. See Cave, Hist. Liter. tom. ii.—Mur. [I cannot find an edition of Druthmar's Commentary, by E. Albertin, though it is also quoted in Davidson's Sacred Hermen.

Godeschalvus, a monk of Orbais, is rendered immortal by the controversies respecting divine grace and predestination to which he gave rise.¹ Paschasius Radbert, a man of fame in the controversies respecting the Lord's supper, has left us beside other works a book on that subject, which afforded matter for a long debate in that age.² Bertram or Ratramn, a monk of Corbey, was the principal antagonist of Radbert. His tract on the Lord's supper, drawn up by order of Charles the Bald, occasioned likewise much debate among the learned.³ Haymo of Halberstadt wrote books of various sorts, which are specimens rather of industry than of genius and learning.⁴ Walafrid Strabo deserved well of the church in that age by his Poems, his Lives of Saints, and his Exposition of difficult passages of Scripture.⁵ Hincmar of Rheims deserves a very honourable place among the Latin writers of this century. For his writings on various subjects show that his mind was not of the ordinary class, but elevated, independent, and zealous for

p. 168. The edition of 1514 was at Strasburg by Jacobus Wimpelingus. See also Bähr, ubi supra, p. 401.

¹ See below, chap. III. sec. 22, 23, of this century, Godeschalvus or Gotteschalvus was of Saxon origin, and educated in the monastery of Fulda. When arrived at manhood he wished no longer to lead a monastic life; but was compelled to it on the ground that his father had devoted him to such a life in his childhood, and that no human power could vacate the transaction. He now removed to Orbais, was ordained a presbyter, and was so distinguished as a scholar that he was surnamed Fulgentius. Upon some disaffection between him and the bishop of the diocese, he travelled to Italy and thence to Dalmatia and Pannonia. Augustine was his favourite author, and he now began to advance the opinions of Augustine respecting divine grace and a twofold predestination. Many favoured those views, but more were opposed to them. The synod of Meutz A.D. 847 condemned his sentiments; and the president, Rabanus Maurus, sent him to Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims, to whose diocese he belonged. The next year he was arraigned before the synod of Chiersey, condemned, degraded; and shut up by Hincmar in the monastery of Huuteville; and after twenty-one years' confinement died in prison. He persevered to the last in his opinions and was denied Christian burial. He wrote two statements of his faith, a longer and a shorter, both of which are extant. In one of them he offered to be cast into boiling water or oil, and to stake the truth of his doctrine on the issue. He also wrote a letter or two and a tract on predestination; but they are lost. See Cave's Hist. Liter. Mauguin, Vindicie Prædestinationis et Gratie, tom. II. p. 45, &c.; Cellot, Hist. Gotteschali Prædestinationarii; Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xxiv. p. 5, &c. Milner, Church Hist. cent. IX. chap. IV.—Mur. (See also Ussher's tract, Gotteschali et Prædest. Controv. ab eo mota historia, &c. Dub. 1631, 4to. At the end he published for the first time the two Confessions of Gotteschalvus, which are reprinted by Mauguin in his Veter. Auctor. de Prædest. et Gratia, &c. tom. I. p. 5. Various other authorities ancient and modern, referring to this persecuted monk and his controversies, may be seen in Bähr, ubi supra, p. 480.—R.

² Paschasius Radbert was a French monk born about A.D. 788. In the year 844 he became abbot of Corbey in France. He was a member of the synod of Chiersey which condemned Godeschalvus A.D. 849; and died Apr. 26, A.D. 861. The Protestants regard him as the man who introduced the doctrine of transubstantiation into the Romish church. Berengarius taxed him with this, and even Bellarmine (De Script. Eccles. p. 288) says: Hic auctor primus fuit, qui serio et copiose scripsit de veritate corporis et sanguinis Domini in Eucharistia. But Mabillon (Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. VI. præf. p. IX. &c.) endeavours to confute this charge. He wrote expositions of Matthew, of the book of Lamentations, of the 41th Psalm, De Sacramento Corporis et Sanguinis D.N. Jesu, ad Prædictum Liber;—De Corpore et Sangu. Domini, ad Frustrandum Eristola; the life of St. Adalhard, the passion of SS. Rufinus and Valerius, all which were published by Sirmund, Paris, 1618, fol. He also wrote the life of St. Wala, and De Partu Virginis. See Cave, Hist. Liter. tom. II. and Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. VI. p. 126—142.—Mur. [There is a full account of this writer, with a critical estimate of his works, several of which are omitted in the preceding list of them, in Bähr, ubi supra, p. 462.—R.

³ Concerning both Radbert and Ratramn see the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome v. p. 287 and 332. [Bertram or Ratramn was a French monk of old Corbey, and afterwards abbot of Orbais. He flourished as early as 840, and was still alive in 870. He was a devout, modest, and learned man, and wrote De Partu Virginis, proving that the Saviour was born in the ordinary manner, which Radbert answered, maintaining the perpetual virginity of Mary, De Prædestinatione, in vindication of the sentiments of Godeschalvus, contra Græcorum Errores, De Corpore et Sangu. Domini, in opposition to Radbert, and De Anima Liber.—Mur. [The Benedictines in their Hist. Littér. de la France (tome v. p. 333), quoted by Mosheim, have shown that he was not abbot of Orbais, as here stated by Dr. Murdoch. For an account of Ratramn, and of his works, several being omitted by Dr. Murdoch, and of the controversy respecting his work against transubstantiation, I may refer once more to that valuable storehouse of information the mediæval as on the earlier Christian and classical Latin writers, Bähr's work so frequently quoted, with the authorities referred to in the notes. See Suppl. vol. part III. p. 471, &c.—R.

⁴ Of the works commonly ascribed to Haymo, a considerable part are not his, but the productions of Remigius of Auxerre. See Oudin, Comment. de Script. Ecclesiast. tom. II. p. 330; Hist. Littér. de la France, tom. v. p. 111, tome VI. p. 106; Le Beuf, Recueil des Diss. sur l'Hist. de la France, tom. I. p. 278. [Haymo or Aymo was a disciple of Alcuin, an intimate friend and fellow student of Rabanus Maurus, a monk of Fulda, abbot of Hersfeld, A.D. 839, and bishop of Halberstadt, A.D. 841. He was at the synod of Meutz in 848, and died 853. Among the writings ascribed to him are Commentaries on the Psalms, on Isaiah, on the epistles of Paul, on the Apocalypse, all of which are mere compilations from the fathers; Historia Eccles. Breviarium sive de Christianorum Rerum Memoria, a mere abridgment of Rufinus, some Homilies, De Amore Patriæ Cælestis, and De Corpore et Sangu. Domini Tractatus. See Cave, Hist. Liter. tom. II. and Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. v. p. 585, &c.—Mur. [Also Bähr, ubi supra, p. 408, where the student will see the several editions of Haymo's separate works, as they have not yet been published in one collection.—R.

⁵ See Hist. Littér. de la France, tome v. p. 59. [Walafrid Strabo (or Strabus i.e. squint-eyed) was a Swabian, studied in the monastery of Richenau, then at Fulda under Rabanus, became head of the school, and at last abbot of Richenau A.D. 842. His death is placed in the year 849. He was learned and a pleasing writer, yet bled in monkish superstition. He wrote De Officiis divinis, sive de Exordiis et Incrementis Rerum Ecclesiasticarum, Lives of several saints, various poems, a Tract on the destruction of Jerusalem, and the Glossa Ordinaria Interlinearis in S. Scripturam, which is extracted chiefly from the writings of Rabanus Maurus.—Mur. [and first published at Rome in 1472, in 7 vols. folio; seven other editions have since appeared, the latest being at Antwerp in 1634, 6 vols. folio. Ample notices of this writer and his works may be seen in Bähr, ubi supra, as a poet at p. 100, as a historical writer at p. 217, and as a theologian, at page 398.—R.

truth. But at the same time he was arrogant and of a restless temper. His works throw much light on both the civil and the ecclesiastical history of that age.¹ John Erigena Scotus, the friend and companion of the emperor Charles the Bald, combined the study of philosophy with that of theology, and acquired great reputation and fame by the acuteness of his mind, and by his translations from Greek into Latin, as well as by his original compositions.²

¹ Hist. Littér. de la France, tome v. p. 544. [Hincmar was a Frenchman of noble birth, educated under Hilddu in the monastery of St. Denis near Paris. He was distinguished as a scholar and a theologian, and in great favour at court. In the year 830 he had leave to accompany Hilddu in his banishment to Saxony. In the year 845 he was made archbishop of Rheims, in which office he continued till his death A.D. 882. Possessing talents of the first order and great activity and perseverance, his influence at court and in all the ecclesiastical transactions of that part of the country, was immense. Against Augustinianism and in favour of the liberties of the Gallican church, he was equally strenuous. Yet he was not free from superstition, as appears from his justification of a trial by ordeal (Opera, tom. ii. p. 676) and his belief in purgatory and visions. (Ibid. p. 805.) Most of his writings are still extant edited by Simond, Paris, 1645, 2 vols. fol. See Cave, Hist. Liter. tom. ii. Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xxiv. p. 20, &c.—Mur. [Ample notices of Hincmar's life and works, and a critical estimate of his character and acquisitions, may be seen in Bähr, ubi supra, p. 507—523. Among many other authorities, he refers to these more recent ones; W. F. Gess, Merkwürd. von Leben u. Schriften Hincmars, Gött. 1806; Guizot, Cours d'Histoire Moderne, tome iii. p. 86, &c. Brussels Ed.—R.

² See Conringius, Antiquit. Académ. p. 369; Hist. Littér. de la France, tome v. pag. 416, &c. and others. [John Scotus Erigena was a native either of Scotland or Ireland, and a very profound scholar. He passed most of his life in France, and at the court of Charles the Bald. About the year 850 he wrote his tract De Prædestinatione Dei contra Gotschalcum. Being well acquainted with Greek, he acquired the subtlety of an Aristotelian and the propensity to mysticism of a Platonist. His great work he entitled Περὶ φύσεως θεοῦ καὶ διαιρέσεως Naturæ seu de Rerum Naturæ, ed. Oxon. 1681, fol. He translated the works of the Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, and the Scholæ of St. Maximus on difficult passages of Gregory Naz. and composed a tract on the Lord's Supper, which is lost, but in which he is said to have denied the doctrine of transubstantiation. Several writers confound him with John, a Saxon monk, whom King Alfred invited over from France to England to teach in his school at Oxford, and who was murdered by the envious monks. But Mabillon (Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. vi. p. 114, &c.) shows that he was a different person, and that there is no evidence of his going to England in the days of Alfred. He was alive A.D. 872.—Mur. [There can be no doubt that Scotus was an Irishman, especially from his name Erigena. The English reader will see an account of him in Kippis's Biographia Britannica, vol. v. p. 597, &c.; in Laing's Eccles. Hist. of Ireland, vol. iii. p. 288, &c.; Turner's Hist. of the Anglo-Saxons, vol. iii. page 416, &c.; and in Moore's Hist. of Ireland, vol. i. page 301, &c. He will also see some striking remarks on Erigena's learning and his influence on the literature and philosophy of the West, in Hampden's Bampton Lectures, On the Scholastic Philosophy, p. 35, and note i. p. 415. This most competent judge has not hesitated to speak of Erigena in the following terms:—"He is one of the most remarkable persons in the history of the middle age. He was quite the meteor of the 9th century; as no one of his contemporaries appears to have approached him in the depth of his learning or the acuteness of his philosophy. His great learning, particularly his knowledge of languages, the Greek, the Hebrew, and the Arabic, appears to have been acquired by travels. Ireland was in high repute, in his time, for its learned men. But he was not satisfied to learn there only, but visited every place, and made inquiries of every one where information might be obtained respecting works of philosophy." With regard to the work of Erigena on the Lord's Supper supposed to be lost, some critics conceive that it is the same work which is extant under the name of Bertram or Ratramn of Corbey; but the evidence against this supposition seems to preponderate. I find it stated that a MS. has lately been found in the Vatican, containing a commentary of Erigena upon the Monarchia Cælestis of Dionysius, which he had previously translated from the Greek, containing sentiments opposed to transubstantiation, and which has recently led a German Romanist critic to ascribe the Protestant view of the Eucharist to him as its first proposer, and not, as the divines of the papal church usually teach, to Berengarius. Though his work be lost we can now be under no doubt as to his real sentiments on this vital point. Bähr has treated, with his usual research and critical skill, the life and writings of this remarkable man, and given us by far the best account which is extant. He refers to the following recent works on Erigena: P. Hjort, J. Scotus Erigena oder von d. Ursprünge einer Christ. Phil. &c. Copen. 1823; H. Schmid, Mysticismus des Mittelalters, &c. Jena, 1824; F. A. Staudemaier, J. Scotus Erigena und die Wissenschaft seiner Zeit, Frankf. 1834; Guizot, Cours d'Histoire Mod. tome iii. p. 116, &c. leçon. 29; with two dissertations, one by C. F. Hück in the Bonn Zeitschrift for 1835, and the other by Frommüller in Steudel's Tubing. Zeitschrift for 1830.—R.

Remigius,³ Bertharius,⁴ Ado,⁵ Aimoin,⁶

³ There were two eminent men in this century of the name of Remigius. The one bishop of Lyons and active from A.D. 850 to A.D. 875, in several councils in behalf of Augustinianism and Godeschalus. He wrote De tribus Episcoporum Epistolis (in defence of Augustinianism), Libellus de tenenda Scripture veritate et Sanct. Patrum autoritate secunda et Absolutio questionis de generali per Adamum damnatione, et speciali per Christum ex eadem ereptione electorum. These tracts are in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xv. and in Mauguin, Collectio Script. de Prædestinatione, &c. tom. i. The other Remigius was a Benedictine monk of St. Germain in Auxerre, and hence called Autissiodorensis. In the year 882 or subsequently he was called to Rheims to take charge of the bishops' school. He died about A.D. 900. His works are Commentaries on all the Psalms of David, on the last eleven minor prophets, on the Epistles of St. Paul (sometimes ascribed, though falsely, to Haymo of Halberstadt), and an exposition of the mass. All these are compilations from the fathers.—Mur. [Of Remigius of Lyons see Bähr, ubi supra, p. 503, and of Remigius of Auxerre and his various works see p. 526, &c.—R.

⁴ Bertharius was of noble French origin, and first a monk and then abbot of Monte Cassino in Italy from A.D. 856 till his death in the year 884. The Saracens frequently plundered that monastery and at last slew Bertharius at the altar. See Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. vi. p. 472, &c. He wrote several discourses, poems, and lives or eulogies of saints, most of which remain unpublished in the archives of his monastery.—Mur. [He was also a "philosophus et medicus insignis," as we are told by Trithemius. See Bähr, ubi supra, p. 240, for a notice of his poetical, and p. 525, of his other works.—R.

⁵ Ado, a French monk, born about A.D. 800, made archbishop of Vienne A.D. 860, and died A.D. 876. He was much esteemed and active in several councils in favour of Augustinianism. He wrote a Martyrology before he was a bishop, and afterwards a brief chronology from the creation to about A.D. 870; also the lives of some saints. See Mabillon, ubi supra, tom. vi. p. 278—290.—Mur.

⁶ Aimoin, a Benedictine monk of St. Germain near Paris, near the close of this century. He wrote the history of the miracles and of the removal of the relics of St. Germain and St. George, extant in Mabillon, ubi supra, tom. iv. p. 96, &c.; and tom. vi. p. 45, &c. This Aimoin must not be confounded with Aimoin the Benedictine monk of Fleury in the 11th century, the author of the Historia de Rebus gestis Francorum. See Labbé, De Script. Eccles. ad Bellarminum, p. 305, &c.—Mur.

Heric,¹ Regino of Prüm,² and others are here passed over, as a sufficient knowledge of them may easily be obtained from common writers.³

¹ Hericus or Erleius, born at Hery a village near Auxerre, and a Benedictine monk at Auxerre near the close of this century. He wrote six books of poetry on the life of St. Germain, and two books of prose respecting his miracles, besides numerous Homilies some of which are now inserted in the Homiliarium of Paul Vianenus. See Cave, Hist. Liter. tom. ii.—Mur. [See also Bähr, ubi supra, p. 111.—R.]

² Regino was a German, a monk of Prüm in the diocese of Treves, chosen abbot there A.D. 892, opposed and induced to resign A.D. 899. He died A.D. 908. His Chronicon from the Christian era to the year 907, and continued by another hand to A.D. 972, relates chiefly to the affairs of the Franks and Teutones. It is printed among the Scriptores rerum German. ed. of Pistorius, tom. i. His two books De Discip. Ecclæ et Rel. Christ. (a collection from councils and the fathers relating to ecclesiastical law) are best edited by Baluze, Paris, 1671, 8vo.—Mur. [Of Regino as a chronicler see Bähr, ubi supra, p. 184, and as a theologian, ibid. page 535, &c. The latest and best edition of his De Discip. Ecclæ, &c. is that by F. G. A. Wasserschleben, Leipzig, 1840, 8vo.—R.]

³ The Latin writers omitted by Mosheim are the following:—

Benedictus Anianensis, born in Lower Languedoc A.D. 751, educated at court, and for some years employed in civil life. In the year 774 he retired to a monastery; and six years after to avoid being made abbot, withdrew to a cell near the river Analane, where monks gathered around him, and he became abbot of that and a dozen other monasteries propagated from it. He died A.D. 814. See his life written by Ardo, his disciple, in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. v. p. 183—215. He wrote Codex Regularum Monasticar. (a collection of the rules of most orders of monks previous to his time), edited by Holstenius, 1661, and Paris, 1664, 4to, Concordia Regularum, a collection of exhortations to monks, Modus diversarum Penitentiarum, and some epistles. [See page 297, above.—R.]

Ludger, a monk of Utrecht who spent some time in England, and travelled in Italy, became abbot of Werden and bishop of Mîmeguen, A.D. 802, and died A.D. 809. See his life written by Altfrið, the second bishop after him, in Mabillon, ubi supra, tom. v. p. 14—33. He wrote the life of St. Gregory, bishop of Utrecht, and some letters still extant.

Smaragdus, abbot of St. Michael in the diocese of Verdun, flourished about A.D. 810, and wrote commentaries on the Lessons from the Gospels and Epistles, Diadema Monachorum a commentary on the Rule of St. Benedict, Via Regia a letter for Charlemagne to the pope, Acts of a conference at Rome A.D. 810, and a grammatical commentary on Donatus never published.

Amalarius, a deacon and perhaps rural bishop of Metz. He flourished from A.D. 812 to A.D. 836, and wrote De Dignis sive Ecclesiasticis Officiis, and De Ordine Antiphonarum (both in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xiv.); also some epistles, Eccloga in Canonem Missæ, and Regula seu Institutio Canonicorum.

Hatto, abbot of Richenau and bishop of Basil, A.D. 811—836. He wrote some capitula for his diocese, and an account of the visions of Wettin, Hildegard, and other monkish saints.

Hettius or Hetto, archbishop of Treves A.D. 814, &c. has left us two epistles.

Frotharius, abbot of St. Aper and bishop of Toul, A.D. 817—837. He wrote Epistolarum Liber, addressed to various bishops, published by Du Chesne among the Script. rer. Francic. tom. ii. p. 719.

Ebbo or Ebo, a German, educated at the imperial court, employed some time in civil affairs, then abbot of St. Remigius, and A.D. 816 archbishop of Rheims. In 822 he went to Rome, and obtained a commission to convert the northern nations; in consequence of which he made two journeys to Denmark. In the year 833 he joined the revolt of Lothaire against his father Lewis, for which he lost his bishopric and was kept in custody at Fulda and other places. In 840 he was restored to his see, but lost it the next year. In 841 he was made bishop of Hildesheim, and died A.D. 851. Of this restless prelate we have nothing remaining but his Apologeticum presented to the council of Hildesheim, and published in the Concilia.

Halitgarius, bishop of Cambrai and Arras A.D. 816. He accompanied Ebbo in one of his excursions to Denmark. In 828 the emperor Lewis sent him as envoy to Constantinople. He returned the next year with abundance of relics, and died in 831. He wrote De Virtutibus, Remedis Peccatorum, et Ordine et Iudicio Penitentiarum, published by Canisius, and in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xiv. p. 906.

Paschal II. pope A.D. 817—824, has left us three Epistles, which are in the Concilia.

Sedulius, a Scot who flourished about A.D. 818, and compiled from the fathers a Collectaneum seu Explanatio in Epistolâ S. Pauli, extant in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. vi. p. 494. He is to be distinguished from Sedulius the poet. See Labbé, De Scriptor. Ecclesiæ apud Belgarum, in da Scriptor. Ecclesiæ, p. 149—152 [Cardinal Mai, in his Script. Vet. nova Collectio, tom. ix. p. 159—181, has given this writer's Expositiones in argumenta evangeliorum Matth. Marc. et Lucæ. Lanigan, in his Ecclesiæ Hist. of Ireland, vol. iii. page 255, claims him as an Irishman and abbot of Kildare from 821 to his death in 829.—R.]

Dungal, a monk of St. Denys near Paris A.D. 821. He wrote a confutation of Claudius of Turin in vindication of image-worship, which is in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xiv. p. 196, and a letter to Charlemagne, De Eclipsi Solari. [That Dungal was an Irishman is admitted by the Benedictine authors of the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iv. sub voc. See a brief notice of him in Lanigan's Ecclesiæ Hist. of Ireland, vol. iii. p. 256, and of his works in Bähr, ubi supra, p. 372.—R.]

Jonas, bishop of Orleans, A.D. 821—843. He was much employed on councils, and wrote against Claudius of Turin an Apologeticum for retaining images but without worshipping them; also De Institutione Laicorum, and De Institutione Regia, extant in the Bibliotheca Patrum, tom. xiv. p. 166.

Eugenius II. pope A.D. 824—827, has left us two Epistles and nine Decretals, extant in the Concilia.

Gregory IV. pope A.D. 828—844. Three of his Epistles are in the Concilia, and another concerning the monastery of Fleury in Baluze, Miscell. tom. ii. p. 145.

Ansegisus, abbot of various monasteries in France from A.D. 807 till his death in 833. He collected the Capitularia Caroli Magni de Rebus præsertim Ecclesiasticis, best edited by Baluze, Paris, 1677, 2 tom. fol. His life written by a contemporary is in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. v. p. 593, &c.

Ardo, called Smaragdus, abbot of Analane and author of the life of his predecessor Benedictus Anianensis, which is in Mabillon, ubi supra, tom. v. p. 183, &c. Several other works have been attributed to him, but some ascribe them to another of the same name.

Theganus, a learned French gentleman and suffragan to the archbishop of Treves. He flourished about A.D. 837, and wrote Annales de gestis Ludovici Imp. ab ann. 813 usque ad ann. 837, extant among the Script. Ilerum Francicæ, ed. Du Chesne, tom. ii.

Amulo, Amulus, or Amularius, archbishop of Lyons A.D. 841—852, or longer. He wrote Epistola ad Theobaldum, exploding certain relics and the vendors of them, Ad Godeschulcum Epistola disapproving his opinions, and three tracts on free-will, predestination, and grace; all which were published by Baluze, subjoined to the works of Agobard, and in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xiv. p. 329.

Nithardus, grandson of Charlemagne, first a courtier and soldier and then a monk. He flourished A.D. 843, and died in 853. He has left us De Dissidio filiorum Ludovici Pii from A.D. 814—843, published by Pitheous, and by Duchesne, Script. Rer. Francicæ, tom. ii. page 259.

Sergius II. pope A.D. 844—847 has left one Epistle, extant in the Concilia.

Prudens or Prudentius, a Spaniard, but bishop of Troyes in France. He flourished A.D. 846 and died in 861. He wrote several tracts on predestination, &c. against John Scotus, Hincmar, &c. which are extant in the Biblioth. Pat. tom. xv. p. 598; and also in Manguin, Vindiciæ Gratia, tom. ii.

Pardulus, bishop of Laon A.D. 847—856. His Epistle to Hincmar of Rheims is printed in the Opera Hincmari, tom. ii. p. 834.

Eulogius of Corduba flourished from A.D. 847 to 850, when he was beheaded by the Saracens for his opposition to their laws. He wrote Memoriale Sanctorum sive de Martiris Cordubensibus, Apologeticus pro Martiris, Exhortatio ad Martyrium, and several Epistles; all extant in Reliquiæ Hispanicæ. Script. tom. iv. and in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xv. p. 242.

Alvarus, a Spanish Christian of Corduba, the intimate friend of Eulogius. He wrote the life of Eulogius, several epistles, and a tract entitled Scintille Patrum, all of which, except the last, are published with the works of Eulogius.

Leo IV. pope A.D. 847—855, has left us two entire epistles and fragments of several others, besides a good homily addressed to presbyters and deacons on the pastoral duties, extant in the Concilia.

Wendelbert, a Benedictine monk of Prüm, who flourished A.D. 850. He wrote the life and miracles of St. Goar (in Mabillon, Acta Sanct. Ord. Bened. tom. ii. p. 269, &c.); also a martyrology in heroic verse published among the works of Bede, tom. i. under the title of Ephemerides Bedæ.

Æneas, bishop of Paris, A.D. 854—869. He wrote Alvarus Objectiones Græcorum, published by D'Achery, Spicil. tom. vii. and a short epistle to Hincmar.

Benedict III. pope A.D. 855—859. Four of his Epistles are in the Concilia.

Herard, archbishop of Tours A.D. 855—871, has left us 140 Capitula addressed to his clergy, and some other papers, in the Concilia.

Hincmar, bishop of Laon, A.D. 856—871, when he was deposed. This proud and tyrannical prelate quarrelled with his uncle Hincmar archbishop of Rheims, with the king, with his clergy, and others; appealed to Rome and obtained support from the pope, but was finally put down. He died about A.D. 881. There remain of him several epistles and documents relating to his contests, extant among the works of Hincmar of Rheims, and in the Concilia.

Angelonus, a Benedictine monk of Luxeuil in Burgundy who flourished A.D. 856. He wrote Stronata or Commentaries on the four books of Kings, and also on the Canticles, extant in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xv. p. 307.

Nicolaus, pope A.D. 858—867. He began the controversy with Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, and opposed King Lothaire's divorce of his queen. He has left us about 100 epistles, a reply to the interrogatories of the Bulgarians in 106 Capitula, besides decrees and rescripts on various subjects. His letters were published at Rome, 1512, fol. and with his other works are now in the Concilia.

Isaac, bishop of Langres, A.D. 859—878, or longer. He, or Isaac abbot of Poitiers wrote a long epistle De Concilio Nisæ, published by D'Achery, Spicil. tom. xiii. He is the author of a Collectio Canonum like the Greek Nomo-canon, compiled from the Capitula of the French kings and the decisions of councils, which was published by Sirmond, and since in other Collections of Councils.

Hulderic, Udalric or Hulric, bishop of Augsbourg A.D. 860—900. He was a distinguished prelate, and wrote a long letter to Pope Nicolaus reproaching his rigid enforcement of celibacy upon the clergy. This famous letter, which Pope Gregory VII. condemned as heretical A.D. 1079, has been often printed by the Protestants.

Hudrian or Adrian, pope A.D. 867—872. He continued the contest with Photius, and assumed great power in France. Twenty-six of his epistles, besides some addresses and papers, are extant in the Concilia.

Anastasius Bibliothecarius, an abbot, presbyter, and librarian at Rome, who was papal envoy to Constantinople, to Naples, &c. He was one of the most learned men of his time (A.D. 870—886) and well acquainted with the Greek language. He wrote Acta Concilii Constantinop. II. in Latin, falsely called the eighth general Council, A.D. 869, Acta Concilii Nicæni II. A.D. 787, in Latin, Hist. Eccles. sive Chronographia Tripartita compiled from Nicephorus, patriarch of Constantinople, George Syncellus, and Theophanes Confessor, Historia de vitis Romanorum Pontificum, seu Liber Pontificalis from St. Peter to Pope Nicolaus I. Collectanea de iis quæ spectant ad Historiam Monothelitæ; besides various letters and tracts, either original or translations and abstracts, published by Sirmond, Paris, 1620, 8vo. His Acts of councils and his lives of the popes are inserted in the Concilia.

John VIII. pope A.D. 872—882. He was an active pope but greatly harassed by the Saracens, who infested all southern Italy. There are extant in the Concilia and elsewhere 326 of his epistles.

Hartmutus or Hartmannus, abbot of St. Gall A.D. 872—883. He wrote some poems and hymns published by Canisius, Lectiones Antiq. tom. v. also the life of St. Wiborada, a virgin martyr, extant in Mabillon, Acta Sanct. Ord. Bened. tom. vii. p. 42, &c.

John, a deacon at Rome and the friend of Anastasius Biblioth. who flourished A.D. 875. He wrote the life of St. Gregory the Great, which is in all the editions of the works of Gregory, and in Mabillon, Acta Sanct. Ord. Bened. tom. i. p. 389, &c.

Usuardus, a French monk of St. Germain near Paris, who flourished A.D. 876. Displeased with the brevity of the martyrologies of Jerome and Bede, he wrote one more full and particular, under the countenance of Charles the Bald. It was published, Louvain, 1568, 8vo, and with omissions of what displeased the Papists, at Antwerp, 1587, 8vo.

Abbo, a monk of St. Germain, having witnessed the siege of Paris by the Normans in the year 887, composed a history of it, in very uncouth verses, published among the Script. Hist. Franc.

Stephen V. pope A.D. 885—891, has left us three Epistles and part of another.

Wulfhardus, a Benedictine monk and presbyter in the diocese of Eichstadt, who flourished A.D. 886, has left us a life of St. Walpurga or St. Walpurgis, extant in Mabillon, Acta Sanct. Ord. Bened. tom. iv. p. 260, &c.

Herembertus or Erchenbertus, a monk of Monte Cassino A.D. 887. He wrote a Chronicon or a full history of the Lombards continued to A.D. 885, an abridgment of which, made (it is supposed) by the author himself, was published at Naples, 1626, 4to, together with three other Chronicons.

Adrevaldus or Adalbertus, a Benedictine monk of Fleury A.D. 890, wrote the history of the removal of the remains of St. Benedict and St. Scholastica from Monte Cassino to Fleury; extant in Mabillon, Acta Sanct. Ord. Bened. tom. ii. p. 338, &c. He also wrote De Corpore et Sanguine Domini, in opposition to the views of John Scotus, extant in D'Achery, Spicil. tom. xii.

Asserus, a British monk, much employed by Alfred the Great and by him made bishop of Sherborne. He flourished A.D. 890, and wrote a history of the life and achievements of King Alfred, published among the Script. Rerum Anglic. ed. Franc. 1602, p. 1, &c. [There was another Asserus, or Ingulfus Asker, a disciple of John Scotus Erigena and bishop of St. David's, with whom this Asserus of Sherborne is confounded by Cave and Fabricius. The former wrote the Chronicon Fani St. Neut. which is to be found in the first volume of Gale's Historia Britannica, &c. scriptores niginti, Oxf. 1687-91, 2 vols. fol. But Lappenberg is of opinion that this Chronicon "can hardly be earlier than the eleventh century." England under the Anglo-Saxons, vol. i. p. 39, Intro.—R.]

Gullelmus, librarian of the church of Rome A.D. 890. He continued Anastasius' lives of the popes from A.D. 867 to A.D. 891.

Solomon, a German monk, abbot, and at last bishop of Constance A.D. 890—920. He left several poems, published in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xvi.

Formosus, pope A.D. 891—896. He had sharp contests with the citizens of Rome; and when dead his successor, Stephen VII. dug up his remains, deposed him, mutilated his body, and cast it into the Tiber. Two of his Epistles are extant in the Concilia.

Auxilius, a writer little known, who flourished about A.D. 894, and composed a history of Pope Formosus and the contests respecting him, in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xvii. p. 1.

The popes, Stephen VII. A.D. 896—897, John IX. A.D. 898—900, and Benedict IV. A.D. 900—904, have left the first two epistles, the next four, and the third two, which are in the Concilia—Mur. [On all these minor Latin writers of the ninth century, and on several others not mentioned by Cave, the student will find much valuable information in Bähr's work so frequently cited, to wit, the Supplementary volume of his Geschichte der Römischen Literatur, part iii. Carlsruhe, 1840.—R.]

CHAPTER III.

HISTORY OF RELIGION AND THEOLOGY.

1. IN the West, so long as those persons survived whom the liberality of Charlemagne and his zeal for Christianity had prompted to the study of the bible and to a candid investigation of truth, a barrier existed to the ingress of many errors and superstitions among the Latins. And accordingly not a few proofs may be collected out of the writers of this century, showing that the truth had some strenuous vindicators. But as these men were gradually removed, and barbarism regained its former ascendancy, a flood of superstitious and pious follies and of base and degrading opinions rushed in from all quarters. None were more zealous and active in the propagation of them, than the professed teachers and patrons of piety and religion, who were corrupted partly by their great ignorance and partly by their selfish passions. The state of things was not much better in the East and among the Greeks, although here and there an individual arose who was disposed to succour the sinking cause of pure religion.

2. The causes of this unhappy state of things will be readily apprehended by those acquainted with the occurrences among Christians in this century. The oriental doctors, wholly occupied with their intestine broils and their foreign controversies, became disqualified for more grave investigations; and as one error generally draws others in its train, it was the natural consequence of their fierce disputes among themselves respecting image-worship, and with the Latins respecting the superiority of their discipline and the divinity of their dogmas, that many other evils should result. Moreover, the uncomfortable and irrational mode of life pursued by those who retired to deserts and solitary retreats, was inconsistent with a sound mind and a sober judgment. Yet persons of this class were immensely numerous, and their influence by no means inconsiderable. In the West, the incursions of the barbarous tribes, the wars and abominable crimes of the sovereigns, the neglect of every branch of learning, the infatuated policy of the Roman pontiffs to display and extend their power, and the impositions and falsehoods of the monks, were ruinous to the cause of virtue, of mental cultivation, and piety.

3. How great were the ignorance and perverseness of this century appears from the single fact of the extravagant and stupid veneration paid to saints, and to their bones and carcasses; for in this consisted the greatest part of their piety and religion. They all believed that they should never find God propitious to them, unless they obtained some intercessor and patron among the glorified saints; and each separate church, and almost each individual person, sought for some particular and appropriate patron, as if afraid that a patron engaged to manage the concerns of others would neglect theirs if committed to him; for they were inclined to estimate the condition of the blessed according to the maxims and principles of human life. Hence arose the rage for creating almost daily new tutelar deities. And the priests and monks were most successful in dispelling the darkness which concealed the wondrous deeds of many holy men, or rather in fabricating the names and the histories of saints who never existed, so that they might have patrons enough for all the credulous and senseless people. Many however provided for themselves, by committing their interests and their salvation to phantoms of their own creation, or to delirious persons who, as they supposed, had led very holy lives, because they had lived like fools and madmen.

4. To this licentiousness of multiplying daily the number of ministers at that celestial court which ill-informed men pictured to themselves, the ecclesiastical councils endeavoured to set bounds; for they ordained that no person should be accounted a glorified saint, unless he was declared worthy of that honour by a bishop and provincial council, in presence of the people.¹ This fallacious remedy laid some restraint upon the inconsiderateness of the people. There were also some in this age who deemed it not absolutely necessary, though useful and proper, that the decisions of bishops and councils should be sanctioned and confirmed by the approbation of the supreme head of the church, that is, by the bishop of Rome. Nor will this excite surprise, if we consider the great increase of the papal power in that unenlightened, rude, and superstitious age. There is indeed no example to be met with prior to the tenth century, of any one being solemnly enrolled among the saints by the Romish bishop;² yet that he was sometimes consulted on such matters, and his opinion asked respecting those to be consecrated, may be shown by some testimonies.¹ In this gradual manner it was that the practice of canonization, or creation of saints, arrived at maturity in the church.

¹ Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. sæcul. v. [tom. vii.] Pref. p. 44, &c. [p. 57, &c. ed. Venice]; Launol, de Lazari, Magdalene et Marthæ in Provincia appulæ, cap. i. sec. 12, Opp. tom. ii. par. i. p. 342; Pagi, Breviarium Pontif. Romanor. tom. ii. p. 259, tom. iii. p. 30.

² See Papebroch, De Solennium Canonisationum Initium et Progressu, in his Proplacum, Acta. Sanct. mensis Martii, p. 171, &c. [Mabillon, ubi supra; Budeus, De Originibus Anacoretarum, seu Canonisationis, in Eccl. Rom. in his Miscell. Sacr. p. 463, &c.] and the authors referred to, on this subject, by Fabricius, Bibliogr. Antiq. cap. vii. sec. 25, p. 270.

5. The number of celestial or glorified saints being so preposterously multiplied, nothing better was to be expected than that their biographies would be written, filled with falsehoods and fables, and that accounts should be published of transactions which no one ever performed. There is still extant a great mass of such idle tales, which it appears was produced not long after the time of Charlemagne, and for the most part by the idle monks. Nor were these crafty deceivers ashamed to contaminate with false accounts and fictitious miracles, the histories of those who really suffered persecution and death for the cause of Christ in the earlier ages; and there are not wanting some respectable writers of those times who chastise this temerity.² Some were led to practise these impositions by their false notions of religion; for in this rude and ignorant age it was supposed that the saints in heaven delight in praise, and will therefore show special favour to their eulogists. Others were prompted to such presumptuous conduct by their lust for honour or for lucre. Because in their perplexities and seasons of danger, the populace in great numbers resorted with presents to the temples of those saints who were said to be ancient, and to have performed many wonders while alive. Hence, such as were appointed to write the history of the patron saint of any associated body deemed it necessary to practise deception, and to add false miracles to their account.³

¹ See the very temperate and ingenious discussion of this subject, by the sovereign pontiff, Benedict XIV. previously Prosper Lambertini, De Servorum Dei Beatificatione et Beatorum Canonizatione, lib. i. cap. vii. In his Opera, tom. i. p. 50, ed. Rome. It were to be wished the historians of the church of Rome would learn to imitate the discretion and fairness of their pontiff. [The earliest solemn canonization by the popes, of which we have authentic records, is that of Ulrich bishop of Augsburg, by John XV. A.D. 995. Yet bishops, metropolitans, and provincial councils, were concerned in such acts for more than a century after this. And it was not till the pontificate of Alexander III. A.D. 1160–1181, that the popes claimed the exclusive power of adding new saints to the calendar. See Mabillon, ubi supra, p. 59, sec. 91, and p. 68, sec. 99, &c.—Mur.]

² See Servatus Lupus, Vita Mazimini, p. 275, 276; and the ingenious and learned remarks on this subject made in several places by Launoï; Disputatio Epistola Petri de Marca, de tempore quo in Gallia Christi fides recepta, cap. xiv. p. 110; Diss. iii. De primis Christi Reliq. in Gallia initii, Diss. ii. p. 142, 144, 145, 147, 168, 169, 184; De Lazari, Magdal. et Marthe in Galliam oppellu, p. 340; De duobus Dionysiis, in his Opusculis, lib. par. i. p. 527, 529, 530. See also Martene, Thesaur. Anecd. tom. i. p. 151, and the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iv. p. 273.

³ Among all the lives of saints composed in this age,

6. In the bones of those who were accounted saints, and the utensils which they used while alive, and even in the very ground which they had touched, there was supposed to reside a marvellous power of repelling all evils, both bodily and mental, and especially of paralyzing the machinations of the prince of darkness. Hence, scarcely any one was willing to be destitute of these useful safeguards. The eagerness for relics led some to encounter severe toils and troublesome journeys to no purpose, while it prompted others to delude the wretched people with base impositions. To obtain a sufficiency of relics for those who were desirous of them, the latent carcasses of departed saints were first sought for by the priests with prayer and fasting, and then were discovered by the guidance and monitions of God. The exultation on the discovery of such a treasure was immense. Some made journeys into the East, and travelled over the regions and places made famous by the presence of Christ and his friends, in order to bring from them what would afford comfort to the faint-hearted, and protection to their country and their fellow-citizens. Nor did such travellers return empty; for the cunning Greeks, always versatile and knavish, took from the honest Latins their genuine coin, and sent them home loaded with spurious merchandise. In this way the numerous holy bodies, and parts of bodies, of Mark, James, Bartholomew, Cyprian, Pantaleon, and others, in which the West still exults, were introduced among the Latins. Those who were unable to procure these precious treasures by either journeys, prayers, or frauds, deemed it expedient to steal them, or to seize them by violence and robbery; for whatever means were resorted to in such a cause as this, were supposed to be pious and acceptable to God, provided only they were successful.⁴

7. There were few among the Greeks who attempted to explain the sacred volume except Photius, who has left Questions on the Holy Scriptures,⁵ an explanation of St.

none are more to be suspected than those written by Britons and Armoricans. See Mabillon, Acta Sanctorum Ord. Bened. tom. i. pref. p. viii. [The student will find extended notices of these Vita Sanctorum of the Western church and of their compilers, in Bähr, Gesch. der Röm. Liter. Suppl. vol. part iii. p. 247, &c.—R.]

⁴ Read Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Medii Ævi, tom. v. p. 6, &c. who presents us with examples.

⁵ This work is entitled Amphilochia, because it was addressed to Amphilochius, bishop of Cyzicum. Though several manuscripts of it still exist it has never been published entire. Among other large extracts, J. C. Wolf has subjoined one of sixty-five pages to the fourth [it should be, fifth.—R.] volume of his Cura Philologie, Hamb. 1741. He also gives account of the work in his preface to that volume. Most of the questions relate to difficult texts in the Old and New Testaments

Paul's Epistles, and some other things of this nature. He made use of his own reason and sagacity, and yet he cannot be esteemed a good interpreter. All the other Greeks who attempted expositions of the Scriptures, merely collected passages from the writers of preceding ages, and attached them to the declarations of the sacred volume. Thus in this century and among the Greeks it was, that what are called catenæ, that is, expositions of Scripture compiled from the writings of the fathers, of which no small number has come down to us, first began to be drawn up; for most theologians, feeling their incompetence to more arduous labours, supposed they could best accomplish their object by collecting together the eloquent thoughts of the ancient fathers.

8. The Latin interpreters were far more numerous, for Charlemagne had awakened in the preceding century an ardour for the study and exposition of the sacred volume. Among these interpreters there is here and there one not wholly destitute of merit, as Christian Druthmar, whose Commentary on Matthew has come down to us,¹ and Bertharius, to whom are ascribed two books reconciling difficult texts, or Ἀντιρρητισμοί. But most of them were incompetent to their work; and, like the interpreters of the preceding century, they may be divided into two classes, those who trod in the steps of former expositors and collected their opinions, and those who searched for mysteries and various recondite meanings in the plainest texts, and generally without much discrimination. At the head of the former class stands Rabanus Maurus, who confesses that he drew his expositions of Matthew and of Paul's Epistles from the writings of the fathers. Of the like character were Walafrid Strabo, author of what is called the Glossa Ordinaria, and who drew his materials chiefly from Rabanus; Claudiu of Turin, who followed Augustine and Origen; Hincmar [of Rheims], whose Stromata on the four Books of Kings, compiled from the fathers, are still extant; Remigius of Auxerre, who elucidated the Psalms of David and other books of Scripture from the same source; Sedulius, who expounded the Epistles of Paul according to the views of the fathers; Florus Magister, who chose Augustine for his guide; Haymo of Halberstadt; and others.

9. At the head of the latter class we again find Rabanus Maurus, whose very diffuse work on the Allegories of the Scriptures is yet extant.² He is followed by Smaragdus, Haymo, Scotus, Paschasius Radbert, and many others whose names it would be needless to mention. The expositors of this class all agree, that besides the literal import there are other meanings of the sacred books, but as to the number of these meanings they are not agreed; for some of them make three senses, others four or five, and one, who is not the worst Latin interpreter of the age, Angelome, a monk of Lisioux, maintains that there are seven senses of the sacred books.³

10. In explaining and supporting the doctrines of religion, the Greeks as well as Latins were neglectful of their duty. Their manner of treating such subjects was dry, and better suited to exercise the memory than the understanding. The Greeks for the most part followed Damascenus—the Latins acquiesced in the decisions of Augustine. The authority of the ancients was substituted for arguments and proofs, as may be clearly seen by the Collectaneum de tribus questionibus of Servatus Lupus and the Tract of Remigius on holding firmly the truths of Scripture and adhering faithfully to the authority of the holy and orthodox fathers. Those who appealed to the testimony of the sacred writers either attached to their words what is called the allegorical sense, or deemed it wrong to put any other construction upon them than had been sanctioned by councils and the fathers. The Irish doctors alone, and but others of them are theological, philosophical, grammatical, historical, and literary. About one sixth part of the whole is to be found in the Epistles of Photius published by R. Montague, London, 1651.—Mur. [Cardinal Mai in his Script. Vet. nova Collectio, tom. i. par. i. p. 1, &c. published, for the first time, an additional portion of these Questiones Amphilochiæ in Greek and Latin amounting to twenty. He afterwards discovered a larger portion of the same work amounting to 130 Questions, which he published in the original Greek, but without a Latin version, in the 9th volume of the above collection, under the title of Questiones Amphilochiæ cxxx. quibus sacrorum plerumque librorum controversiæ solvuntur. The work is still incomplete, as the number of Questions appears to have originally amounted to 260.—R.

¹ See Simon, Hist. Critique des Principaux Commentaires du N. T. chap. xxv. p. 348, and Critique de la Bibliothèque Ecclésiastique de M. Du Pin, tome i. p. 293, &c. He treats of most of the other commentators here noticed; ibid. chap. xxvi. xxvii. [See also Bähr, Gesch. der Römischen Liter. Suppl. vol. part iii. p. 279, &c.—lc.

² On Rabanus Maurus as an interpreter of Scripture, see Conybeare's Hampton Lectures, On the Secondary and Spiritual Interpretation of Scripture, p. 195-6; Davidson's Sacred Hermeneutics, p. 165-6; and especially Bähr, Gesch. der Röm. Liter. Suppl. vol. part iii. p. 423, &c.—lc.

³ See the Preface to his Commentary on the books of Kings in the Bibliotheca Patrum Max. tom. xv. p. 308. The commentary of Angelome on the book of Genesis was published by Pexius, Thesaurus Anecd. tom. i. par. i. But it would have been no loss to sacred literature had it remained in obscurity. [Trithemius says of him:—"Vir in divinis scripturis exponendis nobis sortitus ingenium, ut, quæ ipse exposuit, veteres in eius comparatione non exposuisse videantur, secularium quoque scripturarum non ignarus." De Script. Eccles. p. 265.—R.

among them John Scotus [Erigena], ventured to explain the doctrines of Christianity in a philosophical manner. But they generally incurred strong disapprobation, for the Latin theologians of that age would allow no place for reason and philosophy in matters of religion.¹

11. Practical theology was treated negligently and unskillfully by all who cultivated it. Some gleaned sentences from the writings of the ancients relating to piety and the duties of men, as may be seen in the Scintilla Patrum of Alvarus. Others composed treatises on the virtues and vices, as Halitgarius, Rabanus Maurus, and Jonas of Orleans; but it is not easy to discover in them a likeness to the pattern left us by Christ. Some endeavoured to explain the divine will, and make it intelligible to the unlearned by a tissue of allegories, a method the faults of which are manifest. The writers of sermons and of treatises on penance, of whom the number was not inconsiderable among the Latins, I pass over in silence. Some of the Greeks began to apply themselves to the solution of what are called cases of conscience.²

12. The doctrines of the mystics, which originated from Dionysius falsely called the Areopagite, and which taught men to abstract their minds from all sensible things, and to join them in an inexpressible union with God, had long been in the highest estimation among the Greeks, and especially the monks. And the praises of this Dionysius were magniloquently sung in this century by Michael Syncellus and Methodius, who thus endeavoured to multiply the admirers and followers of the man. The Latins had hitherto been unacquainted with this imposing system. But when Michael the Stammerer, emperor of the Greeks, sent a copy of Dionysius as a present to Lewis the Meek, A.D. 824,³ at once the whole Latin world became remarkably attached to it; for Lewis, to put the Latins in possession of so great a treasure, ordered the works of Dionysius to be forthwith translated into the Latin language.⁴ Afterwards

Hilduin, abbot of St. Denys, by the order of Lewis, published his Areopagitica, or Life of Dionysius, in which, according to the custom of the age, he not only states many things void of truth, but he basely confounds Dionysius the Areopagite with Dionysius bishop of Paris, designing, no doubt, to advance the glory of the French nation.⁵ And this fable, hastily admitted by credulous ears, became so firmly fixed in the minds of the French, that it is not yet fully eradicated. The first translation of Dionysius made by order of Lewis the Meek was perhaps rather obscure and barbarous; therefore his son, Charles the Bald, procured a new and more exact translation to be made by the celebrated John Scotus Erigena; and the circulation of this translation swelled the number of the patrons of mystic theology in France, Germany, and Italy. Scotus himself was so captivated with this new system of theology that he did not hesitate to accommodate his philosophy to its precepts, or rather to explain its principles by the rules of his philosophy.⁶

13. In defence of Christianity against Jews, pagans, and others, only a few took the field, because the internal contests among Christians engrossed all the attention of those who were inclined to be polemics. Agobard inveighed against the arrogance and other faults of the Jews in two short tracts. Amulo and Rabanus Maurus likewise assailed them. The Saracens were confuted by the emperor Leo, by Theodorus Abucara, and by others whose writings are lost. But these and other opposers of the Mohannmedans advanced various false and unsubstantiated statements respecting Mohammed and his religion, which, if brought forward designedly, as would seem to be the fact, prove that the writers did not aim so much at convincing the Saracens as at deterring Christians from apostasy.

14. Among themselves the Christians had more strenuous and animated contests

¹ Respecting the dislike of Scotus, see Buleæus, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. i. p. 182. Add the life of John of Gortz in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. Sæcul. v. [tom. vii.] p. 392.

² See Nicephorus Chartophylax, Epistol. ii. in the Biblioth. Magna Patrum, tom. iii. p. 413.

³ Ussher, Sylloge Epistolarum Hibernic. p. 54. 55.

⁴ This we are explicitly taught by Hilduin in his epistle to the emperor Lewis the Meek, prefixed to his Areopagitica, p. 66, ed. Cologne, 1668, 8vo, in which he says:—"De notitia librorum, quos (Dionysius) patrio sermone conscripsit et quibus petentibus illos composuit, lecto nobis per Dei gratiam et vestram ordinationem, cuius dispensatione interpretatos, scripta nostra eos petentibus reseruat, satisfacit." Those err, therefore, who tell us that the Latin translation of Dionysius was not made till the reign of Charles the Bald. And those err also who say (with Mabillon, Annal. Benedict. tom. ii. lib. xxix. sec. 59, p. 488, and the authors of the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome v. p. 425, &c.) that Michael the Stammerer sent to Lewis the works of Dionysius translated from Greek into Latin. The contrary is most clearly signified by Hilduin in the place cited; "Authenticos namque eosdem (Dionysii) libros Græca lingua conscriptos, cum echeonomis ecclesiæ Constantinopolitane et ceteri missi Michaelis legatione—functi sunt—pro munere magno suscepimus."

⁵ Launoi, Diss. de Discrimine Dionysii Areop. et Parisiensis, cap. iv. Opp. tom. ii. par. i. p. 38, and the other writings of this great man, and of others concerning the two Dionysii.

⁶ Scotus was partial to the Platonic philosophy, which being one of the primary sources of the mystic theology, would easily amalgamate with it, and serve to explain and enforce it.—Mur. [On this subject, see the elaborate opinion given by Bähr, Gesch. der Röm. Lit. Suppl. vol. iii. p. 495, &c.—R.]

than against the common enemy, and these contests involved them continually in new calamities, and brought reproach upon the cause of true religion. Upon the banishment of Irene [A.D. 802] the contest about image-worship was renewed among the Greeks, and it continued with various success for nearly half this century. For Nicephorus [who now ascended the throne], though he would not revoke the Nicene decrees, nor remove the images from the temples, yet laid restraints upon their patrons, and would not allow them to use any violence or do any harm to the opposers of image-worship. His successor, Michael Curopalates, was a timid prince, who feared the rage of the monks and priests who contended for images, and therefore during his short reign [A.D. 811—813] he favoured the cause of images, and persecuted their opponents. Leo the Armenian had more vigour,¹ and assembling a council at Constantinople A.D. 814, he explicitly rescinded the Nicene decrees respecting the worship of the images of saints; yet he did not enact any penal laws against their worshippers.² As this temperate procedure was not satisfactory to Nicephorus the patriarch, and to the other friends of images, and as dangerous tumults seemed ready to break out, the emperor removed Nicephorus from his office, and repressed the rage of some of his adherents with punishments. His successor, Michael the Stammerer, who was also opposed to image-worship, found it necessary to pursue the same course; for although he at first showed great clemency to image-worshippers, he was obliged to depart from that clemency, and to chastise the restless faction which venerated images, and especially the monks.³ His son, Theophilus [A.D. 820—842] bore harder upon the defenders of images, and even put some of the more violent of them to death.⁴

¹ And more ingenuousness too. For, before calling the council, the emperor in an interview with Nicephorus requested him to show the fact by proofs from the writings of the apostles and of the earlier fathers, if as the patriarch asserted the worship of images was in early use in the church. The answer he received was that in this case we must be satisfied with unwritten tradition; and that what had been decided in a general council was never to be controverted. After this the emperor brought the contending parties to a conference in his presence, which Theodorus Studites and his party frustrated, by telling the emperor to his face that doctrinal controversies were not to be discussed in the palace but in the church; and that if an angel from heaven should advance a doctrine contrary to the decrees of the Nicene council, they would treat him with abhorrence. The emperor punished this insolence by merely sending the monks back to their cloisters, forbidding them to raise disturbances about images, and requiring them to be peaceable citizens.—Schl.

² According to Mansi (Supplm. Concil. tom. i. p. 755) there were several councils held at Constantinople under Leo the Armenian, in regard to images. One was held under the patriarch Nicephorus A.D. 814, and condemned Anthony, bishop of Siliceum, as an Iconoclast, and established image-worship. The next council was called by Leo himself in the year 815; and this it was that deposed Nicephorus and declared him a heretic. The third was held under the new patriarch Theodorus, and established the doctrines of the Iconoclasts. Images were now removed; and the unsubmissive monks were banished, but restored again to their cloisters as soon as they promised to remain quiet and to hold communion with the new patriarch Theodorus. There were, however, among them blind zealots who, with Theodorus Studites at their head, belched forth most shameful language against those bishops and monks who yielded obedience to the emperor's commands, and even against the emperor himself. The former they declared to be enemies of Christ, deniers of him, and apostates; the emperor they called an Amorite, another Og of Bashan, the great Dragon, a vessel of wrath, an Ahab, a second Julian; and to insult him they extolled their images, by chanting their praises in the most public places. These indeed were taken up and punished, and Theodorus Studites was sent into exile; and as this did not tame him he was imprisoned, yet so as to be allowed free correspondence by letter.—Schl.

15. But after the death of Theophilus in the year 842, his surviving consort, Theodora, who administered the government of the empire, wearied out and deluded by the menaces, the entreaties, and the fictitious miracles of the monks, assembled a council at Constantinople A.D. 842, and there re-established the decisions of the Nicene council and restored image-worship among the Greeks.⁵ Thus after a contest of one hundred and ten years image-worship gained the victory; and all the East, except the Armenian church, embraced it; nor did any one of the succeeding emperors attempt to cure the Greeks of their folly in this matter. The council of Constantinople held under Photius in the year 879, and which is reckoned by the Greeks the eighth general council, fortified image-worship by new and firm ramparts, approving and renewing all the decrees of the Nicene council. The Greeks, a superstitious people and controlled by monks, regarded this as so great a blessing conferred on them by heaven, that they resolved to consecrate an anniversary in remembrance of it, which they called the Feast of Orthodoxy.¹

³ Notwithstanding Michael ascended the throne under a very dubious title, the image-worshippers described him as a second David and a Josiah, so long as they accounted him one of their party; because he released those imprisoned and recalled the exiles. He in fact showed great gentleness towards the image-worshippers. He caused conferences to be held for allaying the controversies; and these proving ineffectual he allowed them to retain their images, though not to display them in Constantinople, and only required silence from both parties, so that the bitterness between them might subside. This gentleness was the more remarkable as the superstition of the image-worshippers knew no bounds and led on to the grossest follies. For they set up images instead of the cross, lighted candles before them, burned incense to them, sung to their praise, made supplications to them, used them as sponsors for their baptized children, scraped off the colours from the pictures and mixed them with the wine of the eucharist, and placed the bread of benediction in the hands of the images in order to receive it as from them. See the Epistle of Michael to the emperor Lewis the Meek, in Baronius, Annales, ad ann. 824, sec. 26.—Schl.

⁴ It is impossible to believe all that the Greek monks tell us of the cruelties of this emperor against the image-worshippers, as he was in other respects an upright ruler. And it is well known that he was very indulgent and kind towards Theoktista, the mother of his empress, who worshipped images in her house and endeavoured to instil the love of them into the young princesses of the emperor. And if some persons did actually suffer severely under him, they suffered rather on account of their slanderous language, their disobedience to the laws, and their seditious conduct, to which they were prompted by their mad zeal for promoting image-worship.—Schl.

⁵ See Spanheim, Hist. Imaginum, sec. viii. Opp. tom. II. p. 815, &c.; Lenfant, Préservatif contre la Réunion avec le Siège de Rome, tome III. lettr. xiv. p. 147, &c. lettr. xviii. xix. p. 503, &c.

16. Among the Latins image-worship did not obtain so easy a victory, although it was warmly patronised by the Roman pontiffs. For the people of the West still maintained their ancient liberty of thinking for themselves in matters of religion; and could not be brought to regard the decisions of the Romish bishop as final and conclusive. Most of the European Christians, as we have seen, took middle ground between the Iconoclasts and the image-worshippers. For they judged that images might be tolerated as helps to the memory, but denied that any worship or honour was to be paid to them. Michael the Stammerer, emperor of the Greeks, when he sent an embassy to Lewis the Meek A.D. 824, for the purpose of renewing the confederation with him, instructed his ambassadors to draw Lewis over if possible to the side of the Iconoclasts. Lewis chose to have the subject thoroughly discussed by the bishops in the council assembled at Paris A.D. 824.² They decided that they ought to abide by the opinions of the council of Frankfurt—namely, that the images of Christ and the saints were not indeed to be cast out of the temples, yet that religious worship should by no means be paid to them. Gradually however the European Christians swerved from this opinion, and that of the Roman pontiff, whose influence was daily increasing, got possession of their minds. Near the close of the century, the French first decided that some kind of worship might be paid to the sacred images, and the Germans and others followed their example.³

17. Still there were some among the Latins who inclined to the side of the Iconoclasts. The most noted of these was Claudius bishop of Turin, a Spaniard by birth and educated under Felix of Urgel. As soon as the favour of Lewis the Meek had raised him to the rank of bishop in the year 823, he cast all the crosses and sacred images out of the churches and broke them. The next year he published a book not only defending this procedure, but advancing other principles which were at variance with the opinions of the age. Among other things he denied the propriety of worshipping the cross, which the Greeks also conceded, spoke contemptuously of all sorts of relics maintaining that they had no efficacy, and disapproved of all pilgrimages to the tombs of saints and to holy places. He was opposed by the adherents of the inveterate superstition; and first by the abbot Theodemir, and afterwards by Dungal, Scotus, Jonas of Orleans, Walafrid Strabo, and others. But this learned and ingenious man defended his cause with energy;⁴ and thence it was that long after his death, there was less superstition in the region about Turin than in the other parts of Europe.

18. The controversy which commenced in the preceding century respecting the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son, and respecting the words,

¹ Mabillon, Annales Benedict. tom. ii. p. 488; Idem. Præf. ad Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. Sæcul. iv. par. i. p. vii. viii.; Le Cointe, Annales Eccl. Francor. tom. iv. ad ann. 824, and many others.

² Mabillon, Annales Benedict. tom. ii. p. 488, Præf. ad Sæcul. iv. Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. p. viii. Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iv. p. 491, and tome v. p. 27, 64. Among the Reformed, Basnage, Hist. des Eglis. Rêform. tome i. period iv. p. 31, &c. ed. in 4to. [It is to be regretted that we have only those testimonies of Claudius against the superstitions of his time, which his opposers and especially Jonas of Orleans have quoted from his writings. Yet in these quotations there is much that is solid, and expressed in a nervous and manly style. Against images he thus expresses himself: "If a man ought not to worship the works of God, much less should he worship and reverence the works of men. Whoever expects salvation which comes only from God to come from pictures, must be classed with those mentioned Rom. i. who serve the creature more than the Creator." Against the cross and the worship of it he thus taught:—"God has commanded us to bear the cross, not to pray to it. Those are willing to pray to it who are unwilling to bear it, either in the spiritual or in the literal sense. Thus to worship God is in fact to depart from him." Of the pope he said (when accused for not yielding to his authority), "He is not to be called the Apostolic!" (a title then commonly given to the pope), "who sits in the apostle's chair, but he who performs the duties of an apostle. For of those who hold that place yet do not fulfil its duties, the Lord says:—They sit in Moses' seat," &c. See Bishop Jonas, lib. iii. De Imag. in the Biblioth. Patr. Mar. Inéd. tom. xiv. p. 166.—Schl. [See also Milner's Hist. of the Church of Christ, cent. ix. chap. iii. vol. iii. p. 211.—R.

¹ See Gretser, Observat. in Codicum de Officiis Aulae et Ecclesie Constantinop. lib. iii. cap. viii. and the Ceremoniale Byzantinum, lately published by Reiske, lib. i. cap. xxviii. p. 92, &c.

² Fleury, Le Seur, and the other historians unanimously place this council in the year 825. It may be proper to observe here that the proceedings of this council evidently show, that the decisions of the Roman pontiff were by no means looked upon at this time as either obligatory or infallible. For when the letter of Pope Adrian in favour of images was read in the council, it was almost unanimously rejected as containing absurd and erroneous opinions. The decrees of the second council of Nice relating to image-worship were also censured by the Gallican bishops; and the authority of that council, though received by several popes as an œcumenical one, absolutely rejected. And what is remarkable is that the pope did not on this account declare the Gallican bishops heretics, nor exclude them from the communion of the apostolic see. See Fleury, livr. xlvii. sec. 4.—Macl.

[filioque] 'and from the Son,' inserted by the Latins in the Constantinopolitan creed, broke out with greater vehemence in this century; and from being a private dispute it gradually became a public controversy of the whole Greek and Latin church. The monks of Jerusalem contended about this matter and particularly about those words filioque; and one John was despatched by them on the subject into France to the emperor Charlemagne A.D. 809.¹ This subject was discussed in the council of Aix-la-Chapelle held in this year; and also at Rome before the pontiff Leo III. whither Charlemagne had sent envoys. Leo III. approved of the doctrine of the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Son, but disapproved of the alteration of the creed, and wished the words filioque to be gradually disused.² And his successors held the same sentiments; but the interpolation once admitted retained its place in spite of the pontiffs, and was at length received by all the Latin churches.³

19. To these ancient controversies new ones were added among the Latins. The first was respecting the manner in which the body and blood of Christ are present in the sacred supper. Though all Christians believed that the body and blood of Christ were presented to the communicants in the Lord's Supper, yet up to this time their views had been various and fluctuating respecting the manner in which the body and blood of Christ are present, nor had any council definitely prescribed what was to be believed on this subject. But in this century Paschasius Radbert, a monk and abbot of Corbey, in his treatise on the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ written A.D. 831, attempted to give more clearness and stability to the views of the church.⁴ Upon the presentation of this book enlarged and improved to Charles the Bald in the year 845, a great dispute arose. Paschasius taught in general that in the Lord's supper after the consecration, there remained only the form and appearance of bread and wine, and that the real body or the flesh and blood of Christ were actually present; and indeed that identical body which was born of the virgin, suffered on the cross, and arose from the tomb.⁵ This doctrine seemed to many to be new and strange, and especially the last part of it. Therefore Rabanus Maurus, Heribald and others, opposed it but on different grounds. And the emperor, Charles the Bald, commanded two men of distinguished learning and talents, Ratramn and John Scotus, to give a true exposition of that doctrine which Radbert was supposed to have corrupted.⁶ Both of them did so; but the work of Scotus is lost, and that of Ratramn which is still extant has given occasion to much disputation, both in former ages and in the present.⁷

20. The writers who treat of this controversy, are not agreed among themselves, nor are they self-consistent throughout their respective treatises. Indeed the mover of the controversy, Radbert himself, showed little consistency, and not unfrequently

⁴ See Mabillon, Annales Benedict. tom. ii. p. 539. The treatise of Paschasius was published in a more accurate manner than before by Martene, Ampliss. Collectio Veter. Script. tom. ix. p. 378, &c. The life and character of Paschasius are formally treated of by Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. Sæcul. iv. par. ii. p. 126, &c. and by the Jesuits, in the Acta Sanctor. Antw. ad diem 26 Aprilis; and by many others.

⁵ Far too corporeal conceptions of the presence of Christ's body and blood in the eucharist had existed in preceding times, and indeed ever since Cyril's notion of the nature of Christ's becoming flesh had been received, and the holy supper had been compared to an offering or sacrifice. But such gross corporeal expressions as Paschasius employed no one had before used; nor had any carried their conceptions so far. In his book, De corpore et sanguine Domini, he says: Licet figura panis et vini hic sit, omnino nihil aliud quam caro et sanguis post consecrationem credenda sunt—nec alia (caro) quam quæ nata est de Maria, passa in cruce, resurrexit de sepulchro; et hæc, inquam, ipsa est, et ideo Christi caro est, quæ pro vita mundi adhuc hodie offertur.—Schl.

⁶ Concerning Ratramn or Bertram, and his book which has caused so much discussion, see Fabricius, Biblioth. Lat. Med. Ævi, tom. i. p. 661, &c. [Concerning Ratramn's book there has been dispute as to its genuineness, some ascribing it to John Scotus, and also as to the doctrine it contains. The Romanists would make it teach transubstantiation; the Lutherans, consubstantiation; and the Reformed, only a mystical or sacramental presence of Christ.—Mur. [See also Bähr, Gesch. der Röm. Liter. Suppl. vol. part. iii. p. 473, &c.—R.

⁷ This controversy is described at length though not without partiality, by Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. [tom. vi.] Sæcul. iv. par. ii. p. 8, &c. With him, compare Basnage, Hist. de l'Eglise, tome i. p. 909, &c. [See also Gieseler's Text-book translated by Cunningham, vol. ii. p. 45, &c.—Mur.

¹ See Baluze, Miscellan. tom. vii. p. 14. [The occasion of this transaction was as follows; some French monks residing at Jerusalem as pilgrims chanted the creed in their worship, as was common with their countrymen, with the addition of Filioque. The Greeks censured this custom, and the Franks sought the protection and the determination of the emperor.—Schl.

² The conference of the Imperial envoys with Pope Leo III. is still extant in Harduin, Concilia, tom. iv. p. 970, &c. From this it appears that Leo was displeased not with the doctrine itself, but with the unauthorised interpolation of the creed; and disapproved the recent decision of the council of Aix-la-Chapelle, the confirmation of which was requested by the Imperial envoys. Pope John VIII. in a letter to Photius went still further; for he called the expression, that the Holy Ghost proceeded from the Son, blasphemy; though the abolition of it was attended with difficulty and required time.—Schl.

³ See Le Comte, Annal. Eccles. Francor. tom. iv. ad ann. 809, &c. Longueval, Hist. de l'Eglise Galliane, tome v. p. 151, and the other writers above cited. [The pope had not, either in the eighth century or the early part of the ninth, such influence and authority over the Spanish and French churches, as to be able to compel them directly to expunge the interpolation.—Schl.

recedes manifestly from what he had asserted. His principal antagonist, Bertram or Ratramn, seems in general to follow those who think that the body and blood of Christ are not truly present in the eucharist, but are merely represented by the bread and wine; and yet he has passages which appear to depart widely from that sentiment; and therefore it is not without apparent reason that he has been diversely understood and explained.¹ John Scotus being a philosopher, was the only one who expressed his views perspicuously and properly; teaching that the bread and wine are signs and representatives of the absent body and blood of Christ. All the others vary, asserting in one place what they gainsay in another, and rejecting at one time what they presently after maintain. Among the Latins therefore in this century, there was not yet a determinate, common opinion as to the mode in which the body and blood of Christ are present in the eucharist.

21. The disputants in this controversy, as is usual, taxed each other with odious consequences chargeable upon their opinions. The most considerable of these consequences was that which, in the eleventh century, was denominated stercoranism. Those who held with Radbert that after the consecration only the forms of bread and wine remained, contended that from the sentiments of their adversaries, who believed that in the holy supper there was nothing more than the figure or signs of Christ's body and blood, this consequence would follow, namely, that the body of Christ was ejected from the bowels with the other fæces. On the other hand those who rejected the transmutation of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, taxed the advocates of this doctrine with the same consequence. Each party probably cast this reproach upon the other without reason. The crime of stercoranism, if we do not mistake, was a fabricated charge, which could not justly fall on those who denied the conversion of the bread into the body of Christ; but which might be objected to those who believed in such a transmutation, although it was probably never admitted by any one in his right mind.²

22. At the time when the sacramental controversy was at its height, another controversy sprang up relating to divine grace and predestination. Godeschalvus, a Saxon of noble birth, and contrary to his own choice a monk first at Fulda and then at Orbais in France, returning from a journey to Rome in the year 847, lodged with his friend (and perhaps also his relative) Count Eberald; and there in presence of Nothingus, Bishop of Verona, entered into discussion respecting predestination, maintaining that God had from eternity predestinated some to everlasting life and others to the punishment of hell. When his enemy, Rabanus Maurus, heard of this, he first by letter charged him with heresy; and afterwards when Godeschalvus came from Italy to Germany in order to purge himself, and appeared before the council of Mentz, A.D. 848, Maurus procured his condemnation, and transmitted him as one found guilty to Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims in France.³ Hincmar who was a friend of Rabanus condemned him anew in a council held at Chiersey, A.D. 849; and as he would not renounce his sentiments, which he said and said truly were those of Augustine, Hincmar deprived him of his priestly office; ordered him to be whipped till he should throw the statement he had made at Mentz into the flames; and then committed him to prison in the monastery of Hautvilliers.¹ In this prison the unhappy monk, who was a man of learning but high-minded and pertinacious, ended his days in the year 868 or 869; retaining firmly till his last breath the sentiments he had embraced.

² Respecting the stercoranists see Mabillon, Acta Sancti. Ord. Bened. (tom. vi.) Pref. ad Secul. iv. par. ii. p. 21. Basnage, Hist. de l'Eglise, tome i. p. 926, &c. and the late treatise of the venerable Pfaff, Tubing. 1750, 4to. [It is not easy to determine the precise form of this indecent charge as advanced by either party. The believers in transubstantiation supposed the sacramental elements not to pass through the human body like ordinary aliments, but to become wholly incorporated with the bodies of the communicants; so that on their principles they could not be justly charged with stercoranism. On the contrary, the opposers of transubstantiation supposed the substance of the sacramental elements to undergo the ordinary changes in the stomach and bowels of the communicant; so that by assuming that these elements had become the real body and blood of Christ, they might be charged with stercoranism; but it was only by assuming what they expressly denied, namely, the truth of the doctrine of transubstantiation. Thus, neither party could be justly taxed with this odious consequence; and yet a dexterous disputant, by resorting to a little perversion of his antagonist's views, might easily cast upon him this vulgar and unseemly reproach.—Mur.] On the whole of this sacramental controversy, the student should consult the brief outline in Gieseler, Lehrbuch, &c. Cunningham's transl. vol. ii. p. 45, &c. for the sake of the extracts in the notes, on the right interpretation of which the greater part of the dispute turns. For the Roman Catholic view of this remarkable controversy, see the outline given by Döllinger, in his History of the Church, translated by Cox, vol. iii. p. 69, &c.—R.

³ Nothingus by letter gave Rabanus an account of the tenets advanced by Godeschalvus. Upon this Rabanus wrote a long letter to Nothingus and another to Count Eberald, loading the sentiments of Godeschalvus with reproaches. Godeschalvus therefore set out immediately for Germany, in order to vindicate his assailed principles. On his arrival at Mentz, he presented to Rabanus his tract on a twofold predestination. Rabanus laid this before a synod, which condemned the sentiments it contained, but did not venture to punish Godeschalvus, because he did not belong to their jurisdiction, but to that of Rheims. They however exacted from him an oath not to return again to the

¹ Bertram's Treatise in a new English translation was published at Dublin A.D. 1753; and with a learned historical Dissertation prefixed. Mabillon (Acta Sancti. Ord. Bened. tom. vi. Pref. p. 30, &c.) evinces triumphantly the genuineness of the book; and then goes into an elaborate argument to prove, in opposition to John Claude, that the author was a believer in the real presence. But the mere reading of his argument with the full and candid quotations it contains, has left on one mind at least the conviction, that Mosheim has truly stated the character and contents of that work.—Mur. [The translation published at Dublin was not a new one, it was merely a republication of an earlier translation by one G. Hopkins, Lond. 1686, 12mo, and 1688, 8vo. It has been reprinted at Oxford, 1839, 8vo.—R.]

23. While Godeschalvus remained in prison the Latin church was involved in controversy on his account. For distinguished and discerning men, such as Ratramn of Corbey, Prudentius of Troyes, Lupus of Ferrières, Florus a deacon of territories of King Lewis; and transmitted him as a prisoner to Hincmar, the archbishop of Rheims. The synodal epistle of Rabanus accompanying the prisoner contained this statement:—"Be it known to your goodness that a certain vagabond monk named Godeschalvus, who says he was ordained priest in your diocese came from Italy to Mentz, introducing new superstitions and pernicious doctrine concerning the predestination of God and leading the people into error; affirming that the predestination of God related to evil as well as to good; and that there are some in the world who cannot reclaim themselves from their errors and sins, on account of the predestination of God which compels them on to destruction; as if God had from the beginning made them incorrigible and obnoxious to perdition. Hearing this opinion therefore in a synod lately held at Mentz, and finding the man irreclaimable, with the consent and direction of our most pious king Illudovicus, we determined to transmit him together with his pernicious doctrine to you under condemnation; that you may put him in confinement in your diocese from which he has irregularly strolled, and that you may not suffer him any more to teach error, and seduce Christian people: for we have learned that he has already seduced many who are negligent of his salvation and who say, What will it profit me to exert myself in the service of God? Because if I am predestinated to death I can never escape it, but if predestinated to life although I do wickedly I shall undoubtedly obtain eternal rest. In these few words we have written to you, describing what we have found his doctrine to be," &c. See Harduin, Concilia, tom. v. pag. 15, 16.—Mur.

The sentence upon Godeschalvus passed by the synod of Chiersey was thus worded:—"Brother Godeschalvus, know thou that the holy office of the sacerdotal ministry which thou hast irregularly usurped," (because in a vacancy of the see of Rheims he obtained ordination of the sub-bishop of Rheims,) "and hast not feared hitherto to abuse by wicked manners and acts and by corrupt doctrines, is now by the decision of the Holy Spirit (of whose grace the sacerdotal office is the administration by virtue of the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ,) taken from thee, if thou ever receivest it; and thou art utterly prohibited from ever presuming again to exercise it. Moreover, because thou hast presumed, contrary to the design and the name of a monk, and despising ecclesiastical law, to unite and confound the civil and ecclesiastical vocations, we by our episcopal authority decree that thou be whipped with very severe stripes (durissimis verberibus), and according to ecclesiastical laws be shut up in prison. And that thou no more presume to exercise the functions of a teacher, we by virtue of the eternal word impose perpetual silence upon thy lips." See Harduin, ubi supra, p. 20. This sentence was executed without mitigation.—Mur.

Lyons, and Remigius bishop of Lyons, together with his whole church, and many others, defended with energy, both orally and in writing, either the person or the sentiments of the monk. On the other hand, Hincmar his judge, Amalrius, John Scotus the celebrated philosopher, and others, by their writings contended that both he and his opinions were justly dealt with. As the spirit of controversy continually waxed hotter, Charles the Bald in the year 853 ordered another convention or council to be held at Chiersey, in which, through the influence of Hincmar, the decision of the former council was confirmed, and Godeschalvus was again condemned as a heretic.² But in the year 855 the three provinces of Lyons, Vienne, and Arles, assembled in council at Valence, Remigius presiding, and set forth other decisions in opposition to those of Chiersey, and defended the cause of Godeschalvus.³ With

² In this council the opposers of Godeschalvus set forth their creed in respect to the contested doctrines, in the four following articles; viz.

I. Almighty God created man without sin, upright, endued with free will; and placed him in Paradise, and purposed his continuance in the holiness of uprightness. Man abusing free will sinned and fell, and the whole human race became a mass of corruption. But the good and righteous God elected, out of that mass of perdition, according to his foreknowledge, those whom he predestinated unto life through grace, and foreordained eternal life for them; but the others whom in his righteous judgment he left in the mass of perdition, he foresaw would perish, but did not foreordain that they should perish; yet being just he foreordained eternal punishment to be their portion. And thus we affirm but one predestination of God which relates either to the gift of grace, or to the retributions of justice.

II. We lost freedom of will in the first man, which we recover by Christ our Lord; and we have free will to good when prevented and aided by grace; and have free will to evil when forsaken of grace. That we have free will is because we are made free by grace and are healed of corruption by it.

III. Almighty God wills that all men without exception should become saved; and yet all men will not be saved. And that some are saved arises from the gratuity of him who saves; but that some perish arises from their desert of perdition.

IV. As there never was, is, or will be a man whose nature was not assumed by our Lord Jesus Christ, so there never was, is, or will be a man for whom Christ has not died; and this, notwithstanding all are not redeemed by the mystery of his passion. That all are not redeemed by the mystery of his passion is not owing to the [limited] magnitude and value of the price; but is the fault of unbelievers or of them who do not believe with the faith that works by love. For the cup of human salvation, which is provided for our weakness and has divine efficacy, contains what might benefit all; but if it be not drunken, it will not produce healing.

These doctrinal articles were agreed on in the council of Chiersey, A.D. 853; though sometimes attributed to the council of Chiersey in the year 849, and printed as such in Harduin, Concilia, tom. v. p. 13, 19; compare p. 57.—Mur.

³ The council of Valence published twenty-three canons, five of which contain the doctrinal views of the friends and defenders of Godeschalvus. See Harduin, Concilia, tom. v. p. 87, &c. These five canons are too long to be inserted here without some abridgment. The substance of them is as follows, viz.:

Can. II. "That God foresees and eternally foresaw the decisions of the council of Valence coincided with those of the council of Langres, A.D. 859, composed of the same provinces; and likewise those of the council of Toul, A.D. 860, composed of the bishops of fourteen provinces.¹ But on the death of Godeschalvus, the author of the contest, this vehement controversy subsided.²

24. The cause of Godeschalvus is involved in some obscurity, and many eminent men have appeared both as his patrons and his accusers. He taught unquestionably that there is a twofold predestination, the one to eternal life and the other to eternal death; that God does not will the salvation of all men but only of the elect; and that Christ suffered death not only for the whole human race, but only for that portion of it to which God decreed eternal salvation. His friends put a favourable construction upon these propositions; and they deny he held that those whom God predestinated to eternal punishment were also predestinated to sin and guilt. On the contrary they maintain that he taught only this, that God from eternity condemned those who he foresaw would become sinners, that he condemned them on account of their sins voluntarily committed, and decreed that the fruits of God's love and of Christ's sufferings should extend only to the elect; notwithstanding the love of God and the sufferings of Christ in themselves considered have reference to all men. But his adversaries fiercely contend that he concealed gross errors under ambiguous phraseology; and in particular that he wished to have it believed, that God had predestinated the persons who will be damned, not only to suffer punishment but likewise to commit the sins by which they incur that punishment.³ This both the good which the righteous will perform, and the evil which the wicked will do." Dan. ii. 29. "We hold faithfully and judge it should be held that he foresaw, that the righteous would certainly become righteous through his grace, and by the same grace would obtain eternal blessedness; and he foresaw that the wicked would be wicked through their own perverseness, and would be such as must be condemned by his justice to eternal punishment." According to Ps. lxi. 12, and Rom. ii. 7-9, and 2 Thess. i. 7-10. "Nor has the prescience of God imposed upon any bad man a necessity that he cannot be other than bad; but what he would become by his own free volition, God as one who knows all things before they come to pass foresaw, by his omnipotent and unchangeable majesty. Nor do we believe that any one is condemned by a divine prejudication, but according to the deserts of his own wickedness. Nor do the wicked perish because they could not become good, but because they would not become good, and through their own fault remained in the mass of condemnation, or in their original and their actual sin."

Can. III. "As to the predestination of God, we decide and faithfully decide according to the authority of the Apostle;" Rom. ix. 21-23. "We confidently profess a predestination of the elect unto life, and a predestination of the wicked unto death. But in the election of those to be saved, the mercy of God precedes their good deserts; and in the condemnation of those who are to perish, their ill deserts precede the righteous judgment of God. In his predestination God only determined what he himself would do, either in his gratuitous mercy or in his righteous judgment."—"In the wicked, he foresaw their wickedness because it is from themselves; he did not predestine it, because it is not from him. The punishment indeed consequent upon their ill desert he foresaw, being a God who foresees all things; and also predestined because he is a just God, with whom as St. Augustine says there is both a fixed purpose and a certain foreknowledge, in regard to all things whatever."—"But that some are predestinated to wickedness by a divine power, so that they cannot be of another character, we not only do not believe, but if there are those who will believe so great a wrong, we as well as the council of Orange with all detestation declare them anathema."

Can. IV. In this canon they disapproved the sentiments of some who held "that the blood of Christ was shed even for those ungodly ones who had been punished with eternal damnation, from the beginning of the world to the time of Christ's passion." And they held "that this price was paid (only) for those of whom our Lord has said: 'As Moses lifted up the serpent,' &c. 'that every one that believeth in him,' &c. John iii. 14-16. And the apostle says: 'Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many.'"—"Moreover, the four articles adopted without due consideration by the synod of our brethren (at Chiersey, A.D. 853), on account of their inutility, and indeed their injurious tendency and error, contrary to the truth; as also those other, (of John Scotus,) unfitly set forth in nineteen syllogisms, and in which, notwithstanding the boast that they are not the result of philosophy, there appears to be rather the fabrication of the devil than an exhibition of the faith, we wholly explode as not to be listened to by the faithful; and we enjoin by the authority of the Holy Spirit that such and all similar statements be looked upon as dangerous and to be avoided. And the introducers of (such) novelties, we judge ought to be censured."

Can. V. This canon maintains the necessity of a saint's persevering in holiness in order to his salvation.

Can. VI. In regard to saving grace "and free will which was impaired by sin in the first man, but is recovered and made whole again by Jesus Christ in all believers in him;" this council held with various councils and pontiffs; and reject the trash vended by various persons."—Mur.

¹ The five doctrinal canons of the council of Valence were adopted without alteration by the councils of Langres and of Toul. See Harduin, Concilia, tom. v. p. 481, &c. 498.—Mur.

² Besides the common writers an impartial history of this controversy is given by Bulaeus, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. i. p. 178, &c. by Mabillon, Acta Sanctorum, Ord. Bened., tom. vi.; or Sæcul. iv. par. ii. Præf. p. xlvii.; in the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome v. p. 352; by Ussher, Hist. Godeschalci, Dublin, 1631, 4to; and by Vossius, Historia Pelagiana, lib. vii. cap. iv. Add Fabricius, Biblioth. Lat. Mediæ ævæ, tom. iii. p. 210, &c. [and Gieseler's Text-book, translated by Cummingham, vol. ii. p. 50-54.—Mur.] And Dellinger, Hist. of the Church, Cox's transl., vol. iii. p. 62, &c.—R.

³ The cause of Godeschalvus is learnedly treated in an appropriate work by Mauquin, who published all the writings on both sides of this controversy which have reached us, Paris, 1650, 2 vols. 4to, under the title: Veterum Auctorum, qui nono sæculo de Predestinatione et Gratia scripserunt Opera et Fragmenta, cum Historia et gemina Præfatione. A more concise account of it is given by Noris, Synopsis Historiæ Godeschalcanæ in his Opp. tom. iv. p. 677, &c. But he defends Godeschalvus more strenuously than Mauquin does. All the Benedictines, Augustinians, and Jansenists maintain that Godeschalvus was most unjustly oppressed and persecuted by Rabanus and Hincmar. The Jesuits take opposite ground; and one of them, Lewis Cellot, in his Hist. Godeschalci Prædestinantiani, splendidly printed, Paris, 1655, fol. labours to show that Godeschalvus was most righteously condemned. [Natalis Alexander, Hist. Eccles. Sæcul. ii.

at least seems to be incontrovertible, that the true cause of this whole controversy and of all the sufferings endured by the unhappy Godeschalvus, may be traced to the private enmity existing between him and Rabanus Maurus who was his abbot.¹

25. With this great controversy, another smaller one was interwoven relative to the trine God. In the churches over which he presided, Hincmar forbade the singing of the last words of a very ancient hymn: Te trina Deitas unaque poscimus; [Of thee, triune Deity yet one, we ask, &c.] on the ground that this phraseology subverted the simplicity of the divine nature, and implied the existence of three Gods. The Benedictine monks would not obey this mandate of Hincmar; and one of their number, Ratramn, wrote a considerable volume made up, according to the custom of the age, of quotations from the ancient doctors in defence of a trine Deity. Godeschalvus, receiving information of this dissension while in prison, sent forth a paper in which he defended the cause of his fellow monks. For this he was accused by Hincmar of Tritheism, and was confuted in a book written expressly for that purpose. But this controversy soon subsided, and in spite of Hincmar's efforts those words retained their place in the hymn.²

26. About the same time another controversy found its way from Germany into France, relative to the manner in which the blessed Saviour issued from the womb of his mother. Some of the Germans maintained that Jesus Christ did not proceed from the womb of Mary according to the laws of nature in the case of other persons, but in a singular and extraordinary manner. When this opinion reached France, Ratramn opposed it, and maintained that Christ came into the world in the way in which nature has provided. Paschasius Radbert came forth in defence of the Germans, maintaining in a distinct treatise, that Christ was born with no expansion of his mother's body, and charging those who thought otherwise with denying the virginity of Mary. But this also was a short controversy and gave way to greater ones.³

27. Of all the controversies which disturbed this century, the most famous and the most unhappy was that which severed the Greek and Latin churches. The bishops of Rome and Constantinople had long indulged and sometimes also manifested great jealousies of each other. Their mutual animosity became violent from the time of Leo the Isaurian [A.D. 716—741] when the bishops of Constantinople, supported by the authority and patronage of the [Greek] emperors, withdrew many provinces from subjection to the see of Rome.⁴ But in the ninth century the smothered fire which had been burning in secret, broke out into an open flame upon occasion of the elevation of Photius, the most learned Greek of the age, to succeed the deposed Ignatius in the see of Constantinople by the Emperor Michael, A.D. 852 [rather A.D. 858]; and the confirmation of that elevation as regular and correct by the council of Constantinople in the year 861.⁵ For the Roman pontiff, Nicolaus I. whose aid had been solicited by Ignatius in a council at Rome A.D. 862, pronounced Photius (whose election he maintained was uncanonical) together with his adherents to be unworthy of Christian communion. This thunder was so far from terrifying Photius, that he gave back the same measure he had received; and in return excommunicated Nicolaus in the council of Constantinople of the year 866.

28. The pretence for the war which Ni-

¹ See D'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. i. p. 396, Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. (tom. vi.) Sæcul. iv. par. ii. Pref. p. li. &c. [After giving an account of this controversy Mabillon proceeds to the history of another between Ratramn and Paschasius Radbert, respecting the unity of human souls. The controversy was of short continuance and seems to have arisen from a misunderstanding of each other, in consequence of their not clearly discriminating between numerical unity and a specific unity. See Mabillon, ubi supra, p. liii. &c.—There was another controversy under Charlemagne respecting the seven-fold grace of the Spirit. Charlemagne asked the opinion of several bishops, whether Christ and believers receive the same extraordinary gifts of the Holy Spirit. They answered that Christ received all the seven gifts equally, but that believers receive each his particular gift. The emperor, dissatisfied with their answer, wrote a tract to prove that Christ received all the gifts of the Spirit at once and in perpetuum, without change, increase, or diminution; but that believers did not so receive them, though they might in some degree enjoy the temporary possession of them all. See Walch's Programm. de Gratia septiformi Spiritus, A.D. 1755.—Mur.]

² See Giannone, Hist. de Naples, tome i. p. 535, 616. De Marca, De Concordia Sacerdot. et Imperii, lib. i. cap. i. p. 6, &c. Le Quien, Oriens Christ. tom. i. p. 96, &c.—[See also Gieseler's Text-book, by Cunningham, vol. ii. p. 136—147.—Mur.]

³ Some of the Greeks call this a general council. It was attended by 218 bishops, and its decrees were subscribed by the two Roman delegates. Its acts are lost, having probably been destroyed by the adherents of Ignatius. See Walch's Kirchenversam. p. 552—581.

x. Mss. v. tom. xli. p. 302—354, follows Manguin for the most part.—Mur.

¹ Godeschalvus who was committed to the monastery of Fulda by his parents while an infant, agreeably to the custom of the age, when he became adult wished to abandon a monastic life. But Rabanus retained him contrary to his wishes. This produced a great contest between them, which was terminated only by the interposition of Lewis the Meek. Hence those conflicts and sufferings. See the Centuria Magdeb. centur. ix. c. 10. p. 543, 546; and Mabillon, Annals Bened. tom. ii. ann. 829, p. 523.

² See the writers of the history of Godeschalvus who also touch upon this controversy.

colaus I. commenced, was the justice of the cause of Ignatius, whom the emperor had deprived of his episcopal office upon a charge, true or false, of treason. But Nicolaus would have been unconcerned about the injury done to Ignatius, if he could have recovered from the Greek emperor and from Photius, the provinces taken from the Roman pontiffs by the Greeks, namely Illyricum, Macedonia, Epirus, Achaia, Thessaly, and Sicily. For he had before demanded them through his envoys at Constantinople. And when the Greeks paid no regard to his demand, he resolved to avenge his own rather than Ignatius' wrong.

29. In the midst of this warm conflict, Basil the Macedonian, a parricide who had usurped the empire of the Greeks, suddenly restored peace. For he recalled Ignatius from exile and commanded Photius to retire to private life. This decision of the emperor was confirmed by a council assembled at Constantinople A.D. 869, in which the legates of the Roman pontiff, Hadrian II. had controlling influence.¹ The Latins call this the eighth general council. The religious contest between the Greeks and Latins now ceased; but the strife respecting the boundaries of the Romish [pontifical] jurisdiction, especially in regard to Bulgaria, still continued; nor could the pontiff with all his efforts prevail on either Ignatius or the emperor to give up Bulgaria or any other of the provinces.

30. The first schism was of such a nature that it was possible to heal it. But Photius, a man of high feelings and more learned than all the Latins, imprudently prepared materials for interminable war. For in the first place, in the year 866, he annexed Bulgaria to the see of Constantinople which Nicolaus was eager to possess; and this was extremely offensive to the Roman pontiff.² In the next place, what was much more to be lamented and unworthy of so great a man, he sent an Encyclical letter to the oriental patriarchs on the subject, thus converting his own private controversy into a public one; and moreover accused in very strong terms the Roman bishops sent among the Bulgarians, and through them the whole Latin church, of corrupting the true religion or of heresy. In his great irritation he taxed the Romans with five enormities, than which in their view the mind could conceive of no greater. First, that they deemed it proper to fast on the seventh day of the week or the Sabbath. Secondly, that in the first week of Lent they permitted the use of milk and cheese. Thirdly, that they wholly disapproved of the marriage of priests. Fourthly, that they thought none but bishops could anoint the baptized with the holy oil or confirm, and that they therefore anointed a second time those who had been anointed by presbyters. And fifthly, that they had adulterated the Constantinopolitan creed by adding to it the words Filioque, thus teaching that the Holy Spirit did not proceed from the Father only but also from the Son.³ Nicolaus I. sent this accusation to Hincmar and the other Gallic bishops in the year 867, that they might deliberate in councils respecting the proper answer to it. Hence Odo of Beauvais, Ratramn, Ado of Vienne, Æneas of Paris, and perhaps others, also entered the lists against the Greeks, and very warmly defended the cause of the Latins in written vindications.⁴

31. Ignatius died in the year 878; and Photius was again raised, by the favour of the emperor, to the patriarchate of the Greek church. The Roman pontiff John VIII. gave his assent, but it was on condition that Photius would allow the Bulgarians to come under the Roman jurisdiction. Photius promised the whole, nor did the emperor seem opposed to the wishes of the pontiff.⁵ Therefore in the year 879 the legates of John VIII. were present at the council of Constantinople, and gave their sanction to all its decrees.⁶ But after

¹ The writers on both sides of this controversy are named by Fabricius, Biblioth. Græca, vol. iv. cap. xxviii. p. 372.

² The state of the case respecting Bulgaria appears to have been this:—It was the Constantinopolitans who converted the king of that country about the year 861, and the patriarch of that city naturally desired to possess the ecclesiastical supremacy over this new acquisition. But the king dreading the increased influence of so near a neighbour, wished rather to be in connexion with Rome, and the Pope on his application sent him priests and bishops. It was this supposed invasion of his rights which was so keenly felt by the patriarch Photius, and which urged him to issue the Encyclical letter so offensive to the Pope, and containing the charges stated in the text.—H.

³ See an Epistle of Photius himself, which is the second of his Epistles, as published by Montague, p. 47, &c. Some enumerate ten heads of accusation by Photius. But they undoubtedly blend the first controversy with the second between the Greeks and Latins, and include the criminations which were made in the time of Michael Cerularius [patriarch in the middle of the eleventh century]. Certain it is, that in the Epistle of Photius, from which alone the first controversy is to be judged of, there are only the five heads of disagreement which we have stated. [See this Epistle of Photius in Latin in Baronius, Annals ad ann. 863, No. 34.—H.]

⁴ Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. vi.; or Æccl. iv. par. II. Præf. p. 65.

⁵ See Le Gues, Ordens Christianus, tom. i. p. 103, &c.

⁶ The entire acts of this council are in Harduin, Concilia, tom. vi. par. i. p. 207—342. The council was called by order of the emperor Basil, and by all the Greeks it has been accounted a general council; but the Latins do not so regard it. The number of bishops the council broke up, the emperor (doubtless with the consent of Photius) would not permit the Bulgarians to be transferred to the Roman pontiff:—and it must be acknowledged there were very strong motives for such a determination. Hence the pontiff sent Marinus his legate to Constantinople, and signified that he persevered in the former sentence passed upon Photius. The legate was thrown into prison by the emperor but was again liberated, and afterwards on the death of John VIII. being created Roman pontiff, he was mindful of the ill usage he had received, and issued a second condemnation of Photius.

32. Six years afterwards A.D. 886, Leo, surnamed the philosopher, the son of the emperor Basil, again deposed the patriarch Photius and exiled him to a monastery in Armenia called Bardi, where he died in the year 891.¹ Thus the author of the contest being removed, if there had been due moderation and equity at Rome the whole strife might have been quieted, and harmony between the Greeks and Latins have been restored. But the Roman pontiffs required that all the bishops and priests whom Photius had consecrated, should be deprived of their offices. And as the Greeks would by no means submit to this, all the contentions respecting points of religion as well as other things were renewed with increased bitterness; and being augmented by new grounds of controversy, continued till the unhappy separation between the Greek and Latin churches became absolute and perpetual.

present was 333, and the legates of the Roman pontiff and also representatives of the three Oriental patriarchs attended it. Photius presided, and the principal objects were obtained without difficulty in seven sessions. Photius was unanimously acknowledged the regular patriarch of Constantinople, and all that had been decreed against him at Rome and at Constantinople was annulled and declared void. Such as should not acknowledge Photius were to be excommunicated. The council proceeded to establish the true faith by confirming the creed of the first Nicene and the first Constantinopolitan councils, rejecting all interpolations (that is, merely the addition Filioque;) and again enacting the decrees of the second Nicene council respecting image-worship. The council was closed by an eulogy of Procopius of Cesarea on Photius, and by a solemn declaration on the part of the Roman legates, that whoever would not acknowledge the holy patriarch Photius and hold ecclesiastical communion with him, ought to be accounted an associate of the traitor Judas and no Christian; and this was assented to by the whole council. See Walch's Kirchenversamml. v. 375, &c.—Mur.

¹ Photius had ordained one Theodorus a bishop, who was falsely accused of treason. This circumstance brought the patriarch under some temporary suspicion. Besides, the new emperor wished to raise his brother Stephen to the patriarchal chair. He therefore deposed Photius and gave the office to his brother. Yet when he learned the innocence of Photius, he seems to have felt some relents; for he made his exile comfortable, and in a letter to the pope spoke of him as having voluntarily resigned his office and gone into retirement.—Schä.

CHAPTER IV.

HISTORY OF RITES AND CEREMONIES.

1. That the public rites and ceremonies were gradually multiplied very considerably, is evinced by the writers who in this century began to compose and publish explanations of them for the instruction of the common people; namely, Amalarius (whose numerous expositions however are confuted by Agobard and Florus), John Scotus, Angelome, Remigius of Auxerre, Walafrid Strabo, and others. These treatises are entitled De Divinis Officiis; for in the style of this age a divine office is a religious ceremony. Though these works were undoubtedly drawn up with good intentions, yet it is difficult to say whether they benefited more than they injured the Christian cause. They contained indeed some spiritual aliment for those who attended on public worship, but it was for the most part crude and unwholesome. For the alleged grounds and reasons of the various rites are to a great degree far-fetched, false, constrained, nay, ridiculous and puerile. Besides, excessive regard for external rites was increased and strengthened by this elaborate explanation of them, to the detriment of real piety. For how could any one withhold respect and reverence from that which he understood to be most wisely ordained and full of mystery?

2. To describe severally all the new rites adopted either by Christians generally or by particular churches, would not comport with the designed brevity of this work. We therefore despatch this extensive subject in a few words. The corpses of holy men, either brought from distant countries or discovered by the industry of the priests, required the appointment of new feast-days, and some variation in the ceremonies observed on those days. And as the prosperity of the clergy depended on the impressions of the people respecting the merits and the power of those saints whom they were invited to worship, it was necessary that their eyes and their ears should be fascinated with various ceremonies and exhibitions. Hence the splendid furniture of the temples, the numerous wax-candles burning at mid-day, the multitude of pictures and statues, the decorations of the altars, the frequent processions, the splendid dresses of the priests, and masses appropriate to the honour of saints.² The festival of All Saints was added by Gregory IV. to the public holy-days of the Latins;¹ and the feast of St. Michael, which had been long observed with much reverence by both the Greeks and the Latins, now began to be more popular.²

² See the tract of Fecht, De Missis in Honorem Sanctorum.

3. In the civil and private life of Christians, especially among the Latins, there existed many customs derived from ancient paganism. For the barbarous nations who embraced Christianity would not allow the customs and laws of their ancestors to be wrested from them, though very alien from the rules of Christianity; nay by their example they drew other nations among whom they lived intermixed, into the same absurdities. We have examples in the well known methods of proving right and innocence in civil and criminal causes, by cold water,³ by single combat,⁴ by red-hot iron,⁵ by a cross,⁶ and other methods which were in general use among the Latins in this and the following

Du Cange, Glossarium, under the article AQUÆ, vel Aquæ frigidae judicium, tom. i. p. 308—313. ed. Francf. 1710.—Du Cange proceeds to describe the ordeal by hot water. For this the preparatory religious ceremonies were the same as for the ordeal by cold water. Afterwards the priest heated a caldron of water till it boiled. Then, taking it off the fire, he immersed in it a stone which he held suspended by a string to the depth of one, two, or three palms; and the criminal must thrust in his naked hand and arm and seizing the stone pull it out. His hand and arm were immediately wrapped up in linen cloths, and a bag drawn over the whole and sealed. After three days the hand and arm were examined, and if found not scalded the man was accounted innocent. This ordeal was nearly as much used as the other, but was considered rather more suitable for persons of quality.—Mur.

¹ Loccenius, Antiquit. Suro-Gothicæ, lib. ii. cap. vii. viii. p. 144. Even clergymen did not refuse to terminate controversies by the duellum or single combat. See Bæhmer's Jus Eccles. Protestantium, tom. v. p. 88, &c. [The trial by combat originated among the northern barbarians, was in use before the Christian era, and was brought by the Lombards into Italy, and by the Germans into Suabia. It was not an ordeal for the trial of public offences, but was a mode of settling private disputes and quarrels between individuals, when there was no sufficient evidence to make the case clear. The parties deposited with the judge their bonds or goods to the requisite amount, for paying the forfeiture in case they were cast and for the fees of court. The judge also appointed the time for the combat and presided over it. Knights fought on horseback and armed as for war, in complete armour, and with their horses covered with mail. Common men fought on foot with swords and shields, covered, except their faces and feet, with linen or cotton to any extent they pleased. Certain persons, as women, priests, and others, might employ champions to fight in their stead. See the full account in Du Cange, Glossarium, under the article, Duellum; see also Hallam's Lives of Europe in the Middle Ages, vol. i. p. 186, 8th ed., Lond. 1841. This mode of trial gradually sank into disuse; but it was not abolished by legislative enactments either in France or England. Hence, so late as the 19th century the right of challenging to single combat was asserted in an English court.—Mur. (It required a special act of Parliament 59 Geo. III. ch. 46, to abolish it, so recently as 1819.—R.]

² Lambæus, Notam Hamburg. lib. ii. p. 39. Ussher, Synloge Epist. Hibernicæ, p. 81. Johnson's Lives of the British Church, and the extracts from them, in La Roche, Mémoires Littér. de la Grande Bretagne, tome viii. p. 391. [This was a very common ordeal, and was esteemed more honourable than the ordeals by water. Sometimes the person walked barefoot over nine or twelve red-hot ploughshares treading on each. But more frequently he carried a hot iron in his naked hands, nine times the length of his foot. The religious rites attending this ordeal were very similar to those of the ordeal by hot water. See Du Cange, Glossarium, articles FERRUM candens, and VOMER ignis.—Mur.]

³ See Agobard, Contra Judicium Dei Liber, Opp. tom. i. and Contra Legem Gundobadi, cap. ix. p. 114. Bignonius, Ad formulas Marculphi, cap. xii. Baluze, ad Agobardum, p. 104; and others. [Du Cange in his Glossarium, article CRUCIS judicium, is not able definitely to state what was the mode of this ordeal. He finds some instances of persons standing long with their arms extended horizontally so as to present the form of a cross. If they grew weary, fainted, and fell, they were accounted guilty. He also finds other modes of trial by cross. Sometimes it was merely laying the hand on a sacred cross, and then uttering a solemn oath of purgation.—On all the forms of ordeal, see Rees' Cyclopædia, art. Ordeal.—This mode of trying difficult and dubious causes was denominated Judicium Dei, and was considered as a solemn appeal to God to show by his special interposition, whether a person were guilty or innocent. It was therefore a presumptuous attempt to call forth a miracle from the hand of God; and it argued both the ignorance and the super-

¹ See Mabillon, De Re Diplomatica, p. 537. [This holds true only of Germany and France. For as to England, Bede mentioned this feast in the preceding century; and at Rome it had been established by Pope Boniface IV. See above, p. 253, note 7.—Schl.]

² The Latins had but few feast-days up to this century, as appears from the poem of Florus extant in Martene, Thesaurus, tom. v. p. 695, &c. [The council of Mentz A.D. 813, determined precisely the number of both fasts and feasts to be observed. Canon 31 designates the fasts, namely, the first week in March, the second week in June, the third week in September, and the last full week preceding Christmas eve. On these weeks all were to fast, and were to attend church on Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays, at three o'clock, P.M.—Canon 36 thus enumerates and sanctions the festivals: "We ordain the celebration of the feast days of the year. That is, Easter Sunday is to be observed with all honour and sobriety; and the whole of Easter week we decree shall be observed in like manner. Ascension-day must be celebrated with full worship. Likewise Pentecost, just as Easter. In the nativity [martyrdom] of Peter and Paul, one day; the nativity of St. John Baptist; the assumption of St. Mary; the dedication of St. Michael; the nativity of St. Remigius, St. Martin, St. Andrew; at Christmas, four days, the octaves of our Lord, the obsequy of our Lord, the purification of St. Mary. And we decree the observance of the festivals of those martyrs or confessors whose sacred bodies repose in each diocese; and in like manner the dedication of each church." The 27th canon adds: "We ordain the observance of all the Lord's days [Sundays] with all reverence and with abstinence from servile work, and that no traffic take place on those days, nor do we approve that any one be sentenced to death or to punishment," on those days.—See Harduin, Concilia, tom. iv. p. 1015.—Mur.]

³ See Mabillon, Analecæ Veteris Epi, tom. i. p. 47; Roye, De Missis Dom. p. 152. [The ordeal by immersion in cold water was very common in the ninth and following centuries, especially for criminals of vulgar rank in society. It was sanctioned by public law in most countries of Europe. And though disapproved by various kings and councils yet it was generally held sacred, and was supposed to have been invented by the Pope Eugene. The person to be tried was conducted to the church, and most solemnly adjured to confess the fact if he were guilty. If he would not confess, he received the sacrament, was sprinkled with holy water, and conducted to a river or lake. The priest then excoriated the water, charging it not to receive the criminal if he were guilty. The criminal was now stripped naked and bound, and a rope was tied to him by which to draw him out, if he sank to a certain depth. When cast into the water, if he floated he was accounted guilty; but if he sank to the depth marked on the rope (sometimes a yard and a half) he was instantly drawn out and was accounted innocent. See a large and very satisfactory account of this ordeal in century. No sober man at the present day entertains a doubt that these equivocal and uncertain modes of deciding causes originated from the customs of barbarians, and that they are fallacious and abhorrent to the genius of true religion. Yet in that age, the pontiffs and inferior bishops did not blush to honour and dignify them with prayers, with the eucharist, and other rites, in order to give them somewhat of a Christian aspect.

CHAPTER V.

HISTORY OF SECTS AND HERESIES.

1. CONCERNING the ancient Christian sects there is little new to be said. Nearly all of them which were considerable for numbers, had their residence and abettors beyond the boundaries of the Greek and Latin dominions. The Nestorians in particular, and the Monophysites who lived securely under the protection of the Arabians, were very attentive to their own affairs, and did not cease from efforts for the conversion of the nations still in pagan ignorance. Some represent that it was in this century the Abyssinians or Ethiopians were persuaded by the Egyptians to embrace the Monophysite doctrines. But it was undoubtedly from the seventh century if not earlier that the Abyssinians, who were accustomed to receive their bishop from the patriarch of Alexandria, embraced the tenets of the Monophysites; for in that century the Arabs conquered Egypt, oppressed the Greeks [or Melchites], and protected the advocates of one nature in Christ; so that this sect was able to subject nearly the whole Egyptian church to its jurisdiction¹.

2. The Greeks were engaged with various success during nearly this entire century in cruel wars with the Paulicians, a sect allied to the Manicheans and residing principally in Armenia. This sect is said to have been formed in Armenia by two brothers, Paul and John, the sons of Calinice of Samosata, and to have received its name from them; some however think that one Paul, an Armenian who lived in the reign of Justinian II. gave name to the sect². Under Constans in the seventh cen-tury³ it was in an exhausted and depressed state, in consequence of penal laws and oppressions when one Constantine resuscitated it. The emperors, Constans, Justinian II. and Leo the Isaurian, harassed them in various ways and laboured to extirpate the sect, but they were utterly unable to subdue a party so inflexible and so regardless of sufferings. In the beginning of the ninth century their condition was more prosperous. For the emperor, Nicephorus Logotheta, [A.D. 802—811,] favoured the Paulicians and gave them free toleration⁴.

3. But after a few years of repose the Paulicians were again assailed with increased violence, by the emperors Michael Curopalates and Leo the Armenian, [A.D. 811—820,] who commanded them to be carefully searched after, through all the provinces of the Greek empire, and to be put to death if they would not return to the Greek church. Driven to desperation by this cruelty, the Paulicians of Armenia slew of Petrus Siculus, the founder of this sect was an Armenian, named Constantine and surnamed Soloannes. Complaint was made against him to the emperor Constantine Pogonatus in the 7th century. The emperor sent his commissioner Simeon to investigate the subject; and he put the leader of the sect to death and dispersed his adherents; but some years after he himself joined the sect and became its teacher. Under Justinian II. they were again complained of and their principal leader was burnt alive. But this did not prevent their growth. For one Paul with his two sons, Genesis (who was also called Timothy) and Theodorus, propagated the sect in Cappadocia. The first of these was summoned to Constantinople by the emperor Leo; but after a hearing he was acquitted, and retired with his adherents into the territories of the Mohamedans. He was followed by his son Zacharias, who with Joseph his assistant again took residence in Cappadocia; but when persecution broke out he fled to Phrygia, and during some time taught at Antioch in Pisidia. He was succeeded by Bahanes, under whom the sect spread itself much in Asia, particularly in Armenia and in Thrace. After Bahanes the principal teacher was Sergius called also Tychicus, who opposed image-worship most zealously under the Empress Irene. They were then likewise called Athingians or Separates, because they would have no part in the abuses of the times, especially in image-worship and in veneration of the cross and of the hierarchy of the reigning party.—Schl. [Though the Paulicians themselves maintained that they derived their name from the Apostle Paul, yet it is alleged they received it not from the sons of Callinice, but from Paul the father of Genesis and Theodorus. See Dowling's Letter, &c. note n. p. 12. On the other hand, in favour of their deriving their name from the Apostle, see Faber, ubi infra, p. 33, 34.—R.

¹ A recent writer corrects Mosheim here, and says the imperial persecutor of the Paulicians was not Constans, but Constantine Pogonatus. See Dowling's Letter on the Opinions of the Paulicians, Lond. 1835, 8vo, note y, page 20. This pamphlet is deserving of a perusal on account of the original authorities produced by him relative to the opinions of this sect, so differently represented by historians. The student should also consult Faber's Inquiry into the Ancient Valenses and Albigenses, Lond. 1834, 8vo, in which he will find a critical examination of a portion of the evidence produced and relied on by Dowling, and a more favourable view given of the tenets of the Paulicians, p. 31—57.—R.

² See Cedrenus, Compendium Historiarum, tom. II. p. 480, ed. Paris, or p. 379, ed. Venice.

stitution of those times. And thus it was viewed by some of the more discerning; for instance by Agobard, bishop of Lyons. (See the references at the beginning of this note.) But others, as Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims, approved and defended both the ordeals and the trial by combat.—Mur.

¹ Nouveaux Mémoires des Missions de la Compagnie de Jésus dans le Levant, tome IV. p. 283, 284; Le Grand, Diss. IV. on Lobo's Voyage Histor. de l'Abyssinie, tome II. p. 18.

² Photius, Contra Manichæos, lib. I. p. 74, in Wolf's Anecdota Græca, tom. I. [According to the statement

the imperial judges, and likewise Thomas, the bishop of Neocesarea, and then took refuge in the territories of the Saracens; from which they harassed the neighbouring Greeks with perpetual incursions¹. Afterwards this war it seems gradually subsided; and many of the Paulicians appear to have returned to their former settlements within the Grecian territories.

4. But far greater calamities were produced by the inconsiderate and rash zeal of the empress Theodora. [A.D. 841—855.] In the minority of her son she governed as regent, and decreed that the Paulicians should be either exterminated by fire and sword, or brought back to the Greek church. The officers sent into Armenia on this business executed their commission in the most cruel manner; for they destroyed by various punishments about a hundred thousand of this unhappy sect, and confiscated their property. Those who escaped took refuge once more among the Saracens. Being kindly received there, the Paulicians built themselves a city called Tibrice; and choosing Carbeas, a man of very great valour for their leader, and forming alliance with the Saracens they waged fierce war with the Greeks. This war continued with various success nearly through the century; and in it an immense number of persons perished on both sides, and several provinces of the Greeks were ruined.²

¹ Photius, Contra Manich. lib. i. p. 125, &c.; Petrus Siculus, Hist. Manichæor. p. 71.

² Cedrenus, Compendium Historiar. p. 541, ed. Paris, or p. 425, ed. Venice; and p. 547 or 429. Zonaras, Annal. lib. xvi. tom. ii. p. 122, ed. Venice. But the principal historians of the Paulicians are, Photius, Contra Manichæos, Liber primus; and Petrus Siculus whose Historia Manichæorum was published, Gr. and Lat. by Rader, at Ingolstadt, 1604, 4to. This Petrus Siculus, as he himself informs us, was the envoy of Basil the Macedonian to the Paulicians at Tibrice in the year 870, [852] sent to negotiate with them an exchange of prisoners; and he remained among them nine months. These facts alone show how great the power of the Paulicians was at that period. From this Peter, it appears, Cedrenus borrowed his account. Compend. Histor. p. 431. The moderns who treat of the Paulicians, as Bayle, Dictionnaire, article Pauliciens, Wolf, Manichæismus ante Manichæos, p. 247, and others, seem to have derived their information chiefly from Bossuet, Hist. des Variations des Eglises Protest. [liv. xi. sec. 13, &c.] tome ii. p. 129, &c. But this writer certainly did not go to the sources, and being influenced by party zeal he was willing to make mistakes. [Photius wrote four books against the Manichæans or Paulicians, of which the first book gives the history of them to about A.D. 870. The subsequent books are a confutation of their doctrines, and with the common arguments used against the Manichæans. The history of Petrus Siculus terminates at the same time. The edition of it by the Jesuit Rader is said to need revision. Photius and Peter agree in the main in their histories. Which of them wrote first remains a question; but Photius is deemed the better authority. For the history of the sect after A.D. 870, we must go to the Byzantine writers, Constantine Porphyrogenitus, lib. iv. c. 16, and Cedrenus, p. 541, ed. Paris. See Schroëckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xx. p. 363, &c. and vol. xxiii. p. 318, &c. and Gieseler's Text-book translated by Cunningham, vol. ii. p. 7, &c.—Mur.]

During these troubles and near the close of the century, some of the Paulicians disseminated their doctrines among the Bulgarians; and among that people who were recently converted to Christianity, those doctrines easily took root.³

5. These Paulicians are by the Greeks called Manichæans; but as Photius himself states they declared their abhorrence of Manes and of his doctrine;⁴ and it is certain that they were not genuine Manichæans, although they might hold some doctrines bearing a resemblance to those of that sect. There were not among them as among the Manichæans, bishops, presbyters, and deacons; they had no order of clergymen distinguished from laymen by their mode of living, their dress, and other things; nor had they councils or any similar institutions. Their teachers whom they denominated Synecdemi (Συνέδνημοι, fellow travellers) and [Νοταριοί] Notaries, were all equals in rank, and were distinguished from laymen by no rights, prerogatives, or insignia.⁵ But they had this peculiarity that such as were made teachers among them changed their names, and assumed each the name of some holy man mentioned in the New Testament. They received the whole of the New Testament except the two Epistles of Peter, which they rejected for reasons not known; and they received it unaltered or in its usual form as received by other Christians, in which again they differed from the Manichæans.⁶ They moreover would have these holy books to be read assiduously and by all, and were indignant at the Greeks who required the scriptures to be examined only by the priests.⁷ But many parts of the scripture they construed allegorically, abandoning the literal sense lest it should militate against their doctrines;⁸ and this construc-

³ Perhaps there still are Paulicians or Paulians as some call them remaining in Thrace and Bulgaria. There certainly were some there in the seventeenth century; and they resided at Nicopolis according to Cerri, Etat présent de l'Eglise Romaine, p. 72, who tells us, (true or false I know not) that Peter Deodatus, archbishop of Sophia, convinced them of their errors and converted them to the Romish church.—(The history of these Paulicians is of the more consequence as they propagated their sect in various countries of Europe in the tenth and eleventh centuries, and composed a large part of the dissentients from the Romish church during those times. The Catholics (as Bossuet, Hist. des Variat. liv. xi.) charge the Protestants with being the progeny of the Paulicians; and some Protestant writers seem half inclined to regard them as witnesses for the truth in their times. This subject will of course recur in the following centuries.—Mur.)

⁴ Photius, Contra Manichæos, lib. i. p. 17, 56, 65. Petrus Siculus, Hist. Manich. p. 43.

⁵ Photius, ubi supra, p. 31, 32. Petrus Sicul. p. 44. Cedrenus, ubi supra, p. 431.

⁶ Photius, ubi supra, p. 11. Petrus Sicul. p. 19.

⁷ Photius, ubi supra, p. 101. Petrus Sicul. p. 57.

⁸ Photius, ubi supra, p. 12, &c.

tion they undoubtedly put upon the passages relating to the Lord's supper, baptism, the Old Testament, and some other subjects. Besides the New Testament, the epistles of one Sergius a great doctor of the sect were in high esteem among them.

6. The entire creed of this sect, though doubtless consisting of various articles, is nowhere described by the Greeks; who select from it only six dogmas, for which they declare the Paulicians unworthy to live or to be saved. I. They denied that this lower and visible world was created by the supreme God, and distinguished the creator of the world and of human bodies from the God whose residence is in heaven. It was on account of this dogma especially, that the Greeks accounted them Manichæans, and yet this was the common doctrine of all the sects denominated Gnostics. What opinions they entertained respecting this creator of the world, and whether they supposed him to be a different being from the prince of evil or the devil, no one has informed us. This only appears from Photius that they held the author of evil to have been procreated from darkness and fire; and of course he was not eternal or without beginning.¹ II. They contemned the virgin Mary, the mother of Jesus Christ; that is, they would not adore and worship her as the Greeks did. For they did not deny that Christ was born of Mary, because as their adversaries expressly state, they taught that Christ brought his body with him from heaven, and that Mary after the birth of the Saviour had other children by Joseph. They therefore believed with the Valentinians, that Christ passed through the womb of his mother as water through a canal, and that Mary did not continue a virgin to the end of life;—a doctrine which must have appeared abominable to the Greeks. III. They did not celebrate the Lord's supper. For believing that there were metaphors in many parts of the New Testament they deemed it proper to understand by the bread and wine, which Christ is stated to have presented to his disciples at his last supper, those divine discourses of Christ by which the soul is nourished and refreshed.² IV. They loaded the cross with contumely, that is, as clearly appears from what the Greeks state, they would not have any religious worship paid to the wood of the cross as was customary among the Greeks. For believing that Christ possessed an ethereal and celestial body, they could not by any means admit that he was actually nailed to a cross and truly died upon it; and this led them of course to treat the cross with neglect. V. They rejected, as did nearly all the Gnostics, the books composing the Old Testament, and believed that the writers of them were prompted by the creator of the world and not by the supreme God. VI. They excluded the presbyters or elders from the government of the church. The foundation of this charge beyond all controversy was, that they would not allow their teachers to be styled presbyters; because this title was Jewish and suited only to those who persecuted and wished to kill Jesus Christ.³

¹ Photius, ubi supra, lib. ii. p. 147. It is manifest that the Paulicians, with the Oriental philosophers, those parents of the Gnostic and Manichæan sects, considered eternal matter to be the seat and source of all evil. And this matter, like many of the Gnostics, they supposed to be endued from eternity with motion and an animating principle, and to have procreated the prince of all evil, who was the former of bodies which are composed of matter; while God is the parent of souls. These opinions are indeed allied to the Manichæan doctrines, yet also differ from them. I can believe this sect to have been the offspring of one of the ancient Gnostic parties, which though sadly oppressed by imperial laws and punishments, could never be entirely suppressed and exterminated. [As the Paulicians were great friends to allegories and mystical interpretations, and held certain hidden doctrines which they made known only to the perfect, and as we are in possession of no creed nor of any other writing of their doctors, we must always remain in uncertainty whether they understood these Gnostic-sounding doctrines literally, and so were actually a branch from the old Gnostic stock. And for the same reason we cannot place much confidence in the Greeks who wrote their history; and we should always remember that these writers were liable, from misapprehension if not also from party feelings, to misstate their doctrines. At the same time we discover as to most of their doctrines, that they had in several respects more correct ideas of religion, of religious worship, and of church government, than the prevailing church at that day had; and that they drew on themselves persecution by their dislike of images, and by their opposition to the hierarchy, more than by their other religious opinions.—So Semler judges of them, in his Selecta Capita Hist. Eccles. tom. ii. p. 72, and 365.—Schl.]

² The Greeks do not charge the Paulicians with any error in respect to the doctrine of baptism. Yet there is no doubt that they construed into allegory what the New Testament states concerning this ordinance. And Photius (Contra Manich. lib. i. p. 29.) expressly says that they held only to a fictitious baptism, and understood by baptism, i. e. by the water of baptism, the Gospel.

³ These six errors I have extracted from Petrus Siculus, Hist. Manich. p. 17, with whom Photius and Cedrenus agree, though they are less distinct and definite. The reasonings and explanations are my own. [The Romanists have invariably represented the Paulicians as Manichæans, and as chargeable with all the gross errors which the prejudiced and bigotted contemporaries of this sect among the Greeks have attributed to them. Mosheim here takes a more favourable view of their tenets, though he still considers them as tainted with Gnostic errors to a greater degree perhaps than was really the case. He seems not to have weighed with sufficient care the considerations, afterwards urged by his disciple Schlegel as given in a preceding note. (Note 1, on this page.) Gibbon in the 54th chapter of his Decline and Fall, &c. takes nearly the same view of the Paulicians as Mosheim, and Hallam, while adopting it, says of that chapter—"it appears to be accurate as well as luminous, and is at least far superior to any modern work on the subject." Middle Ages, 8th edit. vol. ii. p. 440. Milner however in his

Hist. of the Church went to an opposite extreme, and endeavoured to show that the Paulicians could not be charged with holding any erroneous opinions;—a view which was subsequently adopted by Mr. Faber in his Sacred Calendar of Prophecy, Lond. 1828. These opinions of Milner and Faber were combated, with an excess of dogmatism and self-confidence, by Mr. Maitland in his Facts and documents illustrative of the history, &c. of the Albigenses and Waldenses, Lond. 1832. Mr. Maitland seems to belong to the Puseyite section of the English church, who are at one with the Romanists not only in many fundamental points of doctrine, but even in the lesser matters of historical criticism. According to the canons of this school, the mediæval church-writers are alone entitled to credit, and all that they say of dissenters or sectaries must be implicitly received as altogether trustworthy. Mr. Maitland therefore adopts the extreme view of the Romanists, and gives full credence to every calumny which Photius and Peter the Sicilian have vented against the poor Paulicians. Shortly after, Mr. Rose's terminal divinity lecture at Durham in 1834 excited a very keen and protracted controversy on the character and merits of Milner as an ecclesiastical historian, between Mr. Maitland on the one hand, and the Rev. Messrs. Scott and King of Hull in defence of Milner, on the other. In this controversy the question regarding the faith of the Paulicians occupied a prominent place, and called forth the pamphlet of Mr. Dowling referred to in a preceding note; in which he united with Mr. Maitland in adopting without the least discrimination everything urged against them by their Greek calumniators and persecutors. At the close of this pamphlet war, Mr. Faber published his Inquiry into the history and theology of the ancient Valenses and Albigenses, Lond. 1838, in which he endeavoured to support his previous opinion as to the entire orthodoxy of the Paulicians, by an elaborate examination of the testimony of Peter the Sicilian, but without any reference to that of Photius. Waddington has carefully discussed the question of their Manichæism or Gnosticism, and considers them freer from those errors than even Moshelm seems to do. See his Hist. of the Church, vol. iii. p. 208, &c. Neander takes a very favourable view of their religious character and system in his Der Heil. Bernard und sein Zeitalter, Wrench's translation, Lond. 1843, p. 254, &c. Gieseler speaks of them as "being deeply tinged with the Gnostic character," but as afterwards becoming much purified in their views. See his Lehrbuch, &c. Cunningham's transl. vol. ii. p. 7, with the recent works referred to at the head of the section. The student who wishes to form an impartial opinion on this controversy ought to weigh attentively what is urged in favour of Milner, and on the views of Moshelm and Gibbon, by Mr. King of Hull, in one of his pamphlets entitled, Maitland not authorised to censure Milner, Lond. 1838, p. 29—38.—L.

CENTURY TENTH.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

1. ALL are agreed that in this century the state of Christianity was everywhere most wretched, not only on account of the amazing ignorance and the consequent superstition and debased morals of the age, but also from other causes. Still there were not a few things which may be placed among the prosperous events of the church. The Nestorians living in Chaldea introduced Christianity into Tartary Proper beyond Mount Imaus, where the people had hitherto lived entirely uncultivated and uncivilized. Near the end of the century, the same sect spread the knowledge of the gospel among that powerful horde of Tartars or Turks, which was called Carit or Karit, and which bordered on Cathay or the northern part of China.¹ The activity of this sect and their great zeal for the promotion of Christianity deserve praise; and yet no one can suppose that the religion which they instilled into the minds of these nations was the pure gospel of our Saviour.

2. The [Tartarian] king who was converted to Christianity by the Nestorians, it is said bore the name of John after his baptism, and in token of his modesty assumed the title of presbyter [or elder]. And hence as learned men have conjectured, all his successors retained this title down to the fourteenth century or to the times of Gengis Khan, and each was usually called John Presbyter². But all this is said without adequate authority or proof; nor did that presbyter John, of whom there was so much said both formerly and in modern times, begin to reign in this part of Asia anterior to the close of the eleventh century. Yet it is placed beyond controversy that the kings of the people called Carith, living on the borders of Cathay, whom some denominate a tribe of Turks and others of Tartars, and who constituted a considerable portion of the Moguls, did profess Christianity from this time onward; and that no inconsiderable part of Tartary or Asiatic Scythia, lived under bishops sent among them by the pontiff of the Nestorians³.

3. In the West, Rollo, the son of a Norwegian count and an arch-pirate, who was expelled his country,⁴ and with his military

¹ Asseman, Biblio. Orien. Clem. Vatic. tom. III. par. II. p. 482, &c. Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient. p. 256, &c. [Moshelm, Hist. Tartar. Eccles. p. 23, 24. It is there stated that this Tartarian prince commanded more than 200,000 subjects, all of whom embraced Christianity in the year A.D. 900. The authority for this account is a letter of Ebed Jesu, archbishop of Meru, addressed to John, the Nestorian patriarch, and preserved by Abulpharajus, Chronie. Syr. and thence published by Asseman, Biblio. Orien. Clem. Vat. tom. II. p. 444, &c. The letter states that this Tartarian king while hunting one day got lost in the wilderness, and was wholly unable to find his way out of it. A saint now appeared to him and promised to show him the way, if he would become a Christian. The king promised to do so. On returning to his camp he called the Christian merchants who were there to his presence, received instruction from them, and applied to the above-named Ebed Jesu for baptism. As his tribe fed only on flesh and milk, it became a question how they were to keep the required fasts. This led Ebed Jesu to write to his patriarch, stating the case and asking for instructions on the point. The patriarch directed the bishop to send two presbyters and two deacons among the tribe to convert and baptize them, and to teach them to feed upon milk only on fast-days. Moshelm thinks the conversion of this tribe of Tartars is too well attested to be called in question; but the manner of it he would divest somewhat of the marvellous. He suggests that the saint who appeared to the king in the wilderness, might be a Nestorian anchorite or hermit residing there, who was able and willing to guide the king out of the wilderness on the condition stated.—Mur.

² See Asseman, Biblio. Orien. Clem. Vatic. tom. III. par. II. p. 282.

³ The late T. S. Beyer purposed to write a history of the churches of China and northern Asia, in which he would treat particularly of these Nestorian churches in Tartary and China. See the Preface to his Museum Sinicum, p. 145. But a premature death prevented the execution of this and other contemplated works of this excellent man for the illustration of Asiatic Christianity.

⁴ Holberg's Naval History of the Danes; inserted in followers took possession of a part of Gaul in the preceding century, embraced Christianity with his whole army in the year 912. The French king, Charles the Simple, who was too weak to expel this warlike and intrepid stranger from his realm, offered him no inconsiderable portion of his territory, on condition of his desisting from war, marrying Gisela the daughter of Charles, and embracing the Christian religion. Rollo embraced these terms without hesitation; and his soldiers following the example of their general, yielded assent to a religion which they did not understand, and readily submitted to baptism¹. These Norman pirates, as many facts demonstrate, were persons of no religion; and hence they were not restrained by opinions adopted in early life, from embracing a religion which promised them great worldly advantages. To their ferocious minds whatever was useful appeared to be true and good. From this Rollo, who assumed the name of Robert at his baptism, the celebrated dukes of Normandy in France are descended; for a part of Neustria with Bretagne, which Charles the Simple ceded to his son-in-law, was from this time called, after its new lords, Normandy².

4. Micislaus, duke of Poland, was gradually wrought upon by his wife Dambrowka, daughter of Boleslaus duke of Bohemia; till in the year 965 he renounced the idolatry of his ancestors and embraced Christianity. When the news of this conversion reached Rome, John XIII. the Roman pontiff, sent Egidius, bishop of Tusculum, accompanied by many Italian, French, and German priests into Poland; that they might aid the duke and his wife in their design of instructing the Poles in the precepts of Christianity. But the efforts of these missionaries, who did not understand the language of the country, would have been altogether fruitless had not the commands, the laws, the menaces, the rewards, and punishments of the duke overcome the reluctant minds of the Poles. The foundations being thus laid, two archbishops and seven bishops were created, and by their labours and efforts the whole nation was gradually brought to recede a little from their ancient customs, and to make an outward profession of Christianity³. As to that internal and real change of the mind which Christ requires of his followers, this barbarous age had no idea of it.

5. In Russia a change took place during this century, similar to that in the adjacent country of Poland. For those Russians who had embraced the religion of the Greeks during the preceding century in the time of Basil the Macedonian, soon afterwards relapsed into the superstition of their ancestors. In the year 961 Wlodimir, duke of Russia and Muscovy, married Anna the sister of the Greek emperor, Basil Junior; and she did not cease to importune and exhort her husband, till in the year 987 he submitted to baptism assuming the name of Basil. The Russians followed spontaneously the example of their duke; at least we do not read that any coercion was used⁴. From this time the Christian religion obtained permanent establishment among the Russians. Wlodimir and his wife were ranked among saints of the highest order in the estimation of the Russians, and to the present day they are worshipped with the greatest veneration at Kiow, where they were interred. The Latins however

¹ Dlugoss, Hist. Polonica, lib. ii. p. 91, &c.; lib. iii. p. 95, 239. Regenvolscius, Hist. Eccles. Slanon, lib. i. c. 1. p. 8. Canisius, Lectiones Antiquæ, tom. iii. par. i. p. 41. Solignac, Hist. de Pologne, tome i. p. 71, &c. [Boleslaus, on the death of his mother Dambrowka, A.D. 977, married a nun, Oda the daughter of the German marquis Theodoric. This uncanonical marriage was disliked by the bishops, yet was winked at from motives of policy; and the pious Oda became so serviceable to the church that she almost atoned for the violation of her vows. See Fleury, Hist. Eccles. livre lvi. sec. 13.—Mur.]

² See Pagl, Critica in Baron. tom. iv. ad. ann. 987. p. 55; and ad. ann. 1015, p. 110. Du Fresnoy, Familia Byzantina, p. 143, ed. Paris. [The occasion of Wlodimir's baptism is variously stated. Some say he had captured the Greek fortress Corszyn, and promised to restore it if the princess Anna were given him to wife, but that her brothers, Basil and Constantine, would not consent unless he would engage to renounce paganism; and he accordingly was baptised at Corszyn in presence of the court. But the Greek writers know nothing of these circumstances. Others state that Mohammedans, Jews, and Christians, severally endeavoured to persuade him to embrace their religions, and that he gradually becoming informed respecting them all, gave preference to that of the Greeks. So much is certain, his marriage was the proximate cause of his conversion. After his conversion he strictly enjoined upon his subjects to renounce paganism. And it is said the bishop of Corszyn and other Greek clergymen often administered baptism and destroyed idols at Kiow. A metropolitan of Kiow named Michael, who was sent from Constantinople, is reported to have gradually brought all Russia to submit to baptism. Churches were also built. Dittmar does not commend the plety of this prince, who is represented as endeavouring to compensate for his transgressions by the extent of his aims. Mosheim says that we nowhere find coercion employed in the conversion of the Russians. But Dlugoss states that Wlodimir compelled his subjects by penalties to submit to baptism. And this was certainly the common mode of the spurious conversions. See Semler's continuation of Baumgarten's Auszug der Kirchengesch. vol. iv. p. 423, &c. Von Ein.] in the Scripta Societatis Scientiar. Hafniens., par. iii. p. 357, &c.

³ Bulseus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. i. p. 296. Daniel, Hist. de France, tome ii. p. 587, &c. [Mabillon, Annales Bened. ad. ann. 911, tom. iii. p. 337, and Fleury, Hist. Eccles. liv. 54, sec. 51.—Mur.] hold Wlodimir to be absolutely unworthy of this honour¹.

⁴ It was Neustria properly and not Bretagne which received the name of Normandy from the Normans, who chose Rollo for their chief.—Macl.

6. Some knowledge of Christianity reached the Hungarians and Avars through the instrumentality of Charlemagne, but it became wholly extinct after his death. In this century Christianity obtained a more permanent existence among those warlike nations². First, near the middle of the century two dukes of the Turks on the Danube (for so the Hungarians and Transylvanians were called by the Greeks in that age), Bulosudes and Gyula or Gylas received baptism at Constantinople. The former of these soon after returned to his old superstition; the latter persevering in Christianity, by means of Hierotheus a bishop and several priests whom he took along with him, caused his subjects to be instructed in the Christian precepts and institutions. His daughter, Sarolta, was afterwards married to Geysa, the chieftain of the Hungarian nation; and she persuaded her husband to embrace the religion taught her by her father. But Geysa afterwards began to waver and to incline to his former pollutions, when Adalbert, archbishop of Prague near the close of the century, went from Bohemia into Hungary and reclaimed the lapsed chieftain, and likewise baptized his son Stephen. To this Stephen, the son of Geysa, belongs the chief honour of converting the Hungarians. For he perfected the work which was only begun by his father and grandfather; he established bishops in divers places, and provided them with ample revenues, erected magnificent churches, and by his menaces, punishments, and rewards, compelled nearly the whole nation to renounce the idolatry of their ancestors. His persevering zeal in establishing Christian worship among the Hungarians, procured him the title and the honours of a saint in succeeding times.³

7. In Denmark the Christian cause had to struggle with great difficulties and adversities under the king Gormon, although the queen was a professed Christian. But Harald surnamed Blaataad, the son of Gormon, about the middle of the century, having been vanquished by Otto the Great, made a profession of Christianity in the year 949, and was baptized together with his wife and his son Sueno, by Adalag, archbishop of Hamburg, or as some think by Poppo, a pious priest who attended the emperor. Perhaps Harald who had his birth and education from a Christian mother called Tyra, was not greatly averse from the Christian religion; and yet it is clear that in the present transaction he yielded rather to the demands of his conqueror than to his own inclinations. For Otto being satisfied that the Danes would never cease to harass their neighbours with wars and rapine, if they retained the martial religion of their fathers, made it a condition of the peace with Harald that he and his people should become Christians.⁴ After the conversion of the king, Adalag especially and Poppo with great success, urged the Cimbrians and Danes to follow his example. The stupendous miracles performed by Poppo are said to have contributed very much to this result; and yet those miracles appear to have been fictitious and not really divine, for they did not surpass the powers of nature.⁵ Harald as long as he lived endeavoured to confirm his subjects in the religion they had embraced, by the establishment of bishoprics, the enactment of laws, the reformation of morals, and the like. But his son Sueno [or Swein] apostatized from Christianity, and for a while persecuted the Christians with violence. But being driven from his kingdom and an exile among the Scots, he returned to Christianity, and he was after-inter Hungaros Ecclesia Orientali aderta. Francof. 1740, 4to, who vindicates the credibility of the Greek writers. The accounts of the others are imperfect and involved in much uncertainty. [The book of Schwartz under the fictitious name of Gabriel de Juxta Hornad gave occasion to a learned controversy, which continued several years after the death of Mosheim. The result seems to have been that Schwartz's account is substantially true; and of course the representation given by Mosheim. See Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xxi. p. 527, &c.—Mur].

¹ Dittmar of Merselburg, Chronie, lib. vii. in Leibnitz's collection of the Brunswick Historians, tom. i. p. 417 [and Nestor's Russischer Annalen, &c. by Schlözer, Göttingen, 1802-1809, 5 vols. 8vo.; Karanus's Geschichte des Russ. Reiches, by Hauenschild, Riga, 1820, 5 vols. 8vo.—Mur].

² Debrezonus, Hist. Eccles. Reformat. in Ungaria, par. i. cap. iii. p. 19, &c.

³ The Greeks, the Germans, the Bohemians, and the Poles, severally claim the honour of imparting Christianity to the Hungarians, and the subject is really involved in much obscurity. The Germans say that Gisela, the sister of the emperor Henry II. was married to Stephen, king of Hungary, and that she convinced her husband of the truth of Christianity. The Bohemians tell us that Adalbert of Prague induced this king to embrace the Christian religion. The Poles maintain that Geysa married Adelheid, a Christian lady, the sister of Mieslaus I. duke of Poland, and by her was induced to become a Christian. We have no hesitation in following the authority and testimony of the Greek writers, at the same time calling in the aid of the Hungarian historians. In this we were in part preceded by Gabriel de Juxta Hornad, Initia Religionis Christ.

⁴ Adamus Bremens. Histor. lib. ii. cap. ii. lib. iii. p. 16; cap. xv. p. 20, in Lindenbrog's Scriptores Rerum Septentrional. Kranz, Wandalia, lib. iv. cap. xx.; Ludwig, Reliquia Manuscriptorum, tom. ix. p. 10; Pontoppidan, Annales Ecclesie Danice Diplomatici, tom. i. p. 59, &c. [Münter's Kirchengesch. von Dänemark u. Norwegen, vol. i. p. 322, &c.; and Schmidt's Kirchengesch. vol. 4, p. 147, &c.—Mur].

⁵ See Cypræus, Annales Episcoporum Slesvic. cap. xlii. p. 78; Adamus Brem. lib. ii. cap. xxvi. p. 22; cap. xlii. p. 28; Stephanus, Ad Saxanum Grammat. p. 207; Müller, Introd. ad Histor. Chersones. Cimbr. par. ii. cap. iii. sec. 14, and others.

wards very successful [and recovered his throne] he laboured by all the means in his power to promote that religion which he had before betrayed.¹

8. The conversion of the Norwegians commenced in this century, as appears from the most unexceptionable testimony. King Hagen Adelsteen who had been educated among the English, is said to have commenced this great work A.D. 933, by the aid of priests from England, but with little success, because the Norwegians were violently opposed to the king's designs. His successor, Harald Graufeldt, pursued the work thus commenced, but with no better success.² After these Haco, by the persuasion of the Danish king Harald to whom he owed his possession of the throne, not only embraced Christianity himself but recommended it to his people in a public diet A.D. 945.³ Little success however attended this effort among that barbarous and savage people. Somewhat more successful were the attempts of Olaus who is called a saint.⁴ At length Sueno, king of Denmark, having vanquished Olaus Trygvæsen conquered Norway, and published an edict requiring the inhabitants to abandon the gods of their ancestors, and to embrace Christianity. An English priest Guthebold was the principal teacher at that time among them.⁵ From Norway the Christian religion was transmitted to the Orkney islands then subject to the kings of Norway, to Iceland also, and to old Greenland. The inhabitants of these countries to a great extent made profession of Christianity in this century, as we learn from various sources.⁶

9. In Germany, the emperor Otto the Great, illustrious for his valour and his piety, was zealous for suppressing the remains of the old superstition still existing in various provinces of the empire, and for supporting Christianity which was but imperfectly established in many places. By his beneficence and liberality bishoprics were erected in various places, as Brandenburg, Havelberg, Meissen, Magdeburg, and Naumburg; so that there might be no want of spiritual watchmen, who should instruct the yet rude and half barbarous people in all the duties of religion.⁷ In accordance with the religious views of the age, he also built many convents for those who preferred a monastic life; and he also erected schools. If in these measures the illustrious emperor had exhibited as much wisdom and moderation, as piety and sincerity, he could scarcely be commended too much. But the superstition of his wife Adelaide⁸ and the lamentable ignorance of the times, led this excellent prince to believe that a man secured the friendship of God, by securing that of his ministers and servants with great largesses and presents. He therefore enriched the bishops, the monks, and religious associations of every kind beyond all bounds; and subsequent generations reaped this fruit of his libera-gæa, lib. i.; and Arius Multiculus, Scheda de Islandia, p. 45, &c.; see the same Torfeus, Histor. Norveg., tom. ii. p. 378, 397, 417, &c. Also Liron, Singularités Histor. et Littér. tome i. p. 138. Concerning Greenland Torfeus also treats, ubi supra, tom. ii. p. 374; and in Grœnlandia Antiqua, cap. xvii. p. 127, Copen. 1706, 8vo. [Münter, Kirchenges. von Dänemark u. Norwegen, vol. i. treats of the conversion of the Norwegians, p. 429, &c.; of the Icelanders, p. 517, &c.; of the Faro and Shetland Islanders, p. 548, &c.; and of the Greenlanders, p. 555, &c.—Mur.] [Both Gieseler and Döllinger refer also to a work by Finnus Johannæus or Finner Jansen, a bishop of Iceland, entitled Hist. Eccles. Islandicæ, Copen. 1772-75, 3 tom. 4to.—R.]

⁷ It is more probable that Otto the Great had long purposed, by the erection of a new archbishopric, to curtail the odious power of the archbishop of Mentz. Therefore in the year 946, he established the bishopric of Havelberg, and in 949 that of Brandenburg. For establishing the archbishopric of Magdeburg (as we are told by Dittmar, p. 335), the emperor's motives were, defensio communis patriæ et spes remunerationis æternæ. The first was doubtless the chief motive. The bishop of Halberstadt and the archbishop of Mentz looked upon this innovation with dislike. But the emperor seized the opportunity of their presence in Italy, whither they came to receive their investiture at his hands, to obtain from them the transfer of the suffragan bishoprics of Brandenburg and Havelberg from the jurisdiction of Mentz to that of Magdeburg, and also the transfer of large estates hitherto possessed by the bishop of Halberstadt. Adelbert, formerly a missionary and at this time abbot of Weissenburg, was ordained first archbishop of Magdeburg A.D. 968 by the Pope, and received the pallium; and attended by two papal envoys and the new bishops, repaired to Magdeburg and was regularly installed. At the same time he consecrated the new bishops, Bosso of Merseburg, Hugo of Zeitz, and Burkard of Meissen; who together with the bishops of Brandenburg, Havelberg, and Posen, were to constitute his suffragans. See the Annalist Saxo, ad ann. 969.—Sehl.

⁸ See her life in Canisius, Lectiones Antiquæ, tom. iii. par. i. p. 69.

¹ Saxo Grammat. Histor. Dan. lib. x. p. 186; Pontoppidan, De Gestis et Festiis Danorum extra Daniæ, tom. ii. cap. i. sec. 1, 2.

² See Pontoppidan, Annales Ecclesiæ Daniæ Diplom. tom. i. p. 66.

³ Torfeus, Hist. Norvegica, tom. ii. p. 183, 214, &c.

⁴ Torfeus, ubi supra, tom. ii. p. 457, &c.

⁵ Chron. Danacum, published by Ludewig in his Reliquiæ Manuscriptorum, tom. ix. p. 11, 16, 17. [According to Schroeckh, Kirchengesch., vol. xxi. p. 376, &c. this Olaus Trygvæsen the son of a petty Norwegian chieftain, spent many years in Russia and on the Wendish coast of Germany, while his country revolted from Harald Blauzahn, king of Denmark, under Hakon their viceroy. Olaus became a successful pirate, advanced in power and wealth, became also a zealous Christian, and in his plundering expeditions in those northern seas treated the pagans much as the Mohammedans did the same sort of persons; that is, gave them the alternative of baptism, or slavery and death. The Norwegians now chose him their king and revolted from Hakon. Olaus got possession of the whole country, and by compulsory measures obliged all opposers to embrace Christianity. This was just at the close of the century.—Mur.] lity, that these people abused their unearned wealth for pampering their vices, carrying on wars, and indulging themselves in luxury and dissipation.

⁶ Concerning the inhabitants of the Orkneys see Torfeus, Hist. Rerum Orcadenium, lib. i. p. 22. For the Icelanders, in addition to Arngrim Jonas, Crymo-

10. To the account of these enlargements of the church it may be subjoined, that the European kings and princes began in this century to consider the project of a holy war, to be waged against the Mohammedans who possessed Palestine. For it was thought intolerable and a disgrace to the professors of the Christian religion, that the country in which Christ lived and taught and made expiation for the sins of the human race, should be left under the dominion of his enemies; and it was deemed most righteous and agreeable to the dignity of the Christian religion, to avenge the numerous calamities and injuries, insults and sufferings, which the possessors of Palestine were accustomed to heap upon the Christians residing in that country, or visiting it for religious purposes. Just at the close of the century and in the first year of his pontificate, Pope Sylvester II. or Gerbert sounded the trumpet of war, by writing a letter in the name of the church at Jerusalem addressed to the church universal;¹ in which he solemnly adjured the Europeans to afford succour to the Christians of Jerusalem. But none of them were disposed at that time to obey the summons of the pontiff, except the inhabitants of Pisa in Italy, who are said to have forthwith girded themselves for the holy war.²

CHAPTER II.

ADVERSE EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

1. No unchristian king of this century, except Gormon and Sueno, kings of Denmark, directly and with set purpose persecuted the Christians living under his jurisdiction. And yet they could not live in security and safety either in the East or in the West. The Saracens in Asia and Africa, though troubled with internal dissensions and various other calamities, were yet very assiduous in propagating their religion, that of Mohammed; nor were they unsuccessful. How much this Mohammedan zeal diminished the number of Christians it is not easy to ascertain. But they brought over the Turks, an uncivilised people inhabiting the northern shores of the Caspian sea, to their religion. This agreement in religious faith however did not prevent the Turks, when afterwards called in to aid the Persians, from depriving the Saracens in the first place of the vast kingdom of Persia; and afterwards with astonishing celerity and success, invading and conquering other provinces subject to their dominion. Thus the empire of the Saracens, which the Greek and Roman powers had for so many years in vain attempted to hold in check, was dismembered, and at length subverted, by their friends and allies; and the very powerful empire of the Turks, which has not yet ceased to be terrible to Christians, gradually took its place.³

2. In the countries of the West, the nations which were still pagans were in general grievous foes to the Christians. The Normans during nearly half the century inflicted the severest calamities upon the Franks and others. The Prussians, the Slavonians,⁴ the Bohemians, and others to whom Christianity was unintelligible and hateful, not only laboured with great violence to drive it from their countries, but likewise frequently laid waste in the most distressing manner with fire and sword, the neighbouring countries in which it was received. The Danes did not cease to molest the Christians, till after Otto the Great had conquered them. The Hungarians assailed Germany, and harassed various parts of the country with indescribable cruelties. The tyranny of the Arabs in Spain and their frequent incursions upon Italy and the neighbouring islands, I pass without farther notice.

3. Whoever considers attentively the innumerable calamities the Christian nations suffered from those who were not Christian, will readily perceive a sufficient cause for that unwearied zeal of Christian princes for the conversion of these furious and savage nations. They had the motives not merely of religion and virtue, but of security and peace. For they expected and with good reason, that those savage

¹ These events Leunclavius has endeavoured to elucidate in his Annales Turcici, often reprinted. See also Elmacin, Hist. Saracenica, lib. ii. lii. p. 190, 203, 210, &c.

² These distinguished themselves especially by the outrages they committed upon the Christian churches, in their insurrections against their Christian margraves. Humanity shudders at the narratives of the historians; that when these Slavonians took Brandenburg, they not only enslaved or slew all the clergy, but drew the corpse of Dodo, the deceased bishop, from its grave in order to strip it of its clothing; that after capturing the city of Altenburg they dragged sixty priests, whom they had not butchered, from one city to another till they all died; and among these, Oddar, a provost, they tortured by ripping up his scalp in the form of a cross and laying bare his brain, so that he died in the midst of the extreme anguish. See the Annalist Saxo, ad ann. 988; and Ditmar, p. 345. Schl.

¹ This is the twenty-eighth epistle of the first part, in the Collection of the Epistles of Sylvester II. published by Du Chesne, in vol. iii. of the Scriptores Histor. Franc.

² See Muratori, Scriptores Rer. Ital. tom. iii. p. 400.

minds would be softened and rendered humane by the influences of Christianity. Therefore they proffered matrimonial connexion with their kings and chieftains, assistance against their enemies, the possession of valuable lands, and other temporal advantages, if they would only renounce the religions of their ancestors which were altogether military and calculated to foster ferocious feelings; and those kings and chieftains, influenced by these offers and advantages, listened to Christian instruction, and endeavoured to bring their subjects to do the same.

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE STATE OF LITERATURE AND SCIENCE.

1. It is universally admitted that the ignorance of this century was extreme, and that learning was entirely neglected. Nor is this very surprising, considering what wars and distressing calamities agitated both the East and the West, and to what a base set of men the guardianship of truth and virtue was intrusted. Leo the Wise, who ruled the Greek empire at the beginning of the century, both cultivated learning himself and excited others to do so.¹ His son, Constantine Porphyrogenitus, was still more solicitous to revive literature and the arts.² For it appears that he supported learned men of various descriptions at great expense; he carefully collected the writings of the earlier ages; he was himself an author and he prompted others to write; he wished to have all that was most valuable in the works of the ancients selected and arranged under appropriate heads; and he re-animating as it were the study of philosophy which was extinct.³ Few of the Greeks however copied after these noble examples, nor was there any among the subsequent emperors who was equally friendly to literature and to the cultivation of the mind. Indeed it is supposed that Constantine Porphyrogenitus himself, though the Greeks pronounce him the restorer of all branches of learning, undesignedly injured the cause of learning by his excessive zeal to advance it. For having caused extracts and abridgments to be compiled by learned men from the writers of preceding ages, in order to elucidate the various branches of knowledge and render them serviceable to the world, the slothful Greeks now contenting themselves with these abridgments of the emperor, neglected the writers from whom they were compiled. And therefore many excellent authors of the earlier period became lost, through the neglect of the Greeks from this time onward.

2. Few writers therefore can be named among the Greeks, on whom a wise and ¹ See Fabricius, Biblioth. Græc. lib. v. par. ii. cap. v. p. 363. [Leo VI. reigned from A.D. 886 to 911. The learned Photius had been his instructor. His learning procured him the titles of the Wise and the Philosopher. He completed the revision of the imperial laws begun by his father, and published the result in sixty books entitled Βασιλικὰ or Βασιλικὰ διατάξεις. It is a Greek translation of Justinian's Corpus Juris Civilis, with extracts from the commentaries of the Greek Jurists, the laws of subsequent emperors, and the decisions of ecclesiastical councils, &c. But much of the originals is omitted or changed or enlarged. Fabrotti published a Latin translation of forty-one books and an abstract of the remaining books, Paris, 1647, seven vols. fol. This emperor's book on the art of war compiled from earlier writers, was published by Meursius, Greek and Latin, Leyden, 1612, 4to. His letter to the Saracen Omar in favour of Christianity exists in Chaldean, from which there is a Latin translation in the Biblioth. Patr. Lugdun. tom. xvii.—Baronius (Annal. A.D. 911, § 3.) gives account of thirty-three religious Discourses of this emperor; and Gretser has published nine more, Ingolst. 1600, 4to. They were chiefly designed for the feast days, and are of little value. See Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xxi. p. 127, &c.—Mur.

² Fabricius, ubi supra, cap. v. p. 486. [Constantine Porphyrogenitus reigned from A.D. 911 to 959. The historical, political, and moral compendiums, which he caused to be made out from the earlier writers, were arranged under fifty-three heads or titles; and were intended to embrace all that was most valuable on those subjects. Only two of the fifty-three are now to be found, namely, the twenty-seventh, relating to the diplomatic intercourse of the Romans with foreign nations, (published, partly Antwerp, 1582, 4to, and partly Augsburg, 1603, 4to,) and the fiftieth, respecting virtue and vice, of which a part was published by Valerius, Paris, 1634, 4to. The titles of some of the others are known; e. g. on the proclamations of kings, on heroic deeds, on festivals, on public addresses, on manners, on ecclesiastical persons and things, on epistles, on the chase, on war, on the establishment of colonies, on strange occurrences, &c. Among the emperor's own compositions were a biography of his grandfather, Basil, two books on the military stations and garrisons of the empire, instructions to his son respecting the state and the foreign relations of the empire and the course it would be wise for him to pursue, narrative respecting the image of Christ found at Edessa, on naval and military tactics, on the mode of warfare by different nations, and some compilations on fariery, agriculture, breeding cattle, physic, &c. together with a large work entitled the Ceremonial of the Court of Constantinople, describing minutely all the etiquette there practised. It was published by Reiske, Lips. 1751—54, 2 vols. fol.—See Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xxi. p. 129, &c.—Mur.

³ This is expressly asserted by Zonaras, Annal. tom. iii. p. 155, ed. Paris.

judicious man will place a high value; and in a short time the literary seed sown which seemed to promise a rich harvest, was found to be dead. The philosophers, if such characters flourished among them, produced no immortal works and nothing of permanent value. The body of learned Greeks was composed of a few rhetoricians, some grammarians, here and there a poet who was above contempt, and a number of historians who though not of the first order were not destitute of all merit; for the Greeks seemed to find pleasure almost exclusively in those departments of literature in which the imagination, the memory, and industry have most concern.

3. Egypt, though groaning under an oppressive yoke, produced some learned men, who might contend with the Greeks for the palm of superiority. The example of Eutychius, bishop of Alexandria, to mention no others, will evince this; for he did honour to the sciences of medicine and theology by his various productions. Among the other Arabians, that noble ardour for useful knowledge which was awakened in the preceding age, continued unabated through this whole century; so that there was among them a large number of eminent physicians, philosophers, and mathematicians, whose names and literary labours are celebrated by Leo Africanus and by others.

4. All the Latins were sunk in extreme barbarism. Most writers are agreed that this century deserves the name of the iron age, so far as respects literature and science; and that the Latin nations never saw an age more dark and cheerless.¹ And though some excellent men have questioned this fact, it is too firmly established to be wholly disproved.² Schools existed indeed in most countries in Europe, either in the monasteries or in the cities which were the residence of bishops; and there also shone forth in one place and another, especially at the close of the century, some distinguished men of genius who attempted to soar above the vulgar. But these can be all easily counted up, and the smallness of their number evinces the infelicity of the times. In the schools nothing was taught but the seven liberal arts as they were called; and the teachers were monks who estimated the value of learning and science solely by their use in matters of religion.

5. The best among the monks who were disposed to employ a portion of their leisure to some advantage, applied themselves to writing annals and history of a rude texture. For instance Abo,³ Luitprand,⁴ Wittekind,⁵ Fulcuin,⁶ John of Capua,⁷

The tenth century afforded more writers in whom sound reasoning was combined with some learning, than the twelfth and thirteenth. It had greater and better princes; and in the years and the countries in which the Normans and Huns spread no general desolation, there were more numerous episcopal and monastic schools, in which the young received some instruction though rude and meagre. The most noted episcopal schools were those of Mentz, Treves, Cologne, Magedburg, Würzburg, Paris, Tours, Rheims, Metz, Toul, and Verdun; and among the monastic schools were those of Fleury, Cluny, Laubes, Gortz, Corbey, Fulda, St. Emmeran, Epternach, St. Gall, &c. Every teacher and nearly every cloister procured a stock of the classical writers.—The Greek language was not wholly unknown; although the individuals were becoming more and more rare who could understand the ancients in the originals.—Schl.

³ Abo, born at Orleans, educated at Fleury, Paris, Rheims, or Orleans, was called to England by the archbishop of York to preside over a monastic school before A.D. 960. After two years he returned to Fleury became abbot, and resided there till his death in 1004. He wrote an Epitome of the lives of the popes compiled from Anastasius, a life of St. Edmund, King of the East Angles, Collection or Epitome of canons, several Epistles and short tracts. See Cave, Hist. Liter. tome ii.—Mur.

⁴ Luitprand was born at Pavia or in Spain, was envoy of Berengarius, King of Italy, to Constantinople A.D. 946, created bishop of Cremona he became odious to Berengarius, and was deposed A.D. 963 or earlier, and retired to Frankfort in Germany. The emperor Otto sent him again to Constantinople A.D. 968. He was alive A.D. 970. He was a man of genius and of considerable learning. He understood and wrote in Greek as well as Latin. His works are a History of Europe during his own times, and an Account of his embassy to Constantinople in 968. To him also are falsely attributed a tract on the lives of the popes from St. Peter to Formosus, and a Chronicon. All these, together with his Adversaria or Note-Book, were printed, Antwerp, 1640, fol. See Cave, ubi supra.—Mur.

⁵ Witikind or Winduchind, was a Saxon and a monk of Corbey in Germany, who flourished A.D. 940 and onwards. He wrote a History of the Saxons or the reigns of Henry the Fowler and Otto I. published Basil, 1532, Francf. 1577, and among the Scriptores Rerum Germanicarum; likewise some poetic effusions. See Cave, ubi supra.—Mur.

⁶ Fulcuin or Folguin, abbot of Laubes (Laubiensis) from A.D. 965 to 990. He wrote a Chronicon de Rebus gestis Abbatum Lubiensis Corobis, de Miraculis Sti Ursuarii, and Vita Folcuini Ep. Tarvanensis.—Mur.

⁷ John Capuanus, abbot of Monte Cassino, flourished from A.D. 915 to 934. He wrote De Persecutionibus

¹ Proofs of the ignorance of the age have been collected by Bulaeus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. i. p. 288, &c. Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Medii Aevi, tom. iii. p. 831, &c. and tom. ii. p. 141; and by others.

² Leibnitz, Prof. ad Codicem Juris Naturæ et gentium Diplomata, maintains that this tenth century was not so dark as the following centuries, and particularly not so dark as the twelfth and thirteenth. But he certainly is extravagant and labours in vain. More deserving of a hearing are Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. Sæcul. v. Præf. p. ii. &c.—the authors of the Hist. Littér. de la France, vol. vi. p. 18, &c. le Beuf, Diss. de Statu Literar. in Francia, a Carolo M. ad Regem Robert. and some others; who while they admit that the ignorance of this age was great, contend that its barbarism was not altogether so great as it is commonly supposed. In the proofs which they allege there is considerable deficiency; but still we may admit that all science was not entirely extinct in Europe, and that there was a number of persons who were wise above the mass of people; but that the number was a very moderate one, nay really small, may be gathered from the monuments of the age.—[The opinion of Leibnitz was embraced by Semler, in his Continuation of Baumgarten's Kirchengesch. vol. iv. p. 453, &c. and Hist. Eccles. Selecta Capita, tom. ii. p. 826, &c. His arguments seem not easily answered.

Ratherius,¹ Flodoard,² Notkerus,³ Ethelbert,⁴ and others; of whom some are indeed better than others, but they all wander immensely wide of the true method of composing history. Of their poets one and another shows himself to be not void of genius; but all are rude on account of the infelicity of the times which could relish nothing elegant or exquisite. The grammarians and rhetoricians of those times are scarcely worthy to be mentioned; for they either write absolute nonsense, or inculcate precepts which are jejune and injudicious. Of their geometry, arithmetic, chronology,⁵ astronomy, and music, which had a place in their schools, it is unnecessary to give any description.

6. The philosophy of the Latins was confined wholly to logic, which was supposed to contain the marrow of all wisdom. Moreover, this logic which was so highly extolled was usually taught without method and without clearness, according to the book on the Categories falsely ascribed to Augustine, and the writings of Porphyry. It is true that Plato's Timæus, Aristotle's tract De Interpretatione, and his as well as Cicero's Topics, and perhaps some other treatises of the Greeks and Latins, were in the hands of a few individuals; but they who state this fact, add that there were none who could understand these books.⁶ And yet strange as it may appear, it was in the midst of this darkness, that the subtle question was raised respecting the nature of universals, as they are called, namely, whether they belong to the class of real existences, or are mere names; a controversy which was violently agitated among the Latins from this time onward, and produced the two opposing sects of Nominalists and Realists. At least the incipient footsteps of this protracted and knotty controversy are discoverable in the writings of the learned, as early as this century.⁷

7. At the close of this century the cause of learning in Europe obtained a great and energetic patron in Gerbert a Frenchman, known among the Roman pontiffs as bearing the name of Sylvester II. This great and exalted genius pursued successfully all branches of learning, but especially mathematics, mechanics, geometry, astronomy, arithmetic, and the kindred sciences; and both wrote upon them himself, and roused others to cultivate and advance them to the utmost of his power. The effects of his efforts among the Germans, French, and Italians, were manifest both in this century and the next; for many individuals of those nations were stimulated by the writings, example, and exhortations of Gerbert to the zealous pursuit of philosophy, mathematics, medicine, and other branches of human science. Gerbert cannot indeed be compared with our geometers

Cænobii Casinensis, [a Saracenorum irruptione,] et de Miraculis inibi factis, Chronicon succinctum; also, Chronicon postremorum Comitum Capuae. See Cave, ubi supra.—Mur.

¹ Ratherius, a monk of stern manners and prone to give offence, was bishop of Verona A.D. 928; displaced in 954, and made bishop of Liège; resigned and was again bishop of Verona; was again removed and retired to his monastery of Laubes, where he died A.D. 973. His works as published by D'Achery, Spicilg. tom. II. comprise various epistles, apologies, polemic tracts, a few sermons, and a life of St. Ursmar of Laubes. His Chronographia is said to have existed in MS. in the monastery of Gemblours. See Cave, ubi supra.—Mur. [For further particulars respecting this writer, and an account of his works, see Bähr, Gesch. der Röm. Liter. suppl. vol. par. III. p. 546–53. The latest and best edition of his works is that by the brothers P. and H. Ballerini, published at Verona, 1765, fol.—R.

² Flodoard or Frodoard, a canon of Rheims who died A.D. 966, aged seventy-three years. His Chronicon Rerum inter Francos gestarum, ab anno 919, ad annum 966, was published, Paris, 1588, 8vo, and Franef. 1594, 8vo. His Historia Ecclesie Remensis was edited by Sirmond, Paris, 1611, 8vo; Douay, 1617, 8vo; and in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xvii. p. 500. His poetic lives of various ancient saints in about twenty books were never published. See Cave, ubi supra.—Mur. [His works are noticed in Bähr, ubi supra; the poetical at p. 127, the Chronicon at p. 184, and the Historia, &c. at p. 274, with ample references to various authorities.—R.

³ Notker or Notger, bishop of Liège A.D. 971–1007. He wrote Hist. Episcop. Traiectensium, (seu Leodicensium.) but whether it is the same which was published by Cheapeville, Liège, 1612, is doubted. He also wrote the life of St. Landoald, a Romish presbyter; a life of St. Remacius, bishop of Utrecht; and on the miracles of St. Remacius. It was another Notger of the preceding century who died A.D. 912, and who was a monk of St. Gall, whose Martyrology was published by Canisius, tom. iv. p. 761. See Cave, ubi supra.—Mur. [There were three writers of this name; one was Notker Balbulus or the Stammerer, the writer of the Martyrologium published by Canisius, and of a tract, De interpretibus dicinarum scripturarum in Pezius, Anecd. Thesaur. vol. I.; a second was Notker Labos or of the thick lips, a translator of some Latin classical pieces and portions of the scriptures into German; and a third Notker, surnamed Piferis granum or Peppercorn, a learned physician, also of St. Gallen.—R.

⁴ Ethelbert or rather Ethelwold or Elswold was of royal English blood, and flourished A.D. 980. He wrote Historia brevis, which is a concise Chronology from the creation to the Saxon invasion of England, and then a more full and a bombastic history of England down to A.D. 974. It was published by Saville with the Scriptores Anglici, London, 1596, fol. p. 472.—Mur.

⁵ Moshelm's phrase is computus or the calculation of the moveable feasts of the church—a branch of chronological science.—R.

⁶ Gunzo, Epist. ad Monachos Augienses, in Martene, Collectio impit. Monument. Peter, tom. III. p. 304.

⁷ Gunzo, a learned monk, ubi supra, p. 304, says:—"Aristoteles genus, speciem, differentiam, proprium et accidens subsistere denegavit, quo Platoni subsistentia persuasit. Aristoteli an Platoni magis credendum putatis? Magna est utriusque autoritas, quatenus vix audeat quis alterum alteri dignitate preferre." This is a clear exhibition of the apple of discord among the Latins. Gunzo did not venture to offer a solution of the difficult question, but others attempted it afterwards.

and mathematicians; as is manifest from his Geometry which is a plain and perspicuous treatise, but at the same time imperfect and superficial.¹ And yet his knowledge was too profound for the comprehension of that barbarous age. For the ignorant monks supposed his geometrical diagrams to be magical figures, and therefore set down this learned man among the magicians and disciples of the evil one.²

8. For a part of his knowledge, especially of philosophy, medicine, and mathematics, Gerbert was indebted to the books and the schools of the Arabians of Spain. He went into Spain to pursue science, and was an auditor of the Arab doctors at Cordova and Seville.³ Perhaps his example in this respect had an influence upon the Europeans. This at least is most certain that from this time onward, such of the Europeans as were eager for knowledge, especially of medicine, arithmetic, geometry, and philosophy, had a strong desire to read and hear the Arab doctors resident in Spain, and in a part of Italy; many of whose books were translated into Latin, and much of their contents was brought forward in the European schools; many students also actually went into Spain to get instruction immediately from the lectures of the Arabic doctors. And truth requires us to say that the Saracens or Arabs, particularly of Spain, were the principal source and fountain of whatever knowledge of medicine, philosophy, astronomy, and mathematics, flourished in Europe from the tenth century onward.

CHAPTER II.

HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS AND OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH.

1. NOTHING is more incontrovertible than that the clergy, both in the East and in the West, were composed principally of men who were illiterate, stupid, ignorant of everything pertaining to religion, libidinous, superstitious, and flagitious.⁴ Nor does any one doubt that those who wished to be regarded as the fathers and guardians of the universal church, were the principal cause of these evils. Indeed nothing can be conceived so filthy or so criminal and wicked, as to be deemed by these supreme directors of religion and worship incompatible with their characters; nor was any government so loaded with vices of every kind, as was that which bore the appellation of the most holy.⁵ What the Greek patriarchs were, the single example of Theophylact shows, who as credible historians testify made traffic of everything sacred, and cared for nothing but his hounds and his horses.⁶ But though these patriarchs were very un-

¹ It was published by Pezsius, Thesaur. Anecd. tom. lii. par. ii. p. 7, &c.

² See the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome vi. p. 558; Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. i. p. 314, 319, &c.; Nauw, Apologie pour les grands hommes faussement accusés de la Magie, chap. xli. sec. 4. (Gerbert was a monk of Auvergne, and early devoted himself to study. After much proficiency in France, he attended the schools of the Saracens in Spain, and returned the most scientific man in the Latin church. In the year 968 the emperor Otto I. met with him in Italy, and made him abbot of Bobbio; but he soon left that station to become secretary to Adalbero, archbishop of Rheims. He now taught the archiepiscopal school which flourished greatly under him. In 991 he was made archbishop of Rheims; but was deposed by Pope John XV. in 995, and soon after made archbishop of Ravenna. On the death of Gregory V. A.D. 999, he was by Otto's influence created pope, and assumed the title of Sylvester II. He died A.D. 1003. While at Rheims he wrote 160 Letters, which were published by Masson, Paris, 1611, 4to, and then in Duchene's Scriptores Francici, tom. ii. and in Biblioth. Patr. tom. xvii. While pope he wrote three Epistles, one of which in the name of Jerusalem calls upon Christians to rescue that city from the hands of infidels. He also wrote De Geometria, De Sphæra, De Informatione Episcoporum Sermo, and an epigram; besides several pieces never published. The life of St. Adalbert, archbishop of Prague, formerly ascribed to him is supposed not to be his. But the tract, De Corpore et Sanguine Domini, formerly ascribed to Heniger, abbot of Laubes, is supposed to have been the production of Gerbert. — Mur. [The English reader will find an account of this most remarkable man in Berrington's Literary History of the Middle Ages, Lond. 1814, 4to, p. 202, &c. with much additional information in the Encyclopædia Metropolitana, vol. xi. p. 518, &c.; Burney's Hist. of Music, vol. 2, p. 129. — R.]

³ See Bænzus, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. i. p. 314.

⁴ Whoever would be convinced of this, need only look through the pages of Rothericus. In his Volumen Perpendicularium sive de contemptu canonum, for instance, he speaks of a clergyman: "Qui cum omnes mulieres diocesis suæ sint ipsius filias spirituales, cujuslibet forte illarum corruptione pollutus est." He tells us that the nobility were more anxious to become bishops than to serve the Lord; and that the example of the light-minded bishops, who would recite passages of the Bible such as John x. 1, with laughter, led others to indulge in similar levity. See Semler's Continuation of Baumgarten's Kirchenhistorie, vol. iv. p. 507. — Schl.

⁵ The reader is referred to the testimony of an upright Italian, Muratori, in his Antiq. Ital. Mediæ ævi, lib. v. p. 82. "In the tenth century especially, alas! what unheard-of monsters filled not only many of the chairs of bishops and abbots, but likewise that of St. Peter. Everywhere might be seen the profligate morals of the clergy and monks; and not a few of the rulers of churches were more worthy of the appellation of wolves than of pastors." — "Good theologians were then not to be found." — Schl.

⁶ This prelate who was of royal blood was possessor of the see of Constantinople at the age of sixteen. While under his tutors he appeared grave and decent; but when arrived at maturity he became luxurious and extravagant. He sold ecclesiastical offices; and he was so attached to horses and to hunting that he kept more than 2,000 horses, which he fed on nuts and fruits steeped in odorous wine. Once while celebrating mass, his groom brought him intelligence that his favourite mare had foaled, his joy was so great that, suspending the service, he ran to the stable, and after viewing the foal returned to the great temple and completed the sacred services. His death, which happened A.D. 956, after he had been bishop twenty-three years, was occasioned by his being thrown from his horse against a wall. This brought on a spitting of blood, he languished two years but without becoming more devout, and then died of a dropsy. Thus Fleury, Hist. de l'Eglise, livre iv. sec. 51. — Mur.

worthy men, yet they possessed more dignity and virtue than the Roman pontiffs.

2. That the history of the Roman pontiffs of this century is a history of monsters, a record of the most atrocious villanies and crimes, is acknowledged by all the best writers and even by the advocates of Popery.¹ The principal cause of these enormities is to be sought for in the calamities of the times, which upon the extinction of the family of Charlemagne pervaded the greater part of Europe but especially Italy. Upon the death of Benedict IV. A.D. 903, Leo V. was elected his successor. But he reigned only forty days, when Christophanes [or Christopher] cardinal of St. Lawrence, dethroned him and cast him into prison. In the following year Sergius III. a Roman presbyter, stripped Christophanes of the pontifical dignity by the aid of Adalbert, the powerful marquis of Tuscany, who controlled everything at Rome according to his pleasure. Sergius died in 911 and his successors, Anastasius III. and Lando, filled the holy office only for a short time, and performed nothing worthy of notice.

3. After the death of Lando A.D. 914, the rich and powerful marquis or count of Tusculum, Alberic, by the instigation of his mother-in-law, Theodora, a very lewd woman who controlled all things at Rome, elevated John X. archbishop of Ravenna, to the Papal chair. For at this time nothing was conducted regularly at Rome, but everything was carried by bribery or violence.² This John though otherwise a very bad man is commended for one deed; he successfully attacked and vanquished the Saracens who occupied a fortified mountain [on the banks of the] Garigliano. But Marozia, the daughter of Theodora and wife of Alberic, was inimical to him. Therefore on the death of her husband Alberic, when she had married Wido [or Guido] marquis of Tuscany, she persuaded her new husband to seize her mother's lover A.D. 928, and to imprison and kill him. Leo VI. next succeeded, and he dying six months after was followed by Stephen VII. After two years or A.D. 931, Stephen died and Marozia procured for her very young son, John XI. whom she had by the Roman pontiff Sergius III. the chair of St. Peter and the government of the church.³

4. John XI. who was raised to supreme power in the church by the aid of his mother, lost it again in the year 933 through the enmity of Alberic, his uterine brother. For Alberic being offended with his step-father, Hugo king of Italy, to whom Marozia was married after the death of Wido, expelled Hugo from Rome and confined both his mother and his brother

¹ At that time the noted Theodora with her two daughters, Marozia and Theodora, resided at Rome. They were wholly devoted to what was called the Tuscan party, of which the marquis Adalbert (not Alberic as in the text of Mosheim) was the head. These women not only lived in habits of the most abominable unchastity with the chief men of Rome, but they had boundless influence in the government there. Luitprand is in this matter the principal historian. Eccard and Muratori have indeed questioned his authority, and endeavoured to make his testimony suspicious. But Sigebert of Gemblours and Alberic, the author of the chronicle of Perfe (who could not have transcribed from Luitprand), confirm his account of the profligate lives of these base females.—Schl. [Luitprand's narrative of the elevation of John X. as translated by Bower (Lives of the Popes, vol. v. p. 90), is as follows:—"In those days Peter, archbishop of Ravenna (esteemed the first archiepiscopal see after that of Rome), used frequently to send to Rome a deacon named John to pay his obeisance to his holiness. As the deacon was a very comely and personable man, Theodora falling passionately in love with him, engaged him in a criminal intrigue with her. While they lived thus together the bishop of Bologna died, and John had interest enough to get himself elected in his room. But the archbishop of Ravenna dying before he was consecrated, Theodora persuaded him to exchange the see of Bologna for that of Ravenna; and he was accordingly at her request ordained by Pope Lando, archbishop of that city. Lando died soon after, and upon his death Theodora exerted all her interest, as she could not live at the distance of two hundred miles from her lover, got him preferred to the pontifical chair."—Luitprand, lib. ii. cap. xiii. See also Fleury, Hist. de l'Eglise, livre liv. sec. 49.—Mur.

² Marozia is a woman infamous in the view of all historians ancient and modern, who tell us that the pontiff John XI. was her son, and the fruit of an illicit intercourse with Sergius III. Yet one writer Eccard, in his Origines Guelphicæ, tom. i. lib. ii. p. 131, dares to vindicate her character and to represent Sergius as being her first husband. I say dares, for it is audacious to acquit, without proof or reason, a woman whose actions condemn her and show her to be destitute of all integrity and virtue.

¹ Baronius, Annales, ad ann. 900, says of this century: "It is usual to denigrate it the iron age, on account of its barbarism and barrenness of all good; also the leaden age on account of the abounding wickedness by which it was deformed; and the dark age on account of the scarcity of writers." "One can scarcely believe, nay absolutely cannot credit without ocular demonstration, what unworthy conduct, what base and enormous deeds, what execrable and abominable transactions disgraced the holy Catholic see, which is the pivot on which the whole Catholic church revolves; when temporal princes who, though called Christian, were most cruel tyrants, arrogated to themselves the election of the Roman pontiffs. Alas, the shame! Alas, the mischief! What monsters, horrible to behold, were then raised to the holy see, which angels revere! What evils did they perpetrate; what horrible tragedies ensued! With what pollutions was this see though itself without spot or wrinkle then stained; what corruptions infected it; what filthiness defiled it; and hence what marks of perpetual infamy are visible upon it!"—Mur. [Döllinger, from whom one would have expected more candour and ingenuousness, passes over these dark places in the annals of the papacy, is wholly silent with respect to the notorious profligacy of the Popes, and very jesuitically remarks:—"What is told of female domination at this time in Rome may be justly suspected, as the only writer whose testimony can be given is the credulous Luitprand."—Hist. of the Church, translated by Cox, vol. 3, p. 136. I may observe, however, that the authority of Luitprand has been abundantly supported by C. D. A. Martini in his Abhandlung über Luitprand u. dessen histor. Glaubwürdig. Munich, 1810, 4to.—R.

the pontiff in a prison, where John died A.D. 936. The four pontiffs who succeeded him in the government of the church till the year 956, namely Leo VII. Stephen VIII. Marinus II. and Agapetus, are represented as better men than John; and it is certain that they reigned more tranquilly. But on the death of Agapetus, A.D. 956, Alberic II. the consul of Rome, who controlled everything there by his influence and wealth, raised his own son Octavius yet a youth to the pontificate. This youth, utterly unworthy of the office, assumed the name of John XII. and thus introduced the custom which continues to the present day among the Roman pontiffs, of changing their name on their elevation to that office.¹

5. The death of John XII. was as unfortunate as his promotion had been scandalous. Being very uneasy under the haughty government of Berengarius II. king of Italy, he sent ambassadors to Otho the Great, king of Germany A.D. 960, inviting him to march an army into Italy and rescue the church and the commonwealth from cruel tyranny; and promised if he would do this to invest him with the insignia and confer on him the title of emperor of the Romans. Otho came accordingly with his forces, and was declared emperor of Rome by John, in the year 962. But the pontiff soon after repented of what he had done; and although he had bound himself by a solemn oath to the emperor, he formed a coalition with Adalbert, the son of Berengarius, against Otho. The emperor therefore returned to Rome the next year, and assembled a council in which John was accused of numerous crimes, and perhaps also proved guilty and formally deposed; Leo VIII. being appointed to his place.² When Otho had left the city, John came to Rome A.D. 964, assembled another council, and condemned the emperor's pontiff; but he soon after died a miserable death.³ After his decease the Romans elected Benedict V. but the emperor carried him away to Hamburg where he died.⁴

6. The Roman pontiffs after Leo VIII. who died A.D. 965, down to Gerbert or Sylvester II. at the end of the century, were in different degrees meritorious and successful; but no one of them deserved high commendation. John XIII. was placed in the chair of St. Peter by the influence of Otho the Great A.D. 965. He had just entered on his functions when he was driven from Rome; but the next year the emperor arriving in Italy, he was restored to his chair and held it peaceably till his death in 972. His successor, Benedict VI. was miserably strangled in a prison, into which he was thrown in the year 974 by Crescentius the son of the very noted Theodora. For upon the death of Otho the Great A.D. 973, the Romans who had been awed by his power and severity, relapsed into their former licentiousness and disorderly violence. After Benedict, Franco a Roman who assumed the name of Boniface VII. held the pontifical chair for a short time only; for at the end of a month he was driven from Rome, and Donus II. of whom nothing is known but his name, succeeded to the chair. Donus died in 975, and Benedict VII. governed the Romish church very quietly during nine years, or till A.D. 984. His prosperous reign was probably to be ascribed wholly to the wealth and influence of the family from which he originated. For he was the grandson of that Alberic had put out the eyes of his god-father, and had castrated one of the cardinals; that he had set several houses on fire, and had frequently been seen clad in armour with a sword by his side; that he had drunken to the health of the devil; that in playing at dice he had invoked Jupiter, Venus, and other pagan deities; that he had never said matins or any other canonical hours, and never signed himself with the sign of the cross. See Bower's Lives of the Popes, vol. v. p. 108, 109.—Mur.

² On a certain evening he retired out of the city to spend the night in criminal converse with a married woman. There he received a wound, perhaps from the injured husband, of which he died eight days after. Fleury, Hist. de l'Eglise, liv. lvi. See 10, on the authority of Luitprand.—Mur.

³ In this history of the pontiffs of this century I have consulted the original authorities, most of which are given by Muratori in his Scriptores Rerum Italianar.; and I have also examined the writings of others who have consulted the sources of information, namely, Baronius, De Marca, Sigonius, De Regno Italiae, with the learned notes of Saxius, Muratori's Annales Italiae, Fagi, and others. The general correctness of these statements no one can doubt; yet many parts of this history undoubtedly need more light, and that it may have been corrupted by the partialities of the writers on whom we have to depend, cannot be denied.

¹ Mosheim is incorrect in asserting that Alberic himself raised his son to the pontificate. This patrician and prince of Rome was in fact a tyrant, who had irregularly usurped the supremacy at Rome; but he died in the year 954 and while Agapetus was still living; so that he transmitted to his son only what he himself possessed,—the civil dominion of the city. On the death of Agapetus in the year 956, Octavius was advised by his friends to place himself in St. Peter's chair; and this he found not difficult to accomplish, although his age rendered him unfit for the place, for he was perhaps not then nineteen years old. He was the first pope so far as is known who changed his name. Yet it was only in spiritual affairs that he assumed the name of John, in all worldly matters he still retained his former one. See Muratori, ad ann. 954 and 956.—Schl.

² The charges against John XII. were that he had said mass without communicating; that he had ordained a deacon in a stable; that he had taken money for ordinations; and had ordained as a bishop a child only ten years old; that he carried on amours with various females, one of whom had been his father's concubine; that he turned the holy palace into a brothel; that he was given to hunting; that he who had been so powerful a prince or rather tyrant at Rome.

7. His successor John XIV. previously bishop of Pavia, was destitute of the support derived from family connections, and was abandoned by Otho III. by whose influence he had been elected. Hence his end was tragical; for Boniface VII. who had thrust himself into the see of Rome in the year 974, and being soon after expelled had retired to Constantinople, now returned to Rome, cast John into prison, and there dispatched him. Yet Boniface's prosperity was of short duration, for he died six months after. He was succeeded by John XV. who by many is denominated John XVI. on account of another John whom they represent as reigning at Rome four months. This John XV. or XVI. governed the church during almost eleven years, from A.D. 985 to 996, with as much prosperity as the troubled state of the Roman affairs would permit; which was owing not so much to his personal virtues and prudence, as to his Roman birth and to the nobility of his house. Of course his German successor, Gregory V. whom the emperor Otho III. commanded the Romans to elect A.D. 996, was not equally prosperous. For the Roman consul Crescens expelled him from the city, and placed John XVI. who before was called Philagathus at the head of the church. But Otho III. returning to Italy A.D. 998 with an army, deprived John of his eyes, nose, and ears; and committing him to prison restored Gregory to the chair. And Gregory dying soon after, the emperor raised his preceptor and friend, the celebrated Gerbert or Sylvester II. to the chair of St. Peter with the approbation of the Romans.¹

8. Notwithstanding these perpetual commotions and the reiterated crimes and contests of those who called themselves Christ's viceregents on earth, so great was the influence of ignorance and superstition in those times, that the power and authority of the Roman pontiffs gradually and imperceptibly advanced.² Otho the Great indeed introduced a law, that no Roman pontiff should be created without the knowledge and consent of the emperor; and this regulation continued as all admit from his time to the end of the century. This emperor too, as well as his son and grandson of the same name, held uniformly their right of supremacy over the city of Rome and its territory, as well as over the Roman pontiff; as is demonstrable by many examples. The more intelligent bishops likewise of France, Germany, and Italy were on their guard throughout the century, to prevent the Romish bishop from arrogating to himself alone legislative power in the church. But still the pontiffs, sometimes openly and directly and sometimes by stratagems, invaded the rights both of emperors and kings, and also of the bishops;³ among whom were several who flattered them and favoured their designs. It has been observed by learned men that there were bishops in this century, though never before, who called the pontiffs, bishops of the world instead of bishops of Rome; and that some even among the French clergy conceded what had never been heard of, that bishops receive indeed all their power from God but only through St. Peter.⁴

9. The inferior bishops eagerly copied after the example of the principal bishop, by labouring to extend their authority. From the times of Charlemagne and his sons, many bishops and abbots had obtained for their tenants and estates, exemption from the jurisdiction of the counts and other magistrates, as well as from all imposts and taxes. But in this century they kinsman. Here is no shadow of papal jurisdiction. (See Ekkebart, De Cassibus S. Galli, cap. xi.) Yet the popes laid hold of various occasions to extend their power over monasteries. Thus we read of Sylvester II. that he arbitrarily declared the monastery of Lorschelm free from other jurisdiction; and ordered that whenever the monks deviated from their rule, they should be corrected by the Roman pontiff, and if this was not effectual the emperor should be called upon. (Regiæ potestati deputarentur.) See Mabillon, Annales Ord. S. Bened. sæcul. v. p. 43.—So also in the year 973 the pope called the monastery of Corvey, whose privileges had been established by the Emperor Otho, a daughter of the apostolic see and subject only to it. The great lords in the mean time exercised sovereign power in ecclesiastical things unrestrained, in Spain, in Germany, in England, in Italy, in Hungary, &c. The German churches possessed also the right of electing their own bishops; and the popes acknowledged the right of the German kings to give investiture to their bishops. See Harduin, Concilia, tom. vi. par. i. p. 153. &c. where Pope John X. says explicitly: "Cum prisca consuetudo vigeat, ut nullus alicui clerico episcopatum conferre debeat, nisi rex, cui divinitus sceptræ collata sunt—hoc nullo modo esse potest, ut absque regali preceptione in qualibet parochia Episcopus sit consecratus."—S. h.

² Examples are adduced in the Hist. du Droit Ecclésiastique, tome i. p. 217, ed. in 8vo.

³ The Benedictine monks in their Hist. Littéraire de la France, tome vi. p. 78, 79, 98, 186, &c.

¹ The history of the Roman pontiffs of this period is very barren and uninteresting; and besides is involved in considerable uncertainty. I have followed, for the most part, Muratori, Annales Italiae, and Papebroch's Conatus Chronologico-Historicus de Romanis Pontificibus, which is prefixed to his Acta Sanctorum. Mail.

² Yet no traces of any dominion of the popes over the monasteries are as yet discoverable. In the year 968 the monastery of St. Gall was visited by imperial commissioners. The abbot of Richenau had complained of the monks there to Hedwig, the widowed duchess of Suabia; and through her the complaint reached the imperial court. The emperor appointed for this visitation eight bishops, of whom Henry of Trèves was the first Commissioner, together with eight abbots; and he commanded the commissioners to proceed mildly with the abbot of St. Gall, who was his laboured to obtain also civil jurisdiction over the cities and districts of country subject to them, and coveted the functions of dukes, marquesses, and counts.¹ For whereas violent contests respecting jurisdiction and other matters, frequently sprang up between the dukes, the governors of cities, or the counts and marquesses on the one hand and the bishops on the other, these latter taking advantage of favourable occasions, left no means unattempted to secure to themselves those high offices; and the kings and emperors not unfrequently granted their petitions, sometimes in order to put an end to the contentions and broils among the civil and military magistrates, sometimes from their reverence for religion, and sometimes with a view to augment their own power by means of the bishops. And hence it was, that from this time onward so many bishops and abbots were also to be seen sustaining characters entirely foreign from their sacred functions, and enjoying the rank of dukes, marquesses, counts, and viscounts.²

¹ Among these may be reckoned the regulation of tolls and coinage, which some of them obtained. Thus for example the archbishopric of Trêves obtained these rights from king Lewis A.D. 903. See Brower's Annal. Trevir. lib. ix. and Köhler's Reichs historie, p. 54. And in the year 946 the emperor Otho bestowed on the monastery of Gemblours the control of the market and of coinage, the free election of their own abbots and advocates, and the right of erecting fortifications. See Mabillon, Annal. Ord. S. Bened. p. 453, 454. In like manner Otho II. conferred on Milo, bishop of Minden, the right of coining money. — Chron. Episc. Mindens. p. 166, 167. In Leibnitz's Scriptores Brunsv. tom. II. And likewise Adalgaz, archbishop of Hainburg, received from the munificence of Otho great power and direct civil dominion, namely, the judicial power, the right to levy tolls and to coin money, and in short whatever related to the royal finance, to the exclusion of all royal functionaries from these affairs. See Lambecius, Orig. Hamburg. p. 10, 11; Pagi, Crit. ad Baron. Annal. ann. 988, sec. 1, 2. — Schl. [Pagi also tells us (from Witichind, lib. i. and the Chron. Belgic. Magu.) that similar powers were granted by Otho I. to the archbishoprics of Cologne and Mentz, and to the bishopric of Spire and Minden. He adds, however, that it is not lawful for bishops to preside personally in the temporal courts, but only by their deputies. — Mur.

² Thomassin, in his Disciplina Ecclesie vet. et nova, tom. III. lib. i. cap. xxviii. p. 89, has collected much matter in order to evince that the functions of dukes and counts were sustained by bishops as early as the ninth century. And some of the bishops pretend to trace the origin of their secular power back to the eighth century. But I greatly mistake if any indubitable instance can be produced of earlier date than the tenth century. [The student will find this subject, the growth of the secular power of bishops, carefully examined by Gieseler, and the authorities detailed with his characteristic research and accuracy, in his Lehrbuch, &c. Cunningham's transl. vol. II. p. 91. — R.

³ Rutherus, in his Itinerarium (published by D'Achery, Spicileg. tom. I. p. 381) says of the priests of Verona: scisciatulus de fide illorum, inveni plurimos neque ipsum sapere symbolum, qui fuisse creditur Apostolorum. [The same writer gives us (p. 376) a copy of the charge which he issued to the presbyters of his diocese, Verona. In this charge he requires all priests to be able to repeat the three creeds, namely, the Apostles', the Nicene, and the Athanasian; and moreover to come severally and repeat them before him. He also calls upon them to consider why the Lord's day is so

10. Besides their ignorance which was extreme,³ the body of the Latin clergy were chargeable with two great vices, deplored by most of the writers of those times, namely, concubinage and simony. In the first place, very generally not only the priests but the monks also connected themselves with women, some indeed in a lawful, but others in an unlawful manner; and upon these wives and concubines and the children born of them, they squandered the property of the church.⁴ In the next place, there was scarcely any such thing as the regular and canonical election of bishops and abbots; but kings, princes, and nobles either conferred the sacred offices on their friends and ministers for whom they had partiality, or sold them to the highest bidders.⁵ Hence men the most unfit and flagitious, sometimes soldiers, civil magistrates, and counts, were frequently invested with spiritual offices of the highest dignity and influence. In the following century Gregory VII. endeavoured to cure both of these evils.

11. Among the Greek and Oriental monks there was more appearance of religion and decorum; but among the Latin monks at the beginning of this century, discipline was so low that most of them did not even know, that the rule they had bound themselves to follow was called the rule of St. Benedict. To this evil a remedy not altogether unsuccessful was applied by Odo, a French nobleman, who was a learned and devout man according to the standard of that age. Being made abbot of Cluny in Burgundy, a province of France, after the death of Berno, A.D. 927, he not only obliged his monks to live according to their rule, but also bound them to observe additional rites and regulations, which had an air of sanctity, but were in reality trivial as well as onerous named, and if they do not know, to make inquiry and learn. He likewise directs each of them to have a written exposition of the creed and the Lord's prayer, and to make himself so far master of both as to be able to explain, or at least be able to repeat correctly the prayers and the office of the mass; and he expressed his wish that they might be able not only to read the lessons called the Epistle and the Gospel, but also to give a literal explanation of them. — Mur.

⁴ That this custom commenced in the beginning of this century, appears from Orderic Vitalis and others, and particularly from an epistle of Mantio, bishop of Chalons, published by Mabillon, Analecta Peter. p. 429, ed. nova. Of the Italian monks who supported wives and concubines and thus misused the church property, see Hugo, De Monasterii Farfensis Destructio; in Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Medii Evi, tom. vi. p. 278, &c.

⁵ Very significant examples and testimonies may be seen in the Gallia Christiana, tom. I. p. 23, 37, tom. II. p. 173, 179. See also Abbo's Apologeticum, subjoined to the Codex Canon. of Pithœus, p. 398, and Mabillon Annales Bened. tom. v. and others.

and inconvenient.¹ This new form of monastic life procured for its author great fame and honour; and in a short time it was propagated over all Europe. For very many of the ancient monasteries in France, Germany, Italy, Britain, and Spain, adopted the discipline of Cluny; and the new monasteries which were erected were by their founders subjected to the same discipline. Thus was formed in the next century the venerable order of Cluny, or that body of associated Cluniacensians which was so widely extended and so renowned for its wealth and power.²

12. The more distinguished writers of this century are easily enumerated. Among the Greeks was Simeon Magister, chancellor of Constantinople. He transcribed the earlier written lives of the saints for the sake of giving them a better form, and clothing them in a better style; for which he obtained the surname of Metaphrastes.³

¹ See Mabillon, Annales Bened. tom. iii. p. 386, &c. and Præfatio ad Acta Sanctorum. Ord. Irred. sæcul. v. p. 26, &c. Mabillon treats largely of Berno, the first abbot and the founder of the order of Cluny, in his Acta Sanctorum. Ord. Bened. sæc. v. p. 66, and of Odo, ibid. p. 122, &c. The general history of this order is neatly written by Helyot, Hist. des Ordres Religieuses, tome v. p. 184, &c. The present state of Cluny is described by Martene, Voyage Littér. de deux Bénédictins. part i. p. 227, &c.

² I am mistaken if most of the writers on ecclesiastical history have not misapprehended the import of the word order, as applied to the Cluniacensians, Cistercians, and others. For they take it to mean a new monastic institute or a new sect of monks; in which they mistake by confounding the modern use of the term with its ancient meaning. The term order, as used by the writers of that age, at first signified merely some particular form of monastic discipline. But from this use of the word another gradually arose; for the word order denoted a society or association of many monasteries acknowledging one head, and following the same rules of life. The order of Cluny was not a new monastic sect like the orders of Carthusians, Dominicans, and Franciscans; but it denoted first that mode of living which Odo prescribed to the Benedictine monks of Cluny, and then the whole number of monasteries in different parts of Europe which embraced these regulations and united in a kind of association of which the abbot of Cluny in France was the head.

³ See Leo Allatius, De Symponium Scriptis, p. 24, &c. Bolland, Præfatio ad Acta Sanctorum, Antw. sæc. iii. p. vi. &c. [Simeon Metaphrastes was of noble birth, and a man of both genius and learning. The emperor Leo made him his principal secretary, patriarch, logothetes or high chancellor, and master of the palace. He flourished about A.D. 901; and devoted his time, when the business of his offices did not prevent, to the re-writing of the lives of the saints. How many narratives he revised or composed anew it is difficult to state; because the religious biographies of subsequent writers have been ascribed to him. Of the 661 narratives long and short which have been attributed to him, Leo Allatius supposes 122 are actually of his revision, 444 he attributes to other authors whom he names, and 95 he thinks are not Simeon's, but he cannot ascertain to whom they should be attributed.—Many of the genuine narratives of Simeon have found their way into the large collections of Surian and Bolland; but the greater part of the whole were never printed.—Besides these revised biographies a number of orations, epistles, and short poems, hymns, &c. are extant as the productions of Simeon. See Cave's Hist. Liter. tom. ii. and Fleury, Hist. de

But in digesting, polishing, and embellishing these lives of Saints, he is said to have enlarged the original narratives by the addition of many of his own fictions and silly tales. Nikon, an Armenian monk, has left us a tract on the religion of the Armenians which is by no means contemptible.⁴ The two authors of Catane, Olympiodorus and Ecumenius,⁵ are placed by some in this century; but it is wholly on conjectural grounds. With better reason Suidas, the famous lexicographer, is placed among the writers of this century.⁶ The most distinguished author among the Arabian Christians was Eutychius, bishop of Alexandria, whose Annals with other writings are still extant.⁷

⁴ Eglise, liv. iv. sec. 31.—Mur. [He lived to 976 or 77. See the Onomasticon literarium of Saxius (tom. ii. p. 135) for references to works which serve to illustrate his character and works.—R.

⁵ Nikon was born in Pontus and educated in a monastery on the confines of Pontus and Paphlagonia. About the year 961 his abbot sent him out as a Christian missionary; and he travelled in Armenia and various countries of the east and in Greece. He was accounted a saint, and miracles are related of him. His book, De pessima Religione Armenorum in a Latin translation is extant in the Biblio. Patrum.—Mur.

⁶ For an account of Ecumenius of Tricca see especially Montfaucon, Biblioth. Coislin. p. 274. [Ecumenius, bishop of Tricca in Thrace, is placed in this century because he quotes Photius who lived in the ninth century, but mentions no later writer. His brief Scholia on the Acts of the Apostles and on the canonical Epistles are all borrowed from the fathers, and especially from Chrysostom. His works were printed at Paris, Gr. and Lat. 1631, two vols. fol.—Olympiodorus, a Greek monk and a deacon of Alexandria of uncertain age, is author of an exposition of the book of Ecclesiastes; printed Gr. and Lat. in Fronto le Due's Auctarium, tom. ii. p. 602. The Catena on Job ascribed to him is more probably the work of Nicetas, in the middle of the next century. It was published, Gr. and Lat. by Fr. Junius, Lond. 1637, fol.—Mur.

⁷ That Suidas lived in the latter part of this century is inferred from his computations in the article Adāp, which all terminate with the reign of the emperor John Zimisceus, who died of poison A.D. 975. His Dictionary, which is a kind of historical and literary Encyclopedia, was best published by Kuster, Cambridge, 1705, 3 vols. fol.—Mur. [With Emendationes in Suidam, by the Rev. T. Toup, Lond. 1760–75, in three parts and an appendix.—R.

⁸ See Fabricius, Bibliogra. Antiq. p. 179, and Renaudot, Hist. Patriarch. Alexandr. p. 347. [Eutychius was a native of Egypt, and the Melchite or orthodox patriarch of Alexandria from A.D. 933 to 950. His Arabic name was Said Ibn Batrik, that is Said the son of Batrik. Said signifies Blessed, which in Greek is Eὐτυχής or Eutychius. He lived unhappily with his flock and died at the age of 75. His principal work is his Annals from the creation to A.D. 937; edited by E. Pocock, Arab. and Lat. Oxford, 1658, 4to. He also wrote a history of Sicily after its conquest by the Saracens, a disputation between the heterodox and Christians in opposition to the Jacobites, and some medical tracts; all of which still exist in manuscript.

The Greek writers of this century, omitted by Mosheim, are the following.

John Camenlata, a reader in the church of Thessalonica. When that city was taken and plundered by the Saracens A.D. 904, John was made prisoner and carried to Tarsus, where he composed a full and interesting History of the destruction of Thessalonica and of his own sufferings. It was published, Gr. and Lat. by Leo Allatius, Symmict. par. ii. p. 180; and in the Corpus Hist. Byzant. tom. xvi. p. 240, &c.

Hippolytus of Thebes, who has been confounded

13. The best among the Latin writers was Gerbert or Sylvester II. the Roman pontiff, of whom we have spoken before.¹ The rest deserve no higher character than that of indifferent writers. Odo, who laid the foundation of the Cluniacensian association or order, has left some writings which have few marks of genius and discernment, but many of superstition.² Some tracts of Raterius of Verona are extant; which indicate a mind of good powers and imbued with the love of justice and integrity.³ Atto of Vercelli composed a tract on ecclesiastical grievances, which throws light on the state of those times.⁴ Dunstan, an Englishman, compiled for the benefit of monks a Harmony of monastic rules.⁵ Ælfrie of Canterbury deserved well of the Anglo-Saxons in Britain by a variety of tracts.⁶ Burchard, bishop of Worms, aided the study of canon law by a volume of Decreta in twenty books. But he was not the sole compiler, for he was aided by Olbert.⁷ Odilo of Lyons has left us some frigid sermons and other things not much better.⁸ Of those who wrote with Hippolytus Portuensis of the third century. He flourished about A.D. 933. A Chronicon or part of one composed by him was published, Gr. and Lat. by Canisius, Lectio. Ant. q. tom. iii. p. 35. It is probable he also composed the brief notices of the twelve apostles which have gone under the name of the earlier Hippolytus.

Moses Bar-Cepha, bishop of Beth-Raman, and supervisor of the churches in the regions of Babylonia. He lived in this century, but in what part of it is uncertain. He composed in Syriac three books De Paradiso; which Masius translated into Latin and then published his translation, Antw. 1568, 8vo. It is also in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xvii. p. 456.

Sisinnius, patriarch of Constantinople A.D. 994–997, composed a tract De Nuptiis Conseruatorum, which is in Leunclavius, Jus Gr. et Rom. lib. iii. p. 197.—Mur.

¹ See the preceding chapter, sec. 7, 8, and Note 2, p. 332.

² Hist. Littér. de la France, tome vi. p. 229. [His life written by John, one of his intimate friends, and the same revised by Nalgod two centuries after, are in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. vii. or Secul. vi. p. 150–159; to which Mabillon prefixed a full account composed by himself; ibid. p. 124, &c. He was a Frenchman, brought up in the court of William, Duke of Aquitaine, and educated at Tours and Paris. He early became a monk and a great admirer of St. Martin of Tours. From the year 912 till his death in 942, he was engaged in teaching school, presiding in monasteries, making journeys to Rome and Paris, &c. on public business. His works are several legends concerning St. Martin, St. Mary Magdalen, &c.; a life of St. Gerard, Count of Orleans, an abridgment of Gregory's Morals on Job, and devotional pieces. They are all published in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xvii.—Mur. [For an account of Odo and his works see Bähr, Gesch. der Röm. Liter. Suppl. vol. par. iii. p. 538.—R.]

³ Hist. Littér. de la France, tome vi. p. 339. [See note 1 on the preceding chapter, p. 331.—Mur.]

⁴ Hist. Littér. de la France, tome vi. p. 281. [Atto Secundus was a native of Lombardy, a man of learning and virtue, according to the standard of the age. Augustine was his favourite author. He presided over the church of Vercelli from A.D. 945 till his death in 960. His works were republished in a more complete form in 2 vols. fol. Vercelli, 1769. They comprise a collection of canons and ecclesiastical statutes for the use of his church, De Preuaris Ecclesiasticis, (on the bishop's courts, their ordinations), and De Facultatibus Ecclesiasticarum, several Homilies, and a verbal Commentary on the Epistles of Paul.—Mur. [Of Atto, (Azzo in Italian and Hatto in German) and his works, see also Bähr, ubi supra, p. 543.—R.]

⁵ St. Dunstan was born in Somerset, educated at Glastonbury where he became a monk, and afterwards abbot. He served several years at court, was bishop of Worcester A.D. 956, bishop of London in 958, and archbishop of Canterbury from 961 to 988. He was a most zealous promoter of monkery and celibacy, and is reported to have wrought many miracles. His Harmony of monastic rules was published by Reiner, as an Appendix to his work on the antiquity of the Benedictine order in England, Donay, 1626, fol. See Hume's History of England, vol. i. ch. li. p. 94, &c. His life and miracles composed by Osborn, a monk of Canterbury in the eleventh century, with extracts from others, may be seen in Mabillon, Acta SS. Ord. Bened. tom. vii. or Secul. v. p. 654–715.—Mur. [For further particulars respecting him, the English student may consult Lingard's History of England; Turner's History of the Anglo-Saxons, vol. ii. p. 260, especially the note at p. 277; Wright's Biogr. Brit. Liter. Anglo-Saxon period; Dunham's Europe during the Middle Ages, vol. iii. p. 262–297. The Roman Catholic view of his character may be seen more fully developed in Wright's Biographia Britannica Literaria, Anglo-Saxon period, p. 443, &c.; and the protestant view in Soames's Anglo-Saxon Church, Lond. 1835, p. 167, &c.—R.

⁶ Ælfrie or Elfric or Alfric, archbishop of Canterbury from A.D. 996 to 1006, was a monk of Abingdon, and (as Ussher supposes) filled several other offices in the church during forty years, before he was made archbishop of Canterbury. Most of the writings generally ascribed to him are by some ascribed to another monk of the same name, who was made archbishop of York and died A.D. 1051. See Wharton's Dissert. de Duobus Alfricis, in his Anglia Sacra; and Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. viii. p. 61, &c. The works ascribed to Ælfrie of Canterbury are a Biblical History, a Homily on the body and blood of Christ, (in which he disproves transubstantiation;) an Epistle to Wulfen, bishop of Sherburne, another to Wulfine, archbishop of York, a Penitentiary, and an Epistle to Wulfen, on the ecclesiastical canons. These have been published, and most of them in Saxon and Latin. Besides these there exist in MS. a collection of eighty Sermons, a Saxon Chronicle, a translation of the canons of the Nicene council, a translation of St. Gregory's Dialogue, with several lives of monkish saints, all in the Saxon language; also a Latin-Saxon dictionary, a grammar of the Saxon language, Extracts from Priscian, &c. See Cave's Hist. Liter. vol. ii.—Mur. [The general opinion now is that the Elfric who wrote the preceding works, was of York and not of Canterbury. There is a full account of him in Soames's Anglo-Saxon Church, Lond. 1835, p. 218–229. See also Wright's Biogr. Britan. Liter. Anglo-Saxon period.—R.]

⁷ See the Chronicon Wormatiense in Ludwig's Reliquie Manuscriptorum, tom. ii. p. 43; and the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome vi. p. 535, &c. [Burchard, a Hessian, was first a monk of Laubes, and then bishop of Worms from A.D. 996 to 1026. He commenced his great work on canon law while in his monastery and with the aid of his instructor Olbert, but completed it during his episcopate. It was first published at Cologne, 1548, fol. and afterwards in 8vo. Though still in twenty books it contains not a sixth part of the original work. Its authority is very small, being compiled without due care and often from spurious works. The full title of the book is, Magnum Decretorum (or Canonum) Volumen; but it is often cited by the title Decretum, and also by that of Brocardica or Brocardicorum Opus, from the French and Italian Brocard i.e. Burchard. See Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. vol. xxii. p. 414, &c.—Mur.]

⁸ St. Odilo was a native of Auvergne, educated at Cluny where he became the abbot A.D. 994. He afterwards refused the archbishopric of Lyons; and died abbot of Cluny A.D. 1049, aged eighty-seven years. His works, as published by Du Chesne in his Biblioth.

histories and annals, this is not the place to treat.¹

CHAPTER III.

THE HISTORY OF RELIGION AND THEOLOGY.

1. THAT the most important doctrines of Christianity were misunderstood and perverted, and that those which remained uncorrupted were obscured by the addition of the most foolish opinions, is manifest from every writer of this period. The essence of religion was supposed, by both Greeks and Latins, to consist in the worship of images, in honouring departed saints, in searching for and preserving sacred relics, and in heaping riches upon the priests and monks. Scarcely an individual ventured to approach God without first duly propitiating the images and the saints. And in searching after relics and hoarding them, all were zealous even to frenzy; and if we may believe the monks nothing was more an object of the divine solicitude, than to indicate to doting old women and bareheaded monks the places where the corpses of holy men were deposited. The fire which burns out the stains remaining on human souls after death, was an object of intense dread to all, nay was more feared than the punishments of hell. For the latter it was supposed might be easily escaped, if they only died rich in the prayers and merits of the priests or had some saint to intercede for them; but not so the former. And the priests, perceiving this dread to conduce much to their advantage, endeavoured by their discourses and by fables and fictitious miracles, continually to raise it higher and higher.

2. The controversies respecting grace and the Lord's supper which disquieted the preceding century, were at rest in this. For each party, as appears from various testimonies, left the other at liberty either to retain the sentiments they had embraced, or to change them. Nor was it an object of much inquiry in this illiterate and thoughtless age, what the theologians believed on these and other subjects. Hence among those who flourished in this century we find followers both of Augustine and of Pelagius; and perhaps as many can be discovered who supposed the real body and blood of Christ were literally present in the eucharist, as there were who either had no established opinion on the subject, or believed the Lord's body to be not present, and to be received in the eucharist only by a holy exercise of the soul.² Let no one however ascribe this moderation and forbearance to the wisdom and virtue of the age; it was rather the want of intelligence and knowledge which rendered them both indisposed and unable to contend on these subjects.

3. Innumerable examples and testimonies show that immense superstition flourished everywhere throughout the Christian world. To this were added many futile and groundless opinions, fostered by the priests for their own advantage. Among the opinions which dishonoured and disquieted the Latin churches in this century, none produced more excitement than the belief that the day of final consummation was at hand. This belief was derived in the preceding century from the Apocalypse of John, xx.

Cluniacensis, Paris, 1614, and thence in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xvii. consist of fourteen sermons on the festival days, lives of St. Malolus and St. Adeleidis, four hymns, and some letters. His own life, written by his pupil Jotsald, is given us by Mabillon, together with a long biographical preface, in the Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. viii. p. 631—710.—Mur. [See also Fabricius, Biblio. Latin. Med. Ævi, tom. v. p. 447-9.—R.

¹ The Latin writers omitted by Mosheim were some of them mere authors of the lives of certain monks and saints. Such were Stephen, abbot of Laubus and A.D. 903, bishop of Liège; Hubald, or Hucbald, a French monk who flourished under Charles the Bald A.D. 916; Gerard, deacon of the cloister of St. Medard A.D. 932; Fridgodus, a monk of Canterbury, A.D. 960; and Adso, abbot of Montier en Der in France, A.D. 980. Most of the others were popes or bishops, who have left us only some epistles. Such were John X. pope A.D. 915—928;—Agapatus II. pope A.D. 946—956;—John XII. pope A.D. 956—963;—John XIII. pope A.D. 965—972;—Pilgrim or Peregrine, archbishop of Lorch, A.D. 971—992;—Benedict VI. pope A.D. 972—974;—Benedict VII. pope A.D. 975—984;—John XV. pope A.D. 986—996; and Gregory V. pope A.D. 996—999. To these classes of writers may be subjoined the two following individuals.

Roswitha or Roswitha, a learned and devout nun of Gandersheim in Germany, who flourished about A.D. 980. She understood Greek as well as Latin, in which she wrote. Her compositions are all in verse, namely, a panegyric on Otto the Great, eight Martyrdoms of early saints, six sacred Comedies on various subjects, but chiefly in praise of the saints, and a poem on the establishment of her monastery. These were best edited by Schurzleisch, Wittemb. 1707, 4to. See Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. vol. xxi. p. 177, 256. [Respecting this "clarissima virgo," also called Hroswitha, see Vossius, Hist. Latin. cap. 41, tom. ii. p. 328; Pagi, Critica, &c. ad ann. 925; Leyserus, Hist. Poetar. Med. Ævi, p. 287-9. Fabricius, Bibl. Lat. tom. i. p. 719, and tom. iii. p. 322.—R.

Herier or Hariger, abbot of Laubus, A.D. 990—1007. He wrote a history of the bishops of Liège, a tract on the body and blood of Christ, and the lives of three saints.—Mur.

² That the Latin doctors of this century held different opinions respecting the manner in which the body and blood of Christ are present in the sacred Supper is very clearly attested: nor do learned men among the Roman Catholics, who follow truth rather than party feelings, disavow the fact. That the doctrine of transubstantiation was at this time unknown to the English, has been shown from their Public homilies, by Rapin, Hist. d'Angleterre, tome i. p. 463. Yet that this doctrine was then received by some of the French and German divines may be as easily demonstrated. [For a judicious account of the opinions of the Saxon English church concerning the eucharist, see Collier's Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain, vol. i. cent. x. p. 204, 266.—MacI.

2—4; and being advanced by many in this century it spread over all Europe, and excited great terror and alarm among the people. For they supposed St. John had explicitly foretold that after a thousand years from the birth of Christ, Satan would be let loose, Antichrist would appear and the end of the world would come. Hence immense numbers transferring their property to the churches and monasteries, left all and proceeded to Palestine, where they supposed Christ would descend from heaven to judge the world. Others by a solemn vow consecrating themselves and all they possessed to the churches, the monasteries, and the priests, served them in the character of slaves, performing the daily tasks assigned them; for they hoped the supreme Judge would be more favourable to them, if they made themselves servants to his servants. Hence also whenever an eclipse of the sun or moon occurred, most people betook themselves to caverns, rocks, and caves. Very many also gave a large part of their estates to God and the saints, that is, to the priests and monks. And in many places, edifices both sacred and secular were suffered to go to decay, and in some instances actually pulled down from the expectation that they would no longer be needed. This general delusion was opposed indeed by a few wiser individuals, yet nothing could overcome it till the century had closed. But when the century ended without any great calamity, the greater part began to understand that John had not really predicted what they so much feared.¹

¹ "And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil, and Satan, and bound him a thousand years," &c. They understood this text to refer to the times of the Christian dispensation. And as Satan was to be loosed after the thousand years, and as the vision proceeds immediately to describe the general judgment, they concluded the world would come to an end about A.D. 1000.—Mur.

² Almost all the donations of this century afford evidence of this general delusion in Europe. For the reason assigned for the gift is generally thus expressed: Appropinquante mundi termino, &c. [i. e. The end of the world being now at hand.] Of the many other proofs of the prevalence of this opinion (which was so profitable to the clergy), I will adduce only one striking passage from Abbo of Fleury, in his Apologeticum adversus Arnulphum, which Pitheous has subjoined to the Codex Canonum Ecclesie Romanæ, p. 401. "When a little boy (in the tenth century) I heard a public discourse delivered in the church of Paris concerning the end of the world; that immediately after the thousand years terminated, Antichrist would come, and not long after that the universal judgment would follow. This doctrine I resisted as far as I was able from the Gospels, the Apocalypse, and the book of Daniel. At last my abbot of blessed memory, Richard, very skillfully eradicated the inveterate error respecting the end of the world, after receiving the letter from the Lotharingians which I was to answer. For the rumour had filled nearly the whole world that when the Annunciation of Mary should fall on Saturday, then beyond all doubt the end of the world would take place."

4. The number of the acknowledged saints, i. e. of the purple-clad inmates of the heavenly court and ministers of state in the world above, was everywhere on the increase.³ For this age of unparalleled thoughtlessness and superstition required a host of patrons. Besides so great was the wickedness and madness of most people, that the reputation of being a saint was obtained without much effort. Whoever was by nature rather austere and of coarse manners, or exhibited a strong imagination, appeared amidst such a profligate multitude as one who had intimate converse with God. The Roman pontiff, who had previously begun to assume to himself the right of making new saints, gave the first specimen of the actual exercise of this power in this century; at least no example of an earlier date is extant. John XV. in the year 993, by a solemn act enrolled Udalrich, bishop of Augsburg, among those to whom Christians might lawfully address prayers and worship.⁴ Yet this act must not be understood to imply that from this time onward none but the Roman pontiff might enroll a saint.⁵ For there are examples which show that down to the twelfth century, the bishops of the higher rank and provincial councils without even consulting the pontiff, placed in the list of saints such as they deemed to be worthy of it.⁶ But in the twelfth century Alexander

³ Yet it should be remarked that before the year 994, prayers to the saints and to the Virgin Mary are not mentioned in the canons of the English churches. They are first enjoined in a collection of canons of this date, which is in Wilkin's Concilia, tom. i. p. 265. We read however in a circular Epistle of John XV. in the year 993: Sic adoramus et colimus reliquias martyrum et confessorum, ut cum [Christum], ejus martyres sunt, adoremus—si quis contradicat, Anathema. Harduin's Concilia, tom. vi. par. i. p. 726.—Schl.

⁴ Pagl, Breviar. Pontif. Roman. tom. ii. p. 259, &c.

⁵ This opinion was held by the friends of the Romish court; and in particular by Bonannus, Numismat. Pontif. Romanor. tom. i. p. 41, &c.

⁶ See the remarks of Pagl, Breviarium, tom. ii. p. 260, tom. iii. p. 30, and of Chapelle, Bibliothèque Angloise, tome x. p. 105, and Mabillon, Acta SS. Ord. Bened. Pref. ad Sæcul. v. p. 53. [The word canon in the middle ages denoted in general a register or a matriculation roll, and in a more limited sense a list of the saints; and to canonize a person who was to enroll his name in this book or register of the saints. In the earlier times none were recognised as saints except martyrs and confessors. But in the times of ignorance, the stupid people often selected and made for themselves saints who did not deserve the name. To remedy the evil it was ordained, that no one should be recognized as a saint till the bishop of the place, after investigation made, should declare him such. This was the practice in Europe from the seventh century onward. The popes canonized as well as others, but only in their own diocese. But at this time the chapter of Augsburg saw fit to request the pope to pronounce their bishop Ulrich a saint for all the churches. The bishop of Augsburg who succeeded Ulrich might have canonized this worthy man for the church of Augsburg; but in that case he would have been honoured only in his own diocese, and not throughout the whole church. The pope complied with the request without much inquiry.—Schl.

III. annulled this right of councils and bishops; and made canonization as it is called, to rank among the greater causes, or such as belong only to the pontifical court.

5. Of the labours of the theologians in sacred science and the different branches of it, little can be said. The holy scriptures no one explained in a manner which would place him high among even the lowest class of interpreters. For it is uncertain whether Olympiodorus and Eucumenius of Tricca belong to this century. Among the Latins, Remigius of Auxerre continued his exposition of the scriptures, which he commenced in the preceding century. He is very concise on the literal signification, but very copious and prolix on the mystical sense, which he prefers greatly to the literal meaning. Besides he exhibits not so much his own thoughts as those of others, deriving his explanations from the early interpreters. Odo's morals on Job are transcribed from the work of the same title by Gregory the Great. Those who were esteemed the best expositors of scripture in that age, may be learned from Notkerus Balbulus, who wrote a professed account of them.¹

6. Systematic theology had not a single writer, Greek or Latin. The Greeks were satisfied with Damascenus, and the Latins with Augustine and Gregory the Great, who were in that age regarded as the greatest of theologians. Yet some also read Bede, and Rabanus Maurus. Moral and practical theology received less attention than in almost any age. If we except some discourses which are extremely meagre and dry, and the lives of saints which were composed among the Greeks by Simeon Metaphrastes, and among the Latins by Hübald, Odo, Stephen of Liege, and others, without fidelity and in very bad taste, there remains nothing more in this century which can be placed under the head of practical theology. Nor do we find that any one sought distinction by polemic writings, or confutations of the enemies of truth.

7. The controversies between the Greeks and Latins, in consequence of the troubles and calamities of the times, were carried on with much less noise than before; but they were not wholly at rest.² And those certainly much distort the truth who maintain that this pernicious discord was healed, and that the Greeks for a time came over to the Latins;³ although it is true that the state of the times obliged them occasionally to form a truce, though a deceptive one. The Greeks contended violently among themselves respecting repeated marriages. The emperor Leo, surnamed the Wise or the Philosopher, having had no male issue by three successive wives, married a fourth born in humble condition, Zoe Carbinopina. As such marriages by the canon law of the Greeks were accounted incestuous, the patriarch Nicolaus excluded the emperor from the communion. The emperor indignant at this deprived Nicolaus of his office, and put Euthymius into his place, who admitted the emperor indeed to the communion, but resisted the law which the emperor wished to enact permitting fourth marriages. Hence a schism and great animosity arose among the clergy; some siding with Nicolaus and others with Euthymius. Leo died soon after, and Alexander having deposed Euthymius restored Nicolaus to his office; who now assailed the character of the deceased emperor with the severest maledictions and execrations, and defended his opinion of the unlawfulness of fourth marriages in the most contentious manner. To put an end to these commotions so dangerous to the Greeks, Constantine Porphyrogenitus, the son of Leo, assembled an ecclesiastical council at Constantinople in the year 920, which prohibited fourth marriages altogether, but allowed third marriages under certain restrictions. The publication of this law restored the public tranquillity.⁴ Some other small contests of similar importance arose among the Greeks, which indicate their want of discernment, their ignorance of true religion, and how much the opinions of the fathers prevented them from exercising their own reason.

CHAPTER IV.

HISTORY OF CEREMONIES AND RITES.

1. How great a load of rites and ceremonies oppressed and stifled religion in this century, appears abundantly from the acts of councils held in England, France, Germany, and Italy. The many new-made

¹ His book is entitled, De Interpretibus Divinarum Litterarum, and may be found in Pezius, Thesaur. Anecd. Novus, tom. i. par. i. p. 1. It was addressed to Solomon, afterwards bishop of Constance, whom it excited to the study not only of the biblical interpreters, but also of the ecclesiastical historians and the writers of biographies of the saints; so that it may be viewed as a guide to the best method of studying theology agreeably to the taste of those times.—Schl.

² Le Quien, Diss. i. Damascenica, de Processione

Spiritus S. sec. 13, p. 12. Spanhelm, De Perpetua Disensione Eccl. Orient. et Occident. par. iv. sec. 7, Opp. tom. ii. p. 529.

³ Leo Allatius, De Perpetua Consensione Eccl. Orient. et Occident. lib. ii. cap. vii. viii. p. 600, &c.

⁴ These facts are faithfully collected from Cedrenus, Leunclavius (de Jure Græco-Rom. tom. i. p. 104, &c.) Leo Grammaticus, Simeon Logothetes, and other writers of Byzantine history.

citizens of heaven almost daily enrolled in the calendar, required the institution of new festal days, new forms of worship, and new religious rites. And in inventing these, the priests though in everything else stupid and inefficient, were wonderfully ingenious. Some of their arrangements flowed from the erroneous opinions on sacred and secular subjects, which the barbarous nations had derived from their ancestors and incorporated with Christianity. Nor did the guides of the church oppose these customs; but supposed they had fulfilled all their duty, when they had either honoured with some Christian forms what was worthless and base in itself, or had assigned to it some far-fetched allegorical import. Several customs accounted sacred arose from the silly opinions of the multitude respecting God and the inhabitants of heaven. For they supposed God and those intimate with him above, to be affected in the same manner as earthly kings and their nobles, who are rendered propitious by gifts and presents, and are gratified with frequent salutations and external marks of respect.

2. Near the end of this century in the year 998, by the influence of Odilo, abbot of Cluny, the number of festal days among the Latins was augmented, by the addition of the annual celebration in memory of all departed souls. Before this time it had been the custom in many places, to offer prayers on certain days for the souls in purgatory; but these prayers were offered only for the friends and patrons of a particular religious order or society. Odilo's piety was not to be thus limited; he wished to extend this kindness to all the departed souls who were suffering in the invisible world.¹ The author of the suggestion was a Sicilian recluse or hermit, who caused it to be stated to Odilo that he had learned from a divine revelation, that the souls in purgatory might be released by the prayers of the monks of Cluny.² At first therefore this was only a private regulation of the society of Cluny; but a Roman pontiff—who he was is unknown—approved of the institution, and ordered it to be everywhere observed.

¹ See Mabillon, Acta Sancti. Ord. Bened. [tom viii.] or secul. vi. par. i. p. 584: where he gives the life of Odilo and his decree instituting this new festival. [The story of the hermit is differently related. One says the hermit stated that wandering near Mount Etna he overheard the souls burning in that volcano relate the benefits they received from the prayers of Odilo. Another represents the hermit as saying simply, it was divinely revealed to him. One likewise represents the hermit as stating that all the souls in purgatory enjoyed respite, two days each week, namely Mondays and Tuesdays. Another says he represented that several souls had been released entirely from purgatory by his prayers. And another that many souls might be released, &c. See Mabillon, ubi supra, p. 666, 701 (ed. Paris, 1701) and Fleury, Hist. de l'Eglise, livr. lix. sec. 57. All agree that the hermit made his representation to a French monk, then on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and made him acquaint Odilo with it, which was accordingly done.—Mur.

² The pontiff Benedict XIV. or Prosper Lambertini,

3. The worship of the Virgin Mary which previously had been extravagant, was in this century carried much farther than before. Not to mention other things less certain, I observe first that near the close of this century the custom became prevalent among the Latins, of celebrating masses and abstaining from flesh on Saturdays in honour of St. Mary. In the next place, the daily office of St. Mary which the Latins call the lesser office was introduced, and it was afterwards confirmed by Urban II. in the council of Clermont. Lastly, pretty distinct traces of the Rosary and Crown of St. Mary, as they are called, or of praying according to a numerical arrangement, are to be found in this century. For they who tell us that St. Dominic invented the Rosary in the thirteenth century, do not bring satisfactory proof of their opinion.³ The Rosary consisted of fifteen repetitions of the Lord's prayer, and one hundred and fifty salutations of St. Mary; and what the Latins called the Crown of St. Mary consisted of six or seven repetitions of the Lord's prayer and sixty or seventy salutations, according to the age ascribed by different authors to the holy virgin.

CHAPTER V.

HISTORY OF HERESIES.

1. THE amazing stupidity of the age which was the source of so many evils, had this one advantage, that it rendered the church tranquil and undisturbed by new sects and discords. The Nestorians and Monophysites began to experience more hardships under the Arabians than formerly; and they are said to have repeatedly suffered the greatest violence. But as many of them gained the good will of the great, by their skill in medicine or by their abilities as stewards and men of business, the persecutions which occasionally broke out were in a measure suppressed.⁴

2. The Manichæans or Paulicians, of in his treatise De Festis Jesu Christi, Mariae, et Sanctorum, lib. iii. cap. 22, Opp. tom. x. p. 671, very wisely observes silence respecting this obscure and disreputable origin of that anniversary; and thus shows us what he thought of it. In this work of Benedict XIV. are many specimens of the author's discernment.

³ This is formally demonstrated by Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. Pref. ad secul. v. p. lviii. &c.

⁴ Some Nestorians were private secretaries of the Kalipha; and the Nestorian patriarch had such influence with the Kalipha, that the Jacobite and Greek bishops living among the Arabians were obliged in whom mention has been made before, became considerably numerous in Thrace under the emperor John Tzimiskes. As early as the eighth century Constantine Copronymus had removed a large portion of this sect to this province, that they might no longer disturb the tranquillity of the East; yet they still remained very numerous in Syria and the neighbouring countries. Theodorus therefore the bishop of Antioch, for the safety of his own flock did not cease importuning the emperor, until he ordered a new colony of Manichæans to be transplanted to Philippopolis.¹ From Thrace the sect removed into Bulgaria and Slavonia, in which countries they afterwards had a supreme pontiff of their sect; and they continued their residence there down to the time of the council of Basil or to the fifteenth century. From Bulgaria they migrated to Italy, and spreading thence into other countries of Europe, they gave much trouble to the Roman pontiffs.²

3. At the close of this century a plebeian of the name of Leuthard, in the village of Virtus near Chalons, attempted some innovations in religion; and in a short time drew a large share of the vulgar after him. He would allow of no images, for he is said to have broken the image of our Saviour. He maintained that tithes ought not to be given to the priests, and said that in the prophecies of the Old Testament, some things were true and some false. He pretended to be inspired; but bishop Gebwin drove the man to extremities, and at last he threw himself into a well.³ I suppose the disciples of this man, who doubtless taught many other things besides what are stated above, joined themselves with those who in France were afterwards called Albigenes, and who are said to have leaned to the views of the Manichæans.

4. Some remains of the Arians still existed in certain parts of Italy, and especially in the region about Padua.⁴ Ratherius, bishop of Verona, had a controversy with the Anthropomorphites from the year 939 onwards. For in the neighbourhood of Vicenza there were many persons, not only among the laity but the clergy, who supposed that God possesses a human form, and sits upon a golden throne in the manner of kings; and that his ministers or angels are winged men clothed in white robes.⁵ These erroneous conceptions will not surprise us if we reflect that the people, who were extremely ignorant on all subjects and especially on religion, saw God and the angels so represented everywhere in the paintings which adorned the churches. Still more irrational was the superstition of those assailed by the same Ratherius, who were led, I know not how, to believe that much and wished to be regarded as a great teacher. But in his discourses there was nothing solid and no truth. He said that the things taught by the prophets were to be believed only in part, and that the rest was useless. He declared that it was of no use to a man to pay his tithes. Fame now proclaimed him to be a man of God, and no small part of the vulgar went after him. But Gebwin, the venerable and wise bishop of Chalons, summoned the man before him and interrogated him respecting all the things reported of him. He began to dissemble and conceal the poison of his wickedness, and quoted portions of the Scriptures which he had never studied. The sagacious bishop now convinced the blockhead of falsehood and madness, and in part reclaimed the people whom he had seduced. The wretched Leutard, finding his reputation ruined among the people, drowned himself in a well. —Mur.

their difficulties to put themselves under his protection. See Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Clem. Vatic. tom. iv. p. 96—100. —Schl.

¹ Zonaras, Annal. lib. xvii. p. 209, ed. Paris; p. 164, ed. Venice.

² And as has been already observed perhaps some remains of the sect still exist in Bulgaria.

³ An account of these transactions is given by Glaber Radulphus, Hist. lib. ii. cap. xl. [Fleury, Hist. de l'Eglise, livr. lviii. sec. 19, thus relates the whole story on the authority of Glaber. Near the close of the year 1000, a plebeian of the name of Leutard in the village of Virtus and diocese of Chalons, pretended to be a prophet and deceived many. Being at a certain time in the fields and fatigued with labour, he laid himself down to sleep; when a great swarm of bees seemed to enter the lower part of his body, and to pass out of his mouth with a great buzzing. They next began to sting him severely, and after tormenting him awhile they spoke to him and commanded him to do some things which were beyond human power. He returned home exhausted, and with a view to obey the divine admonition dismissed his wife. Then proceeding to the church as if for prayer, he entered it and seized and broke the image of the crucifix. The by-standers were amazed and supposed the man was deranged; but as they were simple rustics, he easily persuaded them that he had performed the deed under the direction of a supernatural and divine revelation. Leutard talked

⁴ It appears from Ugelli's Italia Sacra, tom. v. p. 429 of the new edition, that in the diocese of Peter, the bishop of Padua, who died A.D. 942, there were many Arians whom that bishop strenuously opposed. And in the same work, p. 433, it is stated that bishop Goslin or Gauslin, who filled the see from the year 964 till into the following century, completely exterminated this sect. —Schl.

⁵ Ratherius, Sermo i. De Quadragesima (in D'Ache-ry, Spicilegium, tom. i. p. 383) says:—"One of my people informed me three days ago of certain preb- yters in the diocese of Vicenza adjoining us, who think God is corporeal, because we read in the Scriptures that the eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous and his ears open, &c. This disturbed me not a little. But, horrible to tell! I found the same perverseness cleaving to members of my own flock; for addressing them in public and showing that God is a spirit, some of my own priests to my astonishment muttered and said.—'What now shall we do? Hitherto it seemed to us that we knew something about God, but now it appears that God is nothing at all since he has no head, no eyes, &c.' No, you were stupidly fabricating idols in your own hearts, and forgetting the immensity of God were picturing, as it were, some great king seated on a golden throne, and the host of angels around as being winged men clothed in white garments, such as you see painted on the church walls, &c." —Mur.

St. Michael says mass every Monday, before God in heaven, and who therefore resorted on those days to the churches which were dedicated to St. Michael.¹ It is probable that the priests who performed service in the temples devoted to St. Michael, instilled this most absurd notion as they did other errors into the minds of the vulgar, in order to gratify their own avaricious views.

¹ Ratherius, Epistola Synodica, in D'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. ii. p. 294, &c.; Sigbertus Gemblacensis, Chronol. ad ann. 535.

CENTURY ELEVENTH.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS OF THE CHURCH.

1. THE Hungarians, Danes, Poles, Russians, and other nations, who in the preceding century had received a kind of knowledge of the Christian religion, could not be brought universally in a short time, to prefer Christianity to the religions of their fathers. Therefore during the greatest part of this century their kings, with the teachers whom they drew around them, were occupied in gradually enlightening and converting these nations.¹ In Tartary² and the adjacent regions, the activity of the Nestorians continued daily to gain over more people to the side of Christianity. And such is the mass of testimony at the present day, that we cannot doubt but that bishops of the highest order or Metropolitans, with many inferior bishops subject to them, were established at that period in the provinces of Cashgar, Nuacheta, Turkestan, Genda, Tangut, and others.³ Whence it will be manifest that there was a vast multitude of Christians in the eleventh and twelfth centuries in these countries, which are now either devoted to Mohammedism or worshippers of imaginary gods. And that all these Christians followed the Nestorian creed and were subject to the supreme pontiff of the Nestorians residing in Chaldaea, is so certain as to be beyond all controversy.

2. For the conversion of the European nations who still lived enveloped in superstition and barbarism, as the Slavonians, the Obotriti, the Wends, the Prussians, &c. some pious and good men laboured indeed, but with either very little or no success. Near the close of the preceding century Adalbert, bishop of Prague, visited the ferocious nation of the Prussians, with a view to instruct them in the knowledge of Christianity; and the result was that he was murdered in the year 996 by Siggon, a pagan priest.⁴ The king of Poland, Boleslaus Chrobry, avenged the death of Adalbert by a severe war, and laboured to accomplish by arms and penalties what Adalbert could not effect by arguments.⁵ Yet there were not wanting some who seconded the king's violent measures by admonitions, instructions, and persuasions. In the first place, we are told that one Boniface of illustrious birth and a disciple of St. Romuald, and afterwards one Bruno with eighteen companions, went from Germany into Prussia as Christian missionaries.⁶

¹ Marco Paulo the Venetian, De Regionibus Orientalibus, lib. i. cap. xxxviii. xl. xlv. xlvii. xlviii. xlix. lxii. lxiii. lxiv.; lib. ii. cap. xxxix.; Renaudot, Anciennes Relations des Indes et de la Chine, p. 320; Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vatic. tom. iii. par. ii. p. 502, &c. The history of this propagation of Christianity by the Nestorians in China, Tartary, and other adjacent countries which was so successful, richly deserves to be more thoroughly explored and set forth to the world, by some man well acquainted with oriental history. But the task would be on various accounts very difficult of execution. It was attempted by an excellent man, Theoph. Sigfr. Bayer, who was furnished with a large number of documents for the purpose both printed and manuscript. But the premature death of this learned man intercepted his labours.

² See the Acta Sanctor. ad diem 23 Aprilis, p. 174, &c. [and Mabillon, Acta Sanct. Ord. Bened. tom. vii. p. 846, &c.—Mur.]

³ Solignac, Hist. de Pologne, tome i. p. 133.

⁴ Bruno and Boniface were in fact one and the same person; the first being his original and proper name, and the other his assumed name; for the monks were then accustomed to take assumed names. See Dittmar, lib. vi. p. 82. Chronicon Quedlinburg. and Sigbertus Gemblacensis. ad ann. 1009. The annalist Saxo on this year says expressly: "Sanctus Bruno qui et Bonifacius, Archiepiscopus gentium, primum Canonicus S. Mauricii in Magdaburg, xvi. Kal. Mart. martyr inclytus cœlos petiit." He was of the highest rank of Saxon nobility, a near relative of the emperor Otho III. and beloved by him. Bruno served for a time at the imperial chapel. But in the year 997 he preferred a monastic life; and connected himself with St. Romuald, whom he accompanied first to Monte Cassino and then to Ferra near Ravenna. He obtained permission from the pope to preach to the pagans; and therefore received ordination as an archbishop. He preached to pagans till the twelfth year, and was then killed near

¹ For an account of the Poles and Russians, see the life of St. Romuald, in the Acta Sanctor. tom. ii. Februar. p. 113, 114; and for the Hungarians, p. 117.

² The word Tartary is here used in its broadest sense; for I am not insensible that the Tartars, properly so called, are widely different from the Tangutians, Calmucs, Mongols, and other tribes.

But all these were put to death by the Prussians; nor could the valour of Boleslaus or of the subsequent kings of Poland, bring this savage nation to abandon the religion of their ancestors.¹

3. The Saracens seized upon Sicily in the ninth century; nor could the Greeks or the Latins hitherto expel them from the country, though they made frequent attempts to do it. But in this century A.D. 1059, Robert Guiscard, the Norman duke of Apulia, with his brother Roger, under the authority of the Roman pontiff Nicolaus II. attacked them with great valour; nor did Roger relinquish the war till he had gained possession of the whole island and cleared it of the Saracens. After this great achievement in the year 1090 Roger restored the Christian religion, which had been almost extinguished there by the Saracens, to its former dignity; and established bishops, founded monasteries, erected magnificent churches, and put the clergy in possession of ample revenues and honours which they enjoy to the present time.² To this heroic man is traced the origin of what is called the Sicilian monarchy, or the supreme power in matters of religion, claimed by the kings of Sicily; for Urban II. is said to have created this Roger and his successors hereditary legates of the apostolic see, by a special diploma dated A.D. 1097. The Romish court contend that this diploma is a forgery; and hence even in our times those severe contests between the Roman pontiffs and the kings of Sicily, respecting the Sicilian monarchy. The posterity of Roger governed Sicily down to the twelfth century, at first under the title of dukes, and then under that of kings.³

4. From the time of Sylvester II. the Roman pontiffs had been meditating the extension of the limits of the church in Asia, and especially the expulsion of the Mohammedans from Palestine; but the troubles of Europe prevented the execution of their designs. Gregory VII. the most daring of all the pontiffs who ever filled the chair of St. Peter, being excited by the perpetual complaints of the Asiatic Chris-

¹ See Baronius, De Monarchia Siciliae, in his Annales, tom. xi.; and Du Pin, Traité de la Monarchie Sicilienne. [The famous bull of the monarchy of Sicily is supposed to have been granted at an interview of pope Urban II. with Roger duke of Sicily and Calabria, held at Salerno A.D. 1098. The pope had appointed Robert, bishop of Frant, his legate à latere in Sicily. But the bishop, no stranger to the authority claimed by such legates and to the disturbances they produced, entreated the pope to revoke the commission, plainly insinuating that he would suffer no legate in his dominions. As the duke had rendered signal services to the apostolic see, had driven the Saracens quite out of Sicily, and subjected all the churches of that island to the see of Rome though claimed by the patriarch of Constantinople, the pope not only recalled the commission he had given to the bishop, but to engage the duke still more in his favour, he conferred upon him all the power he had granted to his legate, declaring him, his heirs, and his successors, hereditary legates, and vested with the legatine power in its full extent. The bull is dated at Salerno, July, Indiction vii.; Urban's reign, xi. i.e. 1098. Here is some mistake, as the eleventh year of Urban coincided with the sixth year of the Indiction. And this error has been urged against the genuineness of the instrument by Baronius, who inserts it and endeavours to prove it a forgery, in the eleventh volume of his Annals. He also urges that the bull if genuine related only to Roger and his immediate descendants, that it was a family privilege given to reward the personal services of Roger. Though many learned men regard the bull as of very questionable origin, and especially as the Sicilian monarchs, when challenged to do it, have not produced the original writings, yet the kings of Aragon, to whom Sicily was long subject, claimed and exercised the legatine power as being the successors of Duke Roger. And they would not suffer the eleventh volume of Baronius' Annals to circulate in their dominions, on account of its elaborate confutation of their claims. The same power has been likewise claimed and sometimes exercised by all the princes who have been masters of that island, down to modern times. In the year 1715, Clement XI. having published two bulls, the one abolishing the monarchy, as it is called, and the other establishing a new plan of ecclesiastical government, the duke of Savoy, as sovereign of Sicily, banished all who received either of them out of the country. Some compromise has since taken place, but the supreme ecclesiastical power is still in the hands of the temporal sovereign of the country; that is, he is supreme head of the church there, has power to excommunicate and absolve all persons whatever, ecclesiastics as well as laymen, and cardinals themselves if resident in the island; he has a right to preside in all the provincial councils of the country, and to exercise all the jurisdiction of a legate à latere vested with the fullest legatine power. And this power the sovereign may exercise though a female, as in the instance of Jane of Aragon and Castile; and not only in his own person but also by a commissioner of his appointment. For the more convenient exercise of this power a commissioner, who is styled the Judge of the monarchy, is appointed by the king whose tribunal is the supreme ecclesiastical court for Sicily, Apulia, Calabria, Taranto, Malta, and the other islands. Yet from him lies an appeal to the royal audience. See Bower's Lives of the Popes, vol. v. p. 340; and Strucllin's Kirchl. Geographie, vol. i. p. 476, &c.—Mur.

the confines of the Prussians and Lithuanians [A.D. 1006]. The bodies of Bruno and his companions were purchased from the pagans by Boleslaus.—Schl. [See also Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. vol. viii. p. 79—81, and Fleury, Hist. de l'Eglise, livr. lviii. sec. 26.—Mur.

² Pagi, Critica in Baronium, tom. iv. ad ann. 1008, p. 97, &c. Hartknoch, History of the Prussian Church, written in German, book i. chap. i. p. 12, &c. [Some of the principal Poles also to whom Christianity was burdensome on account of the many times they had to pay to the clergy, relapsed again into idolatry. See Dugloss, Hist. Polon. ad ann. 1022. On the other hand, the Transylvanians were vanquished by the king of Hungary in the year 1002; and were brought to embrace Christianity, after their prince Geula, with his wife and children, was thrown into prison. And the same king undertook some successful campaigns against the Bulgarians and the Pagan Slavonians. See Theuroezius, in Chron. Hungar. cap. xxix. xxx.—Schl.

³ See Burligny, Hist. Générale de Sicile, tome i. p. 386, &c. [The character of this Roger is highly extolled by the historians of those times. Among other things he is extolled for his tolerant disposition in regard to religion. For when he conquered Sicily he allowed the Saracens, who chose to remain in the island, to live according to their own laws and to follow their own religion, so long as they should continue obedient subjects. See Muratori, Annal. Ital. ad ann. 1090.—Schl.

tians respecting the cruelty of the Mohammedans, wished to engage personally in a holy war, and more than fifty thousand men prepared themselves for an expedition under him.¹ But his controversy with the emperor Henry IV. of which we shall have occasion to speak hereafter, and other unexpected events, obliged him to abandon the design. But near the close of the century a certain Frenchman of Amiens, Peter surnamed the Hermit, was the occasion of the renewal of the design by Urban II. Peter visited Palestine in the year 1093, and there beheld with great anguish of mind the extreme oppressions and vexations which the Christians residing at the holy places suffered from the Mohammedans. Therefore being wrought up to an enthusiasm which he took to be a divine impulse, he first applied for aid to Simeon, the patriarch of Constantinople [within whose province Jerusalem lay], and to Urban II. the Roman pontiff, without success; and then began to travel over Europe, calling on both princes and people to make war upon the tyrants of Palestine. Nay, he carried about with him an epistle on this very subject, addressed from heaven to all Christians, and thereby calculated the more readily to impose upon the ignorant.²

5. Public sympathy being thus excited, Urban II. in the year 1095, assembled a very numerous council at Placentia, in which he first recommended this holy war.³ But the dangerous enterprise was relished only by a few, although the ambassadors of the Greek emperor, Alexius Comnenus were present, and in the name of their master represented the necessity of opposing the Turks whose power was daily increasing. The business succeeded better in the council of Clermont which was assembled soon after. For the French, more enterprising and ready to face dangers than the Italians, were so moved by the inflated eloquence of Urban, that a vast multitude of all ranks and ages were ready at once to engage in a military expedition to Palestine.⁴ This host seemed to be a very formidable army, and adequate to overcome almost any obstacles, but in reality it was very weak and pusillanimous. It was composed chiefly of monks, mechanics, farmers, persons tired of their stated occupations, spendthrifts, speculators, prostitutes, boys, girls, servants, malefactors, and the lowest dregs of the idle populace who hoped to make their fortune.⁵ From such troops what could be expected? Those attached to this camp were called Crusaders (cruciati), and the enterprise itself was called a Crusade (expeditio cruciata); not only because they professedly were going to rescue the cross of our Lord from the hands of its enemies, but also because they wore upon their right shoulders a white, red, or green cross made of woollen cloth, and solemnly consecrated.⁶

ann. 1095, No. 32, p. 648. [The number present at the council of Clermont is not definitely stated by the early writers, though they all agree that it was very great. There were thirteen archbishops, two hundred and fifty bishops, besides abbots and inferior clergy, with a multitude of laymen. The Acts of this council with two speeches of Urban are given by Harduin, Concilia, tom. vi. par. ii. p. 1718, &c.—Mur.]

⁵ These adventurers moreover were from every country in Europe, even the most remote. William of Malmesbury, while he bears testimony to this fact, gives a curious illustration of what were then supposed to be the national peculiarities of some of these less civilized people who abandoned their homes in numbers for the crusades:—"Nam non solum Mediterraneas provincias hic amor movit, sed et omnes, qui vel in penitissimis insulis, vel in nationibus barbaris, Christi nomen audierunt. Tunc Wallenses venationum saltuum, tunc Scottos familiaritatem pulcium, tunc Danos continuationem potum, tunc Noricos crudelitatem reliquit piscium." Will. Malmbr. lib. iv. cap. ii. apud Rerum Anglic. Script. post Bedam, Lond. 1896, fol. p. 75.—R.]

⁶ See Bazovius, Continuat. Annal. Baronii, tom. xv. ad ann. 1410, sec. 9, p. 32, &c. ed. Colon.; Lefant, Hist. du Concile de Pise, tome ii. livr. v. p. 60, &c. The writers who give account of the Crusades are enumerated by Fabricius, Lux Evangelii totti Orbis e-orien-, cap. xxx. p. 518. [Most of the original writers living in or near the times of the Crusades were collected by Bongarsius, in his Gesta Dei per Francos, Hanov. 1611, 2 vols. fol. Of these original writers the most important are Robert of Rheims, Baldric or Baudri of Dol, Raimond of Agle, Albert of Aix, Fulcher or Fulcard of Chartres, and Gilbert of Nogent; but especially William bishop of Tyre, and James de Vitry. To these may be added Marino Sanuto of the thirteenth century. The best moderns are said to be Maillay, Esprit des Croisades, ou Histoire politique et militaire des Guerres entreprises par les Chrétiens pour le recouvrement de la Terre sainte, Paris, 1780, 4 vols. 12mo; Malmburg, Hist. des Croisades, Paris, 1675, &c. 4 vols. 12mo; Mayer, Gesch. der Kreuzzüge, Berlin, 1780, 2 vols. 8vo; Wilkin, Gesch. der Kreuzz. Lips. 1807-17, 3 vols. 8vo; Waken, Gemälde der Kreuzz. Francf. 1808-10, 3 vols. 8vo; Hoeren, Versuch e. Entwicklung d. Folg. d. Kreuzz., a prize essay) Gotting. 1808, 8vo. The English reader may consult Gibbon's Decline and Fall, chap. lviii. lix.; Bower's Lives of the Popes, vol. v. and vi.; Mill's History of the Crusades.—Mur. [in 2 vols. 8vo, and an admirable sketch of the first crusade in the Encycl. Metrop. vol. xi. p. 584-613, with careful references to the original authorities. A preferable work to Maillay's Esprit des Croisades, is Michaud, Histoire des Croisades, Paris, 1841, 6th edit. 6 vols. 8vo, with maps; to which should be added his Bibliothèque des Croisades, Paris, 1829, 4 vols. 8vo.

¹ Gregory VII. Epistol. lib. ii. ep. 31, and in Harduin, Concilia, tom. vi. par. i. p. 1285.

² This fact is mentioned by the abbot Dodechinus in his Continuat. Chronici Mariani Scoti, in the Scriptor. Germanici, of Pistorius, tom. i. p. 462. For an account of Peter, see Du Fresno, Notæ ad Anna Comnenæ Alexiadem, p. 79, ed. Venet.

³ Berthold, a contemporary writer, says there were present in this council about four thousand clergymen and more than thirty thousand laymen, and that its sessions were held in the open air, because no church could contain the multitude. See Harduin, Concilia, tom. vi. par. ii. p. 1711, &c.—Mur.

⁴ Rulnart, Vita Urbani II. sec. 225, &c. p. 224, 229, 240, 273, 274, 292, 296, of the Opp. Postum. of Mabillon; and Rulnart, tom. iii.; Harduin's Concilia, tom. vi. par. ii. p. 1726; Baronius, Annales, tom. xl. ad

6. Eight hundred thousand persons therefore, as credible writers inform us, marched from Europe in the year 1096, pursuing different routes and conducted by different leaders, all of whom directed their way to Constantinople, that after receiving instructions and aid from Alexius Comnenus, the Greek emperor, they might pass over into Asia. The author of the war, Peter the Hermit, girded with a rope, first led on a band of eighty thousand through Hungary and Thrace. But this company, after committing innumerable base deeds, were nearly all destroyed by the Hungarians and Turks.¹ Nor did better fortune attend some other armies of these Crusaders, who roamed about like robbers under unskilful commanders, and plundered and laid waste the countries over which they travelled. Those bands whose leaders were men of noble birth and experienced in military affairs, performed the journey rather more prosperously. Godfrey of Bouillon, duke of Lorraine, a man who may be compared with the greatest heroes of any age² and who was commander-in-chief of the war, conducted with his brother Baldwin a well-organized body of eighty thousand horse and foot, through Germany and Hungary. Another body under the command of Raymond, earl of Toulouse, marched through Slavonia. Robert earl of Flanders, Robert duke of Normandy,³ and Hugo the Great, brother to Philip king of France, embarked with their forces at Brindisi and Tarento (Brundisium and Tarentum), and landed at Durazzo (Dyrrachium). These were followed by Boamund, duke of Apulia and Calabria, at the head of a numerous and select band of Normans.

7. This army, the greatest since the memory of men, when it arrived at Constantinople though greatly diminished by various calamities, excited much alarm and not without reason in the mind of the Greek emperor. But his fears were dispelled when it had passed the straits of Gallipolis and landed in Bithynia. The crusaders first besieged Nice, the capital of Bithynia, which was taken in the year 1097. They then proceeded through Asia Minor into Syria, and in the year 1098 took Antioch [in Syria], which was given with its territory to Boamund, duke of Apulia. They also captured Edessa, of which Baldwin, the brother of Godfrey of Bouillon, was constituted the sovereign. Finally in the year 1099, these Latins reduced the city of Jerusalem by their victorious arms. And here the seat of a new kingdom was established, and the above-named Godfrey was declared the first king of Jerusalem. He however refused the title of king from motives of modesty, and retaining a few soldiers with him, permitted the others to return back to Europe. But this great man died not long after and left his kingdom to his brother Baldwin, prince of Edessa, who did not hesitate to assume the title of king.

8. With the Roman pontiffs and particularly with Urban II. the principal motive for enkindling this holy war was furnished. I conceive, by the corrupted religion of that age. For according to the prevailing views, it was a reproach upon Christians to suffer the land which had been consecrated by the footsteps and the blood of Christ, to remain under the power of his enemies; and moreover a great and essential part of piety to God consisted in pilgrimages to the holy places, which were most hazardous undertakings so long as the Mohammedans should occupy Palestine. To these religious motives was added an apprehension that the Turks, who had already subdued a large part of the Greek empire, would march into Europe and would in particular assail Italy. Those among the learned who suppose that the Roman pontiff recommended this terrible war, for the sake of extending his own authority and of weakening the power of the Latin emperors and king, and that the kings and princes of Europe encouraged it, in order to get rid of their powerful and warlike vassals and to obtain possession of their lands and estates, bring forward indeed plausible conjectures, but they are mere conjectures.⁴ Yet afterwards when

There is also much additional information in Reinaud, Extraits des Auteurs Arab. relat. aux Croisades, Paris, 1829.—R.

¹ The army under Peter the Hermit vented their rage especially against the Jews, whom they either compelled to receive baptism or put to death with horrid cruelty. The same thing was done by another division in the countries along the Rhine, at Mentz, Cologne, Treves, Worms, and Spire, where however the Jews were sometimes protected by the bishops. See the Annalist. Saxo, ad ann. 1096, in Eccard's Corpus Hist. Mediæ ævi, tom. i. p. 579, &c.—Schl.

² Of this illustrious hero the Benedictine monks treat professedly, in the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome viii. p. 598, &c.

³ He was the eldest son of William the Conqueror, king of England.—Mur.

⁴ The first of these motives ascribed to the pontiffs is brought forward by many, both Protestants and Catholics, as one not at all to be questioned. See Accolitus, De Bello Sacro in Infideles, lib. i. p. 16. Basnage, Hist. des Eglises Réformées, tome i. period v. p. 235. Vertot, Hist. des Chevaliers de Malthe, tome i. livr. iii. p. 302, 308, livr. iv. p. 428. Baillet, Hist. des Demeurs du Boniface VIII. avec Philip le Bel, p. 76, Hist. du Droit Ecclési. François, tome i. p. 296, 299, and many others. But that this supposition has no solid foundation will be clear to those who consider all the circumstances. The Roman pontiffs could not certainly foresee that so many princes and people of every class the pontiffs as well as the kings and princes learned by experience the great advantages resulting to them from these wars, new and additional motives for encouraging them undoubtedly occurred to them, and particularly that of increasing their own power and aggrandisement.

9. But these wars, whether just or unjust,¹ produced immense evils of every would march away from Europe to Palestine; neither could they discover beforehand that these expeditions would be so beneficial to themselves. For all the advantages accruing to the pontiffs and to the clergy from these wars, both the extension of their authority and the increase of their wealth, were not apparent at once and at the commencement of the war; but they gradually developed themselves, being the result rather of accidental circumstances than of design. This single fact shows that the pontiffs who promoted these wars, could have had no thoughts of extending their power by them. It may be added that the general belief and the expectation of the pontiffs was, that the whole business would be accomplished in a single expedition of no long continuance; and that God himself would, by miraculous interposition, overthrow those enemies of Christianity who were the unjust possessors of Palestine. Besides, as soon as Jerusalem was taken, most of the European princes and soldiers returned back to Europe; which the popes surely would not have permitted, if from the continuance of this war they anticipated great accessions to their wealth and power. But no conjecture on this subject is, in my view, more unfortunate than that which supposes Urban II. to have eagerly pressed forward this holy war, in order to weaken the power of the emperor Henry IV. with whom he was in a violent contest respecting the investiture of bishops. The advocates of this conjecture forget that the first armies which marched against the Mohammedans of Asia, were raised chiefly among the Franks and Normans, and that the Germans, who were opposed to Urban II. were at first the most averse from these wars. Other arguments are omitted for the sake of brevity.—Nor is the other part of the conjecture which relates to the kings and princes of Europe, better founded. It has received the approbation of Vertot, (Hist. des Cheval. de Malthe, livr. III. p. 309) Boulainvilliers, and other great and eminent men who think they see farther than others into the policy of courts in those ages. But these excellent men have no other argument than this; many kings, especially of the Franks, were rendered more rich and powerful by the death and the misfortunes of those who engaged in these wars; and therefore they craftily gave not only permission, but also a direct encouragement to these wars. All can see the inconclusiveness of this reasoning. We are too prone to ascribe more sagacity and cunning both to the Roman pontiffs and to the kings and princes of those times than they really possessed; and we too often judge of the causes of transactions by their results, which is a defective and uncertain mode of reasoning. I apprehend that the Roman pontiffs, of whom alone I would speak, obtained their immense aggrandisement, not so much by shrewdly forming plans for enlarging their power, as by dexterously seizing the opportunities which occurred.

¹ The question of the justice of what are called the Crusades, I shall not take upon me to discuss; nor shall I deny that it is, when viewed impartially, an intricate and dubious question. But I wish the reader to be apprised that there was discussion among Christians as early as the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, respecting the justice and injustice of those holy wars. For the Cathari or the Albigenses and Waldenses denied their justice. The arguments they used are collected and refuted by Moneta, a Dominican writer of the thirteenth century, in his Summa contra Catharos et Waldenses, (which was published a few years ago at Rome by Richini,) lib. v. c. xlii. p. 531, &c. But the arguments of the Cathari against the transmarine expeditions (viam ultra-marinam) as they called these wars, had not great weight; nor were the sort, both in church and state; and their effects are visible even to the present day. Europe was deprived of more than half of its population, and immense sums of money were exported to foreign countries; and very many families previously opulent and powerful either became extinct or were reduced to extreme poverty. For the heads of families either mortgaged or sold their territories, possessions, and estates in order to defray the expense of their expedition;² while others imposed such intolerable burdens upon their vassals and tenants, as obliged them to abandon their houses and lands and assume the badge of the cross. A vast derangement of society and a subversion of everything took place throughout Europe; not to mention the murders, slaughter, and robberies everywhere committed with impunity by these soldiers of God and Jesus Christ, as they were called, and the new and often very grievous privileges and prerogatives to which these wars gave occasion.³ answers of the well-meaning Moneta very solid. An example will make this clear. The Cathari opposed the holy wars by urging the words of Paul, 1 Cor. x. 32. "Give none offence, neither to the Jews, nor to the gentiles, nor to the church of God." By the gentiles, they said, may be understood the Saracens. Therefore European Christians ought not to make war upon the Saracens lest they should give offence to the gentiles. The answer of Moneta to this singular argument we will give in his own words. "We read, Gen. xli. 7, that God said to Abraham: 'To thy seed will I give this land.' But we (the Christians of Europe) are the seed of Abraham, as says the Apostle to the Galat. iii. 29. 'To us therefore has that land been given for a possession. Hence, it is the duty of the civil power to labour to put us in possession of that land; and it is the duty of the church to exhort civil rulers to do their duty.'—A rare argument this, truly! But let us hear him out.—'The church does not intend to harm the Saracens or to kill them; nor have Christian princes any such design. And yet if they will stand in the way of the swords of the princes, they will be slain. The church of God therefore is without offence, that is, it injures no one in this matter, because it does no one any wrong but only defends its own rights.'—Who can deny that here is ingenuity?"

² Many and very memorable examples of this occur in ancient records. Robert duke of Normandy mortgaged to his brother William, king of England, the duchy of Normandy to enable him to perform his expedition to Palestine. See Matthew Paris, Hist. Major, lib. I. p. 24, &c. Odo, viscount of Bourges, sold his territory to the king of France. See the Gallia Christiana, by the Benedictines, tom. II. p. 45. For more examples see Du Fresnoy, Adnot. ad Joinvillii vitam Ludovici S. p. 52; Boulainvilliers, Sur l'Origine et les Droits de la Noblesse, in Molcts, Mém. de Littér. et de l'Hist. tome ix. par. I. p. 68; Cramer, De Juribus et Prærogatiis Nobilitatis, tom. I. p. 81, 409. From the time therefore of these wars very many estates of the nobility, in all parts of Europe, became the property of the kings and more powerful princes, of the priests and monks, or of private citizens of inferior rank.

³ Those who took the badge of Crusaders acquired extraordinary rights and privileges, which were injurious to other citizens. Of these the Jurists properly treat. I will only observe that hence it became customary, whenever a person would contract a loan, or buy, or sell, or enter into any civil compact, to require of him to renounce the privileges of a Crusader,

10. These wars were no less prejudicial to the church and to religion. The power and greatness of the Roman pontiffs were greatly advanced by them; and the wealth of the churches and monasteries was in many ways much augmented.¹ Moreover as bishops and abbots in great numbers forsook their charges and travelled into Asia, the priests and monks lived without restraint and addicted themselves freely to every vice. Superstition also, previously extravagant, now increased greatly among the Latins. For the long list of tutelary saints was enlarged with new and often fictitious saints of Greek and Syrian origin, before unknown to the Europeans;² and an immense number of relics generally of a ridiculous character, were imported to enrich our churches and chapels. For every one who returned home from Asia brought with him as the richest treasure, the sacred relics which he had purchased at a high price of the fraudulent Greeks and Syrians, and committed them to the careful charge of some church, or of the members of his own family.³

CHAPTER II.

ADVERSE EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

1. THE principal sufferings of the Christians in this century were from the Saracens or from the Turks, who were equally the enemies of both Saracens and Christians. The Saracens, though at war among themselves and at the same time unable to arrest the daily encroachments of the Turks upon them, persecuted their Christian subjects in a most cruel manner, putting some to death, mutilating others, and plundering others of all their property. The Turks not only pressed hard upon the Saracens, but also subjugated the fairest provinces of the Greek empire along the Euxine sea, and ravaged the remaining provinces with their perpetual incursions. Nor were the Greeks able to oppose their desolating progress, being miserably distracted with intestine discords, and so exhausted in their finances that they could neither raise forces nor support them when raised.

2. In Spain the Saracens seduced a large portion of the Christians by rewards, by marriages, and by compacts, to embrace whether already acquired or yet future (privilegio crucis sumptus ac sumenda renunciare.) See Le Beuf, Mém. sur l'Hist. d'Auxerre, Append. tome ii. p. 292.

¹ The accessions to the wealth and the power of the Roman pontiffs arising from these wars, were too numerous and various to be conveniently enumerated here with particularity. And not only the visible head of the church, but likewise the church universal augmented its power and resources by means of these wars. For they who assumed the cross, as they were about to place their lives in great jeopardy, acted as men do when about to die. They therefore generally made their wills; and in them they gave a part of their property to a church or monastery, in order to obtain the protection and favour of God. See Plessis, Hist. de Meaux, tome ii. p. 76, 79, 141; Gallia Christiana, tom. ii. p. 133, 139; Le Beuf, Mém. pour l'Hist. d'Auxerre, tome ii. Append. p. 31; Du Fresnoy, Adnot. ad vitam Ludovici Sancti, p. 52. Numerous examples of such pious donations are to be found in ancient records. Those who had controversies with priests or monks very commonly would abandon their cause or lawsuit, and yield up the property in controversy. Those who had themselves seized on the property of churches or convents, or were told that their ancestors had done some wrong to the priests, freely restored what they had taken, and often with additions, and compensated for the injuries done whether real or imaginary by their donations. See Du Fresnoy, ubi supra, p. 52. [In general the Crusades were a rich mine for the popes. Whoever became a knight of the cross became subject to the pope, and was no longer subject to the secular power of his temporal lord. Whoever had taken the vow to march to the holy land and afterwards wished to be released from it, could purchase an exemption from the pope who gave such dispensations, &c.—Schll.]

² The Roman Catholics themselves acknowledge that in the time of the crusades many saints, before unknown to the Latins, were brought from Greece and the East into Europe, where they were worshipped most religiously. And among these new spiritual guardians, there were some of whose lives and history there is the greatest reason to doubt. For example St. Catherine was introduced into Europe from Syria, as is admitted by Baronius, Ad Martyrol. Rom. p. 728, by Cassander, Scholia ad Hymnos Ecclesiæ, in his Opp. Paris, 1616, fol. p. 278, 779. Yet it is very doubtful whether this Catherine, the patroness of learned men, ever existed.

³ The sacred treasures of relics which the French, Germans, Britons, and other nations of Europe formerly preserved with such care, and which are still exhibited with reverence, are not more ancient than the times of the crusades, and were purchased at a great price by kings, princes, and other distinguished persons of the Greeks and Syrians. But that these avaricious and fraudulent dealers imposed upon the pious credulity of the Latins, the most candid judges will not doubt. Richard, king of England, in the year 1191 purchased from Saladin, the noted Mohammedan Sultan, all the relics at Jerusalem. See Matthew Paris, Hist. major, p. 138, who also tells us (p. 666) that the Dominicans brought from Palestine a white stone on which Christ had impressed the prints of his feet. The Genoese possess as a present from Baldwin, the second king of Jerusalem, the dish from which Christ ate the paschal lamb with his disciples at his last supper. And this singular monument of ancient devotion is ridiculed by Labat, Voyages en Espagne et en Italie, tome ii. p. 63. Respecting the great amount of relics brought from Palestine to France by St. Lewis the French king, see Joinville's Life of St. Lewis, edited by Du Fresnoy. Plessis, Hist. de l'Eglise de Meaux, tome i. p. 120. Lancelot, Mém. pour la Vie de l'Abbé de S. Cyran, tome ii. p. 175. Christ's pocket-handkerchief which is held sacred at Besançon was brought from Palestine to Berançon by a Christian Jewess. See Chiffet, Vestitium, par. ii. p. 108, and De linteis Christi sepulchralibus, cap. ix. p. 50. For other examples, see Matthæus, Analecta veteris Xvi, tom. ii. p. 677; Mabillon, Annales Benedict. tom. vi. p. 52, and especially Chiffet, Crisis historica de linteis Christi sepulchralibus, cap. ix. x. p. 50, &c. Among other things Chiffet says, p. 59: "Scilendum est, vigente immani et barbara Turcorum persecutione, et imminente Christianis religionis in Oriente naufragio,educta e sacralis et per Christianos quovis modo recondita Ecclesiarum pignora.—Hisc plane divinis opibus illicet præ aliis Galli, sacra Acipava qua vi, qua pretio a detinentibus hæc illac extorsorunt." And this learned writer brings many examples as proofs.

the Mohammedan faith.¹ And they would doubtless have gradually induced most of their subjects to apostatize from Christianity, had they not been weakened by the loss of various battles with the Christian kings of Aragon and Castile, especially with Ferdinand I. of Aragon, and by the conquest of a large part of the territories subject to them.² Among the Danes, Hungarians, and other nations, those who still adhered to their ancient superstitions (and there were many of this description among those people) very cruelly persecuted their fellow-citizens, as well as the neighbouring nations who professed Christianity. To suppress this cruelty the Christian princes in one place and another, made it a capital crime for their subjects to continue to worship the gods of their ancestors. And this severity was undoubtedly more efficacious for extinguishing the inveterate idolatry, than the instructions given by persons who did not understand the nature of Christianity, and who dishonoured its purity by their corrupt morals and their superstitious practices. The still unconverted European nations of this period, the Prussians, the Lithuanians, the Slavonians, the Obotriti, and others inhabiting the lower parts of Germany, continued to harass the neighbouring Christians with perpetual wars and incursions, and cruelly to destroy the lives of many.³

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

HISTORY OF LEARNING AND SCIENCE.

1. THE calamitous state of the Greek empire impeded the progress of literature and science among its subjects. The Turks as well as the Saracens were continually divesting the empire of some portion of its glory and power; and what they left inviolate, the civil discords, the frequent insurrections, and the violent dethronement of emperors, gradually wasted and destroyed. Yet there was here and there an individual who cherished and encouraged the liberal arts, both among the emperors (as Alexius Comnenus) and among the patriarchs and bishops. Nor would the controversies of the Greeks with the Latins, allow the former to despise all cultivation of the understanding and all love of learning. Owing to these causes, the Greeks of this century were not entirely destitute of men respectable for their learning and intellectual culture.

2. I omit the names of their poets, rhetoricians, and grammarians, who if not the best were at least tolerable. Among their historians Leo the Grammarian,⁴ John Scylitzes,⁵ Cedrenus,⁶ and some others, are not to be passed by in silence; although they adhered to the fabulous stories of their countrymen, and were not free from partiality. Michael Psellus, a man in high reputation, was a pattern of excellence in all the learning and science of his age. He also laboured to excite his countrymen to the study of philosophy, and particularly of the Aristotelian philosophy, which he attempted to explain and recommend by various productions.⁷ Among the Arabians the love of science still flourished, as

⁴ He was the continuator of Theophanes' Chronicle from A.D. 813 to 1013, the time when he is supposed to have written. His work was published Gr. and Lat. subjoined to Theophanes, ed. Combefis, Paris, 1655, fol. and in the Corpus Hist. Byzant. tom. vi. p. 355-404.—Mur.

⁵ John Scylitzes, a civilian and Curopalates at Constantinople. He wrote a History of Transactions in the East from A.D. 811 to 1057; and afterwards continued it to A.D. 1081. The whole was published in a Latin translation by Gabe, Venice, 1570, fol. and the latter part in Gr. by Goar, Paris, 1648, fol.—Mur.

⁶ George Cedrenus, a Greek monk, compiled a chronicle extending from the creation to A.D. 1057. It is a mere compilation or transcript from George Syncellus, prior to the reign of Diocletian, then from Theophanes to A.D. 813, and lastly from John Scylitzes to A.D. 1057. It was first published, Gr. and Lat. by Hylander, Basil, 1566, fol. and afterwards much better and with notes by Fabricius and Goar, Paris, 1647, fol.; also in the Corpus Hist. Byzant. tom. viii. p. 1-627.—Mur. [I may state here that a new edition of this great work of the French press, the Corpus Hist. Byzant. was commenced at Bonn in 1828, at the suggestion of Niebuhr, and that it is still in course of publication under the auspices of the Royal Academy of Berlin. I believe about 45 volumes have already appeared, though some disappointment has been felt at the manner in which some of the works have been edited. See Note 7. p. 396, below.—R.

⁷ See Leo Allatius, Diatriba de Psellis, p. 14, ed. Fabricius. [Michael Psellus, junior, was of noble birth, a senator at Constantinople, tutor to Michael Duca, afterwards emperor. He retired to a monastery about is manifest from those among them who in this century excelled in the sciences of medicine, astronomy, and mathematics.

¹ Hottinger, Hist. Eccl'es. sæcul. xi. sec. ii. p. 452; Geddes, History of the Expulsion of the Moriscos out of Spain, among his Miscellaneous Tracts, vol. i. p. 104, &c.

² These wars between the Christian kings of Spain and the Mohammedans or Moors, are described by the Spanish historians Mariana and Ferreras.

³ Helmold, Chron. Slavor. lib. i. cap. xv. p. 52, &c.; Adamus Bremensis, Hist. lib. ii. cap. xxvii. [Among these nations many persons had professed Christianity; but on account of the numberless taxes laid upon them particularly by the clergy, and the cruelty of the Christian magistrates, they returned to paganism again and then persecuted the Christians without mercy. See Helmold (lib. i. cap. xvi. xxv. xxv.) and Adam. Brem. (lib. ii. cap. xxiii.) particularly in regard to the Slavonians.—Schl.

3. In the West, learning revived in some measure among those devoted to a solitary life, or the monks and the priests. For other people, and especially the nobles and the great, despised learning and science, with the exception of those who devoted themselves to the church or aspired to sacred offices. In Italy, schools flourished here and there after the middle of this century, and a number of learned men acquired reputation as authors and instructors. Some of these afterwards removed to France and especially to Normandy, and there taught the youth devoted to the service of the church.² The French while they admit that they were indebted in a degree to learned men who came from Italy, produce also a respectable list of their own countrymen, who cultivated and advanced learning in this age; and they name numerous schools which were distinguished by the fame of their teachers and the multitude of their students.³ It is indeed unquestionable that the French paid great attention to letters and the arts, and that their country abounded in learned men, while the greatest part of Italy was still sunk in ignorance. For Robert king of France, the son of Hugh Capet and a pupil of Gerbert or Sylvester II. was himself a learned man, and a great patron of learning and learned men. His reign terminated in the year 1031, and his great zeal for the advancement of the arts and learning of every kind was not unsuccessful.⁴ The Normans from France, after they obtained possession of the lower provinces of Italy, Apulia, Calabria, and Sicily, diffused the light of science and literature over those countries. To the same people belongs the honour of restoring learning in England. For William the Conqueror, Duke of Normandy, a man of discernment and the great Mæcenas of his time, when he had conquered England in the year 1066, made commendable efforts by inviting learned men from Normandy and elsewhere, to banish from the country barbarism and ignorance, those fruitful sources of so many evils.⁵ For those heroic Normans, who had been so ferocious and hostile to all learning before they embraced Christianity, imbibed after their conversion a very high regard both for religion and for learning.

4. The thirst for knowledge which gradually spread among the more civilized nations of Europe, was attended by this consequence that more schools were opened and in various places better teachers were placed over them. Until the commencement of this century, the only schools in Europe were those attached to the monasteries and the cathedral churches; and the only teachers of secular as well as sacred learning were the Benedictine monks. But in the beginning of this century other priests and men of learning undertook the instruction of youth, in various cities of France and Italy; and they not only taught more branches of science than the monks but adopted a happier method of inculcating some of the branches previously taught. Among these new teachers those were the most distinguished who either studied in the schools of the Saracens in Spain, (which was a very common thing in this age with those who aspired after a superior education,) or at least read the books of the Arabians, many of which were translated into Latin. For such masters taught philosophy, mathematics, medicine, astronomy, and the kindred sciences, in a more learned and solid manner than they were taught by the monks, or by those trained in monastic schools. For the science of medicine, the school of Salerno in the kingdom of Naples was particularly famous in this century; and to this school, medical students resorted from most of the countries of Europe. But all the medical knowledge possessed by the teachers at Salerno, was derived from the schools of the Saracens in Spain and Africa, and from the medical works of the Arabs.⁶ From the same schools and books

A.D. 1077, and died not long after. He wrote a metrical paraphrase, and a prose commentary on the Canticles, on the Trinity and the person of Christ, tracts on a great variety of subjects, on the ecclesiastical canons, on the Quadrivium, &c. &c. Many of his pieces were never printed, and most of those published were published separately.—Mur.

¹ Elmacin, Hist. Saracen. p. 281; Hottinger, Hist. Eccles. ævcul. xi. p. 419, &c.

² See Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Medii Ævi, tom. iii. p. 871; Giannone, Histoire de Naples, tome ii. p. 148.

³ See the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome vii. Introduction, passim; Bulaeus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. i. p. 355, &c.; Le Beuf, Diss. sur l'état des Sciences en France, depuis la mort du roy Robert, &c. which is published among his Diss. sur l'Hist. Eccles. et Civile de Paris, tome ii. p. 1, &c. [Among their monastic schools that of Bee in Normandy taught by Lanfranc and Anselm was particularly celebrated; and among their episcopal schools were those of Rheims, Liege, Orleans, Tours, Angers, and Chartres.—Schl.]

⁴ See Daniel, Hist. de la France, tome iii. p. 53; Bulaeus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. i. p. 636, et passim.

⁵ See the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome viii. p. 171. "The English," says Matthew Paris, Hist. major, lib. i. p. 4, ed. Watts, "before the time of William were so illiterate, that one who understood grammar was looked upon with astonishment."

⁶ Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Medii Ævi, tom. iii. p. 935 &c.; Giannone, Hist. de Naples, tome ii. p. 151; Jo Friend, History of Physic from the time of Galen, Lond and at the same time, nearly all the nations of Europe derived those futile arts of predicting the fortunes of men by the stars, by the countenance, and by the appearance of the hands, which in the progress of time acquired such an extensive currency and influence.

5. In most of the schools the so-called seven liberal arts were taught. The pupil commenced with grammar, then proceeded to rhetoric, and afterwards to logic or dialectics. Having thus mastered the Trivium as it was called, those who aspired to greater attainments proceeded with slow steps through the Quadrivium,¹ to the honour of perfectly learned men. But this course of study adopted in all the schools of the west, was not a little changed after the middle of this century. For logic (which included metaphysics at least in part,) having been improved by the reflection and skill of certain close thinkers, and being taught more fully and acutely, acquired such an ascendancy in the minds of the majority that they neglected grammar, rhetoric, and the other sciences, both the elegant and the abstruse, and devoted their whole lives to dialectics or to logical and metaphysical discussions. For whoever was well acquainted with dialectics or what we call logic and metaphysics, was supposed to possess learning enough, and to lose nothing by being ignorant of all other branches of knowledge.²

1726, 8vo. And who does not know that the Schola Salernitana or rules for preserving health, was written in this century by the physicians of Salerno at the request of the king of England?

¹ See the Trivium and Quadrivium explained in Note 2, p. 178, above.—R.

² See the citations in Buleux, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. i. p. 408, 409, 511, 512. To show how true the vulgar maxim is that there is nothing new under the sun, I here subjoin a passage from the Metalepticum of John of Salisbury, a writer of no contemptible abilities, lib. i. cap. lii. p. 741, ed. Lugd. Bat. 1639, 8vo. "The poets and historians were held in contempt, and if any one studied the works of the ancients he was pointed at and ridiculed by everybody, as being more stupid than the ass of Arcadia and more senseless than lead or a stone. For every one devoted himself exclusively to his own discoveries or those of his master."—"Thus men became at once consummate philosophers; for the illiterate novice did not usually continue longer at school than the time it takes young birds to become fledged."—"But what were the things taught by these new doctors, who spent more sleeping hours than waking ones in the study of philosophy? Lo, all things became new, grammar was quite another thing, dialectics assumed a new form, rhetoric was held in contempt, and a new course for the whole Quadrivium was got up derived from the very sanctuary of philosophy, all former rules and principles being discarded. They talked only of suitableness (convenientia) and reason; proof! resounded from every mouth, and very inept! or crude and unphilosophical! To say or do anything suitably and rationally, was thought to be impossible, without the express statement of the suitableness and reason of it." The author says more on the same subject, for which see his work. [The latter part of the extract above, is very obscure in the origi-

Hence arose that contempt for the languages, for eloquence, and the other branches of polite learning, and that gross barbarism which prevailed for several centuries in the western schools, and which had a corrupting influence on theology as well as philosophy.

6. The philosophy of the Latins in this century was confined wholly to what they called dialectics; and the other branches of philosophy were unknown even by name.³ Moreover their dialectics were miserably dry and barren, so long as they were taught either from the work on the ten Categories falsely attributed to Augustine, or from the Introductions to Aristotle by Porphyry and Averroes.⁴ Yet in the former part of this century the schools had no other guide in this science; and the teachers had neither the courage nor the skill to expand and improve the precepts contained in these works. But after the middle of the century dialectics first assumed a new aspect in France. For some of the works of Aristotle being introduced into France from the schools of the Saracens in Spain, certain eminent men of genius, as Berengarius, Roscelin, Hildebert, and afterwards Gilbert of Porrée, Abelard, and others, following the guidance of Aristotle, laboured to extend and perfect the science.

7. None however obtained greater fame by their attempts to improve the science of dialectics and render it practically useful, than Lanfranc an Italian, who was promoted from the abbacy of St. Stephen in Caen to the archbishopric of Canterbury in England, Anselm whose last office was likewise archbishop of Canterbury, and Odo who became bishop of Cambray. The first of these men was so distinguished in this science that he was nal Latin, at least when thus deprived of light from the context. The translation here given is not offered with great confidence.—Nur.

³ In the writings of this age, we find mention indeed of many philosophers; e.g. Mancelod the philosopher, Adalard the philosopher, and many more. But it would mislead us to attribute to the term the meaning it had anciently among the Greeks and Romans, and which it now has. In the style of the middle ages a philosopher is a man of learning. And this title was given to the interpreters of Scripture, though ignorant of everything which is properly called philosophy. The Chronicon Salernitanum (in Muratori's Script. Rer. Italicar. tom. ii. par. ii. cap. ccxiv. p. 265) states that there were thirty-two philosophers at Benevento in the tenth century, at which time the light of science scarcely glimmered in Italy. But what follows this statement shows that the writer intended to designate grammarians, and persons having some knowledge of the liberal arts.

⁴ For an account of the philosophical system of this eminent Arabian, see Ritter, Geschichte der Christ. Philos. vol. iv. p. 115—160, in addition to the various sources of information referred to by Saxius in his Onomasticon Liter. vol. ii. p. 278.—R.

commonly called the dialectician; and he applied the principles of the science with much acuteness to the decision of the controversy with his rival, Berengarius, respecting the Lord's supper. The second, Anselm, in his dialogue De Grammatico, among other efforts to dispel the darkness of the dialectics of the age, investigated particularly the ideas of substance and of qualities or attributes.¹ The third, Odo, taught dialectics with great applause, and explained the science in three works De Sophista, De Complexibus, and De Re et Ente, which however are not now extant.² The same Anselm, who laboured to improve the science of dialectics, a man illustrious and renowned in many respects, was likewise the first among the Latins who rescued metaphysics and natural theology from obscurity and neglect; for he explained acutely what reason can teach us concerning God in two treatises which he entitled Monologion and Proslonion. He it was who invented what is commonly called the Cartesian argument, which aims to prove the existence of a God from the very conception of an all-perfect Nature implanted in the minds of men. The conclusiveness of this argument was assailed in this very century by the French monk Gaunilo, whom Anselm attempted to refute in a tract expressly on the subject.⁴

8. But the science of dialectics was scarcely matured, when a fierce contest broke out among its patrons respecting the subject matter of the science. This controversy was of little importance in itself and one that had long been agitated in the schools, but considered in its consequences it now became a great and momentous affair; for the parties applied their different theories to the explanation of religious doctrines, and they mutually charged each other with the most odious consequences. They were all agreed in this, that dialectics are occupied with the consideration and comparison of general ideas (rebus universalibus); because particular and individual things being liable to change, cannot become the subject matter of fixed and invariable science. But it was debated whether these general ideas with which the science of dialectics is concerned, are to be referred to the class of things, or to that of mere words or names. Some maintained that general ideas are things which have real existence; and they supported their opinion by the authority of Plato, Boethius, and others among the ancients. On the contrary others affirmed that these general ideas are nothing more than words or names; and these quoted the authority of Aristotle, Porphyry, and others. The former were called Realists and the latter Nominalists. Each of these parties became in process of time subdivided into various sects, according to the different ways in which they explained their favourite doctrine.⁵ This controversy filled all the schools in Europe for many centuries; and it produced frequently mortal combats among the theologians and the philosophers. Some learned men trace back its origin to the controversy with Berengarius respecting the Lord's supper;⁶ and although they have no authorities to adduce, the conjecture is very probable, because the opinion of the Nominalists might be used very conveniently in defending the doctrine of Berengarius respecting the Lord's supper.

9. The father of the Nominalist sect was one John, a Frenchman called the Sophist, of whom almost nothing is now known except the name.⁷ His principal disciples were Robert of Paris, Roscelin of Compeigne, and Arnulph of Laon; and from

⁵ There is a full account of the Nominalists and likewise of the dialectic controversy in Brückner's Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. iii. p. 904, &c. He also, as his custom is, mentions the other writers concerning this sect. Among these writers is John Salabert, a presbyter of Agen, whose Philosophia Nominalium Fidei was published at Paris, 1651, 8vo. None of those who have treated expressly of the Nominalists has made use of this very rare book. I have before me a manuscript copy transcribed from one in the library of the king of France; for the printed work was not to be obtained in that country. The acute Salabert however is at more pains to defend the philosophy of the Nominalists than to narrate its history. And yet he relates some facts which are generally little known.

⁶ Bulcrus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. i. p. 443. Du Bois, Hist. Eccles. Paris. tom. i. p. 770.

⁷ This is stated by the unknown author of the Fragmen-tum Hist. Franc. a Roberto Rege ad Mortem Philippi I. which is extant in Du Chesne's Scrip. Hist. Francie, tom. iv. p. 90. This writer says: In Dialectica hi potentes exultarent Sophistæ, Johannes, qui artem Sophisticam vocalem esse dissocuit, &c. Bulcrus, in his Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. i. p. 443 and 612, conjectures that this John was John of Chartres surnamed the Deaf, an eminent physician and first physician to Henry I. the king of France. And he tells us, p. 377, that John's instructor was Giraldus of Orleans, an extraordinary poet and rhetorician; but of this he brings no proof. Mabillon, in his Annales Benedictini, tom. v. lib. lxviii. sec. 78, p. 261, supposes him to be that John who made known to Anselm the error of Roscelin, concerning the three Persons in the Godhead.

¹ This dialogue is among his Works, published by Gerberon, tom. i. p. 143, &c.

² See Herimann, Narratio Restaurationis Abbatie S. Martini Tornac. in D'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. ii. p. 889, &c. of the new edition. "Odo, though well skilled in all the liberal arts, was particularly eminent in dialectics, and for this especially his school was frequented by the clergy."

³ In the Monologion a person is represented as meditating or reasoning with himself alone; in the Proslonion the same person is represented as addressing himself to God.—Mur.

⁴ Gaunilo's Tract against Anselm, as well as the answer to it, is to be found in Anselm's Opera, p. 35, 36.

these many others imbibed the doctrine. Perhaps also we may reckon among the disciples of John, that Raimbert who taught a school at Lisle in Flanders; for he is said to have read logic to his clergy in voce, whereas Odo of whom mention has been made, read it to his disciples in re.¹ But of all the Nominalists of this age no one acquired greater celebrity than Roscelin; whence he has been regarded, and is still regarded by many, as the founder of this sect.

CHAPTER II.

HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS AND OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH.

1. ALL the records of these times bear testimony to the vices of those who presided over the affairs of the church, and to the consequent prostration of discipline and of all religion. The western bishops when raised to the rank of dukes, counts, and nobles, and enriched with territories, towns, castles, and wealth of all sorts, became devoted to their pleasures and to magnificence, and hovered about courts attended by splendid retinues of servants.² At the same time the inferior clergy, few of whom exhibited any degree of virtue and integrity, gave themselves up without shame to frauds, debaucheries, and crimes of various descriptions. The Greeks practised a little more restraint; for the calamities of their country would not allow them to indulge themselves extravagantly. Yet the examples of virtue among them were few and rare.

2. The power and majesty of the Roman pontiffs attained their greatest height during this century, though it was by gradual advances and through great difficulties. They exercised indeed, at the commencement of this century, very great power in sacred and ecclesiastical affairs; for they were styled by most persons masters of the world, and popes, or universal fathers; they presided also everywhere in the councils by their legates; they performed the functions of arbiters in the controversies which arose respecting religious doctrines or discipline; and they defended with moderation the supposed rights of the church against the encroachments of kings and princes. Yet their authority had its limits, for sovereign princes on the one hand and bishops on the other made such resistance, that the court of Rome could not overthrow civil governments nor destroy the authority of councils.³ But from the time of Leo IX. especially [A.D. 1049], the pontiffs laboured by various arts to remove these limitations. With incessant efforts they strove to be acknowledged not only the sovereign legislators of the church, superior to all councils, the divinely constituted distributors of all the offices, and dispensers of all the property belonging to the church, but also — what was the extreme of arrogance — to be acknowledged as lords of the whole world and the judges of kings, or kings over all kings.⁴ These unrighteous designs were opposed by the emperors, by the kings of France, by William the Conqueror, duke of Normandy but now king of England, a most vigorous asserter of the rights of kings against the pontiffs,⁵ and by other sovereigns. Nor were the bishops wholly silent, especially those of France and Germany; but others of them succumbed being influenced either by superstition or by motives of interest. Thus although the pontiffs did not obtain all they wished for, yet they secured no small part of it.

³ A very remarkable summary of the ecclesiastical law of this century has been collected from the Epistles of Gregory VII. by Launoi, in his Assertio contra Prinegium S. Medardi, par. ii. cap. xxxi.; Opera, tom. iii. par. ii. p. 307. From this summary it appears that even this Gregory himself did not claim absolute power over the church.

⁴ Before Leo IX. there is no example of a Roman pontiff's assuming the power to transfer countries and provinces from their owners to other persons. But this pope generously gave to the Normans, then reigning in the south of Italy, both the provinces which they then occupied and also such as they might wrest from the Greeks and the Saracens. Malaterra, Hist. Siculæ, lib. i. cap. xiv. in Muratori's Script. Ital. tom. v. p. 553.

⁵ See Eadmer, Hist. Novorum, lib. i. p. 29, &c. subjoined to Anselm, Opera. And yet this very William who so openly and vigorously resisted the extension of pontifical and episcopal power, is himself a proof that the kings of Europe, when the desire of extending or confirming their power demanded it, did imprudently feed the lust of dominion which reigned in the breasts of the pontiffs. For when he was preparing to invade England, he sent ambassadors to the pontiff, Alexander II. "in order" (as Matthew Paris says, Hist. Major, lib. i. p. 2) "that the enterprise might be sanctioned by Apostolic authority. And the pope, after considering the claims of both the parties, sent a standard to William as the omen of kingly power." And the Normans, I can suppose, did the same thing; humbly requesting Leo IX. to confer on them the territories which they now occupied and those they might afterwards seize. What wonder then that the pontiffs should claim dominion over the whole world, when kings and princes themselves suggested to them this very thing?

¹ Herlmann, Hist. Restauracionis Abbatii S. Martini Tornac. in D'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. ii. p. 889.

² See the examples of Adalbert (in Adam. Brem. lib. iii. cap. xxiii. p. 38; lib. iv. cap. xxxv. p. 52) of Gunther (in Canisius, l.c. Antiq. tom. iii. par. i. p. 185), of Manasses (in Mabillon, Museum Italic. tom. i. p. 114), and those collected by Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Medii Ævi, tom. vi. p. 72, &c. [Among the servants of bishops in these times we meet with the ordinary officers of courts. In Harzheim's Concilia German. tom. iii. p. 17, &c. we read: "The duke of Brabant — is carroer to the bp. of Utrecht. The count of Guelders — his hunter. The count of Holland is styled and is the bp. of Utrecht's marshal. The count of Cleves is the bishop's chamberlain. Count de Bentheim is the bishop's janitor. Lord de Cucke is the bishop's butler. Lord de Choer is the bishop's standard-bearer." — Schl.

3. Those who presided over the Latin church from the death of Sylvester II. in the year 1003 till A.D. 1012, namely, John XVII. John XVIII. and Sergius IV. neither did nor suffered anything great or remarkable. It is beyond a doubt however that they were elevated to the chair, with the approbation and by the authority of the emperors. Benedict VIII. who was created pontiff in 1012, being driven from Rome by one Gregory his competitor, implored the aid of the emperor, Henry II. called the Saint;¹ was restored by him and reigned peacefully till the year 1024. Under his reign the celebrated Normans, who afterwards acquired so much fame, first came into Italy and subdued its southern parts. Benedict was succeeded by his brother, John XIX. who presided over the church till A.D. 1033. These five pontiffs appear to have sustained respectable moral characters.² But very different from them, yea, a most flagitious man and capable of every crime was their successor Benedict IX. The Roman citizens therefore in the year 1038 hurled him from St. Peter's chair, but he was restored soon after by the emperor Conrad. As he continued however in his base conduct, the Romans again expelled him in the year 1044, and gave the government of the church to John, bishop of Sabina, who assumed the name of Sylvester III. After three months, Benedict forcibly recovered his power by the victorious arms of his relatives and adherents, and Sylvester was obliged to flee. But soon after finding it impossible to appease the resentments of the Romans, he sold the pontificate to John Gratian, archpresbyter of Rome, who took the name of Gregory VI. Thus the church now had two heads, Sylvester and Gregory. The emperor, Henry III. terminated the discord; for in the council of Sutri A.D. 1046, he caused Benedict, Gregory, and Sylvester, to be all declared unworthy of the pontificate; and he placed over the Romish church Suidger, bishop of Bamberg, who assumed the pontifical name of Clement II.³

4. On the death of Clement II. A.D. 1047, Benedict IX. who had been twice before divested of the pontificate, seized the third time upon that dignity. But the year following he was obliged to yield to Damasus II. or Poppo, bishop of Brixen, whom the emperor Henry III. had created pontiff in Germany and sent into Italy. Damasus dying after a very short reign of twenty-three days, Henry III. at the diet of Worms in the year 1048 elevated Bruno, bishop of Toul, to the throne of St. Peter. This pontiff bears the name of Leo IX. in the papal catalogue, and on account of his private virtues and his public acts has been enrolled among the Saints. Yet if we except his zeal for augmenting the wealth and power of the church of Rome and for correcting some more flagrant vices of the clergy, by the councils which he held in Italy, France, and Germany, we shall find nothing in his character or life to entitle him to such honour. At least many of those who on other occasions are ready to palliate the faults of the Roman pontiffs, censure freely the last acts of his reign. For in the year 1053 he rashly made war upon the Normans, whose dominion in Apulia near his estates excited his apprehensions. And the consequence was that he became their prisoner, and was carried to Benevento. Here his misfortunes so preyed upon his spirits that he fell sick; but after a year's captivity he was set at liberty, conducted to Rome, and there died on the 19th of April A.D. 1054.⁴

5. Leo IX. was succeeded in the year 1055 by Gerhard, bishop of Eichstadt, who assumed the name of Victor II.⁵ and he was followed A.D. 1058 by Stephen IX.

¹ This statement, that Benedict was driven from Rome by Gregory and implored the succour of king Henry II. is given also by Baronius, ad. ann. 1012, sec. 6. and by Pagl. Breviar. Pontif. Vita Bened. viii. sec. 2. But it is founded on a misinterpretation of Dittmar's Chronicon, lib. iv. near the end, p. 339. Dittmar says: "Papa Benedictus Gregorio cuidam in electione prevaluit. Ob hoc ite (not Benedict, for he had the superiority, but Gregory) ad nativitatem Domini ad regem in Palatii (Palais) venit cum omni apparatu apostolico, expulsionem suam omnibus lamentando innotescens."—See Muratori, ad. ann. 1012, and the (German) translator's notes there.—Schil. [But it is not so certain that Gregory was the suitor to king Henry. If he lost his election how could he appear before the king in the pontifical habiliments, never having been pope? But suppose Benedict, after "prevailing in the election," and being put in possession of the papacy, to have been vanquished and "expelled" from Rome by his antagonist, he might well flee to the king in the habiliments and might there plead that he had prevailed in the election, and complain of his expulsion. Besides it is certain that it was Benedict who crowned king Henry as emperor, upon his first arrival at Rome, Feb. 1014. It is therefore supposed that the people of Rome finding Benedict to be supported by the king, restored him of their own accord. See Schroech's Kirchengesch. vol. xxii. p. 322, &c.—Mur.

² Yet Benedict was rescued from purgatory by the prayers of St. Odilo, and John obtained the papacy by base means;—according to Baronius, ad. ann. 1012, sec. 1—4.—Mur.

³ In this account of the pontiffs I have followed the best historians, Anton. and Fran. Pagl. Papebroch, and Muratori in his Annales Italiae, disregarding what Baronius and others allege in defence of Gregory VI.

⁴ See the Acta Sanctorum, ad d. 19 Aprilis, tom. iii. p. 642, &c.; Hist. Littér. de la France, tome vii. p. 459; Giannone, Hist. de Naples, tome ii. p. 52 [lib. ix. cap. lii.]—Mur.

⁵ Leo of Ostia states that Hildebrand, a subdeacon of the Romish church, was sent by the clergy and people of Rome to the emperor in Germany requesting permission to elect, in the name of the Romans, whom he should deem most fit to be pope; and the request being granted, Hildebrand selected this bishop of Eichstadt.

brother to Godfrey, duke of Lorrain. Neither of these, so far as is now known, performed anything worthy of notice. Greater celebrity was obtained by Nicolaus II. who was previously bishop of Florence, and was raised to the pontificate in 1058.¹ For John, Bishop of Veletri, who, with the appellation of Benedict X. has been inserted between Stephen IX. and Nicolaus II. does not deserve to be reckoned among the popes; because after nine months he was compelled to renounce the office which a faction at Rome had induced him to usurp. In a council at Rome which he assembled in the year 1059, Nicolaus sanctioned, among other regulations calculated to remedy the inveterate evils in the church, a new mode of electing the Roman pontiffs, which was intended to put an end to the tumults and civil wars which so often took place at Rome and in Italy, and divided the people into factions when a new head of the church was to be appointed. He also in due form created Robert Guiscard, a Norman, duke of Apulia, Calabria, and Sicily, on the condition that he would be a faithful vassal of the Romish church and would pay an annual tribute. By what right Nicolaus could do this does not appear; for he was not lord of those territories which he thus gave to the Normans.² Perhaps he relied upon the fictitious donation of Constantine the Great; or perhaps with Hildebrand, the Romish archdeacon who afterwards became supreme pontiff under the title of Gregory VII. he believed that the whole world belonged to the bishop of Rome as Christ's vicegerent; for it is well known that this Hildebrand guided him in all his measures. This was the commencement of the Neapolitan kingdom or that of the two Sicilies, which still exists, and of that right of sovereignty over this kingdom which the Roman pontiffs assert and the Neapolitan kings recognise from year to year.

6. Before the reign of Nicolaus II. the Roman pontiffs were elected, not by the suffrages of the cardinals but by those of the whole Roman clergy; nor by theirs alone, for men of military rank, that is, the nobles and also the citizens, and in a word all the people of Rome, gave their voice. Among such a mixed and heterogeneous multitude, it was unavoidable that there should be parties, cabals, and contests. Nicolaus therefore ordered that the cardinals, bishops, and cardinal-presbyters, should elect the pontiff, yet without infringing the established rights of the Roman emperors in this important business. At the same time he did not exclude the rest of the clergy, nor the citizens and people, from all part in the election; for he required that the assent of all these should be asked and obtained.³ From this time onwards, the cardinals always acted the principal part in the choice of a new pontiff; and yet for a long time they were much impeded in their functions both by the priests and the Roman citizens, who either laid claim to their ancient rights or abused the power given to them of approving the election. These alterations were at length terminated in the following century by Alexander III. who was so fortunate as to perfect what was begun by Nicolaus, and to transfer the whole power of creating a pontiff to the college of cardinals.⁴

7. From this period therefore the august college of Romish cardinals, and that high authority which they possess even to this day both in the election of the pontiffs and in other matters, must be dated. By the title cardinals, Nicolaus understood the seven bishops in the immediate vicinity of Rome or the suffragans of the bishop of Rome, of whom the bishop of Ostia was chief, and who were thence called cardinal bishops; together with the twenty-eight ministers of the parishes in Rome or chief presbyters of the churches, who were called cardinal clerks or presbyters. To these in process of time others were added first by Alexander II. and then by other pontiffs; partly to satisfy those who complained that they were unjustly excluded from a share in the election of pontiffs, and partly for other reasons. Therefore although the exalted order of purpled dignitaries in the

But this story is very improbable; and it is more likely that Hermanus Contractus was better acquainted with the facts, who states (ad ann. 1054) that the emperor held a council at Mentz in which Victor II. was elected. It is also worthy of notice that this pope and his predecessors continued to hold their former bishoprics when elevated to the papal throne. See Muratori, Annales, ad ann. 1055.—Schl.

¹ Besides the common historians of the pontiffs, the Benedictine Monks have treated particularly of Nicolaus II. in their Hist. Littér. de la France, tome viii. p. 516.

² See Muratori, Annales, tom. vi. p. 186. Baronius, Annales, ad ann. 1050.

³ The decree of Nicolaus respecting the election of Roman pontiffs is found in the collections of the Councils, and in many other works. But the copies of it, as I have learned by comparing them, differ exceedingly; some being longer and others shorter, some favouring the imperial prerogative more, and some less. The most extended form of it is found in the Chronicon Farfense, published in Muratori, Script. Rer. Italicar. tom. ii. par. ii. p. 645. Very different from this is the form exhibited by Hugo of Fleury in his book De Regni Potestate et Sacerdotali Dignitate, in Baluze, Miscellanea, tom. iv. p. 62. Yet all the copies universally agree in the points we have stated.

⁴ See Mabillon, Comment. in Ord. Roman. tom. ii. of his Museum Italicum, p. cxiv.; Cenni, Pref. ad Concilium Lateran. Stephani III. p. xviii. Rom. 1735 4to; Pagl, Breviar. Pontif. Romanor. tom. ii. p. 374

Romish church denominated cardinals had its commencement in this century, yet it did not acquire the settled character and the form of a real college before the time of Alexander III. in the next century.¹

¹ Concerning the cardinals, their name, origin, and rights, very many persons have written treatises; and these are enumerated by Fabricius, in his Bibliogr. Antiq. p. 455, 456, by Sagittarius, Introductio ad Hist. Eccles. cap. xxix. p. 771; and in Schmidt's Supplement, p. 644; by Gryphius, Tagoge ad Hist. Sacculi xvii. p. 430. To these I add Thomas-in's, Disciplina Eccl. sic ut. et nota, tom. i. lib. ii. cap. cxv. cxvi. p. 616; and Muratori, whose Diss. de Origine Cardinalatus is in his Antiq. Ital. Medi. Evi, tom. v. p. 156.—Among these writers are many who are both copious and learned; but I am not certain that any one of them is so lucid and precise as he should be in respect to the grand points of inquiry, the origin and nature of the office. Many expend much time and labour in ascertaining the import of the word, and tracing its use in ancient authors; which is not unsuitable indeed for a philologist, but is of little use to give us clear views of the college and dignity of cardinals. It is certain that the word cardinal, whether used of things or persons or as the appellation of a certain clerical order, was of dubious import, being used in various senses by the writers of the middle ages. We also know that this title anciently was not peculiar to the priests and ministers of the church of Rome, but was common to nearly all the churches of the Latins; nor was it applied only to what are called secular clergymen, but likewise to regular ones as abbots, canons, and monks, though with some difference in signification. But after the time of Alexander III. the common use of the word was gradually laid aside, and it became the exclusive and honorary title of those who had the right of electing the pontiffs. When we undertake to investigate the origin of the college of cardinals at Rome, the inquiry is not who were they that were anciently distinguished from the other clergy by the title of cardinals, both among the Latins generally and at Rome in particular; nor is the object to ascertain the original import and the propriety of the term, or in how many different senses it was used; but the sole inquiry is whom did Nicolaus II. understand by the appellation cardinals, when he gave to the cardinals of Rome the sole power of electing the pontiffs, excluding the other clergy, the knights, the citizens, and the people at large. If this can be ascertained, the origin of the college of cardinals will be seen; and it will likewise appear how far the modern cardinals differ from those who first held the office. Now the answer to this inquiry in my view is manifest from the edict of Nicolaus itself. "We ordain," says the pontiff (according to Hugo of Fleury in Baluze, Miscellanea, tom. iv. p. 62), "that on the demise of a pontiff of this universal Roman church, the cardinal bishops in the first place hold a solemn consultation among themselves, and then forthwith advise with the cardinal clerks; and so let the rest of the clergy and the people give their assent to the new election." The pontiff here very obviously divides the cardinals who are to elect a pope into two classes, cardinal bishops and cardinal clerks. The former beyond all controversy were the seven bishops of the city and its dependent territory, the comprovinciales Episcopi, as Nicolaus afterwards calls them, borrowing a phrase from Leo I. [These seven bishops were those of Ostia (Ostiensis), of Porto (Portuensis), of Albano (Albanensis), of St. Rufina or Silva Candida, of Frascati (Tusulanus), of Palestrina (Praenestinus), and of La Sabina (Sabinensis).—Mur.] These seven bishops long before this period bore the title of cardinal bishops. And the pontiff himself puts this construction beyond all doubt, by indicating that he understood the cardinal bishops to be those to whom belonged the consecration of a pontiff after his election: "Because the apostolic see can have no metropolitan over it," (to whom in that case would belong the principal part in the ordination) "the cardinal bishops undoubtedly supply the place of a metropolitan; for they it is who raise the pontiff elect to the summit of his apostolic elevation." And that it was the custom for those seven bishops above named to consecrate the Roman pontiffs, is a

8. Notwithstanding Nicolaus II. had forbidden any infringement on the right of the emperor to ratify the election of a pontiff, yet on the death of Nicolaus in 1061,

fact known to all men. Nicolaus would have these cardinal bishops therefore first to hold a consultation by themselves and discuss the merits of the candidates for the high office of pontiff. Immediately after they were to call in the cardinal clerks, and with them as forming one body of electors they were to choose a pontiff. Clerk here is the same as presbyter. And all admit that the cardinal presbyters were the ministers who had charge of the twenty-eight parishes or principal churches in Rome. All the remaining clergy of Rome, of whatever rank or dignity, Nicolaus excludes expressly from the office of electors of the pontiffs. And yet he would have "the clergy and the people give their assent to the new election;" that is, he leaves them what is called a negative voice or the right of approving the election. It is therefore clear that the college of electors of the Roman pontiffs, who were afterwards denominated cardinals in a new and peculiar sense of the word, as this college was at first constituted by Nicolaus, embraced only two orders of persons, namely, cardinal bishops and cardinal clerks or presbyters. And of course we are not to follow Ouyphr. Ravinius (cited by Mabillon, Comment. in Ordinum Roman. in his Museum Italicum, tom. ii. p. cxv.) who undoubtedly errs when he says that Alexander III. added the cardinal bishops to the college of cardinals. And they also are to be disregarded who suppose there were cardinal deacons in the electoral college from the beginning. There were indeed then, and there had long been, as there are at the present day, cardinal deacons at Rome, that is, superintendents of the diakonice or churches from whose revenues the poor are supported and to which hospitals are annexed. But Nicolaus committed the business of electing the pontiffs solely to such cardinals as were bishops and clerks, so that he excluded deacons. And hence in the diploma of the election of Gregory VII. the cardinals are plainly distinguished from deacons. But this decree of Nicolaus could not acquire at all the force of a fixed law. "It is evident," says Anselm of Lucca (Lib. ii. contra Wibertum Antipapam, et ejus sequaces, in Canisius, Lect. Antiq. tom. iii. par. i. p. 383), "It is evident that the above-mentioned decree," (of Nicolaus, for of that he is speaking) "is of no importance, nor did it ever have any force. And by saying this I do not injure Pope Nicolaus of blessed memory, nor derogate at all from his honour.—Being a man he could not be secured against doing wrong." Anselm is speaking especially of that part of the decree which secures to the emperors the right of confirming the elections of pontiffs; but what he says is true of the whole decree. For those who were excluded by it from this most important transaction, namely, first the seven palatine judges as they were called, that is, the Prinicerius, Secundicerius, Arcarius, Succellarius, Protoscrinarius, Prinicerius Defensorum, and the Administrador; next, the higher clergy who filled the more important offices, and also the inferior clergy, priests, deacons, &c. and lastly, the knights, citizens, and common people, complained that injury was done them; and they raised commotions and gave trouble to the cardinals whom Nicolaus had constituted (sole electors). Therefore to appease these tumults Alexander III. thought proper to extend and enlarge the college of those now called cardinals in the restricted sense. And he accordingly added to the list of cardinals certain priests of high rank, namely, the prior or arch-presbyter of the Lateran church, the arch-presbyters of St. Peter and St. Maria Maggiore, and the abbots of St. Paul and St. Laurence without the walls; and after these the seven palatine judges which have been mentioned. See Cenni, Pref. ad Concil. Lateran. Stephani III. p. xix.; Mabillon, Comment. ad Ord. Roman. ex Papieno, p. 115. By this artifice the higher clergy or those of superior rank, were vanquished and ceased to disturb the elections of the cardinals. For the heads of this body of clergy being admitted into the electoral college, the rest could neither effect nor attempt anything. The inferior clergy still remained. But they were reduced to silence in the same way; for their leaders, the cardinal dea-

the Romans at the instigation of Hildebrand, then archdeacon and afterwards pontiff of Rome, proceeded without consulting Henry IV. not only to elect, but to consecrate Anselm the bishop of Lucca who assumed the name of Alexander II. When the news of this reached Agnes, the mother of Henry, through the bishops of Lombardy, she assembled a council at Basle; and to maintain the majesty and authority of her son then a minor, she there had Cadolaua, bishop of Parma, appointed pontiff, who took the name of Honorius II. Hence a long and severe contest arose between the two pontiffs, in which Alexander indeed prevailed, but he could never bring Cadolaua to abdicate the papacy.¹

9. This contest was a trifle compared with those direful conflicts which Alexander's successor, Gregory VII. whose former name was Hildebrand, produced and kept up to the end of his life. He was a Tuscan of obscure parentage, first a monk of Cluny, then archdeacon of the church of Rome, and all along from the reign of Leo IX. he had governed the pontiffs by his counsels and influence; when in the year 1073 and during the very obsequies of Alexander, he was hailed pontiff by the united suffrages indeed of the Romans, but contrary to the mode of proceeding enjoined by the decree of Nicolaus. When the election was laid before Henry IV. king of the Romans, by the ambassadors from Rome, he gave it his approbation; but greatly to his own injury and to the detriment both of the church and the public.² For Hildebrand being elevated to the chair of St. Peter,—a man of extraordinary abilities and competent to the greatest undertakings, intrepid, sagacious, and full of resources, but beyond measure proud, pertinacious, impetuous, untractable, and destitute of true religious principle and piety,—he being elevated, I say, to the highest post in the Christian commonwealth, laboured during his whole life to enlarge the jurisdiction and augment the opulence of the see of Rome, to subject the whole church to the sole will and power of the pontiff, to exempt all clergymen and all church property wholly from the jurisdiction of kings and princes, and to render all kingdoms tributary to St. Peter. The extravagance of his views and the vastness of his plans are discoverable in those noted propositions, which from his name are called the Dictates of Hildebrand.³

of Gregory VII. are mentioned by Sagittarius, Introduct. ad Hist. Eccles. tom. i. p. 687, &c. and Schmidt, in his Suppl. tom. ii. p. 627, &c. But especially should be consulted the Acta Sanctorum tom. v. Mail, ad d. xxv. page 568, and Mabillon, Acta Sanctorum Ord. Bened. secul. vi. par. ii. p. 406, &c. Add Vita Gregorii VII. by Dithmar, Franck. 1710, 8vo. and all those who have written the history of the contest between the civil and the ecclesiastical powers, and of the controversy respecting investitures. [Also Hildebrand als Papst Gregor. VII. und sein Zeitalter, by Voigt, Weimar, 1815, 8vo.—Mur. [This work of Voigt has been translated into French by Jager, third ed. 1842, and also into Italian; for, though the work of a Protestant, it is very popular among the Romanists from the favourable view which it gives of Gregory's character and policy. A new and enlarged edition of it appeared at Weimar in 1816. The English reader may consult with advantage the careful and impartial review of the history of this remarkable pope by Hallam in his Middle Ages, vol. i. p. 539, &c. See also Bowden's Life and Pontificate of Gregory VII. Lond. 1840, 2 vols, 8vo, in defence of Gregory; and Waddington's Hist. of the Church, vol. ii. p. 59–90, for a fair and candid review of his policy and character; but particularly Gieseler, Lehrbuch, &c. the whole of sec. 47, Cunningham's transl. vol. ii. p. 156–179, for an accurate summary of Gregory's various measures and their result, with the important quotations and references in the notes. Millman recommends Stenzel, Geschichte Deutschlands unter den Fränk. Kaisern, Lelp. 1827. 2 vols. as containing much valuable information. Note on Gibbon's Decl. and Fall, vol. x. p. 288.—R.]

³ By the Dictates, or as some write it, the Dictate of Hildebrand, are to be understood twenty-six short propositions relating to the supreme power of the Roman pontiffs over the whole church and over states. These are found in the second book of the epistles of Gregory VII. inserted between the 55th and 56th epistles. See Harduin, Concilien, tom. vi. par. i. p. 1304, and nearly all the Ecclesiastical Historians, large or small. Baronius and Lupus, (whose full Commentary on these Dictates, which he considers most sacred, is among his Notes and Dissertations on the Councils, Opp. tom. v. p. 164,) and nearly all the patrons and friends of the Roman pontiffs maintain, that these Dictates were drawn up and ratified perhaps in some council by Gregory VII. himself; and therefore the protestants have not hesitated to ascribe them to Hildebrand. But the very learned French writers, Launoï (Epist. lib. vi. Ep. xlii. in his Opp. tom. v. par. ii. p. 309,) Natalis Alexander (Hist. Eccles. secul. xi. xlii. tom. vi. diss. iii. p. 719,) Antony and Francis Pagi (the former in his Critica in Baron. the latter in his Breviarium Pontific. Roman. tom. ii. p. 743,) Du Pin, and many others zealously contend that these propositions, cons or reginarii, were admitted into the electoral college; and after this the whole mass of deacons, sub-deacons, acolythists, &c. had to be quiet. But which of the pontiffs it was, whether Alexander III. or some other, who admitted the principal deacons at Rome to the rank of cardinals, I have not been able to ascertain. This however I am sure of, that it was done in order to pacify the inferior clergy, who were dissatisfied at the violation of their rights. When all the clergy, both the higher and the lower, were appeased, it was an easy matter to exclude the Roman people from the election of pontiffs. Hence on the death of Alexander III. when his successor, Victor III. [rather Lucius III.—Mur.] was to be chosen, the assent and approbation of neither the clergy nor the people were sought as had always been done before; but the college of cardinals alone, to the exclusion of the people, created the pontiff. And the same custom has continued down to the present age. Some tell us that Innocent II. [a. d. 1130] was chosen by the cardinals only, or without the voice of the clergy and people. See Pagi, Breviar. Pontific. Romanorum, tom. ii. p. 615. I grant it was so; but it is also true that this election of Innocent was irregular and disorderly, and therefore was no example of the ordinary practice at that time.

¹ Ughelli, Italia Sacra, tom. ii. p. 166; Mascovius, De Rebus sub Henrico IV. et F. lib. i. p. 7, &c.; Pagi, Breviar. Pontific. Romanorum, tom. ii. p. 385, &c.; Muratori, Annali d'Italia, tom. vi. p. 214, &c.

² The writers who describe the life and achievements

10. Nearly the whole form of the Latin church therefore was changed by this pontiff; and the most valuable rights of councils, of bishops, and of religious societies, were subverted and transferred to the Roman pontiff. The evil however was not equally grievous in all the countries of Europe; for in several of them, through the influence of different causes, some shadow of pristine liberty and prescriptive right was preserved. As Hildebrand introduced a new code of ecclesiastical law, he would have introduced also a new code of civil law, if he could have accomplished fully his designs. For he wished to reduce all kingdoms into fiefs of St. Peter, i.e. of the Roman pontiffs; and to subject all causes of kings and princes and the interests of the whole world to an assembly of bishops who should meet annually at Rome.¹ But neither he nor his successors could fully accomplish this arduous design, on account especially of the vigilance and firmness of the emperors, and of the kings of France and England.

called Dictates were palmed upon Hildebrand by some crafty flatterer of the Romish see. And to prove this they allege that although some of those sentences express very well the views of the pontiff, yet there are others among them which are clearly repugnant to his opinions as expressed in his epistles. The French have their reasons (which need not be here detailed) for not admitting that any pontiff ever spoke so arrogantly and loftily of his own power and authority. I can readily concede that so far as respects the form and arrangement of these Dictates, they are not the work of Gregory. For they are void of all order and connexion, and many of them also of clearness and perspicuity. But Gregory, who was a man of no ordinary genius, if he had attempted to draw up and describe what he conceived to be the prerogatives of the pontiffs, would have expressed with neatness and perspicuity what he had revolved in his own mind. But the matter of these Dictates is undoubtedly Hildebrand's; for the greater part of them are found, couched in nearly the same terms, here and there in his epistles. And those which seem to deviate from some assertions in his epistles, may without much difficulty be reconciled with them. It is probable therefore that some person collected these sentences out of his epistles, partly the printed ones and partly such as are lost or unknown, and perhaps likewise from his oral declarations; and then published them without judgment and without arrangement.—[The following are the principal propositions which compose these Dictates. I. That the Romish church was founded by our Lord alone. II. That the Roman pontiff alone is justly styled universal. III. That he alone can depose bishops and restore them. IV. That his legate has precedence of all bishops in a council, though he be of an inferior order, and can issue sentence of deposition against them. V. That the pope can depose absent persons. VI. That no person, among other things, may live under the same roof with one excommunicated by the pope. VII. That the pope alone is competent as occasion shall require to enact new laws, to gather new congregations, to divide rich bishoprics, and to unite poor ones. VIII. That he alone can use the imperial insignia. IX. That all princes should kiss his feet only. XII. That it is lawful for him to depose emperors. XVI. That no council without his order is to be accounted a general council. XVIII. That his sentence is not to be reviewed by any one, while he alone can review the decisions of all others. XIX. That he can be judged by no one. XX. That no one may presume to condemn a person who appeals to the apostolic see. XXI. That the greater causes of every church should be carried up to that see. XXII. That the Romish church never erred, nor will it, according to the scriptures, ever err. XXIV. That with his license subjects may impeach [their sovereigns]. XXVI. That no one is to be accounted a catholic who does not harmonize with the Romish church. XXVII. That he can absolve subjects from their allegiance to unrighteous rulers. See Harduin, Concilia, tom. vi. par. i. p. 1304, &c.—Mur.

¹ In confirmation of this most audacious design, proofs which are above all exception or doubt have been collected by learned men; and still more may be collected from the epistles of this pontiff and from other ancient monuments. In his Epist. lib. ix. ep. lii. p. 1481 (I use all along the edition of Harduin, Concilia, tom. vi. par. i.) he prescribes this form of an oath to be taken by future kings of the Romans or emperors:—"From this hour onward I will be faithful, with upright integrity, to the apostle Peter and to his vicar pope Gregory, and whatever the said Pope shall command me under the following form, by true obedience I will observe with fidelity. And on the day when I shall first see him, I will with my own hands make myself a vassal (miles) of St. Peter and him." What is this but a feudal oath (ligium) as the jurists call it, and a perfect vassalage (hominium)? That the pontiffs of Rome derived all their civil power from the kings of France is a fact well known. And yet Gregory contended that the kingdom of France was tributary to the church of Rome; and he directed his ambassadors to demand an annual contribution or tribute from the French. Lib. viii. ep. xxiii. p. 1476: "You must declare to all the Franks and command them by true obedience, that each family is to pay annually at least one denarius to St. Peter, if they recognise him as their father and shepherd according to ancient custom." It should be remembered that the phrase, by true obedience, here used, denotes, as those versed in antiquities well know, that the injunctions and commands to which it was annexed were to be inevitably obeyed. But in vain did Gregory lay this command upon the French; for he never obtained the least tribute from them. In the same epistle he vainly asserts that Saxony was a fief of the Romish church, or that Charlemagne had presented it to St. Peter. He insolently addresses Philip I. the king of France, in the following manner: (lib. vii. ep. xx. p. 1468: "Strive to the utmost to make St. Peter (i.e. the pontiff, St. Peter's vicar) your debtor; for in his hands are your kingdom and your soul, and he is able to bind and to loose you both in heaven and on earth." He endeavoured to instil the same principles into the Spaniards as into the French, lib. x. ep. vii.: "That the kingdom of Spain was from ancient times the property of St. Peter—and righteously belongs solely to the Apostolic see." But in lib. x. ep. xxvii. where he most earnestly inculcates the same doctrine upon the Spaniards, he has to acknowledge that the record of this important transaction was worn out and lost. Yet with the Spaniards he was rather more successful than with the French. For De Marca, in his Hist. de Bearn, livr. iv. p. 331, 332, proves from ancient documents that the king of Aragon, and Bernard, count of Besalva, promised and paid an annual tax to our Gregory. And it might be shown if there was room for it, that other Spanish princes did the same. William the Conqueror, a king of enlarged views and a most watchful guardian of his rights, when Gregory required him to pay St. Peter's pence and to render his kingdom a fief of St. Peter, replied with spirit: "Hubert your legate has admonished me to do fealty to you and your successors, and to be more careful to send the money which my predecessors were accustomed to remit to the Romish church. One of these I accede to, the other I do not. Fealty I have not done, nor will I do it. The money when there shall be opportunity shall be transmitted." The letter of king William is in Baluze, Miscellanea, tom. vi. p. 127. With this answer Gregory had to be contented, for though he might fear no other he stood in fear of William. To Geusa, king of Hungary, he writes, lib. ii. ep. lxx. p. 1316, thus: "It cannot be unknown we think to your prudence, that the kingdom of Hungary is the property of the apostle Peter." [He had before, lib. ii. ep. xiii. p. 1273, written to Solomon, king of Hungary,

11. Gregory was more successful in extending the territories of the Romish church in Italy, and enlarging the patrimony of St. Peter. For he persuaded Matilda, the daughter of Boniface the very opulent duke and marquis of Tuscany, who was a very powerful Italian princess and with whom he was on terms of peculiar intimacy, after the death of her first husband Godfrey the hump-backed, duke of Lorraine, and of her mother Beatrix in the year 1076 or 1077, to make the church of Rome heir to all her claiming that kingdom by virtue of an absolute surrender of it to the see of Rome made by king Stephen, and in consequence of an acknowledgment by the emperor Henry II. after conquering it that it belonged to St. Peter. And as Solomon had done homage for it to the king of the Teutones, Gregory now threatens him with the loss of his kingdom unless he shall acknowledge the Pope, and him only, to be his liege lord. — Mur.] He laboured most zealously to bring the more potent princes of Germany in particular under subjection or fealty to St. Peter. Hence in lib. ix. ep. iii. p. 1480, he strongly exhorts the bishop of Padua to persuade Guelph, duke of Bavaria, and the other German chiefs, by all the means in his power, to subject their territories to the see of St. Peter, lib. ix. ep. iii. p. 1480. "We would have you admonish Duke Guelph to do homage to St. Peter. For we wish to place him wholly in the bosom of St. Peter and to draw him in a special manner into his vassalage. If you shall find such a disposition in him or in other men of power influenced by love of St. Peter, labour to bring them to do fealty." He approaches Sucno, king of Denmark, lib. ii. ep. ii. p. 1300, with much flattery to persuade him "to commit with pious devotedness his kingdom to the prince of the Apostles, and obtain for it the support of his authority." Whether he was more successful in Denmark than in England and France, I know not; but in other places his efforts certainly were not fruitless. A son of Demetrius, king of the Russians (to whom he addressed the lxxiv. ep. book ii. p. 1319), came to Rome, "and wished to obtain the kingdom" (which he expected to inherit from his father) "by gift from St. Peter through the hands of Gregory, paying due fealty to St. Peter, the Prince of Apostles:" the import of which language will be quite intelligible from what has been said. Gregory granted his "devout prayer," being certainly not backward to perform such offices, and "in behalf of St. Peter committed the government of the kingdom" to the Russian prince. More such examples might be adduced. Demetrius, surnamed Suilmer, duke of Croatia and Dalmatia, was created a king by Gregory in the year 1076, and was solemnly inaugurated at Salona by the Pontiff's legate, on the condition that he should annually pay to St. Peter on Easter day a tribute of two hundred golden Byzantines [a Grecian golden coin, of from twenty-three to twenty-four carats. — Schl.] See Du Mont's Corpus Diplomaticum, tom. i. par. i. no. 84, p. 63; Lucius, De Regno Dalmatie, lib. ii. p. 85. Up to this time however the emperors of Constantinople held the sovereignty over the province of Croatia. Boleslaus II. king of Poland, having killed Stanislaus, bishop of Cracow, Gregory not only excommunicated him, but likewise deprived him of his crown; and not contented with this severity, by a special mandate he forbade the Polish bishops to crown any one king of Poland without first obtaining the consent of the Roman pontiff. Dlugoss, Hist. Polon. tom. i. p. 295. But I dissent. — If Gregory's success had equalled his wishes and his purpose, all Europe would at this day have been one great empire of St. Peter, or tributary to the Roman pontiffs; and all kings, feudal lords or vassals of St. Peter. But Gregory did not utterly fail in his attempts; for from this time onward the state of the whole of Europe was changed, and many of the rights and prerogatives of emperors and kings were either abridged or annulled. Among those annulled was the right of the emperor to ratify the election of a pontiff, which became extinct in Gregory and could never after be revived.

estates both in Italy and out of it. A second marriage of this very heroic and prosperous lady in the year 1089, with Guelph, the son of Guelph, duke of Bavaria, contracted with the consent of the Roman pontiff Urban II. seemed to prejudice this more than princely donation. But being repudiated by her husband in the year 1095 and thus again made free and independent, Matilda in the year 1102 formally renewed the gift.¹ The pontiffs indeed had to encounter severe contests, first with the emperor Henry V. and then with others, respecting this splendid inheritance, nor were they so fortunate at last as to secure the whole of it to St. Peter; yet after various struggles and hazards they succeeded in obtaining no small share of it, which they hold to this day.²

¹ The life and achievements of this extraordinary princess (than whom the Roman church had no stronger bulwark against the emperors, and Gregory VII. no more obedient daughter) are described by Luchin, Mellin, Contelorus, Julius de Putea, and especially by Florentin, in his Monuments of the Countess Matilda, written in Italian; and by Bachi in his Hist. Monasterii Podalironensis which was founded by her. The ancient biographies of her, one by Donizo and another anonymous, are given by Leibnitz, in his Script. Brunsvicens. tom. i. p. 629, &c.; and by Muratori, in his Script. Rerum Italicarum, tom. v. p. 335, &c. with notes, and also the formula of her second donation mentioned above. Well worth perusing also are the remarks concerning this woman of so masculine an understanding, which are found in the Origines Guelphicæ, tom. i. lib. iii. cap. v. p. 444, &c. and tom. ii. lib. vi. cap. iii. p. 303, &c. where also is an account of her second husband Guelph.

² Some distinguished men infer from the terms of the conveyance, that Matilda gave to the church of Rome only her allodial possessions, and not the territories which she held as fiefs of the empire; and of course that she did not include in the donation the marquise of Tuscany and the duchy of Spoleto. For she says: "Ego Matildis—dedi et obtuli ecclesie S. Petri—omnia bona mea jure proprietario, tamque tunc habueram, quam ea, que in antea acquiescitur eram, sive jure successione, sive alio quocunque jure ad me pertinent." See the Origines Guelphicæ, tom. i. lib. iii. p. 148, &c. But I doubt whether this is so clear that it must be admitted without hesitation. For the words jure proprietario, from which learned men conclude that Matilda gave to St. Peter only what she possessed jure proprietario, or her allodial possessions, manifestly refer, or I am greatly mistaken, not to the possession by the owner, but to the mode of the gift, and are to be construed with the verbs dedi and obtuli. The princess does not say, "I have given all the estates which I possess and hold jure proprietario," which had she said we must have acceded to the opinion of the learned gentlemen; but she says, "I have given all my estates to the church jure proprietario, i.e. it is my will that the church should possess all my estates, jure proprietario, as their real property. Besides the words which follow refute the construction of the learned gentlemen. Had Matilda intended to include only what she possessed, jure allodii, she could not have said as she does say, "whether belonging to me by right of inheritance or (alio quocunque jure) by any other right whatever." Certainly she excludes no species of possessions, but by using this very comprehensive language embraces all. Possibly some one however may object and say, The church of Rome never contended that the fiefs of the empire which Matilda possessed were included in this donation, and therefore they claimed only her allodial possessions. I am not sure that such was the fact; many reasons induce me to believe that the pontiffs wished to secure to their church all the estates of Matilda. But allow it to be so: as I cannot now go into the inquiry, that fact will not disprove what I contend for. Our inquiry is not how moderate were the Roman pontiffs in claiming the property bequeathed to them by Matilda, but what is the import of the words used in the bequest.

12. The design of Gregory VII. to raise the church above all human authority, and to render it perfectly free and independent, was obstructed especially by those two capital vices of the European clergy, concubinage and simony. The Roman pontiffs from the time of Stephen IX. had combated with zeal, but without much success on account of their inveteracy, these monstrous vices.¹ Gregory therefore in the second

¹ Monstrous vices we may justly call them; for, although no honest man will deny that in hunting down these vices, Gregory violated not only the principles of religion but also those of natural justice and equity, and committed deeds without number which were most incompatible with the character he professed to sustain, yet it must be acknowledged that evils of no slight magnitude resulted from both these vices of the clergy to the church and to civil society; and that it was necessary restraint should be laid upon them. Very many among the married clergy were pious and upright men, whom Gregory ought to have spared. But there were also in all parts of Europe a vast number, not only of priests and canons, but likewise of monks, implicated in illicit amours: who kept concubines under the name of wives which they dismissed at their pleasure, substituting others and often a plurality in their place; who basely squandered the property of the churches and colleges which they served, even dividing it among their spurious offspring, and committed other insufferable offences. How extensive the crime of simony had become in this century, and what pernicious effects it produced everywhere, will be manifest from those examples (not to mention innumerable others) which the Benedictine monks have interspersed in various parts of their Gallia Christiana. I will give a few specimens. In the first volume of this excellent work, Append. Docum. p. 5, we have the document by which Bernard, a viscount, and Froterius, a bishop, give or rather openly sell to Bernard Almar and to his son the bishopric of Alby, reserving to themselves a large part of its revenues. Immediately after follows a writing of Pontius, a count, in which he bequeaths to his wife this bishopric of Alby [and moieties of another bishopric and an abbey; the reversion of which at her death was to belong to his children]: "Ego Pontius dono tibi dilectæ sponse meæ episcopatum Albiensem—cum ipsa ecclesia et cum omni adjacentia sua—et medietatem de episcopatu Nemanso—et medietatem de Abbatia S. Agidii:—post obitum tuum remaneant ipsius alodis ad infantes qui de me erunt creati." Similar and even worse instances are stated, p. 24, 37, and elsewhere. In vol. ii. Append. Docum. p. 173, there is a letter of the clergy of Limoges, in which they humbly entreat William, count of Aquitaine, that he would not sell the bishopric [and to give them a pastor, not a devourer of the flock]: "Rogamus tuam pietatem, ne propter mundiale lucrum vendas S. Stephani locum; quia si tu vendas episcopalia, ipse nostra manducabit communia.—Mitte nobis ovium custodem, non devoratore[m]." In vol. ii. p. 179, Ademar, viscount of Limoges, laments that he "had heretofore simoniacally sold the charge of souls to abbots who purchased of him." In fact, it appears from authors and documents which are above all exception, that the licentiousness of this age in buying and selling sacred offices exceeded all bounds and almost all credibility. I will subjoin only one short extract from Abbo's Apologétique in Pithagor, Collect. Curon. Ecclesie Romanæ, p. 398, which is worthy of notice as containing the argument by which the traders in sacred offices attempted to justify their base conduct: "There seems to be almost nothing appertaining to the church which is not put upon sale; viz. bishoprics, presbyterships, deaconries, and the other lower orders, archdeaconries also, deaneries, superintendencies, treasurers' offices, baptisteries."—"And these traffickers are accustomed to offer the cunning excuse that they do not buy the blessing by which the grace of the Holy Spirit is conveyed, but the property of the church or the possessions of the bishop" [non se emere benedictionem, qua percipitur gratia Spiritus Sancti, sed res ecclesiarum, vel possessiones episcopali]. An acute distinction truly! [See also what Glaber Radulphus, lib. v. cap. v. says of the Italian churches in the middle of this century: "All ecclesiastical offices were at that time as much accounted things vendible as merchandise is in a common market."—Schl.]

year of his reign, or A.D. 1074, attacked them with increased energy and firmness; for in a council held at Rome he renewed all the laws of the former pontiffs against simony, severely forbidding the sale of ecclesiastical benefices; and enacted that no priests should henceforth marry, and that such as now had either wives or concubines should relinquish either them or their sacred office. After these enactments he wrote letters to all bishops, requiring them to obey these decrees on pain of incurring severe punishments, and also sent ambassadors into Germany to Henry IV. king of the Romans, demanding of him a council for trying the causes of those especially who were contaminated with simony.

13. Both these decrees appeared very proper, salutary, and accordant with the principles of the religion of the age; for it was then maintained that priests should be elected and that they ought to live single. Yet both gave rise to the most lamentable contentions and to very great calamities. When the decree respecting celibacy was promulgated, serious tumults were excited in most of the countries of Europe, by those priests who were connected with either lawful wives or concubines;² many of whom, surers' offices, baptisteries."—"And these traffickers are accustomed to offer the cunning excuse that they do not buy the blessing by which the grace of the Holy Spirit is conveyed, but the property of the church or the possessions of the bishop" [non se emere benedictionem, qua percipitur gratia Spiritus Sancti, sed res ecclesiarum, vel possessiones episcopali]. An acute distinction truly! [See also what Glaber Radulphus, lib. v. cap. v. says of the Italian churches in the middle of this century: "All ecclesiastical offices were at that time as much accounted things vendible as merchandise is in a common market."—Schl.]

² The histories of these times are full of the commotions excited by those priests who had either wives or concubines. For an account of the insurrections among the German priests, see Sigonius, De Regno Italia, lib. ix. tom. ii. p. 557; and Tengnagel's Collectio Veter. Monumentor. p. 45, 47, 54, &c. and the other writers of German history. [Two councils were held in Germany, one at Erfurth and the other at Mentz, in which the papal decree against the marriage of priests was made known. But in both, tumults were excited; and the adherents of the pope were in jeopardy of their lives, especially the abb. of Mentz and the papal legate the bp. of Chur. The German clergy said, "they would rather lose their priesthood than part with their wives. Let him who despises men see whence he can procure angels for the churches." See Trithemius in Chron. Hirsau. and Lambert of Aschaffenb. ad. ann. 1074.—The clergy of Passau when the papal prohibition was published said to their bp. Altmann, "That they neither could nor would abandon the custom which it was clear they had followed from ancient times under all preceding bishops." The French also declared in an assembly at Paris, that they would not suffer the pope's insupportable yoke to be laid upon them. See Mansi, Suppl. Concil. tom. ii. p. 5.—Schl.] Of the commotions in England William of Paris treats, Hist. Major. lib. i. p. 7. For those in the Netherlands and France, see the epistles of the clergy of Cambray to those of Bremen in behalf of their wives, in Mabillon's Annal. Benedict. tom. v. p. 634, and the epistle of the clergy of Noyon to those of Cam-

especially in the Italian province of Milan, were willing rather to relinquish the priesthood than to part with their wives; and accordingly they seceded from the church of Rome, and branded the pontiff and his adherents who condemned the marriage of priests with the odious appellation of Paterini, that is, Manichæans.¹ The impartial however, though they wished priests to lead single lives, blamed Gregory for two things: first, that he fell indiscriminately upon the virtuous and the profligate with equal severity, and dissolved the most honourable marriages, to the great disgrace, hazard, and grief of husbands, wives, and children;² and secondly, that he did not correct the married clergy with moderation and with ecclesiastical penalties only, but delivered them over to the civil magistrates to be prosecuted, deprived of their property, and subjected to indignities and sufferings of various kinds.³

14. This first conflict gradually subsided in process of time, through the firmness and perseverance of the pontiff; nor was there any one among the European sovereigns disposed to become the patron of clerical matrimony. But the conflict arising from the other law (that for the suppression of simony) was extremely difficult to be settled; and being protracted through many years, it involved both the church and the state in very great calamities and distress.⁴ Henry IV. received indeed the legates of the pontiff in a gracious manner, and he commended the pontiff's design of putting an end to bray, in Mabillon's Museum Italicum, tom. i. p. 128. How great a commotion this thing produced in Italy, and especially among the Milanese, is fully stated by Arnulph senior and Landulf, historians of Milan; extant with notes, in Muratori, Script. Rerum Italicarum, tom. iv. p. 36, &c. Each of these historians favours the marriage of priests, in opposition to Gregory and the pontiffs.

¹ Paterini was one of the names by which the Paulicians or Manichæans were designated in Italy (who are well known to have migrated from Bulgaria to Italy in this age), and who were the same as were also called Cathari. In process of time this became the common appellation of all heretics; as might easily be shown by many examples from writers of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Respecting the origin of the name there are many opinions, the most probable of which is that which derives it from a certain place called Pataria, where the heretics held their meetings. And a part of the city of Milan is still vulgarly called Pattaria, or Contrada de' Pattari. See the notes on Arnulphus Mediolan. in Muratori, Script. Rer. Italicarum, tom. iv. p. 39. Saxius ad Sigonum, De Regno Italie, lib. ix. Opp. Sigon. tom. ii. p. 536. An opinion has prevailed, perhaps originating from Sigonius, that this name was given at Milan to those priests who retained their wives contrary to the decrees of the pontiffs, and who seceded from the Roman church. But it appears from Arnulph and other ancient writers, that it was not the married priests who were called Paterini, but that these priests gave that appellation, by way of reproach, to such friends of the pontiffs as disapproved of the marriage of clergymen. See Arnulph, lib. iii. cap. x.; and the copious and learned proofs of this fact by Pagl, Critica in Annal. Baron. tom. iv. ad ann. 1058, sec. iii.; and Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Mediæ ævi, tom. v. p. 82. Nor need we look farther for the origin of this term of reproach. For the Manichæans and their brothers, the Paulicians, were opposed to marriage, which they considered as an institution of the evil demon; and therefore such as held the marriage of priests to be lawful and right, by applying the designation Paterini to the pontiffs and their adherents who prohibited such marriages, would represent them as following the opinions of the Manichæans.

² For there was a vast difference among those priests who were more attached to their women than to the decrees of the pontiffs; all of them being by no means equally censurable. The better sort of them, among whom those of Milan stood conspicuous, also those of the Netherlands and some others, only wished to live according to the laws of the Greek church; maintaining that it should be allowed to a priest before his ordination to marry one wife, a virgin, and no more. And they supported their opinions by the authority of Ambrose. See Puricellus, Diss. utrum S. Ambrosius Clero suo Mediolan. permisisset, ut Virgines semel nubere possent; republished in Muratori, Script. Rer. Italicarum, tom. iv. p. 223, &c. With this class of priests Gregory and the other Roman pontiffs ought, as some advocates of the pontiffs have themselves acknowledged, to have been more indulgent than to those who claimed the right of marrying many wives, and those who advocated concelnallage. The case of the monks also, whose vows bound them to perpetual celibacy, was very different from that of priests who were unwilling to be separated from their children and their lawful wives, whom they had espoused with upright intentions.

³ Theodorie de Verdun, Epistola ad Gregorium VII. in Martene's Thesaurus Anecdotorum, tom. i. p. 208. "They put me to the greatest confusion for this, that I should ever admit of a law for restraining the incontinence of the clergy, by the intertempore proceedings of laymen" (per licetum inamius).—"Nor must you suppose that persons of these sentiments, when they bring forward such vindications, wish to encourage incontinence in the clergy. They sincerely desire to see them lead blameless lives; but they wish to have only the restraints of ecclesiastical terror, as is proper, held out to them" (nee aliter, quam oportet, ecclesiasticæ ultionis censuram, intentari gaudent).

⁴ We have numerous histories, both ancient and modern, of this famous contest about investitures, which was so calamitous to a large part of Europe, and which being commenced by Gregory VII. was carried on by him and the succeeding pontiffs on the one part, and by the emperors Henry IV. and V. on the other. Yet few if any of these histories are entirely impartial. For all the writers espouse the cause either of the popes or of the emperors; and they decide the controversy, not (as in my opinion they should do) by the laws then in force and according to the principles then universally admitted, but according to a supposed system of laws and the opinions of the present age. The principal ancient writers on the side of Gregory are collected by the noted Jesuit Gretzer, in his Apologia pro Gregorio VII. which was published separately, and also in his Opp. tom. vi. Those who defend Henry IV. are collected by Goldast in his Replicatio contra Gretzerum, et Apologia pro Henrico IV. Hanov. 1611, 4to. Of the moderns, besides the Centuriators Magdeburgenses, Baronius, the writers of Germanic and Italian history, and the biographers of Matilda, the reader may consult Schilterus, De Libertate Ecclesiæ Germanicæ, lib. iv. p. 481, &c.; Thomassin, Historia Contentionis inter Imperium et Sacerdotium; Meibomius, De Jure Investiture Episcopalia, in the Script. Rer. Germanicarum, tom. iii.; Dithmar, Hist. Belli inter Imperium et Sacerdotium, Francf. 1714, 8vo, and others. Superior to all these in learning is Noris, in his Litoria delle Investiture della Dignità Ecclesiastica, which was published after the death of this great man, Mantua, 1741, fol. It is a very learned work, but unfinished and defective; and what is not surprising in a friend of the pontiffs or a cardinal, not candid towards the adversaries of the pontiffs or the emperors. With advantage may be also consulted Mascov's Commentarii de Rebus Imperii Germanici sub Henrico IV. et F. Lips. 1749, 4to.

simony. But neither he nor the German bishops would grant leave to the legates to assemble a council in Germany, for the purpose of trying those who were guilty of simony. The next year therefore, A.D. 1075, in a new council at Rome, Gregory proceeded still further; for in the first place he excommunicated some of the favourites of king Henry, whose advice and assistance he was said to have used in the sale of benefices, and also certain bishops of Germany and Italy; and in the next place, he decreed that "whoever should confer a bishopric or abbacy or should receive an investiture from the hands of any layman should be excommunicated."¹ For it had long been customary with the emperors and kings and princes of Europe to confer the larger benefices and the government of monasteries by the delivery of a ring and a staff. And as this formal inauguration of the bishops and abbots was the main support, both of the power claimed by kings and emperors to create whom they chose bishops and abbots, and also of the licentious sale of sacred offices to the highest bidders, or of simony, the pontiff judged that the custom ought to be wholly extirpated and abolished.²

¹ See Pagi, Critica in Baronium, tom. iv. ad ann. 1075; Noris, Historia delle Investiture, p. 32, &c. Lupus, Scholæ ad Dis. ad Concilia, Opp. tom. vi. p. 39, &c. 44, &c.

² I must be allowed here to go into an investigation respecting the rite of inaugurating bishops and abbots with the ring and staff, because it is misunderstood by many and not very intelligibly explained by others. Among these last I may place the name of Henry Noris, the author of the Historia delle Investiture; for in chap. iii. p. 56, where he treats of the motives which induced Gregory to prohibit investitures, though he states many things well and better than other writers do, yet he does not see through the whole thing, and he omits some circumstances important to be known. The investiture itself of bishops and abbots undoubtedly commenced at the time when the emperors, kings, and princes of Europe conferred on them the possession and use of territories, forests, fields, and castles. For according to the laws of those times (and they have not yet ceased to operate), persons holding territories, &c. by favour of the emperors and sovereigns, were not considered to be in legal possession of them until they had repaired to the court, sworn fealty to the sovereign, and received from his hand the token of the transfer and dominion of the property. But the mode of inaugurating or investing bishops and abbots with the ring and the staff or crozier (which are the insignia of the sacred office) was of later date, and introduced at the time when the emperors and kings, subverting the free elections which the ecclesiastical laws required, assumed to themselves the power not only of conferring but also of selling sacerdotal and abbatial offices at their pleasure. At first, the emperors and kings handed over to men of the sacred orders the same tokens of transferred use and possession as they did to soldiers, knights, counts, and others who approached the throne as vassals, namely, written instruments, green twigs, and other things. Humbert, a cardinal of the Roman church, who wrote before the contest about investitures was moved by Gregory VII. in his lib. iii. Adversus Simoniacos, cap. xl. (in Martene, Thesaur. Anecdotor. tom. v. 787),

15. But Henry was not dismayed at the decree of the pontiff. He acknowledged indeed that he had done wrong in selling sacred offices, and he promised amend-says: "The secular authority favoured the ambitious who coveted ecclesiastical dignities and benefices, first by making request for them, next by threats, and afterwards by formal grants; and in all this finding no one gainsaying them, none who took up the pen or opened the mouth and complained, they proceeded to what was still greater; and now under the name of investiture give, first, a written instrument, or deliver any sort of green twigs, and then staffs which horrid abomination has become so well established that it is accounted the only canonical way, and what the ecclesiastical rule is, is neither known nor thought of."—And this custom of inaugurating or investing clergymen or laymen in the same manner would doubtless have continued unchanged, had not the clergy, who had the legal power and right of electing their bishops and abbots, artfully eluded the designs of the emperors and sovereigns. For as soon as their bishop or abbot was dead, without delay and in due form they elected a successor to him and caused him to be consecrated. And the consecration having taken place, the emperor or prince who had proposed to give or sell that office to some one of his friends was now obliged to desist from his purpose and to confirm the person who was elected and consecrated. There is not room here for examples and proofs of this shrewd management of the canons and monks, by which they eluded the intentions of emperors and kings to sell or give away sacred offices; but many may be collected out of the records of the tenth century. For this reason the sovereigns, that they might not lose the power of conferring the sacred offices on whom they pleased, required the insignia of such offices, namely the staff and ring, immediately after the decease of a bishop, to be transmitted to them. For according to ecclesiastical law, official power is conveyed by delivering the staff and ring; so that these being carried away, if the clergy should elect any one for their bishop, he could not be consecrated in due form. And every election, till it had been ratified by consecration, could be set aside without violation of ecclesiastical law; nor could a bishop elect perform any episcopal function till he was consecrated. As soon therefore as any one of the higher officers in the church died, the magistrate of the city where he lived or the governor of the province seized upon his staff and ring, and transmitted them to court. Ebbro, in his life of Otto of Bamberg (who lived in the court of Henry IV.) lib. i. sec. 8, 9 (in the Acta Sanctor. Mensis Julii, tom. i. p. 426), says: "Soon after, the ring and the pastoral staff of the bishop of Breinen were brought to the royal court. For at that period the church had not free elections, but when any bishop was about to go the way of all the earth, presently the commandants of his city transmitted his ring and pastoral staff to the palace; and thus by royal authority after consulting with his courtiers he placed a suitable prelate over the bereaved people. After a few days again the ring and pastoral staff of the bishop of Bamberg were transmitted to our lord the emperor. Which being told abroad many nobles flocked to the royal court, who endeavoured to obtain one of these either by price or by petition. The emperor or king then delivered the ring and staff to whom he pleased; after which the person thus inaugurated and appointed bishop repaired to the metropolitan to whom it belonged to perform the consecration, and delivered over to him the staff and ring received from the emperor, that he might again receive these insignia of his power from the hands of the metropolitan. Thus the new bishops and abbots received the ring and staff twice: first from the hand of the king or emperor, and then from the metropolitan by whom they were consecrated. Humbert, Contra Simoniacos, lib. iii. cap. vi. In Martene, Thesaur. Anecdotor. tom. v. p. 779. "Being thus consecrated" (i.e. invested by the emperor), "the intruder comes upon the clergy, the people, the sacred order, as their master, before he is known by them, sought after, or asked for. And he goes to the metropolitan, not to be judged by him, but to judge ment; but he could by no means be induced to give up the power of appointing bishops and abbots, and the investiture so closely connected with that power. Grehim. For what does it signify or profit to give up the staff and ring which he brings with him? Is it because they were given to him by a layman? Why is that given up which is already held, unless it be either that the ecclesiastical benefice may be again sold under this form of enjoining or giving, or that the former sale may be confirmed by being subscribed to by the metropolitan and his suffrages; or at least that the appearance of a lay-ordination may be concealed under some cloak and colour of a clerical proceeding?"

What king or emperor first introduced this custom of appointing prelates by delivery of the staff and ring is uncertain. According to Adamus Bremensis (Hist. Ec. lib. i. cap. xxiii. p. 10. and cap. xxix. p. 12. in Lindenbrog's Script. Septentrion.) as early as the ninth century, Lewis the Meek conferred on new bishops the right of enjoying the revenues of the churches they ruled, by delivery of a staff or shepherd's crook. But I suspect that Adam described the events of the former centuries in accordance with the customs of his own age, which was the eleventh century. For in the ninth century most emperors and kings allowed bishops to be created by the suffrages of the clergy and people; so that such an inauguration was then unnecessary. See the remarks of Papebroch against Adam. Iren. in the Acta Sanctor. Febr. tom. i. p. 557. Humbert states (lib. iii. Contra Simoniac. cap. vii. p. 780, and cap. xi. p. 787) that this custom commenced in the age of Otho the Great, and I am much inclined to that opinion. At least the learned men who have treated explicitly on the origin of investitures have adduced nothing which dissuades me from receiving this opinion. See Thomassin, Discip. Ecclesiæ circa Benef. tom. ii. lib. ii. p. 431; and Natal. Alexander, Hist. Eccles. sæcul. xi. xii. diss. iv. p. 725. The same Humbert relates (ubi supra, cap. vii. p. 780) that the emperor Henry, the son of Conrad (i.e. Henry III. surnamed Niger) wished to abrogate these investitures, but was prevented by various circumstances; but that Henry I. the king of France, threw everything into confusion, and was excessively addicted to simony, against whom therefore Humbert inveighs most vehemently.

In this method of inaugurating bishops and abbots by delivery of the ring and staff, there were two things especially which displeased the Roman pontiffs. First, that by it the ancient privilege of electing bishops and abbots was entirely subverted, and the power of creating prelates was placed wholly in the hands of the kings and emperors. This objection appeared a fair one, and perfectly accordant with the religious principles of that age. Secondly, it was extremely offensive to them that the insignia of spiritual power—namely, the staff and ring—should be conveyed by the hands of laymen, i.e. of profane persons, which seemed to them very like to sacrilege. Humbert, who wrote, as already stated, anterior to the contest between Gregory and Henry, has a long complaint on this subject, Contra Simoniac. lib. iii. cap. vi. p. 779, 785. "I will subjoin some of his language;—"What business have laymen to distribute the ecclesiastical sacraments and episcopal or pastoral grace; that is, the curved staffs and rings by which episcopal consecration is especially performed and becomes valid, and on which it wholly depends? For the curved staff denotes the pastoral care which is committed to them; and the ring is emblematical of the celestial mysteries, admonishing preachers that they should exhibit the wisdom of God in a mystery with the apostle. Whoever therefore presume to initiate any one with these two, undoubtedly claim for themselves, by this presumption, the whole pastoral authority." And this reasoning was certainly good, if not according to our views, at least according to the opinions of that age; for the staff and the ring were viewed as the emblems of spiritual things, and whoever conferred these emblems was supposed to confer along with them spiritual authority and power.

From these considerations it will be easy to perceive what it was that induced Gregory VII. to oppose so resolutely the inauguration of bishops by means of the gory therefore, well knowing that many of the German princes, especially those of Saxony, were alienated from Henry, deemed this a favourable opportunity to extend and to establish his authority; and sending ambassadors to Goslar he summoned the king to Rome, there to answer before a council to the charges brought against him. The king, who was a high-minded prince and of an ardent temperament, being extremely indignant at this mandate, immediately called a convention of German bishops at Worms; and there accusing Gregory of various crimes, pronounced him unworthy of the pontificate, and appointed a meeting for the election of a new pontiff.¹ Gregory on the other hand, upon receiving this sentence by the king's messengers and letters, interdicted him from the communion, deposed him from the throne, and absolved his subjects from their oath of allegiance to him.² War being thus declared on both sides, the staff and ring. In the first council at Rome he left the subject of investitures untouched, and sought merely to abolish simony and restore the ancient right of election to the societies of priests and monks. Nor had the former pontiffs who opposed simony aimed at anything more. But when he afterwards learned that the practice of investitures was so closely connected with the power of kings and emperors to confer the higher sacerdotal offices, and with its adjunct simony, that it could not well be separated from them, he now assailed that practice that he might pluck up the evil which he opposed by the root. Thus we see the true grounds of the contest between the pontiff and the emperor. Gregory did not oppose investitures universally and as such, but only that species of investitures which was then practised. He did not object to the bishops and abbots swearing fealty to the kings and emperors, and acknowledging themselves their vassals and tenants; nor did he forbid an investiture which should be made by an oral declaration or a written instrument, for this mode of investiture he conceded to the kings of France and England; perhaps also he allowed a sceptre to be used in the transaction, as Callistus II. afterwards did. But he would not tolerate an investiture by the insignia of the sacred office, much less an investiture previous to consecration; and least of all an investiture subversive of the free election of bishops and abbots.

¹ The council of Worms was composed of a "very great number of bishops and abbots" from all parts of Germany. Hugo, a displaced cardinal, appeared there and painted the life and character of Gregory in the blackest colours. "The whole assembly, with the exception of two bishops, subscribed his condemnation. Henry's letter to the pontiff concludes thus: "Thou therefore condemned by this anathema and by the decision of all our bishops, descend, quit the apostolic chair you have invaded, let another ascend it who will pollute religion by no violence, but will teach the sound doctrines of St. Peter. We Henry, by the grace of God, king, with all our bishops, say to you, descend." See Harduin, Concilia, tom. vi. par. i. p. 1563.—Mur.

² Gregory's excommunication of Henry is drawn up in the form of an address to St. Peter, stating what he had decreed and why. It contains these words: "Hæc itaque fiducia fretus, pro ecclesiæ tuæ honore et defensione, ex parte omnipotentis Dei, Patris et Filii et Sp. Sancti, per tuam potestatem et auctoritatem, Henrico regi filio Henrici Imperatoris, qui contra tuam ecclesiâ inaudita superbia insurrexit, totius regni Teutoniarum et Italici gubernaculo contradico; et omnes Christianos a vinculo juramenti, quod, sibi fecere vel facient, absolvo; et ut nullus ei sicut regi serviat, interdico." See Harduin, Concilia, tom. vi. par. i. p. 1566.—Mur.

church as well as the state was rent into two factions, one party supporting the king and the other the pontiff; and the evils resulting from this schism were immense.

16. The first who revolted from Henry were the chiefs of Swabia, at the head of whom was Rudolph, duke of Swabia. Next followed the Saxons, who had long been inimical to the king. Both were advised by the pontiff to elect a new king, in case Henry would not comply with the will of the church; and they assembled at Tribur in the year 1076 to deliberate on this very important subject. The result of the deliberation was, that the decision of the controversy between the king and the princes should be referred to the Roman pontiff, who should be invited to attend the diet of Augsburg the ensuing year for that purpose; and that the king during the intervening time should lead a private life, yet with this condition annexed, that unless he obtained absolution from the anathema within the year, he was to lose the kingdom. Henry therefore, with the advice of his friends, determined to go into Italy and implore the clemency of the pontiff. But the journey did not secure to him the advantages he hoped for. He obtained indeed, though with difficulty, from the pontiff, then residing at the castle of Canosa with Matilda, the great patroness of the church, the pardon of his sins, after standing for three days together, in the depth of winter, in February, A.D. 1077, barefooted and bareheaded and meanly clad, within the walls of the castle, professing himself a penitent. But the pontiff deferred the discussion and decision of his right to the throne till the convention of the princes should meet; and in the mean time wholly interdicted his wearing the ornaments or exercising the functions of royalty. The Italian princes and bishops [who had been Henry's supporters] were most indignant at this convention or compromise, and threatened the king with a deposition and other evils; so that Henry soon after violated the agreement, and, contrary to the command of Gregory, resumed the regal character which he had laid aside. The princes of Swabia and Saxony hearing of this met in convention at Pforzheim, in the month of March A.D. 1077, and by a unanimous vote elected Rudolph, the duke of Swabia, king.¹

17. A violent war now commenced both in Germany and Italy. In Italy Gregory, with the forces of the Normans, who were sovereigns of Lower Italy and whom he had drawn over to his party, and those of the famous Matilda, a very heroic princess, resisted not unsuccessfully the Lombards who fought for Henry. In Germany Henry with his confederates encountered Rudolph and his associates, but not with good success. Gregory fearing the dubious issue of the war wished to be accounted neutral for some years. But taking courage after the unfortunate battle of Henry with the Saxons at Fladenheim in the year 1080, he excommunicated Henry a second time, and sending a crown to Rudolph, pronounced him the legitimate king of Germany.² In revenge Henry, supported by the suffrages of many of the German and Italian bishops, again deposed Gregory the same year in a council at Mentz; and a little after in a convention at Brixen in the Tyrol, he created the archbishop of Ravenna, Guibert, supreme pontiff, who subsequently took the name of Clement III. when consecrated at Rome A.D. 1084.

18. A few months after, Rudolph the enemy of Henry died at Merseburg, in consequence of a wound received in battle at the river Elster. Therefore the following year, A.D. 1081, the king marched with his army into Italy, intending if possible to crush Gregory and his adherents; for if these were subdued, he hoped the commotions in Germany might be easily quelled. He made several campaigns with various success against the forces of Matilda; twice he besieged Rome in vain; but at length in the year 1084 he became master of the greatest part of that city; placed Guibert whom he had made pontiff in the chair of St. Peter with the title of Clement III.; was by him crowned emperor and saluted as such by the Romans; and he now laid close siege to the castle of St. Angelo in which his enemy Gregory was shut up. But Robert, the Norman, duke of Calabria and Apulia, delivered the pontiff from his siege; and as it was not safe for him to remain at Rome, carried him with him to Salerno. And here it was in the year following that this high-minded man, whose spirit was so invincible, but who was the most ambitious and audacious of all the pontiffs that ever lived, terminated his days ginal writers, and have followed those most to be relied on—Sigonius, Pagl, Muratori, Mascovius, Noris, and others, whose accounts differ indeed in some minor things, but agree as to the main points.

² The golden crown which Gregory sent to Rudolph had this memorable inscription: "Petra dedit Petro, Petrus diademata Rudolpho."—Mur.

¹ The ancient and modern writers of Italian and German history have given ample relations of these and subsequent events, though not all of them with equal fidelity and accuracy. I have consulted the ori-

in the year 1085. The Romish church honours him among her saints and intercessors with God, though he was never enrolled in that order by a regular canonization. Paul V. near the commencement of the seventeenth century appointed the 25th day of May to be his festival.¹ But the sovereigns of Europe, especially the emperor of Germany and the king of France, have prevented its being publicly and everywhere observed. And even in our times [A.D. 1729] there was a contest with Benedict XIII. respecting the worship of him.²

19. The death of Gregory was followed by very trying times; for Clement III. or Guibert, the emperor's pontiff,³ ruled both at Rome and over a large part of Italy; and in Germany Henry himself continued the war with the princes. The pontifical party, supported by the forces of the Normans, elected at Rome in the year 1086 Desiderius, an abbot of Monte-Cassino, successor to Gregory; and assuming the name of Victor III. he was consecrated in the church of St. Peter A.D. 1087, the Normans having rescued a part of the city of Rome from Clement. But Victor, who was a very different man from Gregory, being mild and timorous, soon retired to Benevento, because Rome was in the hands of Clement, and not long after died at Cassino. Before his death however, in a council held at Cassino, he renewed the decrees enacted by Gregory for the abolition of investitures.

20. Victor was succeeded by Otto, bishop of Ostia, and likewise a monk of Cluny, who was elected at Terracina in the year 1088 and took the name of Urban II. He was inferior to Gregory in courage and fortitude, but equalled him in arrogance and exceeded him in imprudence.⁴ At first fortune seemed to smile upon him; but in the year 1090 the emperor returning into Italy and boldly and successfully attacking the younger Guelph, duke of Bavaria, and Matilda, the two heads of the pontifical party, things assumed a new aspect. Yet the hope of subduing the emperor revived again in 1091, when Conrad, his son, suffered himself to be seduced by the pontiff and the other enemies of his father, to rebel against his parent and usurp the kingdom of Italy. The condition of Italy still continued in the utmost confusion; nor was Urban able to bring the city of Rome under his subjection. Therefore after holding a council at Placentia in the year 1095, in which he reiterated the decrees and the anathemas of Gregory, he took a journey into France and there held the celebrated council of Clermont, in which the holy war against the Mohammedans who now possessed Palestine was resolved on. And what deserves particular notice, in the same council Urban most imprudently rendered the contest about investitures, which had long been so obstinate and calamitous, still more unmanageable and violent. For Gregory had not forbidden bishops and priests to swear fealty to their sovereigns; but Urban very rashly prohibited them from taking the oath of allegiance.⁵ On his return to

¹ See the Acta Sanctor. Antwerp. ad diem 25 Maii; and Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. sæcul. vi. par. II.

² See the French work entitled, L'Assent du Diable; ou Mémoires Historiques et Critiques sur la Vie et sur la Légende du Pape Grégoire VII. published in Holland, 1743, 3 vols. 8vo. [See also Hartung's Unpartheyische Kirchen-Historie, vol. II. p. 1057; and Mémoires pour servir à l'Hist. Ecclési. du 18me Siècle, 2d edit. Paris, 1815, tome 2, p. 51, &c.—Mur.] This contest arose out of the circumstance that in 1728 Benedict XIII. appointed certain lessons to be read in public worship on the festival of Gregory VII.; one of which highly commended Gregory for having deprived the Emperor Henry IV. of his crown and absolved his subjects from their oath of allegiance. This ostentatious renewal of the papal approbation of such unwarrantable deeds was warmly and justly resented by several of the Roman Catholic sovereigns of Europe, and by the king of France in particular; and the Parliament of Paris in 1729 ordered these lessons to be expunged from the Breviaries used in the churches of that kingdom. Accordingly, the Breviaries subsequently printed in France not only wanted these lessons, but some of them contained no reference at all to this festival of Gregory. The same course was adopted by the Emperor of Germany and other Romanist authorities in Europe. It is a most significant fact, however, that this obnoxious festival with its collects and its pernicious lessons, though up to the present time strictly prohibited in Austria, is now introduced into the French Breviaries, and also into those of Belgium. The reflections of a distinguished English divine on this ominous fact are very just. Speaking of the restoration not only of these offices lauding Gregory for deposing the emperor, but of the similar restoration of the festival and offices in commemoration of Pius V. who in like manner dethroned Queen Elizabeth and incited her subjects to rebellion:—"Such are the doctrines which the Church of Rome now preaches on her religious festivals in the churches of France! With her the acts of Pius and of Gregory are as fresh as if they were done yesterday; and is it too much to say that by eulogizing them in her liturgy, she shows her desire that they may be repeated?" Wordsworth's Letters to M. Gondon, Lond. 1847, p. 279.—R.

³ A life of this pontiff, Clement III., was lately promised to the world by Horiunus, in the Miscell. Lips. tom. viii. p. 609. Clement died A.D. 1100, as is expressly stated in the Chronicon Beneventanum published by Muratori, Antiq. Italice, tom. I. p. 262, &c. See Rubens, Hist. Ravennat. lib. v. p. 337, &c.

⁴ The Life of Urban II. was written by Ruinart, and is extant in Mabillon's Opera Posthuma, tom. III. p. 1, &c. It is composed with learning and industry, but with what fidelity and candour I need not say. Those acquainted with facts know that the monks are not at liberty to describe to us the Roman pontiffs such as they really were. See also, concerning Urban, the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome viii. p. 514.

⁵ To the fifteenth canon of this council the following addition is subjoined [constituting the seventeenth canon; according to Harduin, Conclia, tom. vi. par. II. p. 1719]: "Ne episcopus vel sacerdos Regi vel alicui laico in manibus ligam fidelitatem faciant;" i.e. may take the oath which vassals or subjects are accus-

Italy the pontiff succeeded in reducing the Roman castle of St. Angelo under his power; but he died a little after in the year 1099, and the year following Clement III. also died. Thus the Benedictine monk, Raynier, who was created pontiff after the death of Urban and who assumed the name of Pascal II. reigned without a competitor when the century closed.

21. Among the oriental monks nothing occurred worth noticing; but among the western monks there were several events which deserve to be mentioned. Of these events the most important perhaps was the closer union between them and the Roman pontiffs. For a long time many of the monks, in order to escape the oppressions and snares of the bishops, kings, and princes who coveted their possessions, had placed themselves under the protection of the Roman pontiffs, who readily received them on condition of their paying an annual tribute. But in this century the pontiffs in general, and especially Gregory VII. who wished to bring all things under subjection to St. Peter and to diminish the rights and prerogatives of the bishops, advised and counselled the monks to withdraw their persons and property from the jurisdiction of the bishops, and to place both under the inspection and dominion of St. Peter.¹ Hence from the time of Gregory VII. the exemptions of monasteries from the power of the Ordinary were immensely multiplied throughout Europe, to the great injury and inconvenience of kings and princes, and to the vexation of the bishops.²

tomed to take. They are in an error who tell us that Gregory VII. forbade bishops taking the oath of fidelity. Unreasonable as he sometimes was, he was more reasonable than that. This is proved by Noris, Istoria delle Investiture, cap. x. p. 279, &c.

¹ See as a specimen the Epistle of Gregory VII. in which he subjects the monks of Redon to the Romish sec. with expressions new and unheard of till his age, in Martene, Thesaur. Anecdotor. tom. i. p. 204, &c. To this may be added others by Urban II. and the subsequent pontiffs, which are extant in the same work, and here and there in other collections.

² Perhaps no exemption of a Germanic monastery can be produced which is older than the time of Gregory. Mosheim probably means to say, "No exemption by mere papal authority" occurred in Germany before Gregory VII. for there were various monasteries there which were exempt at an earlier period. That of Fulda was one exempt from its foundation A.D. 744; as appears from Boniface, Epistola 151. The founders of monasteries often wished to have them exempt from episcopal jurisdiction as well as from civil exactions, and therefore procured from the bishop and from the prince such exemption; which was confirmed at first by some council and afterwards by the Roman pontiff. As the pontiffs advanced in power and encroached on the prerogatives of bishops, councils, and kings, their confirmation of an exemption became more common and more necessary, till at last they assumed the exclusive right of granting exemptions at their pleasure. See De Marca, Concordia Sacerdotii et Imperii, lib. iii. cap. xvi. — Mur.

22. The irreligious lives, the ignorance, frauds, dissoluteness, quarrels, and flagrant crimes of the greater part of the monks, are noticed by nearly all the historians of that age; not to mention other proofs of their impiety which have reached us in great numbers.³ But still this class of people were everywhere in high repute, were promoted to the highest offices in the church, and increased continually in wealth and opulence. The causes of this are to be traced to the extreme ignorance of everything pertaining to religion, which gave rise to the grossest superstition, and to the licentiousness and the very dissolute lives of the people at large in this century.⁴ While the great mass of the people, and even the clergy, secular as well as regular, addicted themselves to every species of vice, those appeared like saints and the friends of God who preserved some show of piety and religion. Besides, the nobles, knights, and men of military rank who had spent their lives in acts of robbery, in debauchery, in revelry, and other gross vices, when they became advanced in life and felt the stings of a guilty conscience, hoped they could appease their Almighty Judge if they should either purchase the prayers of the monks by rich gifts, and should bestow on God and the saints a portion of their ill-gotten wealth, or should themselves become monks and make their new brethren their heirs.

23. Of all the monks none were in higher reputation for piety and virtue than those of Cluny in France. Their rules of life therefore were propagated throughout all Europe, and whoever would establish new monasteries or resuscitate and reform old ones, adopted the discipline of Cluny.

³ See what Launol, Assertio in Privileg. S. Medardi, cap. 26, sec. 6, Opp. tom. iii. par. ii. p. 499, &c. and Simon, Bibliothèque Critique, tome iii. cap. 32, p. 331, &c. have collected and remarked on this subject. [Ivo Carnotensis, Ep. 70 (cited by Pagi, Crit. Baron. ad ann. 1100, No. ix.) says to Walter, bishop of Meaux: "I state to your goodness the shameful report which I have received from the lips of the monks of Tours, and the letters of lady Adeleld, the venerable countess, respecting the monastery of St. Fara, that it is no longer the residence of holy virgins but may be pronounced the brothel of demoniac females who prostitute their bodies to every sort of men." This is only a specimen of what is to be met with in the writers of these times. — Mur.

⁴ On the astonishing wickedness of this age see Blondell, De Formulis, regnante Christo, p. 14, &c. Boulainvilliers, De l'Origine et des Droits de la Noblesse, in Malet's Mémoires de Littér. et de l'Hist. tome ix. par. i. p. 63, &c. and many others. This licentiousness and impunity of all sorts of wickedness gave rise to the orders of knights errant or chivalry; whose business it was to protect the weak, the poor, and especially females, against the insults and violence of the strong. This was a laudable institution in those wretched times when the energy of law was wholly prostrate, and when those filling the office of judges were incompetent to perform the duties of their stations.

The French monks of Cluny, from whom the sect originated, gradually acquired such immense wealth in consequence of the donations of the pious of all classes, and at the same time such extensive power and influence, that towards the close of the century they were able to form a peculiar community of their own, which still exists under the name of the Cluniacensian order or congregation.¹ For all the monasteries which they reformed and brought under their rules, they also endeavoured to bring under their dominion; and in this they were so successful, especially under Hugo, the sixth abbot of Cluny, a man in high favour with pontiffs, kings, and nobles, that at the close of the century no less than thirty-five of the larger monasteries in France, besides many of the smaller ones, looked up to him as their general. Besides these there were numerous others which, though they declined becoming members of this community and continued to elect their own governors, yet chose the abbot of Cluny or the arch-abbot as he was called, for their patron and supervisor.² But this prosperity, this abundance of riches, honours, and power, gradually produced not only arrogance, but all those vices which disgraced the monks of those ages; and in a little time there was nothing to distinguish the Cluniacensians from the other monks except some rites and forms.

24. The example of the Cluniacensians led other pious and well-disposed men to establish similar monastic associations; and the consequence was that the Benedictine family, which hitherto had composed but one body, was now split into several sects, all subject indeed to one rule, but differing in customs, forms, and mode of living, and moreover indulging animosity towards each other. In the year 1023 Romuald, an Italian, retired to Camaldoli or Campo-Malduli, a desert spot on the lofty heights of the Apennine,³ and there laid the foundation of the congregation of the Camaldulensians, which still flourishes, especially in Italy. Those who belong to it are divided into cœnobites and eremites. Both are required to live according to rigorous and severe laws, but the cœnobites have relaxed not a little the ancient rigour of the order.⁴ Shortly after John Gualbert, a Florentine, founded at Vallombrosa, which is also on the Apennine, the congregation of Benedictine monks of Vallombrosa, which in a little time extended into many parts of Italy.⁵ To these two Italian congregations may perhaps be subjoined that of Hirschau [in the diocese of Spire] in Germany, established by the abbot William, who reformed many monasteries in Germany and established several new ones.⁶ But the Hirschaugians, if we examine them closely, appear not to be a new fraternity, but a branch of the Cluniacensian congregation, whose rules and customs they followed.

25. Near the end of the century, A. D. 1098, Robert, abbot of Molesme in Burgundy, a province of France, being utterly unable to bring his monks to live up to the rule prescribed by St. Benedict, retired with twenty associates to Cîteaux (Cistercium), then a horrid place covered with woods and briers, but now a beautiful spot [in the diocese of Chalons and county of Beaume], and there commenced the order or rather congregation of the Cistercians. In the following century this fraternity, with the same success as that of Cluny, spread itself over the greatest part of Europe, became exceedingly opulent, and acquired the form and rights not only of a new monastic sect, but of a new commonwealth of monks. The primary law of this fraternity was the rule of St. Benedict, which the founder required the members to fulfil perfectly, without adopting any convenient interpretations of its precepts; yet he added some further regulations to serve as a rampart fortifying the rule against any violations; regulations which were severe and obnoxious to human nature, but exceedingly holy according to the views of that age. Yet the possession of wealth which had corrupted the Cluniacensians at

⁴ Some of the writers concerning the order of Camaldulensians are named by Fabricius, Biblioth. Lat. Medii Ævi, tom. i. p. 895. To which add the life of Romuald in the Acta Sanctor. Febr. tom. ii. p. 101. &c.; and in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. secul. vi. par. i. p. 427; Helyot, Hist. des Ordres, tome i. p. 236; Mabillon, Annales Ord. Bened. tom. v. In many places, especially p. 261, &c.; Ziegenhauer's Constitutio Camaldulense, seu Notitia Scriptor. Camaldulensium, Venice, 1750, fol. [and Costadoni, Annales Camaldulens. tom. i. li. Venice, 1755, fol.—Schl.

⁵ See the life of Gualbertus in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. secul. vi. par. ii. p. 273; Helyot, Hist. des Ordres, tome v. p. 298. Many documents relating to this order and to its history were published not long since by Lami in his Dolicea Eruditorum, printed at Florence, tom. ii. p. 238 (where the ancient rules of the order are given), and p. 272, 279, tom. iii. p. 177, 212, and elsewhere.

⁶ See Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. secul. vi. par. ii. p. 716, &c.; Helyot, Hist. des Ordres, tome v. p. 332.

¹ On the very rapid advances of the order of Cluny in both wealth and reputation, Baluze has collected numerous facts in his Miscellanea, tom. v. p. 343, &c.; and tom. vi. p. 436; and Mabillon has treated expressly on the subject in several parts of his Annales Benedict. tom. v.

² Mabillon, Præfat. ad secul. v. Acta Sanct. Ord. Bened. p. xxvi. &c.; Hist. Génér. de Bourgogne, 1 y the Benedictine Monks, tome i. p. 158, &c. Paris, 1739, fol. Hist. Littér. de la France, tome ix. p. 470.

³ See a description and a drawing of the spot in Mabillon, Annales Benedict. tom. iv. p. 261, &c.—Mur.

once, also gradually extinguished among the Cistercians their first zeal for obeying their rule; so that in process of time their faults were as numerous as those of the other Benedictines.¹

26. Besides these societies formed within the Benedictine order, there were added some new families of monks or orders in the proper sense of the term, i.e. societies having peculiar rules and institutions.² For to some persons who were constitutionally gloomy and inclined to excessive austerity, the rule of Benedict appeared too lax; and others thought it imperfect and not well accommodated to the exercise of all the duties of piety towards God. In the first place Stephen of Thiers, a nobleman of Auvergne and son of a viscount (whom some call Stephen de Muret from the place where he erected the first convent of his order), obtained from Gregory VII. in the year 1073, permission to institute a new species of monastic discipline. He at first designed to subject his followers to the rule of St. Benedict, but he afterwards changed his purpose and drew up a rule of his own. It contains many very severe injunctions; poverty and obedience it inculcates as first principles; it forbids the possession of lands beyond the boundaries of the monastery; denies wholly the use of flesh even to the sick; does not allow of keeping cattle, that a hankering after animal food might be more easily prevented; most sacredly enjoins silence, and makes solitude of so much importance, that the doors of the monastery were to be opened to none but persons of high authority; prohibits all converse with females; and finally commits the care and management of all the temporal affairs and concerns of the monastery exclusively to the converted [or lay] brethren, while the clerical brethren were to devote themselves exclusively to the contemplation of divine things. The reputation of this new order was very high in this century and the next, so long as these regulations and others no less severe were observed; but its credit sank entirely when violent animosity broke out between the clerical and the converted brethren, the latter exalting themselves above the former; and when the rigour of their rule was in many respects mitigated and softened down, partly by the presidents of the order themselves, and partly by the Roman pontiffs. This monastic sect was called the order of Grammontians; because Muret where they were first established was near to Grammont in the territory of Limoges.³

27. Afterwards in the year 1084 or 1086 followed the order of Carthusians, so called from Chartreuse a wild and dismal spot, surrounded with high mountains and craggy rocks, near Grenoble in [the south-easterly part of] France. The founder of this noted sect, which exceeded perhaps all others in severity of discipline, was Bruno, a German of Cologne and canon of Rheims in France. Unable to endure or to correct the perverse conduct of his archbishop Manasses, he bade adieu to the world, and with six companions took up a wretched residence in the dismal spot I have mentioned, with the permission of Hugo, bishop of Grenoble.⁴ He at first adopted the rule of St. Benedict, though enlarged with a considerable number of very austere and rigid precepts; and his successors, first Guigo and afterwards others, imposed upon the order other laws

¹ The origin of this order is described by Guidonis [de la Gayonne], whose tract was published in Labbé's Biblio. Manuscrip. tom. ii. p. 275. For its history and affairs, see Mabillon, Annales Bened. tom. v. p. 65, &c. 99, &c. and tom. vi. p. 116, and Præf. ad Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. sæcul. vi. par. ii. p. 34; Helyot, Hist. des Ordres, tome vii. p. 409; Gallia Christiana, by the Benedictine monks, tom. ii. p. 645; Baluze, Vita Pontif. Avenionens. tom. i. p. 158, and his Miscellanæ, tom. vii. p. 486. Of the founder of the order, Stephen, there is a particular account in the Acta Sanctor. Februar. tom. ii. p. 199, &c.

² Some of the writers concerning Bruno and the order he established are mentioned by Fabricius, Biblio. Lat. Mediæ Ævi, tom. i. p. 784, but there are many more extant. See Masson, Annales Cartusianæ, Corrois, 1687, fol.; Orland, Chronicon Cartusianum, and others; from whom Helyot (in his Hist. des Ordres, tome vii. p. 366) has compiled a neat but imperfect history of the Carthusian order. Many documents relating to the character and laws of the order are exhibited by Mabillon, in his Annales Benedict. tom. vi. p. 638, 683, &c. Of Bruno himself the Benedictine monks have given a distinct account, Hist. Littér. de la France, tome ix. p. 233, &c. The collectors of the Acta Sanctorum will doubtless give a more full account when they come down to the 6th day of October, which is sacred to his memory. It was the current report formerly that Bruno took his resolution of retiring into a desert upon occasion of the death of a priest at Paris, who after his death miraculously returned to life for a short period, in order to attest his own damnation. But since Launoï attacked that story in his tract, De Casu a Seceus Brunonis in Desertum, it has commonly been accounted a fable by the more discerning even in the Romish church itself. And the Carthusians, who might feel an interest to keep up the story, seem at this day to abandon it, or at least they defend it timidly. The arguments on both sides are clearly and fairly stated by Baluze, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. i. p. 467, &c.

³ The principal historian of the Cistercian order is Manriquez, whose Annales Cistercienses, a ponderous and minute work, was published at Lyons, 1642, in four vols. fol. The second is Le Nain, whose Essai de l'Hist. de l'Ordre de Cîteaux was published at Paris, 1696, in nine vols. 8vo. The other writers are enumerated by Fabricius, Biblioth. Lat. Mediæ Ævi, tom. i. p. 1066. But to them should be added Mabillon, who learnedly and diligently investigates the origin and progress of the Cistercians in the 5th and 6th vols. of his Annal. Bened. and also Helyot, Hist. des Ordres, tome v. p. 341, &c.

⁴ See note 2, p. 337, of this vol. — Mur.

which were still more severe and rigorous.¹ Nor is there any sect of monks which has departed less from the severity of its original discipline. This new sect of solitaries spread itself more slowly than the others over Europe, and was later in admitting females to join it; indeed it could never prevail much among that sex, owing undoubtedly to the rigours and gloominess of its discipline.²

23. At the close of the century, A.D. 1095, the order of St. Anthony, which was devoted to the receiving and curing diseased persons, and especially those affected with what was called the holy disease or St. Anthony's fire, took its rise from small beginnings in France. Those who were seized with this terrible disease in this century hastened away to a cell (built by the Benedictine monks of Montmajor near Vienne), in which the body of St. Anthony was said to repose, that through the prayers of this holy man they might be restored. Gaston, a rich nobleman of the diocese of Vienne, and his son Guérin having both recovered from the disease in this cell, consecrated themselves and all their property to St. Anthony, who as they believed had healed them, and devoted themselves to works of kindness towards the sick and the indigent. Eight men first joined them and afterwards many more. This company were indeed all consecrated to God, but they were bound by no vows and were subject to the Benedictine monks of Montmajor. But after they had become rich through the bounty of pious individuals and were spread over various countries, they at first withdrew themselves from the control of the [Benedictine] monks; and at length under Boniface VIII. in the year 1297, they obtained the rank and the rights of an order, or sect of brethren observing the rule of St. Augustine.³

¹ See Mabillon's Pref. ad secul. vi. par. ii. of his Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. p. xxvii.

² Most of those who treat of this sect make no mention of Carthusian nuns, and hence many represent the order as embracing no females. But they have cloisters of females, though but few; for most of their nunneries are extinct, and in the year 1368 an express regulation was made prohibiting the erection of any more convents for females in the Carthusian community. At the present day therefore [A.D. 1755], there are only five convents of Carthusian nuns, four in France and one at Bruges in the Netherlands. See the learned author of the Variétés Historiques, Physiques, et Littéraires, tome i. p. 80, &c. Paris, 1752, 8vo. The delicate female constitution could not sustain the austere and stern mode of living required by the laws of the order; and hence in the few nunneries which remain it was necessary to yield somewhat to nature, and in particular to relax or abrogate the severe laws respecting silence, solitude, and eating alone.

³ See the Acta Sanctor. Januarii, tom. ii. p. 160. Helyot, Hist. des Ordres, tome ii. p. 108, &c.; Pennot-

29. The canons, who since the eighth century formed an intermediate class between the monks and what are called the secular clergy, had become infected with the same dissoluteness of morals which pervaded the whole sacred order; indeed there was even greater profligacy among them in some countries of Europe. Therefore good men who had some sense of religion, and also several of the pontiffs, as Nicolaus II. in the council at Rome A.D. 1059,⁴ and afterwards others, made commendable efforts for reforming the associations of the canons. Nor were these efforts without effect, for a better system of discipline was introduced into nearly all those associations. Yet all of them would not admit reform to the same extent. For some bodies of canons returned indeed into commons, that is, resided in the same house and ate at a common table, which was especially required by the pontiffs, and was extremely necessary in order to prevent marriages among this class of priests; while they still retained the perquisites and revenues of their priestly offices, and used them at their pleasure. But other associations, chiefly through the influence of Ivo, afterwards bishop of Chartres, renounced all private property and all their possessions, and these lived very much after the manner of monks. Hence arose the distinction between secular canons and regular; the former obeying the rule of Nicolaus II. and the latter following that of Ivo. And as St. Augustine introduced among his clergy nearly the same regulations as those of Ivo, though he did not commit any rules to writing, hence the regular canons were called by many, regular canons of St. Augustine or canons under the rule of St. Augustine.

tus, Hist. Canonorum Regular. lib. ii. cap. 70; Knapp, Diss. de Fratribus S. Antonii, Lips. 1737, 4to. The present state of the first house or hospital of this order in which its abbot resides, is described by Martone and Durand, Voyage Littér. de Deux Bénédictins, tome i. p. 260, &c.

⁴ The decree of Nicolaus II. in the council of Rome, A.D. 1059 (by which the old rule for canons adopted in the council of Aix-la-Chapelle was repealed and another substituted), was first published by Mabillon among the documents subjoined to tom. iv. of his Annales Benedict. p. 748, &c. and it is also inserted in the Annales themselves, lib. lxi. sec. xxxv. p. 586, &c.

⁵ See Mabillon, Annales Bened. tom. iv. p. 586, and his Opp. Posthuma, tom. ii. p. 102—115; Helyot, Hist. des Ordres, tome ii. p. 11, &c. Thomassin, Disciplina Ecclesie circa Beneficia, tom. i. par. i. lib. iii. cap. xi. p. 657, &c. Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Mediæ Ævi, tom. v. p. 357, &c.; Many documents occur likewise in various parts of the Gallia Christiana by the Benedictine monks, relating to this reformation of the canons and the distinction among them. This recent origin of their order is very disagreeable to the regular canons; for they wish on many accounts to be

30. Among the Greek writers the following are the best.¹ Theophanes Cerameus, whose homilies still extant are not altogether contemptible.² Nilus Doxopatrius.³ Nicetas Pectoratus, the most strenuous defender of the opinions of the Greeks against the Latins.⁴ Michael Psellus, a learned man and well known by his writings of various kinds.⁵ Michael Cerularius, patriarch of Constantinople, who revived the contest between the Greeks and the Romans, when it was nearly put to rest.⁶ Simeon

esteemed a very ancient order; and hence, as is well known, they refer the origin of their order to the times of Christ, or at least to those of Augustine. But the arguments and testimonies they allege to prove their high antiquity scarcely deserve a laboured confutation. The name canons was doubtless used anterior to this century, but its import was anciently very extensive. See Claude de Vert, Explication des Cérémonies de la Messe, tome i. p. 58. Hence nothing can be inferred from the name. But of regular and secular canons there is no mention in any work extant older than this century; and it is certain that those canons who had nothing in common but their dwelling and table were called secular canons; while those who had all things in common, without any exception whatever, were called regular canons. [To Moshelm's account of the canons it may not be improper to add a few words concerning their introduction into England, and their progress and establishment among us. The order of regular canons of St. Augustine was brought into England by Adewald, confessor to Henry I. who first erected a priory of his order at Nostel in Yorkshire, and had influence enough to have the church of Carlisle converted into an episcopal see, and given to regular canons, invested with the privilege of choosing their bishop. This order was singularly favoured and protected by Henry I. who gave them in the year 1107 the priory of Dunstable, and by queen Maud, who erected for them the priory of the Holy Trinity in London, the prior of which was always one of the twenty-four aldermen. They increased so prodigiously that besides the noble priory of Merton, which was founded for them in 1117 by Gilbert, an earl of Norman blood, they had under the reign of Edward I. fifty-three priories, as appears by the catalogue presented to that prince, when he obliged all the monasteries to receive his protection and to acknowledge his jurisdiction.—Mur.]

¹ Concerning all of whom the Biblioth. Græca of Fabricius may be consulted.

² Theophanes, surnamed Cerameus (the potter), was abp. of Tauroentum in Sicily and probably flourished about A.D. 1040, though some place him in the ninth century. His sixty-two Homilies on the lessons from the Gospels for all Sundays and festivals are written in a natural and didactic style. They are exegetical. Fr. Scorsus published them, Gr. and Lat. Paris, 1644, fol.—Mur.

³ Nilus Doxopatrius, an abbot or archimandrite in the Greek church. He resided at Panormus in Sicily, A.D. 1043. He wrote an account of the five patriarchates, namely, of Rome, Constantinople, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Alexandria, containing their statistics; large extracts from which were published by Leo Allat. De Concordia Eccles. Orient. et Occident. and the entire work, Gr. and Lat. by Le Moine, Varia Sacra, tom. i. p. 211, Paris, 1611.—Mur.

⁴ He was a monk and presbyter in the monastery of Studium near Constantinople, and flourished A.D. 1050. He wrote against the Latins and also against the Armenians. His book De Azyms, de Sabbatorum Jojunio, et Nuptiis Sacerdotum, was published in Lat. by Canisius, tom. vi. Some others of his polemic tracts have been partially published.—Mur.

⁵ For a notice of Michael Psellus, see note 7, p. 351, above.—Mur.

⁶ This Michael was patriarch A.D. 1043–1058. We have nothing of his but some synodic decrees and a few letters, all in controversy with the Latins.—Mur.

junior, some of whose Meditations on the duties of a Christian life are extant.⁷ Theophylact of Bulgaria, who became known especially by his interpretation of the Holy Scriptures.⁸

31. The Latins esteem the following as their best writers. Fulbert of Chartres, a man who encouraged literature and the education of youth, and who has rendered himself famous by his Epistles and by his immoderate zeal for the Virgin Mary.⁹ Humbert, a cardinal who wrote against the

⁷ Simeon junior was abbot of St. Mamas at Constantinople about A.D. 1050. His works in a Latin translation were published by Pontanus at Iuglostadt, 1603, 4to, comprising thirty-three orations on Faith and Christian morals, a book on divine love, and 228 Capitula moralia, practica, et theologica.—Mur.

⁸ Theophylact was a native of Constantinople and abp. of Acris, in Bulgaria, A.D. 1077. He wrote commentaries (compiled from Chrysostom) on nearly all the New Test. and on the minor prophets, also seventy-five epistles and several tracts; all of which were well published, Gr. and Lat. Venice, 1754, fol. The older editions are less perfect.

Besides the writers mentioned by Moshelm, the Greeks of this century had the following:—

Alexius, patriarch of Constantinople A.D. 1025–1043. Some of his decrees are extant.

Peter, patriarch of Antioch in the middle of this century, has left us three epistles and a profession of his faith.

Leo, abp. of Acris in Bulgaria, A.D. 1053. He engaged in the contest against the Latins. One of his epistles and extracts from others are extant.

John, metropolitan of Euchaita in Paphlagonia, A.D. 1054, has left a poem on the history of the principal festivals, published Eton, 1610, 4to, and a few lives of monkish saints.

John Xiphilin, patriarch of Constantinople A.D. 1066–1078. He was of honourable birth, but abandoned public life, became a monk, and at last a patriarch. He has left us a homily on the cross, and some decrees. His nephew, also called John Xiphilin, and his contemporary, was the epitomizer of Dion Cassius. Samuel, a converted Jew of Morocco in Africa, wrote, A.D. 1070, a letter or tract in Arabic proving that the Messiah was already come. A Latin translation of it is in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xviii. p. 519.

Samonas, abp. of Gaza, A.D. 1072, wrote a tract or dispute with Achmed, a Saracen, proving the doctrine of transubstantiation; published, Gr. and Lat. in F. le Duc, Auctarium, tom. ii. p. 277.

Michael Attaliata, a Greek jurist, proconsul, and judge, A.D. 1072. He wrote a synopsis or practical treatise on the imperial laws in ninety-five titles, addressed to Michael Duca; published, Gr. and Lat. by Leunclavius, De Jure Gr. Rom. tom. ii. p. 1.

Nicetas Serron, deacon of the church at Constantinople and their abp. of Hieraclea. He flourished A.D. 1077, and wrote commentaries on Gregory Nazianzen. To him as well as to Olympiodorus has been ascribed the Catena on Job, published, Gr. and Lat. by Junius, Lond. 1637, fol.

Nicolaus Grammaticus, patriarch of Constantinople A.D. 1084–1111. He has left us a long letter to Alexis Comnenus against depriving metropolitans of their sees; also several decrees.—Mur.

⁹ For an account of this famous man see the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome vii. p. 261. [St. Fulbert came from Rome to Chartres about A.D. 1000, and there taught school with great reputation. In the year 1007 he was made bishop of Chartres, and filled that office till his death in the year 1028. His writings consist of 134 letters, generally well written and of some use to the history of those times; besides several indifferent sermons, some worse poetry, and two lives of monkish saints. They were edited with bad faith, Paris, 1608, 8vo, and thence admitted into the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xviii. p. 1. See Du Pin's Bibliot. des Aut. Ecclés. tome ix. p. 1, &c.—Mur.]

Greeks, with more zeal and learning than any of the Latins in this century.¹ Petrus Damianus, whose genius, candour, integrity, and writings of various kinds, entitle him to rank among the first men of the age, although he was not free from the faults of the times.² Marianus Scotus, whose Chronicon and some other of his writings are extant.³ Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, a man of great acumen, well versed in the dialectics of his age, and peculiarly well acquainted with theological subjects.⁴ Lanfranc, also archbishop of Canterbury, well known for his exposition of the epistles of Paul and his other writings, from which he must be acknowledged not destitute of perspicuity nor of learning, according to the standard of his age.⁵ The two Brunos, the one of Monte Cassino⁶ and the other the founder of the Carthusian order.⁷ Ivo of Chartres, a terbury next after Lanfranc, A.D. 1093. In that office he spent an unquiet life, which ended A.D. 1109. He was in continual collision with the kings of England, respecting investiture and encroachments upon clerical rights. Twice he left the kingdom, travelled to Italy, and resided at Rome and at Lyons. His works have been published frequently; the best edition is by Gerson, Paris, 1675, 3 tom. fol. They comprise a large number of letters, many sermons, and meditations on practical and devotional subjects, and a considerable number of doctrinal and polemic treatises.—Mur. [There is a slight anachronism here in placing Anselm before his master and predecessor Lanfranc; but I suppose Mosheim gave him the precedence as being the more learned and eminent man of the two. The student will find an account of Anselm in Wright's Biogr. Britan. Liter. Anglo-Norman Period, p. 49, &c. with references to modern writers of Spain, Italy, and Germany, who have treated of this remarkable man, and a catalogue of his various works, and their editions and translations. To the former might have been added Möhler, Grammatische Schriften, &c. Regensburg, 1839, band I. p. 32, &c. and 129, &c.; and Billroth, De Anselmi Cantuarii Prologio et Homologia, Leipzig, 1832; and to the list of editions of Anselm's works, the latest and best by Dr. Giles, in his series of Patres Eccles. Anglic.—R.

¹ Hist. Littér. de la France, tome vii. p. 260. [And Vita Beati Lanfranci, by Milo Crispin, chanter in the monastery of Bec in the age next after Lanfranc, in Mabillon's Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. ix. p. 630—660. Lanfranc was a native of Pavia, travelled into France very early in life, became a monk at Bec in Normandy, A.D. 1041, taught there with very great applause and drew pupils from afar, was made prior and then abbot of his monastery, and counsellor to William the Conqueror, and A.D. 1070 archbishop of Canterbury, in which office he died A.D. 1089. He had a contention with Thomas archbishop of York about priority, went to Rome on that and other subjects, and bore a conspicuous part in the civil transactions of England. His works, which were collected and published by D'Achery, Lucca, 1648, fol. comprise his commentary on the epistles of St. Paul, about sixty letters, a tract on transubstantiation, and a few other small pieces.—Mur. [Of Lanfranc see also Wright's Biogr. Britan. Liter. ubi supra, p. 1, and the various histories of England both civil and ecclesiastical, as he occupied a conspicuous place in the affairs of both church and state. The several histories of philosophy may also be consulted regarding both Anselm and Lanfranc, as among the earliest founders of scholasticism. Lanfranc's works have been published, for the first time in England, with great care, by Dr. Giles in his series of Patres Eccles. Anglic. Oxford, 1844, 2 vols. 8vo.—R.

⁶ This Bruno was a native of Lombardy, educated in the monastery of Asti, became a canon in the cathedral of Sienna in Tuscany, disputed against Berengar in the council at Rome, 1079, and was soon after by the Pope created bishop of Segni in the ecclesiastical states. Weary of public life he fled to Monte Cassino, A.D. 1104, but the pontiff ordered him back to his bishopric. In 1107 he again went to Monte Cassino, and was there made abbot with the consent of the Pope. But in the year 1111 the pontiff required him to resign his abbacy and resume his episcopal staff, which he held till his death, A.D. 1125. His writings were published at Venice, 1651, 2 vols. fol. The first volume contains his commentaries on the Pentateuch, Job, Psalms, Canticles, and the Revelation. The second contains 145 homilies on the Gospel lessons, some letters and tracts, and a life of the pontiff Leo IX.—Mur.

⁷ For an account of St. Bruno, the founder of the Carthusians, see p. 370 of this vol. and note 4 there.—After spending six years at Chartreuse, Urban II. who

¹ See Martene, Thesaurus Anecdotor. tom. v. p. 629; Hist. Littér. de la France, tome vii. p. 527, &c. [Humbert was a monk of Toul, well skilled in Greek, whom pope Leo IX. took with him to Rome, A.D. 1049, and there made him a cardinal. He was employed in several important commissions, but especially in a papal embassy to Constantinople, A.D. 1054. He died after A.D. 1064. His writings are all controversial, and chiefly against the Greeks. They are extant partly in Baronius, Annales, and all of them in Causius, Lectiones Antiq. tom. vi. and in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xviii.—Mur.

² See the Acta Sanctor. Febr. tom. iii. p. 406; Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome ii. p. 950; Oudin, Diss. in his Comment. de Scriptor. Eccles. tom. ii. p. 686, &c. [Petrus Damian was born of humble parentage at Ravenna, A.D. 1007. Educated by his brother, he early became a monk, a teacher, a reformer of morals, an abbot of Ostia, and cardinal of the Roman church. But weary of public life, he resigned his bishopric and retired to his monastery. The pontiff employed him as their legate on several most difficult enterprises, in which he acquitted himself with great address and prudence. He was sent to Milan A.D. 1059, to suppress simony and clerical incontinence; and, A.D. 1062, was dispatched to Cluny in France, to reform that monastery and settle its controversies; and in 1063 was legate to Florence for settling a contest between the bishop and the citizens; and 1069 he was sent into Germany to dissuade king Henry from repudiating his queen Bortha; and lastly, in 1072, he was papal legate to Ravenna for reconciling that church to the papal dominions; and died on his return, in February 1074, aged 66. He was a man of great learning, devout, honest, frank, and well acquainted with human nature. He wrote with ease and perspicuity. His numerous writings were collected in three vols. fol. by Cajetan, Rome, 1606; often reprinted since, but best at Venice, 1754, in four vols. fol. They consist of eight books of letters, about sixty tracts on various subjects of discipline, morals, and casuistry, sermons for all Sundays and festivals of the year, and the lives of several saints, besides notices of many others.—Mur. [His name was Petrus de Honestis, and he was called Damian after an elder brother who acted as a parent towards him. Fabricius, in his Biblio. Lat. Medii Ævi, tom. ii. p. 20, &c. supposes Petrus de Honestis and Petrus Damianus to be two different persons.—R.

³ Marianus Scotus was born in Ireland A.D. 1028, became a monk, travelled into Germany in 1058, where he spent the remainder of his life in the monasteries of Cologne, Fulda, and Mentz. He died A.D. 1086, aged 58. His Chronicon extends from the creation to A.D. 1083, and was continued by Dodechin to A.D. 1200. It is published among the Scriptores Rer. Germanic. by Struve and others. His other writings are of little value.—Mur.

⁴ See the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome ix. p. 398; Rapin, Hist. d'Angleterre, tome ii. p. 65, 166, &c.; Colonia, Hist. Littér. de Lyon, tome ii. p. 210; [Eadmer (Anselm's secretary) De Vita S. Anselmi, lib. ii. in the Acta Sanctor. April. tom. ii. p. 893; Wharton's Anglia Sacra, par. ii. p. 179, and Milner's Hist. of the Church of Christ, cent. xi. chap. v. St. Anselm was born at Aosta in Piedmont, A.D. 1033. After acquiring an education and travelling in France, he became a monk at Bec in Normandy at the age of twenty-seven. Here he taught with great reputation, succeeded Lanfranc in the abbacy, and was made archbishop of Can-very active restorer of ecclesiastical law and order.¹ Hildebert of Le Mans, as a theologian, philosopher, and poet, not one of the best nor one of the worst.² Lastly Gregory VII. the most haughty of the Roman pontiffs, who undertook to elucidate some parts of the holy Scriptures and wrote several other things.³

had been his pupil summoned him to Rome A.D. 1092, that he might become his counsellor. But the scenes of public life were so disagreeable to him, that the pontiff in 1095 gave him leave to retire. He travelled to the extreme part of Calabria, and there with a few of his monks spent the remainder of his life. He died A.D. 1101. To him have been ascribed most or all of the works written by Bruno of Segni, mentioned in the preceding note. But he wrote nothing except two letters during his residence in Calabria, and a confession of his faith, which is extant in Mabillon's Analecta, tom. iv. p. 400.—Mur.

¹ Ivo or Yvo was a native of Beauvais in France, educated under Lanfranc at Bee, then abbot of St. Quintin, and at last bishop of Chartres, A.D. 1092—1115. He was a very learned man and a partisan of the Roman pontiffs, which involved him in some difficulties. His works were published by Souchet, Paris, 1647, fol. They comprise Decretorum Liber, Parvoria or a summary of ecclesiastical law, 287 epistles, 22 sermons, and a short chronicle of the kings of France, extending from Pharamond to Philip I.—Mur.

² All the works of this Hildebert, who was certainly a man of learning and ingenuity, were published by the Benedictine monks, with the explanatory notes of Heuguerde, Paris, 1708, fol. [They comprise about a hundred well written epistles, and some sermons, tracts, and poems of an ordinary character.] Hildebert was born at Lavardin in the diocese of Mans, became a monk of Cluny, studied under the famous Berengarius, and was made bishop of Mans about A.D. 1098, and archbishop of Tours A.D. 1125, where he died A.D. 1132.—Mur.

³ The epistles of Gregory VII. in number 370, are found in all the collections of councils, e.g. by Harduin, tom. vi. par. i. p. 1195, &c. His other writings are few and little worth. To him some attribute an exposition of the seven penitential Psalms published as the work of Gregory the Great. His exposition of St. Matthew exists in MS. and some fragments of it have been published.

The following list embraces most of the Latin writers omitted by Mosheim. For a fuller account of them, see Cave's Hist. Liter. Du Pin, and others.

Almon of Aquitaine, a Benedictine monk of Fleury, A.D. 1001. His Hist. Francorum to A.D. 752, with an additional book by another hand, is published among the Scriptores Francie. He also wrote two books recounting the miracles of St. Benedict, a life of St. Abbo of Fleury, and some other things.

Godehard, a monk and bishop of Hildesheim A.D. 1002, has left us five epistles, published by Mabillon, Analecta, tom. iv. p. 349.

Gozbert, abbot of Tegern in Bavaria, A.D. 1002, has left us four epistles, published also by Mabillon, Analecta, tom. iv. p. 347.

Adelbold, a nobleman, counsellor, and general under the emperor Henry, then a monk, and A.D. 1008—1027, bishop of Utrecht. He is supposed to be the author of the Vita S. Henrici Imperat. published by Canisius, Surlus, and Gretser.

Berno, a monk of St. Gall, abbot of Richenau near Constance, died A.D. 1045. He wrote De Officio Missæ, seu de Rebus Missæ ad Officium pertinentibus (in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xviii.), and lives of two saints.

Hugo, archdeacon of Tours, A.D. 1020, wrote Dialogus ad Fulbertum Carnotensem Episcopum, published by Mabillon, Analecta, tom. ii.

John, surnamed Johannellus from his diminutive stature, abbot Fiscamensis, A.D. 1028—1078. He wrote many prayers and religious meditations, and some epistles, published by Mabillon, Analecta, tom. i.

Adeniar, a monk of Limoges, A.D. 1030. He wrote a Chronicle of the French monarchy from its commencement to A.D. 1029, an account of some abbots of Limoges, and a supplement to the work of Amalarius De Divinis Officiis.

Hugo de Britollo, a monk of Cluny and bishop of Limoges, A.D. 1030—1049, when he was deposed for simony. He retired to the monastery of Verdun, and wrote a tract against Berengarius in favour of transubstantiation, which is in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xviii. p. 417.

Bruno, Duke of Carinthia, and bishop of Würzburg, A.D. 1033—1045. To instruct his clergy, he compiled from the fathers Commentaries on the Psalms, and on all the devotional hymns of the Scriptures, also on the Apostolic, Ambrosian, and Athanasian Creeds; published, Cologne, 1494, and in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xviii. p. 65.

Hermannus, surnamed Contractus because all his limbs were contracted by a paralytic affection. He was accounted a vast scholar, well skilled in Latin, Greek, and Arabic, and in theology, history, philosophy, and all the sciences of the age. Though of noble parentage he became a monk of St. Gall and of Richenau till his death, A.D. 1054. He wrote Chronicon de Sex Mundi ætates, from the creation to A.D. 1054, published among the Scriptores Germanici, and in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xviii. p. 348.

Glaber Radulphus, a monk of St. Germain de Auxerre and then of Cluny, A.D. 1045. He wrote Historiarum, libri v. extending from A.D. 900 to A.D. 1045, published among the Scriptores Francici; also a life of St. Guillelmus, abbot of St. Benignus of Dijon.

Deoduin or Theoduin, bishop of Liège, A.D. 1045—1075. He wrote a letter or tract addressed to Henry king of France, against the doctrine of Berengarius and his followers, in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xviii. p. 419.

Hugo, abbot of Cluny, A.D. 1048—1108. He was of noble French parentage, and became a monk at the age of fifteen. Some of his letters are extant in D'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. ii.

Leo IX. pope A.D. 1048—1054. (See above p. 356.) He has left us nineteen epistles extant in the Collections of the Councils, (e.g. Harduin's tom. vi. par. i. p. 927), besides a number of homilies or sermons. His life written by Wibert, a contemporary, is in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. ix. p. 49, &c.

Anselm, a canon of Liège and dean of Namur, A.D. 1050. He wrote a history of the bishops of Liège, from A.D. 666 to about A.D. 1048; published by Jo. Chapeville, Liège, 1612, 4to.

Stephen IX. pope A.D. 1057—1058. He has left two epistles.

Alkeric, a monk and deacon of Monte Cassino, and a cardinal, A.D. 1057—1079. He wrote many poems and other tracts devotional and polemical, and some lives of saints, all of which are said to exist still in manuscript. His life of St. Domlnic is the only work of his published, extant in Mabillon's Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. viii. p. 35, &c.

Alphanus, abbot in the Benedictine monastery at Salerno, and then archbishop there A.D. 1057—1086. He wrote numerous poems, devotional, and in praise of the saints, most of which were published by Ughelli, annexed to his Italia Sacra, tom. ii.

Nicolaus II. pope A.D. 1058—1061. He has left us eight epistles, extant in the Concilia.

Gauferius, called also Benedict, a monk of Monte Cassino, A.D. 1060. He wrote some sermons on the festivals, and some religious poems, which are in the library of Monte Cassino.

Alexander II. pope A.D. 1061—1073. He has forty-five epistles in the Concilia.

Berthold, a German ecclesiastic, presbyter of Constance, and a warm partisan of Gregory VII. against Henry IV. He flourished from about A.D. 1066 to 1100. His Historia sui Temporis, ab anno 1053 usque ad ann. 1100, and his Appendix to Hermanus Contractus' Chronicle, from A.D. 1055—1066, are published among the Scriptores Rer. Germanicæ. Some of his tracts also, in support of Gregory's measures, were published by Gretser.

Guitmund, a Benedictine monk of Normandy, and then archbishop of Aversa in Italy, died A.D. 1080. He has left three books on the real presence in the Eucharist, a statement of the doctrine of the Trinity, &c. and an address to William I. king of England; all extant in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xlii.

Sigifrid, archbishop of Metz, from about 1069 to 1084. In the year 1064 he led a band of 7,000 German pilgrims to the Holy Land. In 1074 he attempted to reclaim his clergy from simony and matrimony, without success. In 1076, Gregory VII. excommunicated him for adhering to the cause of Henry; but the next year he revolted, and it was he who crowned Rudolph the competitor for the German throne. Four of his epistles are in the Concilia.

Durand, a monk of Normandy, A.D. 1070, was one who wrote against Herengarius. His tract is subjoined to Lanfranc's works, ed. D'Achery.

Gualdo, a monk of Corbey, A.D. 1070, wrote a metrical life of St. Ansgar, bishop of Hamburg and apostle of the North, which is in Mabillon's Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. vi. p. 116.

St. Anselm, bishop of Lucea, A.D. 1071—1086. He was a decided supporter of Gregory VII. and wrote two books in his defence against Guibert the antipope; also a collection of sentences from the fathers in support of Gregory's principles respecting the independence of the clergy and the church of all civil power; both of which are extant in Canisius, Lect. Antiq. tom. vi. and in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xviii. p. 602, and tom. xxvii. p. 436. His life, written by one of his friends and pupils, is in Mabillon's Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. ix. p. 460, &c.

Willhelmus, an abbot of Metz, A.D. 1073, and friendly to Gregory VII. Mabillon has published seven of his epistles and an oration, in his Analecta, tom. i. p. 247.

Ingulphus of Croyland, born in London, A.D. 1030, educated at Westminster and Oxford. In 1051 he accompanied William duke of Normandy to France, and became his private secretary. To escape envy, in 1064 he retired to Germany, and was one of the 7000 who went as pilgrims to the Holy Land under Sigifrid archbishop of Metz. On his return he was made abbot of Montecelle; and A.D. 1076, William, now king of England, invited him thither and made him abbot of Croyland till his death, A.D. 1109. He was very intimate with Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury. His History of the Monastery of Croyland from A.D. 664 to about A.D. 1091, was published by Saville among the five Scriptores Anglie, Lond. 1596, fol. and still better among the Rerum Anglicar. Scriptores, Oxford, 1684, vol. [See Wright's Biogr. Britan. Litt. Anglo-Norman Period, p. 28; Lappenberg's Gesch. von Engl. Thorpe's transl. vol. i. p. 51, &c. Ingulf's History, it appears from these writers, cannot be depended on.—R.

Lambert of Aschaffenburg. He became a monk at Hirsfeld A.D. 1058, soon after travelled as a pilgrim to the Holy Land, and returning, resumed his monastic life at Hirsfeld. There he composed, A.D. 1077, his History, which is a mere chronicle from the creation to A.D. 1050, and then a very diffuse history down to A.D. 1077. His style is commended very highly. The work is published among the Scriptores Germanici.

Hugo, bishop of Die in the year 1077, and archbishop of Lyons from A.D. 1080 till after A.D. 1099. He was much engaged in the public transactions of the times. Two of his epistles to Gregory VII. are in the Concilia.

Micrologus, a fictitious name for the author of a tract on the ceremonies of the mass, written in the latter part of this century or perhaps in the next; which is extant among the Scriptores de Divinis Officiis, Paris, 1610, fol. and in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xviii. p. 469.

Adamus, surnamed Magister, a canon of Bremen from A.D. 1077 and who flourished A.D. 1080. He wrote Hist. Eccles. præsertim Bremensis, in which he describes with much fidelity the propagation of Christianity in Hamburg, Bremen, Denmark, and throughout the North, from the times of Charlemagne to those of Henry IV.; to which he subjoined a geographical account of Denmark and other northern countries, published by Lindenbrog, Leyden, 1598, 4to, and Helmstadt, 1670, 4to.

Benno, a German ecclesiastic who adhered to Clement III. or Guibert, the antipope, was made archpresbyter and cardinal of Rome, and took a very active part against Gregory VII. He flourished about A.D. 1086, and wrote De Vita et Rebus gestis Hildebrandi et Pape, published Francf. 1581, and among the Opuscula Anti-Gregorianæ, by Goldast, Hanover, 1611, 4to, p. 1.

Victor III. pope A.D. 1086, 1087. He was born at

CHAPTER III.

THE HISTORY OF RELIGION AND THEOLOGY.

1. It is not necessary to be minute in describing the state of the public religion of this age. For who can doubt that it was debased and corrupt, when the guardians of it were equally destitute of sacred and secular knowledge, and of virtue; and when even the first men in the church exhibited examples of the grossest vices? The people at large were wholly absorbed in superstition, and concerned themselves with nothing but statues, and images, and relics, and the futile rites which the caprice of their priests enjoined upon them. The learned had not indeed wholly lost all knowledge of the truth; but they obscured and debased it with opinions and doctrines, some of which were ludicrous and silly, others hurtful and pernicious, and others useless and uncertain. No doubt there were, here and there, pious and good men, who would willingly have aided the suffer-

Benevento, A.D. 1027; bore the name of Daufertius till he became a monk of Monte Cassino, when he assumed the name of Desiderius; became abbot there in 1056, was made a cardinal, and employed on important occasions by the pontiffs. But he was ever partial to a retired and monastic life. His dialogues on the miracles of St. Benedict and other monks of Monte Cassino (a work stuffed with idle tales) has been frequently published; e.g. by Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. secul. iv. par. ii.

Urban II. pope A.D. 1087—1099. His former name was Otho, a native of Châtillon, in the diocese of Rheims, a monk of Cluny, cardinal bishop of Ostia, and much employed by Gregory VII. While pope he pursued the measures of Gregory. He has left us fifty-nine epistles and two harangues in favour of a crusade, extant in the Concilia. Mabillon gives some account of his life, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. ix. p. 902, &c.

Lambert, bishop of Arras from A.D. 1004 onwards. Three of his epistles are in the Concilia.

Raimund de Agelles, a canon of Lo Puy in France, and chaplain to the Earl of Toulouse (who was also bishop of Le Puy), whom he accompanied in his expedition to the Holy Land A.D. 1095. He saw the holy lance dug out of the earth, and carried it at the siege of Antioch. He wrote the History of Jerusalem, describing especially the achievements of the Earl of Toulouse during five years from the time they entered Scavonia on their way to the East. The work is in the collection of Bongarsius, De Gestis Dei per Francos, tom. i. p. 139.

Gotsadin or Gosceldin, a Benedictine monk of St. Bertin in Artois, and then of St. Augustine at Canterbury, who flourished A.D. 1096. He wrote the life of St. Augustine, the apostle of England, which is extant in Mabillon's Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. i. p. 498.

Baldric, secretary to two successive bishops of Arras and Cambrai, and then bishop of Nimegue and Tournay, A.D. 1097—1112. He wrote a history or chronicle of the churches of Cambrai and Arras, published by Colvener, Douay, 1615.

Paschal II. pope A.D. 1099—1118. His former name was Rainer or Raginger, a Tuscan by birth, a monk of Cluny, a presbyter and cardinal of Rome, abbot of St. Laurence and St. Stephen, and at last pope. His wars and contests with Henry V. were very violent. One hundred and seven of his epistles are in the Concilia, and some more in Baluze, Miscellanea.—Mur.

ing cause of piety. But they themselves needed protection against the satellites of superstition and impiety.

2. From the time of Gregory VII. however, pretty clear traces appear in some countries of Europe, especially in Italy and France, of those persons whom the Protestants denominate witnesses of the truth; that is, of pious and good men who deplored the imperfection and defects of the public religion, and of the whole clerical order; who opposed the lordly domination both of the Roman pontiffs and of the bishops, and who attempted, sometimes covertly and sometimes openly, to effect a reformation in the church.¹ For rude as this age was, and ignorant in general of the true revealed religion, yet those few fragments, as it were, of Christianity,² which were exhibited and explained to the people, were sufficient to show even to the illiterate and the peasantry, that the religion publicly inculcated was not the true religion of Christ; that Christ required of his followers things wholly different from those exhibited in the discourses, and in the lives and morals of the clergy; that the pontiffs and the bishops exceedingly abused their power and opulence; and that the favour of God and salvation were to be obtained, not by a round of ceremonies, nor by donations to the churches and priests, nor by erecting and endowing monasteries, but by holiness in the soul.

3. Those however who undertook the great work of reforming the church and religion, were for the most part incompetent to the task; and by their solicitude to avoid some faults they ran into others. All indeed perceived the corruption and the defects of the prevailing religion; but none, or at least very few of them, understood the nature and essential character of true religion. This will not appear strange to one who is acquainted with those unhappy times. Hence these reformers often mixed much that was false with a little that was true. As all saw that most of the principal enormities and crimes of the bishops and clergy were the consequence of their wealth and opulence, they placed too high an estimate on indigence, and looked upon voluntary poverty as the primary virtue of a good religious teacher. They all supposed the church of the primitive times to be a model, after which all churches were ever after to be formed and regulated; and the practice of the apostles of Jesus Christ they considered as an inviolable law for all priests. Many also, grieved to see the people place all their dependence for salvation on the ceremonies of religion and the external worship of God, contended that the whole of religion consisted in the internal emotions of the mind and the contemplation of divine things, and contemned and wished to abolish all external worship, with its houses of worship, religious meetings, public teachers, and sacraments.

4. A large number both of the Greeks and the Latins applied themselves to the interpretation of the holy scriptures. Among the Latins, the two Brunos expounded the Psalms of David; Lanfranc, the Epistles of Paul; Berengarius, the Revelation of St. John; Gregory VII. the Gospel of St. Matthew; and others, different portions of the sacred volume. But all these follow the perverse custom of their age; that is, they either transcribe the works of former interpreters, or they apply the declarations of the sacred writers so whimsically to heavenly things and to the duties of life, that a wise man can scarcely restrain his indignation. The most eminent of the Greek interpreters was Theophylact of Bulgaria, though he also drew most of his comments from the ancients, particularly from Chrysostom.³ After him we may place Michael Psellus, who attempted to explain the Psalms and the book of Canticles, Nicetas who wrote a Catena on Job, and some few others.

5. Hitherto all the Latin theologians, except a few of the Irish, who threw obscurity on religious doctrines by their philosophical speculations, had illustrated, explained, and proved the doctrines of Christianity, solely from the holy scriptures or from them in connexion with the opinions and writings of the fathers. But in the middle of this century some divines, among whom was Berengarius, well known by his controversy respecting the Lord's supper, ventured to apply the precepts of logic and metaphysics to the explanation of the scriptural doctrines, and the confirmation of their own opinions. Hence the opposer and rival of Berengarius, Lanfranc, who was afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, employed the same weapons against Berengarius and his followers; and in general laboured to impart light and confirmation to religious truths by the aid of reason. His example was followed by St. Anselm, likewise an archbishop of Canterbury, and a man of great intellectual acumen; and to these succeeded many others. From these beginnings gradually arose that species of philosophic theology which, from the schools in which it most prevailed, obtained afterwards the name of scholastic theology.¹ But there was far more sobriety and good sense in these reconcilers of faith and reason than in their successors; for they used perspicuous language, had no fondness for vain and idle disputations, and for the most part made use of the precepts of logic and philosophy only in combating their antagonists.²

¹ Some have considered Peter Damianus, Hildebert, Ivo, Walther bishop of Naumberg, and Lambert of Aschaffenburg, as examples of this class of persons. Von Einem.—[See Spanheim, Introductio ad Hist. Eccles. N. T. sæcul. xi. cap. vii. sec. 5, p. 313, and the Catalogus Testium Veritatis, lib. xii. xlii.—Mur.]

² In some of the writers of this century we meet with specimens of sound Christian doctrine, as well as of devout breathings of a pious soul. The English reader may see, for an example, the life of Anselm of Canterbury in Milner's History of the Church, century xi. chap. v.—Mur.

³ For an account of Theophylact, see Simon's Hist. Critique des Principaux Commentateurs du N. T. chap. xxviii. p. 289; and his Critique de la Bible. Ecclési. de M. Du Pin, tome i. p. 310, where he also treats of Nicetas and Eusebius. [See Davidson's Sacred Hermeneutics, for notices of Theophylact, Lanfranc, and Nicetas, as biblical interpreters, p. 169, &c.—R.]

6. Following these principles the Latin theologians began to reduce all the truths of revealed religion into a connected system, and to subject them to the laws of the human sciences, a thing which no one before had attempted, if we except Tago of Saragossa, a writer of the seventh century, and Damascenus among the Greeks in the eighth century. For all the Latin writers previously to this age had only occasionally, and never in a formal manner, elucidated and explained the points of theology; nor had they thus explained them all, but only such as occasions demanded. The first attempt at a system of theology was by Anselm,³ and the first who completed an entire system or body of divinity was Hildebert, bishop of Le Mans and afterwards archbishop of Tours, just at the close of the century. And all the subsequent, almost numberless writers of systems of theology (summarum Theologicarum), seem to have followed Hildebert as their model.⁴ The method of Hildebert is, first to substantiate each doctrine by passages of Scripture and by authorities from the fathers, which had been the common method hitherto; and then to solve the difficulties and objections which may be raised by the aid of reason and philosophy, which was something new and peculiar to this age.⁵

³ The principal treatise by Anselm here referred to is that entitled, Cur Deus Homo? In two books (In his Opp. p. 74—96, ed. Paris, 1721, fol.). The work corresponds with its title, its object being to answer the question, Why did God become Incarnate? He describes the fallen state of man, and his need of an Almighty Saviour to atone for his sins and raise him to a state of bliss after death; and he shows that an Incarnate God, and he only, could perform the office of a mediator. The views and speculations of Anselm on this whole subject have prevailed very generally quite down to the present times. Nor have Grotius and Edwards, and the most elaborate modern writers, added much on the subject. Another tract of Anselm on the same important subject is entitled, De Conceptu Virginali et Originali Peccato (In his Opp. p. 97—106.). Besides these he has four others on important subjects. The first is a philosophical inquiry, De Veritate, Opp. p. 109—115. The second is De Libero Arbitrio, Opp. p. 117—122. The third is on the fall of the sinning angels, De Casu Diaboli, Opp. p. 62—73. The fourth is a philosophical explanation of the doctrine of the divine decrees, and its consistency with free and accountable action in creatures, De Concordia Præscientiæ et Prædestinationis nec non Gratiæ, cum Libero Arbitrio, Opp. p. 123—134. On all these subjects Anselm thought intensely, and endeavoured to meet every objection and difficulty which could be urged. But he did not wander from his subject, and take up a whole system of divinity in one or even all of these his theological tracts.—Mur.

⁴ This first system of theology among the Latins, or Tractatus Theologicus as it is entitled, is among the works of Hildebert, p. 1010. In the edition of De Beaugendre, who has shown in his preface to the volume that Peter Lombard, Robert Pullen, and the other writers of Summaries, trod in the footsteps of Hildebert. [This tract occupies about ninety folio pages, and is divided into forty chapters. It treats of the nature of faith, free-will and sin, the Trinity, the incarnation of the Son of God, original sin, grace, predestination and prescience, and the sacraments. But it scarcely touches upon the doctrine of atonement by Jesus Christ, its value and efficacy, of faith in Christ, of regeneration and sanctification, and the promises of the Gospel.—Mur.

¹ See Heumann, Præfat. ad Tribbechoniæ Librum de Doctoribus Scholasticis, p. xiv. The sentiments of the learned respecting the first author or inventor of the scholastic theology are collected by Buddeus, Isagoge ad Theologiam, tom. i. p. 358.

² That it may be seen how much wiser the first scholastics were than their disciples and followers, I will subjoin a passage from Lanfranc, whom many regard as the first author of the scholastic theology. In his tract De Corpore et Sanguine Domini, cap. viii. Opp. p. 236, ed. D'Achery, he says:—"God is my witness and my own conscience, that in treating sacred subjects, I do not wish to bring forward dialectical questions and their solutions, nor to answer them when brought forward by others. And if at any time the subject under discussion is such that it can be most satisfactorily explained by the rules of this art, as far as I am able I cover over the art by citations of equivalent import, that I may not seem to place more reliance upon this art than upon the truth and the authority of the holy fathers." The concluding words in this quotation indicate those sources from which the theologians previously to this age had derived all their arguments—namely, the holy Scripture, which he denominates the truth, and the writings of the ancient fathers. To these two sources of proof the theologians now suffered a third to be added—namely, dialectics. Yet they would have none recur to this except disputants, whose business it is to withstand opponents who wield dialectical weapons, and to solve the difficulties suggested by reason. But unhappily in the following centuries the two former sources of proof were used but sparingly, and philosophical proof alone, and that not very wisely stated, was deemed sufficient to substantiate everything in a system of theology.

⁵ I will here subjoin an opinion of Anselm of Canterbury, taken from his treatise entitled, Cur Deus Homo? lib. i. cap. ii. Opp. p. 75; an opinion which the first philosophical theologians or the scholastics among the Latins seem to have received as a sacred and immutable law in theology: "As the right order of proceeding requires, that we believe the deep things of the Christian faith before we presume to discuss them by the aid of reason, so it appears to me to be negligence if, when we are confirmed in the faith, we do not study to understand what we believe." [His meaning seems to be that a Christian should neither make philosophy the rule and measure of his religious faith, nor despise her aid in elucidating and confirming the truths of revealed

7. Those of this century who undertook to give rules for Christian life and conduct, attempted a great object without possessing in general adequate resources. This will be obvious to one who shall read the work of Peter Damianus on the virtues; with the Moral Philosophy and the Tract on the four virtues of a religious life, by Hildebert, bishop of Le Mans. Nor did the moralists usually add anything to their precepts respecting the virtues, except what they called the written law, by which they intended the ten commandments of Moses. Anselm wrote some tracts calculated to excite pious emotions, and a book of meditations and prayers, in which many good thoughts occur. Nor did the mystics, as they are called, wholly abstain from writing. Among the Latins, John Johannellus composed a book expressly on divine contemplations;¹ and among the Greeks Simeon junior wrote some tracts on the same subject; not to mention a few others.

8. Many of the polemics of this age came forth armed with dialectical arguments and demonstrations, yet few of them could use such arguments dexterously and properly; and they aimed, not so much to confute their adversaries as to confound them with their subtleties. Those who were destitute of such armour contended so badly, that it is manifest they commenced writing before they had considered why and what they were to write. Damianus defended Christianity against the Jews with good intentions but with little effect. And there is extant a tract of Samuel, a converted Jew, against his nation. Anselm of Canterbury assailed the despisers of all religion and of God with acuteness, in his book against the fool (Adversus Inipientem); but perhaps the subtlety of the reasoning exceeded the comprehension of those whom he aimed to convince.

9. The public contests between the Greek and Latin churches, which, though not settled, had now for a long time been suspended, were indiscreetly revived and rendered more violent by new accusations, in the year 1053, by Michael Cerularius, patriarch of Constantinople, a man of a restless spirit. The pretence of renewing hostilities was, zeal for the truth and for religion, but the true cause was the arrogance and ambition of the two patriarchs. The Latin patriarch endeavoured by various arts and projects to bring the Greek patriarch under subjection, and to detach from him the patriarchs of Alexandria and Antioch, and connect them with himself; and the disturbed and unhappy condition of the Greek empire was favourable to such machinations. For the friendship of the Roman pontiff seemed very important to the Greeks, who had to contend with the Normans in Italy as well as with the Saracens. The Greek patriarch on the other hand was solicitous to extend the limits of his jurisdiction, to concede nothing to the Roman pontiff, and to bring the Oriental patriarchs entirely under his control. Cerularius therefore in a letter written in his own name, and in that of his chief counsellor, Leo, bishop of Achrida, and addressed to John bishop of Trani in Apulia, publicly accused the Latins of various errors. Leo IX. who was then the pontiff of Rome, replied in a letter drawn up in a very imperious style; and moreover, in a council at Rome, excommunicated the Greeks.²

10. In order to stifle this controversy in its birth, the Greek emperor Constantine, surnamed Monomachus, requested the Roman pontiffs to send legates to Constantinople to negotiate a settlement. Accordingly three legates of the Latin pontiff repaired to Constantinople, namely, cardinal Humbert, a fiery man, Peter, archbishop of Amalfi, and Frederic, archdeacon and chancellor of the church of Rome, carrying with them letters from the pontiff both to the emperor and to the Greek patriarch. But the issue of the legation was lamentable, although the emperor, for political reasons, favoured the side of the Latins more than that of the Greeks. For the letter of Leo IX. which displayed great arrogance, alienated the mind of Cerularius from him; and the legates showed in various ways that they were sent, not so much to restore harmony between the contending parties, as to establish Roman domination among the Greeks. All deliberation about a reconciliation being thus rendered fruitless, the Roman legates acted in the most indiscreet and most unsuitable manner possible, in the year 1054; for they excommunicated the Greek patriarch, with Leo of Achrida, and all that adhered to them, publicly in the church of St. Sophia, left a copy of the inhuman anathema upon the great altar, and then shook religion. For a further development of his opinions, see the passages cited by Gieseler in his Text-book, by Cunningham, vol. ii. p. 311, &c. note 10.—Mur.

¹ See the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome viii. p. 48.

² These epistles are extant in Baronius, Annales, ad ann. 1053, tom. xi. p. 210, &c. The epistle of Cerularius is also printed in Canisius, Lect. Antiq. tom. iii. p. 281 of the new edition; and that of Leo in the Concilia, &c. [e.g. in Harduin's collection, tom. vi. par. i. p. 927.—Mur.

off the dust from their feet and departed. This most unrighteous procedure rendered the dissension incurable, though till this act it seemed capable of a compromise. The Greek patriarch now returned the anathema, excommunicating in a council the pontiff's legates and all their friends and supporters; and also directed the copy of the Latin decree of excommunication against the Greeks to be burned by order of the emperor.¹ From this time offensive and insulting writings were issued by both parties, which continually added fresh fuel to the fire.

11. To the old charges advanced by Photius, new ones were added by Cerularius, of which the chief one was, that the Latins used unleavened bread in the eucharist; and on this point the Greeks and Latins henceforth contended more vehemently, perhaps, than on all other subjects; at least they were as warm about this as about the primacy of the Roman pontiff. The other things opprobriously objected to the Latins by the Greek patriarch, betray rather his contentious disposition and his ignorance of true religion than his zeal for truth. For he was exceedingly offended that the Latins did not abstain from things strangled and from blood; that their monks used lard, and allowed the brethren when sick to eat flesh; that the Latin bishops wore rings on their fingers, as if they were bridegrooms; that their priests wore no beards, but shaved them; and that in baptising the Latins dipped the individual but once into the water.² When we see the Greeks and Latins not only standing aloof from each other and contending eagerly, but also fulminating anathemas and execrations against each other, for such things as these, we perceive the very lamentable state of religion in both churches; and we can be at no loss for the causes which gave rise to so many sects dissenting from the church.

12. Near the close of the century, under Alexius Comnenus, the Greeks were nearly involved in an internal controversy, in addition to this public one with the Latins. For in a time of great national emergency, the emperor not only laid hold of the money in the churches, but caused the images of gold and silver to be taken off their doors and converted into money. Leo, bishop of Chalcedon, a man of austere manners, severely censured this transaction, maintaining that it was a sacrilege. To support his views he published a tract, asserting that in the images and emblems of Jesus Christ and the saints there was a degree of sanctity which entitled them to worship and adoration; so that worship was to be paid not only to the persons represented by the statues, images, and emblems, but also to the statues themselves. To suppress the popular tumult which arose from this discussion, the emperor assembled a council at Constantinople, which decreed that the images of Christ and of the saints were to be worshipped only relatively;³ that the material of a sacred image was not entitled to worship, but only the likeness formed upon the material; that the images of Christ and the saints, whether painted or sculptured, had nothing of their nature, although they participated somewhat in the grace of God; and that the saints were to be invoked and honoured as the servants of Christ and on his account. Leo, who had held different opinions, was deprived of his office and sent into exile.⁴

13. In the Latin church about the middle of the century, the controversy was revived respecting the manner in which Christ's body and blood are present in the eucharist. Various opinions on this subject had hitherto prevailed with impunity; for it had not yet been decided by the councils what ought to be believed respecting it.⁵ Hence in the beginning of the century, A.D. 1004, Leutheric, archbishop of Sens, had taught,

¹ Besides Baronius and the common writers, none of whom are free from errors, see Mabillon, Annales Bened. tom. iv. lib. ix. ad ann. 1053, and Præf. ad sæcul. vi. of his Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. par. ii. p. l. &c.; Leo Allatus, De Libris Græcor. Ecclesiast. diss. ii. p. 160, ed. Fabricius; and De Perpetua Ecclesiæ Orient. et Occident. Conensione, lib. ii. cap. ix. p. 614; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, tom. i. p. 200; and Diss. Damascen. Prima, sec. xxxi. p. xvi. &c.: but especially Hermann, Hist. Concertationum de Pane Azymo et Fermentato, p. 59, &c. Lips. 1739, 8vo; and Cotelier, Monumenta Eccles. Gr. tom. ii. p. 108, &c. [See also a full yet dense and well vouched account in Schmidt's Kirchengesch. vol. v. p. 316, &c. The account in Bower's Lives of the Popes, vol. v. is less correct.—Mur. [To these authorities may be added Gieseler's Lehrbuch, &c. Cunningham's transl. sec. 42, vol. ii. p. 142, principally for the sake of the apposite quotations in the notes from the original sources.—R.]

² See the epistle of Cerularius to John of Trani in Canisius, Lectiones Antiq. tom. iii. p. 281, where also we have Humbert's confutation of it. Cerularius' epistle to Peter of Antioch is in Cotelier's Monumenta Eccles. Græc. tom. ii. p. 139; add Martene's Thesaur. Anecdotor. tom. v. p. 847, where there is a polemic tract of an unknown Latin writer against the Greeks.

³ Σχετικῶς προσκυνῶμεν, οὐ λατρευτικῶς τὰς εἰκόνας.

⁴ This controversy is stated at large by Anna Comnena, the emperor's daughter, Alexia, lib. v. p. 104; lib. vii. p. 158, ed. Venice. The acts of the council were procured from the Colindian library, by Montfaucon, and published in his Biblioth. Cœlestina, p. 103, &c.

⁵ The various opinions of the age respecting the eucharist are stated by Martene, from an ancient manuscript, in his Voyage Littér. de Deux Bénédictins, tome ii. p. 126.

contrary to the more general opinion, that only the holy and worthy communicants receive the body of Christ; but Robert, king of France, and the advice of friends prevented him from raising commotion among the people by the doctrine.¹ Much more indiscreet was Berengarius, a canon and master of the school at Tours and afterwards archdeacon of Angers, a man of a discriminating mind, learned, and venerable for the sanctity of his life;² for he publicly and resolutely maintained, in the year 1045, the opinion of John Scotus respecting the eucharist, rejecting that of Paschasius Radbert, which better accorded with the unenlightened piety of the multitude. He taught that the bread and wine are not converted into the body and blood of Christ, but are merely emblems of his body and blood.³ He was forthwith opposed by some both in France and Germany, and Leo IX. the Roman pontiff in the year 1050, caused his opinion to be condemned first in a council at Rome, and then in one at Vercelli; and ordered the work of Scotus, from which it was derived, to be committed to the flames. Berengarius was not present at either of these councils. A council held at Paris in the same year by Henry king of France, concurred in the decision of the pontiff, and issued very severe threats against Berengarius who was absent, and against his adherents who were numerous. A part of these threatenings was felt by Berengarius, for the king deprived him of the income of his office. But neither threats, nor decrees, nor fines, could move him to reject the opinion which he had embraced.

14. This controversy now rested for some years; and Berengarius, who had many enemies (among whom his rival, Lanfranc, was the principal), and also many patrons and friends, was restored to his former tranquillity. But after the death of Leo IX. his adversaries incited Victor II. the new pontiff, to order the cause to be tried again before his legates, in two councils held at Tours in France, A.D. 1054. In one of these councils, in which the celebrated Hildebrand, afterwards Gregory VII. was one of the papal legates, Berengarius was present; and being overcome unquestionably by threats rather than by arguments, he not only gave up his opinion, but (if we may believe his adversaries who are the only witnesses we have) abjured it, and was reconciled to the church. This docility, however, was only feigned; for he soon after went on teaching the same doctrine as before, though perhaps more cautiously. How much censure he deserves for this transaction it is difficult to say, as we are not well informed of what was done in the council.

15. Nicolaus II. being informed of this bad faith of Berengarius, in the year 1058 summoned him to Rome, and in a very full council held there in the year 1059, he so terrified him that Berengarius requested a formula of faith to be drawn up; which being accordingly done by Humbert, Berengarius subscribed it and confirmed it with an oath. In this formula he declares that he believes what Nicolaus and the council required to be believed, namely, "that the bread and wine after consecration are not only a sacrament, but also the real body and blood of Christ; and are sensibly, and not merely sacramentally, but really and truly, handled by the hands of the priests, broken and masticated by the teeth of the faithful." This opinion however was too monstrous to be really believed by such a man as Berengarius, who was a man of discernment and a philosopher. Therefore when he returned to France, relying undoubtedly upon the protection of his patrons, he expressed his detestation, both orally and in his writings, of what he had professed at Rome, and defended his former sentiments. Alexander II. indeed admonished him in a friendly letter to reform, but he attempted nothing against him, probably because he perceived him to be upheld by powerful supporters. Of course the controversy was protracted many years in various publications, and the number of Berengarius' followers increased.

16. When Gregory VII. was raised to the chair of St. Peter, that pontiff, to whom no difficulty seemed insurmountable, undertook to settle this controversy also, and therefore summoned Berengarius to Rome in the year 1078. This new judge of the affair manifested an extraordinary, and, considering his character, a wonderful degree of moderation and gentleness. He seems to have been attached to Berengarius, and to have yielded rather to the clamours of his adversaries than to have followed his own inclinations. In the first place, in a council held near the close of the year, he allowed the accused to draw up a new formula of faith for himself, and to abandon the old formula drawn up by Humbert, though it had been sanctioned by Nicolaus II. and by a council; for Gregory, being a man of discernment, undoubtedly saw the absurdity of that formula.¹ Berengarius therefore now professed to believe, and swore that he would in future believe only, "that the bread of the altar after consecration is the real body of Christ which was born of the Virgin, suffered on the cross, and is seated at the right hand of the Father; and that the wine of the altar after consecration is the real blood which flowed from Christ's side." But what was satisfactory to the pontiff did not satisfy the enemies of Berengarius; for they maintained that the formula was ambiguous (and it really was so), and therefore they wished that one more definite might be prescribed for him, and that he might prove the sincerity of his belief by touching red-hot iron. The last of these, the pontiff in his friendship for the accused would not concede; to the first the importunity of their demands obliged him to yield.

¹ See Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. i. p. 354.

² For the life of Berengarius, see the works of Hildebrand of Le Mans, p. 1324; Hist. Littér. de la France, tome viii. p. 197, &c.; Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. i. p. 404; and those others mentioned by Fabricius, Biblioth. Lat. Mediæ Evæ, tom. i. p. 570. I will just observe that he is erroneously called archiepiscopus instead of archidiaconus in Matthew of Paris, Hist. lib. i. p. 10, ed. Watta. But I suppose it is a mistake of the printer, and not of the historian. [For the life of Berengarius, see Mabillon, De Berengario, ejusque Hæreses ortu, progressu—ac multiplici condemnatione; in Præfat. ad Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. ix. p. 7, &c. See also Berengarius Turonensis, &c. by Lessing, Brunswick, 1770. Schroëckh's Kirchengesch. tom. xxxiii. p. 507, &c.—Mur.

³ For the real opinion of Berengarius, see note 4, p. 370, in this chapter.—Mur.

17. The following year therefore, A.D. 1079, in a council held again at Rome, Berengarius was required to repeat, subscribe, and swear to a third formula which was milder than the first, but stricter than the second. According to this he professed to believe, "that the bread and wine by the mysterious rite of the holy prayer and the words of our Redeemer are changed in their substance into the real and proper and vivifying flesh and blood of Jesus Christ;" and he also added to what he had professed by the second formula, "that the bread and wine are," after consecration, "the real body and blood of Christ, not only by a sign and in virtue of a sacrament, but in their essential properties and in the reality of their substance." When he had made this profession the pontiff dismissed him to his own country with many tokens of his good-will. But as soon as he got home he discarded and confuted in a book, what he had professed at Rome in the last council. Hence Lanfranc, Guitemund, and perhaps others, violently attacked him in written treatises; but Gregory VII. neither punished his inconstancy nor manifested displeasure; which is evidence that the pontiff was satisfied with the second formula or that which Berengarius himself drew up, and disapproved of the zeal of his enemies who obtruded upon him the third formula.²

18. Berengarius, influenced undoubtedly by motives of prudence, returned no answer to his much-excited opposers; but retiring from the world, he repaired to the island of St. Cosme near Tours, and there led a solitary life in prayer, fasting, and other devotional exercises, till the year

² These statements are strongly illustrated and supported by a work of Berengarius himself, which Martene has presented to the public in his Thesaurus Anecdotorum, tom. iv. p. 99-109. From this tract it appears (1.) that Gregory VII. had great and sincere friendship for Berengarius. (2.) That in general he believed with Berengarius respecting the eucharist, or at least thought we ought to abide by the words of holy writ, and not too curiously inquire after and define the mode of Christ's presence. For thus Gregory (p. 108) addressed Berengarius just before the last council: "I certainly have no doubt that your views of the sacrifice of Christ are correct and agreeable to the Scriptures; yet because it is my custom to recur on important subjects, &c. I have enjoined upon a friend, who is a religious man, . . . to obtain from St. Mary that through him she would vouchsafe not to conceal from me, but expressly instruct me what course I should take in the business before me relating to the sacrifice of Christ, that I may persevere in it immovably." Gregory therefore was inclined to the opinion of Berengarius, but yet had some doubts; and therefore he consulted St. Mary through a friend, to know what judgment he ought to form respecting the eucharistical question. And what was her response? His friend (he says) "learned from St. Mary and reported to me, that no inquiries were to be made and nothing to be held respecting the sacrifice of Christ, beyond what the authentic Scriptures contain; against which Berengarius held nothing. This I wished to state to you, that your confidence in us might be more secure, and your anticipations more pleasing." This therefore was Gregory's belief, and this he supposed or pretended he had received from the holy Virgin herself, that we should simply hold what the sacred volume teaches, that the real body and blood of Christ are exhibited in the sacred supper, but should not dispute about the manner of it. (3.) It appears from this writing that Gregory was forced by the enemies of Berengarius, who pressed the thing beyond measure, to allow another formula to be prescribed to Berengarius in another council. "He was constrained," says Berengarius, "by the importunity of the buffoon—not bishop—of Padua, and of the anticrist—not bishop—of Pisa, to permit the calumniators of the truth, in the last Quadagesimal council, to alter the writing sanctioned by them in the former council. (4.) It is hence manifest why Gregory attempted nothing further against Berengarius, notwithstanding he violated his faith publicly plighted in the latter council, and wrote against the formula which he had confirmed with an oath. For Gregory himself disagreed with the authors of this formula, and deemed it sufficient if a person would confess with Berengarius that the real body and blood of Christ were exhibited in the sacred supper. He therefore suffered his adversaries to murmur, to write, and to confute the man whom he esteemed and agreed with, kept silence himself, and would not allow Berengarius to be further molested. Moreover, in the book from which I have made these extracts, Berengarius most humbly begs God to forgive the sin he committed at Rome; and acknowledges that through fear of death he assented to the proposed formula and accused himself of error, contrary to his real belief. "God Almighty," says he, "the fountain of all mercy, have compassion on one who confesses so great a sacrifice."

¹ I wish the learned and candid to observe that Gregory VII. than whom none carried the prerogatives of the pontiffs farther or defended them more strenuously, here tacitly acknowledges that a Roman pontiff and a council are capable of erring, and have in fact erred.

1088, when he died, leaving numerous followers and a high reputation for sanctity.¹ In this retreat he seems to have aimed to atone for the crime, of which he confessed and deeply lamented the commission, before the last council at Rome, when he professed, contrary to the dictates of his own conscience, what he regarded as erroneous doctrine.² As to his real opinions, learned men are not agreed; but whoever will candidly examine his writings which yet remain, will readily see that he was one of those who consider the bread and wine to be signs of the body and blood of Christ, although he expressed himself variously and concealed his views under ambiguous phraseology.³ Nor have those writers any solid proof to urge who contend that he receded from this opinion before his death.⁴

tained there (re vera, sed latenter contineri), and in order that they may be received they are somehow, so to speak, impanated (impanari). And this more subtle opinion they say is that of Berengarius himself." Berengarius therefore was a Lutheran; or like Luther he held the doctrine of consubstantiation. It may be added that the newly-discovered manuscript of Berengarius throws light on various parts of his history and of the proceedings against him. In particular, it shows that Lanfranc attacked him and was answered by him at a much earlier period than Mosheim states in the text, sec. xvii.—Mur.

⁴ It is well known that the historians of the Romish community endeavour to persuade us, that Berengarius, before his death, gave up the doctrine which he had for so many years strenuously defended, and adopted that of the Romish church. But the only proofs which they have of the fact are these: First, in the council of Bourdeaux, A.D. 1080, it is said, "he gave an account of his faith." And further, some ancient writers speak favourably of his penitence, and say that he died in the Catholic faith. But these arguments amount to nothing. Berengarius adhered to that formula which he adopted in the former council at Rome under Gregory, and which the pontiff judged to be sufficient; and they who heard it read but did not examine its meaning, looking only at the words and their natural import, might easily believe that between his opinion and the common belief of the church there was no difference. And in this conclusion they would be confirmed by the conduct of the pontiff, who, though he knew Berengarius to have renounced and opposed the formula which he had approved in the latter Roman council, yet took no measures against him, and thus [apparently] absolved him from all error and blame. To these considerations another of still greater weight may be added; namely, that the belief of the Romish church itself respecting the sacred supper was not, in that century, definitely established, as the three formulas of Berengarius evince beyond all controversy; for they most manifestly disagree, not in words only but in import. Nicolaus II. and his council decided that the first formula, which cardinal Humbert drew up, was sound and contained the true doctrine of the church. But this was rejected and deemed too crude and erroneous not only by Gregory, but also by his two councils which tried the cause. For if the pontiff and his councils had believed that this formula expressed the true sense of the church, they would never have suffered another to be substituted for it. The pontiff himself, as we have seen, supposed that the doctrine of the sacred supper was not to be explained too minutely, but that, dismissing all questions as to the mode of Christ's presence, the words of the sacred volume were simply to be adhered to; and as Berengarius had done this in his formula, the pontiff pronounced him no offender. But the last council departed from the opinion of the pontiff, and the pontiff, though reluctant, suffered himself to be drawn over to the opinion of the council. Hence the third formula disagreed with both the former ones. We may here drop the passing remark, that in this controversy a council was superior to the pontiff; and the resolute Gregory himself, who would yield to no one else, yielded to the council. Berengarius escaping from the hands of his enemies, adhered to his own formula which had met the approbation of the pontiff, and publicly assailed and condemned the third formula or that of the latter council. And he did this with the pontiff's knowledge and silent consent. Now what could be inferred from all this but that Berengarius, though he resisted the decree of the latter council, yet assented to the opinion of the pontiff and the church?—In this history of the Berengarian controversy, so memorable for various reasons, I have examined the ancient documents of it which are extant (for all of them are not extant), and have called in the aid of those learned men who have treated most copiously and accurately of this contest. First the very rare work of Francis de Roke published at Angers, 1656, 4to, under the title, Ad Can. ego Berengarius, 41, De Consecrat. Distinct. 2, ubi Vita, Hæresis et Pœnitentia Berengarii Andegavensis Archidiaconi et

¹ The canons of Tours still celebrate religiously his memory. For they annually, on the third day of Easter, repair to his tomb on the island of St. Cosme, and there solemnly repeat certain prayers. See Mollon, Voyages Liturgiques, p. 130. [And Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. ix. Pref. sec. lxviii.—Mur.]

² None will doubt this after reading his tract published by Martene, Theaurus Anecd. tom. vi. p. 109.

³ Some writers in the Romish church, as Mabillon and others, and some also in our own, suppose that Berengarius merely denied what is called transubstantiation, while he admitted the real presence of Christ's body and blood. And whoever inspects only the formula which he approved in the first Roman council under Gregory VII. and which he never after rejected, and does not compare his other writings with it, may be easily led to believe so. But the writers of the reformed church, Basnage, Usher, and nearly all others, maintain, that Berengarius's opinion was the same which Calvin afterwards held. With these I have agreed, after carefully perusing his epistle to Almanus in Martene's Theaurus Anecd. tom. iv. p. 109. "Constat," says he, "verum Christi corpus in ipsa mensa proponi, sed spiritualiter interiori homini verum, in ea Christi corpus ab his duntaxat, qui Christi membra sunt, incorruptum, intaminatum inatritur: que spiritualiter manducari." This is so clear that an objection can scarcely, if at all, be raised against it. Yet Berengarius often used ambiguous terms and phrases in order to elude his enemies. (Since Mosheim's death the manuscript of Berengarius's reply to Lanfranc has been discovered in the library of Wolfenbüttele, and a large part of it has been presented to the public in extracts by G. E. Lessing (Berengarius Turonensis, oder Ankündigung eines wichtigen Werkes desselben, &c. Brunsw. 1770, 4to). From this work it is said to appear beyond all controversy, that Berengarius only denied transubstantiation or the transmutation of the substance of the bread and wine into the substance of Christ's body and blood; while yet he admitted the real presence of Christ's body and blood, as being superadded to the bread and wine in and by their consecration. See Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. tom. xxiii. p. 534, &c. And Mûnseher's Elements of Dogmatic History, sec. cxxliii. p. 118, ed. N. Haven. 1830. And this accords exactly with the statement of Gultmund, one of Berengarius's antagonists, as quoted by Mabillon (De Berengario, ejusque Hæresis ortu, &c. in his Pref. ad Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. ix. p. 23). Speaking of the followers of Berengarius, Gultmund says: "All the Berengarians indeed agree in this, that the bread and wine are not changed in their essence; but I was able to draw from some of them that they differ among themselves much; for some of them say that nothing whatever of the body and blood of the Lord are in the sacraments, but that these are only shadows and figures [of the body and blood of Christ]; but others yielding to the solid arguments of the church, yet not receding from their folly that they may seem to be with us in a sort, say that the body and blood of the Lord are in reality though covertly con-

19. In France about the year 1023, a great contest arose about a trifling affair. The priests and monks of Limoges disputed whether Martial, the first bishop of Limoges, ought in the public prayers to be classed among the apostles or among the confessors. Jordan, the bishop of Limoges, wished him to be denominated a confessor; but Hugo, abbot of the monastery of St. Martial, insisted on his being called an apostle; and he pronounced the adherents of the bishop to be Ebionites, that is, the worst of heretics. This controversy was first taken up in the council of Poitiers, and then, A.D. 1024, in that of Paris. Their decision was, that Martial was to be honoured with the appellation of an apostle; and those who judged differently were to be classed with the Ebionites, who denied that there were any more than twelve apostles. The Ebionites, it may be noted, in order to exclude St. Paul from the number of apostles, would not allow of more than twelve apostles. But this decision of the council inflamed rather than calmed the feelings of the disputants, and the silly controversy spread over all France. The affair being carried before the pontiff, John XIX., in a letter addressed to Jordan and the other bishops of France, he decided in favour of the monks, and pronounced Martial deserving of the title and the honours of an apostle. Accordingly in the council at Limoges, A.D. 1029, Jordan yielded to the pleasure of the pontiff; afterwards, A.D. 1031, in a council of the whole province of Bourges, Martial was solemnly enrolled in the order of apostles; and lastly, in a very full council at Limoges the same year, the controversy was terminated, and the prayers in honour of Martial the apostle, as consecrated by the pontiff, were publicly recited.¹ Those who contended for the apostleship of Martial assumed that he was one of the seventy disciples of Christ; and thence they inferred that he was entitled to the rank of an apostle, upon the same ground as Paul and Barnabas were.

CHAPTER IV.

HISTORY OF CEREMONIES AND RITES.

1. THE forms of public worship used at Rome had not yet been received in all the countries of the Latin world. In this age therefore the pontiffs, who regarded all disagreement in rites as adverse to their authority, took great pains to have the Romish forms everywhere adopted, and all others excluded. In this affair again the diligence of Gregory VII. as his letters show, was very conspicuous. No people of Europe had more resolutely and perseveringly opposed the wishes of the pontiffs in this matter than the Spaniards; for no means could induce them to part with their ancient liturgy, called Mozarabic or Gothic, and to adopt that of Rome. Alexander II. indeed in the year 1068 had prevailed with the people of Aragon not to oppose the introduction of the Romish mode of worship;² and the Catalonians no longer resisted. But the glory of having perfected this work was reserved for Gregory VII. He did not cease to press the subject upon Sanchez and Alphonso, the kings of Aragon and Castile, till they consented that the Gothic rites should be abolished and the Roman be received. Sanchez first complied, and Alphonso followed his example in the year 1080. In Castile the nobles thought this contest ought to be decided by the sword.

ad Josephi locum de Christo. Next, I have consulted Mabillon, Pref. ad tom. ix. Acta Sanctorum Ord. Bened. or secul. vi. par. ii. p. lv. &c. and his Diss. de multiplici Damnatione, Fidei Professione et Relapsu, which is in his Annotata Veteris Eni, tom. ii. p. 456; Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. i. p. 404, &c.; Pagi, Breviarium Romanorum Pontif. tom. ii. p. 452. Among the reformed divines, Ussher, De Successione Eccles. Christianar. in Occidente, cap. vii. sec. 24, p. 195, &c. Basnage, Hist. des Eglises Réformées, tome i. p. 105, and Hist. de l'Eglise, tome ii. p. 1391; Oudin, Diss. de Doctrina et Scriptis Berengarii, in his Comment. de Scriptor. Ecclesiast. tom. ii. p. 624. Partiality prevails I fear among them all, but especially among the writers of the Romish church. [In studying this important and significant controversy, the student should read carefully the entire section (sec. 29) devoted to it in Gieseler, Lehrbuch, &c. Cunningham's transl. vol. ii. p. 102—111, with the authorities quoted and the extracts given in the notes. No additional information is afforded in the sketch given by Waddington in his Hist. of the Church, vol. ii. p. 91, &c. or by Bowden in his Life of Gregory VII. vol. ii. 240. Milner considered the contest so uninteresting that he thought it worthy of only "a few sentences." Hist. of the Church, vol. iii. p. 289.—R.

¹ See Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. i. p. 372, 401. Longueval, Hist. de l'Eglise Gallicane, tome vii. p. 188, 189, 231, &c. The Benedictine monks in their Gallia Christiana, tom. ii. Append. Documentor. p. 162, have published Jordan's letter to the pope, Benedict VIII. against the apostleship of Martial. The acts of the councils of Bourges and Limoges respecting this controversy are published by Labbé, Biblioth. Nova Manuscriptor. tom. ii. p. 766, &c. Of the first author of this strife, Ademar, a monk of Chabanois, Mabillon gives an account in his Annales Ord. S. Bened. tom. iv. p. 348, &c. and in the appendix to the volume he subjoins the epistle of Ademar in support of the apostleship of Martial. The Benedictine monks have also given an account of this man, in their Hist. Littér. de la France, tome vii. p. 301.

² See Mabillon, De Liturgia Gallicana, lib. i. cap. ii. p. 10; Bona, Rerum Liturgicar. lib. i. cap. xi. Oppi, p. 220; Le Brun, Explication des Cérémonies de la Messe, tome ii. diss. v. p. 272 [and Liturgia Antiqua, Hispanica, Gothica, Isidoriana, Mozarabica, &c. tom. i. Rome, 1740, fol.; as also Pinlus, Tractatus Historico-Chronolog. de Patrie Vicinidudinis Officii Mozarabici Seculo xi. c. 6.—Schl. [Also Krazzer, De Liturgiis, p. 70, &c. Augsb. 1786, 8vo.—Mur.

³ De Marca, Histoire de Bearn, livr. ii. chap. ix.

Accordingly two champions were chosen, who were to contend in single combat, the one fighting for the Roman liturgy and the other for the Gothic. The Gothic champion conquered. After this they concluded to submit it to the decision by fire. Both liturgies, the Roman and the Gothic, were now thrown into a fire. The Roman was consumed in the flames, the Gothic remained uninjured. Yet this double victory could not save the Gothic liturgy; the authority of the pontiff and the pleasure of Constantia the queen, who controlled Alphonso the king, had greater weight and turned the scale.¹

2. This seal of the Roman pontiffs may admit some kind of apology, but not so their prohibiting each nation from worshipping God in its own vernacular tongue. While the Latin language was spoken among all the nations of the West, or at least was understood by most people, few objections could be urged against its use in public assemblies for Christian worship. But when the Roman language with the Roman dominion had been gradually subverted and become extinct, it was most just and reasonable that each nation should use its own language in worship. But this privilege could not be obtained from the pontiffs in this and the following centuries; for they decided that the Latin language should be retained, though unknown to the people at large.² Different persons assign different reasons for this decision, and some have suggested such as are quite preposterous. But the principal reason, doubtless, was an excessive veneration for the ancient forms. And the Oriental Christians have fallen into the same fault of excessive love of antiquity; for public worship is still performed by the Egyptians in the ancient Coptic, by the Jacobites and

Nestorians in Syriac, and by the Abyssinians in the ancient Ethiopic; although all these languages have long since become obsolete and gone out of popular use.³

3. The other things enjoined or voluntarily practised in this century under the name of religious acts, the rites added in the worship of the saints, relics, and images, the pilgrimages and various other things of the kind, it would be tedious to detail. I will therefore only state here that, during nearly the whole of this century, all the nations of Europe were very much occupied in rebuilding, repairing, and adorning their churches.⁴ Nor will this surprise us if we recollect the panic dread of the impending final judgment, and of the end of all things, which spread throughout Europe in the preceding century. For this panic, among other effects, led to neglect the repair of the churches and sacred edifices, as being soon to become useless and perish in the wreck of all things; so that they either actually fell to the ground or became greatly dilapidated. But this panic being past, they every where set about repairing the decayed churches, and vast sums were expended on their restoration.

CHAPTER V.

HISTORY OF THE SECTS AND HERESIES.

1. THE condition of the ancient sects, particularly the Nestorians and Monophysites, who were subject to the Mohammedans in Asia and Egypt, was very nearly the same as in the preceding century; not perfectly happy and exempt from all evils, nor absolutely wretched or miserable. But the Manichæans or Paulicians, whom the Greek emperors had transported from the provinces of the East to Bulgaria and Thrace, were in almost perpetual conflicts with the Greeks. The Greek writers throw all the blame on the Manichæans, whom they represent as turbulent, perfidious, always ready for war, and inimical to the empire.⁵ But there are many reasons which almost compel us to believe that the Greek bishops and priests, and by their instigation the emperors, gave much trouble and vexation to this people; and alienated their feelings by punishments, banishment, confiscation of their

¹ Bonā, ubi supra, p. 216; Le Brun, ubi supra, p. 292, &c.; Jo. de Ferreras, Hist. de l'Espagne, tome iii. p. 237, 241, 246 [Krazer, ubi supra, p. 76. — Mur.]

² Ussher, Hist. Dogmatica de Scripturis et Sacris Vernaculis, published with enlargement by Wharton, London, 1690, &c. [Yet we find in the canons of Ælfric, king of England, about A.D. 1050 (in Harduin, Concilia, tom. vi. par. i. p. 382, can. 23) that the priests were required on Sundays and other mass days to explain the lessons from the gospels in the English language, and to teach the people to repeat memoriter and to understand the Lord's prayer and the Apostles' creed in the same language. "Presbyter etiam, seu missalis sacerdos, in diebus Solis, et Missalis, evangelii ejus intellectum populo dicet Anglice et ipsorum etiam Patrum nostrorum et Credo toties quoties poterit ad eos instruendos adhibere, et ut symbolum fidei memoriter discant, Christianamque suam teneant confessionem." — Mur.] — [These canons are most correctly given, in Saxon and English, in the Ancient Laws and Institutes of England, edited by Mr. Thorpe and published by the Record Commissioners, p. 441, &c. Their compiler was Ælfred, the celebrated Anglo-Saxon writer and Archbishop of York, not king of England, as stated by Dr. Murdock. — R.]

³ See Renaudot, Dis. de Liturg. Oriental. Origine et Antiquitate, cap. vi. p. 40, &c.

⁴ Glaber Radulphus, Hist. lib. iii. cap. iv. in Du Chesne's Scriptores Francici, tom. iv. p. 217. "As the year 1003 approached there was almost the world over, but especially in Italy and France, a general repairing of the churches."

⁵ See Anna Comnena, Alexias, lib. v. p. 106, lib. vi. p. 124, 126, 145, and in other passages.

property, and other vexations. The emperor Alexius Comnenus, being a man of learning, and perceiving that the Manichæans could not easily be subdued by force, determined to try the effect of discussion and reasoning, and therefore spent whole days at Philippopolis in disputing with them. Not a few of them gave up to this august disputant and his associates; nor was this strange, for he employed not only arguments but also rewards and punishments. Those who retracted their errors, and consented to embrace the religion of the Greeks, were rewarded with rich presents, honours, privileges, lands, and houses; but those who resisted were condemned to perpetual imprisonment.¹

2. From Bulgaria and Thrace some of this sect, either from zeal to extend their religion or from weariness of Grecian persecutions, removed first into Italy, and then into other countries of Europe; and there gradually collected numerous congregations, with which the Roman pontiffs afterwards waged bloody wars.² At what time the migration of the Paulicians into Europe commenced, it is difficult to ascertain. But it is well attested that as early as the middle of this century, they were numerous in Lombardy and Insubria, and especially in Milan; nor is it less certain that persons of this sect strolled about in France, Germany, and other countries, and by their appearance of great sanctity captivated no small number of the common people. In Italy they were called Paterini and Cathari, or rather Gazari;

the last of which names, altered so as to suit the genius of their language, was adopted by the Germans.³ In France they were called Albigenes [Albigeois], from the town Albi.⁴ They were also called Bulgarians particularly in France, because they came formerly from Bulgaria where the patriarch of the sect resided; also Publicani, a corruption of Pauliciani, and Boni Homines [Good Men], and by other appellations.⁵

3. The first congregation of this sect in Europe is said to have been discovered at Orleans in France, A.D. 1017, in the reign of king Robert. An Italian woman is stated to have been its founder and teacher. Its principal men were ten canons of the church of the Holy Cross at Orleans, all eminent for their learning and piety, but especially two of them, Lisois and Stephen; the congregation was composed of numerous citizens and not of the lowest rank and condition. The impious doctrines maintained by those canons being made known by Heribert, a priest, and Arifastus, a Norman nobleman, king Robert assembled a council at Orleans,

¹ Of the name Paterini, given to this sect in Italy, we have already spoken, note i. p. 363. That the name Cathari was the same as Gazari, I have shown in another work, Hist. Ord. Apostolor. p. 367. The name Gazaria was given in that age to the country now called the Lesser Tartary [or Crim Tartary, or the Crimea. But the derivation of Cathari from Gazaria, a distant and then little known region, is by many deemed less probable than from the Greek καθαρῶν, the Pure. So also the derivation of the German Ketzler (Heretic) from Gazari or Chazari is by no means universally admitted. See Neander's Heilige Bernhard, &c. p. 314, &c.; Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. vol. xxiii. p. 350, &c. and Gieseler's Text-book, by Cunningham, vol. ii. p. 368, note vi.—Mur.

² That the Paulicians in France were called Albigenes, and are not to be confounded with the Waldenses and other heretics, is most manifest from the Records of the Inquisition at Toulouse. And they were called Albigenes because they were condemned in a council held A.D. 1176 at Albi (Albigea), a town of Aquitain. See Chatelet, Mémoires de l'Hist. de Langue-doc, p. 305, &c. They therefore mistake who suppose the Albigenes were certain heretics who either originated at Albi, or who resided there, or had their principal church there; they were rather the heretics condemned there. Yet there did live in the region of Albi some Paulicians, as well as many other classes of dissenters from the Church of Rome; and the name of Albigenes is often applied to all the heretics in that tract of country. [See, for a fuller illustration and confirmation of what is asserted in this note, Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. vol. xxix. p. 569, &c. also Hist. de Langue-doc, tome iii. note 13, p. 553, &c. and Fuesli's Kirchen-und Ketzlerhistorie der mittlern Zeit, vol. i.—Mur.

³ That these people were called Bulgarians, or as it was corruptly uttered Bougres, is fully shown by Du Fresne, Glossarium Latin. Medii ævi, tom. i. p. 1338. And the same Du Fresne, in his Observationes ad Felcharduini Historiam Constantinop. p. 169, has shown by abundant proofs, that the name Popoliciani or Publicani, given likewise to these Manichæans, is merely the name Pauliciani corruptly pronounced. The Paulicians called themselves Good Men, or Los Bos Homos, as the French pronounced it. See the Codex Inquit. Tolosana, p. 22, 84, 95, &c. but especially p. 131, &c.

¹ Anna Comnena (Alerias, lib. xiv. p. 357, &c.) is very full in her account and eulogy of this holy war of her father against the Paulicians.

² See Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Medii ævi, tom. v. p. 38, &c.; Limborch, Hist. Inquisitionis, p. 31; Richini, Dia. de Cathari, prefixed to Moneta's Summa contra Catharos, p. xvii. xviii. and others; not to mention Glaber Radulphus, Historia, lib. iii. c. viii. Matth. Paris, and other ancient writers. Some of the Italians, among whom is Richini, wish to deny that this sect was propagated from Italy into other parts of Europe; and would persuade us rather that the Paulicians came into Italy from France. For they would consider it a disgrace to their country to have been the first in Europe which fostered so absurd and impious a sect. These are countenanced by Peter de Marca, a Frenchman, who supposes (in his Hist. de Béarn, liv. viii. chap. xiv. p. 723), that when the French were returning from the crusades in Palestine, as they passed through Bulgaria, some Paulicians joined them, and thus first migrated to France. But De Marca brings no proof of his supposition; and on the contrary it appears from the records of the Inquisition of Toulouse, published by Limborch, and from other documents, that the Paulicians first settled in Sicily, Lombardy, Milan, and Liguria, and from thence sent their teachers and missionaries into France. See the Codex Tolosanus, p. 13, 14, 32, 68, 69, and in many other places. From the same Codex Tolosanus we learn that the Paulicians of Gaul had no bishops who could consecrate their presbyters, whom they called Anciani; so that such of the French as wished to become presbyters had to go into Italy to obtain regular consecration.

and left no means untried to bring them to a better mind. But nothing could induce them to give up the opinions they had embraced. They were therefore burned alive.¹ But the case of these men is involved in obscurity and perplexity. For they are extolled for their piety by their very enemies; and at the same time crimes are attributed to them which are manifestly false; at least the opinions for which they suffered death were in general quite different from the tenets of the Manichæans.² So far as I and then appear as a witness against them. He did so, and drew from them the following tenets: that Christ was not born of the Virgin Mary, did not suffer for mankind, was not really laid in the tomb, and did not rise from the dead; that in baptism there was no washing away of sins; nor were the body and blood of Christ in the sacrament consecrated by the priest; and that it was useless to pray to the saints and martyrs. Arefast wished to know then on what he could rely for salvation. They promised to purify him from all sin, and to impart to him the Holy Spirit, by laying their hands upon him; and that he should eat heavenly food and often see angels, and with them travel where he pleased with ease and despatch. The account then describes the heavenly food they talked of. At certain times the heretics met together by night, each with a lighted candle, and invoked the devil till he appeared to them. Then putting out their lights, they all debauched themselves promiscuously. The fruits of these horrid scenes, when eight days old, were murdered and burned to ashes, and the ashes so obtained constituted their heavenly food, and was so efficacious that whoever partook of it at all became an enthusiast of their sect, and could seldom ever after be recovered to a sound mind. While Arefast was thus learning the whole heresy, king Robert and his queen Constantia arrived at Orleans; and the next day he called a council of bishops, and apprehending a whole assembly of the heretics, arraigned them for trial. Here Arefast stated all he had learned from them. Stephen and Lisoi admitted that they held such doctrines. A bishop stating that Christ was born of the Virgin, because he could be so, and that he died and rose again to assure us of a resurrection, they replied that they were not present and could not believe it was so. Being asked how they could believe that they had a natural father and were born in the usual way, not having been present, they replied that what was according to nature they could believe, but not what was contrary to nature. They were then asked if they did not believe that God created all things from nothing by his Son. They replied, "Such things may be believed by carnal men who mind earthly things, and trust in the fictions of men written upon parchment; but we, who have a law written upon the inward man by the Holy Spirit, regard nothing but what we have learned from God the creator of all." They likewise asked the bishops to desist from questioning them, and to do with them what they saw fit; for they said they already saw their king in the heavens, who would receive them to his right hand and to heavenly joys. After a nine hours' trial the prisoners were first degraded from the priesthood, and then led away to the stake. As they passed the church door queen Constantia with a stick struck Stephen, who had been her confessor, and dashed out one of his eyes. Their bodies, together with the abominable ashes used by them, were consumed in the flames.—Such is the story as told by their enemies. It is reasonable to give them all the credit which their enemies allow to them, and to make abatement only from what is said to their disadvantage. The whole description of their infernal night meetings, and eating the ashes of murdered infants, is doubtless mere calumny. Their intelligence and the spotless purity of their lives are well attested. The account given of their doctrines is lame, and coming from those who were their inferiors in knowledge of the Scriptures, and so hostile as to burn them at the stake, it is impossible to ascertain what their real sentiments were.—Mur.

¹ The testimonies of the ancients respecting these heretics are collected by Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. i. p. 361, &c.; D'Argente, Collectio Judiciorum de Nominis Erroribus, tom. i. p. 5; Launo, De Scholis Celeberrimis Caroli M. cap. xxiv. p. 90. The proceedings of the council of Orleans, in which they were condemned, are given by D'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. i. p. 694, &c. [Two principal accounts of these heretics of Orleans have reached us. The one is that of Glaber Radulphus (Historia, lib. iii. cap. viii.); the other, which some ascribe to one Agano, a monk, is an anonymous account, but more full, and apparently deserving of at least as much credit, published by D'Achery, ubi supra. Both accounts are in Harduin, Councils, tom. vi. par. i. p. 821, &c. Glaber states, that in the year 1017 a very strange heresy was discovered at Orleans, said to have been introduced by an Italian woman, and which had long been spreading itself in secret. The leaders in this heresy were two clergymen of Orleans, respectable for their birth, education, and piety, named Heribert and Lisoi. Both were canons, and the latter was also master of the school in St. Peter's church, and enjoyed the friendship of the king and the court. These circumstances enabled them more easily to spread their errors at Orleans and in the neighbouring towns. They attempted to convert a presbyter of Rouen, and told him that the whole nation would soon be with them; but he divulged the subject to a nobleman of Rouen, and he again to king Robert. The monarch, equally distinguished for learning and piety, hastened away full of solicitude to Orleans, assembled there a number of bishops and abbots and some pious laymen, and commenced an examination of the heretics. The two leading men among them acknowledged that they anticipated a general reception of their doctrines; that they considered all that was taught in the Old Testament and the New, by miracles or otherwise, concerning a trinity in the Godhead, as being absurd; that the visible heavens and earth had always existed, as they now are, without an original author; that all acts of Christian virtue, instead of being meritorious, were superfluous; and like the Epicureans, they believed the crimes of the voluptuous would not meet with the recompense of punishment. Great efforts were made to convince them of their errors, but in vain; neither arguments nor threatenings could move them, for they expected a miraculous deliverance from death. Accordingly, when led out to the fire which was kindled for them, they all, thirteen in number, went exulting and voluntarily leaped into it. But they no sooner felt the fire consuming them than they cried out, that they had been deceived, and were about to perish for ever. The bystanders moved with pity made efforts to draw them from the flames, but without effect. They were reduced to ashes. Such others of the sect as were afterwards detected were in like manner put to death. And heresy being thus destroyed, the Catholic faith shone the more conspicuous.—The other and more full account differs from that of Glaber in several respects. It states that a Norman nobleman, named Arefast, had a clergyman in his house by the name of Herbert, who went to Orleans for the purpose of study. That two leaders among the heretics, Stephen and Lisoi, universally esteemed for their wisdom, their piety, and their beneficence, met with Herbert and instilled into him the poison of their heresy. When Herbert returned to the family of Arefast, he laboured to convert him. But Arefast was not to be seduced. He communicated the whole to count Richard, to be made known to the king, with a request that the king would take measures to suppress the heresy. King Robert directed Arefast to repair with his clergyman Herbert to Orleans, and there insinuate himself among the heretics, promising to come there himself shortly. Arefast was instructed by an aged priest of Chartres how to proceed. He was to receive the communion every day; and thus fortified, he was to go among the heretics, pretend to be captivated with their doctrines, and draw from them a full knowledge of their heresy,

² Basnage, in his Hist. des Eglises Réformées, tome i. period iv. p. 97, and in his Hist. Eccles. tom. ii. p. 1388, &c. defends the cause of these canons of Orleans. But this otherwise excellent and discerning man seems to have been carried too far, by his zeal for augmenting the number of the witnesses for the truth.

can judge, these Manichæans of Orleans were mystics, who despised the external worship of God, ascribed no efficacy to religious rites, not even to the sacraments, and supposed religion to consist in the internal contemplation of divine things, and the elevation of the soul to God. At the same time they philosophized respecting God, the three persons in the Godhead, and the soul of man, with more subtlety than the capacity of the age could comprehend. Persons of this description proceeded from Italy in the following centuries, spread over nearly all Europe, and were called in Germany Brethren of the Free Spirit, and in some other countries Beghards.¹

4. Better characters perhaps than these, certainly honest and candid though illiterate, were those men whom Gerhard, bishop of Cambray and Arras, reconciled to the church at the council of Arras A.D. 1030. These likewise received their doctrines from Italians, and particularly from one Gundulf. According to their own account, they supposed all religion to consist in pious exercises and in actions conformable to the law of God, while they despised all external worship. In particular (1.) they rejected baptism as a rite of no use as regards salvation, and especially the baptism of infants. (2.) The Lord's Supper they discarded for the same reason. (3.) They denied that churches are more holy than private houses. (4.) Altars they pronounced to be heaps of stones, and therefore worthy of no reverence. (5.) They disapproved of the use of incense and of holy oil in religious worship. (6.) The ringing of bells or signals, as bishop Gerhard calls them, they would not tolerate. (7.) They denied that ministers of religion, bishops, presbyters, and deacons, were of divine appointment, and maintained that the church could exist without an order of teachers. (8.) They contended that funeral rites were invented by the priesthood to gratify their avarice, and that it was of no consequence whether a person were buried in the church-yard or in some other place. (9.) Penance as then practised, that is, punishments voluntarily endured for sins, they deemed of no use. (10.) They denied that the sins of the dead who are in the world of torment or in purgatory can be expiated by masses, by gifts to the poor, and by vicarious penance; and doubtless they rejected the idea of purgatory itself. (11.) They held marriage to be pernicious, and condemned it in all cases.² (12.) They allowed indeed some reverence to be paid to the apostles and to the martyrs; but to confessors (by whom they intended those denominated saints and who had not suffered death for Christ's sake) they would have no reverence paid, declaring that their corpses were no better than those of other persons. (13.) The custom of chanting in churches and religious assemblies they represented as superstitious and unlawful. (14.) They denied a cross to be more holy than other wood, and therefore refused it any honour. (15.) They would have the images of Christ and the saints to be removed from the churches, and receive no kind of adoration. (16.) Finally, they were displeased with the difference of rank, and of powers and prerogatives, among the clergy.³ Whoever considers the defects in the prevailing religion and doctrines of that age, will not think it strange that many persons throughout Europe, possessing good understandings and pious feelings, should have fallen into such sentiments as these.

5. Towards the close of this century, about the year 1089, a more subtle controversy was raised in France by Roscelin, a canon of Compeigne, who was not the lowest among the dialecticians of the age, and a principal doctor in the sect of the Nominalists. He maintained that it could not be conceived at all how the Son of God could assume human nature without the Father and the Holy Spirit's doing the same, unless we supposed the three persons in the Godhead to be three things or separately existing natures (such as three angels are or three human souls), though those three divine things might have one will and one power. Being told that this opinion would imply that there are three Gods, he boldly replied that were it not for the harshness of the expression it might be truly said there are three Gods.⁴ He was compelled

¹ I cannot easily believe this was altogether so. I should rather suppose that these people did not wholly condemn matrimony, but only judged celibacy to be more holy than the married state.

² See the Synodus Atrabatenis, in D'Achery's Spi-cilegium, tom. i. p. 607—624; Argentre's Collectio Judicior. de Nonis Erroribus, tom. i. p. 7. [See also Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. vol. xxiii. p. 324, &c.—Mur.]

³ Thus his sentiments are stated by John who accused him to Anselm in an Epistle which is published by Baluze, Miscell. tom. iv. p. 478; also by Anselm of Canterbury in his book De Fide Trinitatis, written against Roscelin, Opp. tom. i. p. 41, 42, and in tom. ii. p. 358, Epist. lib. ii. ep. xxxv.; and lastly, by Folco of Beauvais, in Anselm's Opp. p. 357, Epist. lib. ii. ep.

¹ Of this class of people we shall treat hereafter in the thirteenth century; at which period they were first drawn from their concealment into full view, and condemned in many councils, especially in Germany. Yet they had long before been working their way in secret. This sect held some opinions in common with the Manichæans; whence the undiscerning theologians of those times might easily be led to regard them as a branch of the Manichæans to condemn this error in the council of Soissons, A.D. 1092, but as soon as the danger was past he resumed it. He was then ordered to quit the country. While

xii. But all these were adversaries of Roscelin, who may be supposed either to have perverted his meaning, or not to have understood it correctly. And Anselm himself leads me to have much hesitation and doubt; for while he regarded the Nominalists, of whom Roscelin was the head, with no little hatred, yet he concedes in his book, De Fide Trinitatis, that the opinion of his opponent may be admissible in a certain sense; he frequently states that he does not know certainly what his views were, and even says that he suspects they were less exceptionable than his adversaries represented them. De Fide Trinitatis, cap. iii. p. 44. He says: "But perhaps he (Roscelin) does not say, just as three human souls or three angels are; but he who communicated his sentiments to me might make this comparison without any authority for it, while he (Roscelin) only affirmed that the three persons are three things without adding any comparison." So in his forty-first Epist. book ii. p. 357, being about to state Roscelin's opinion, he prefaces it thus: "Which however I cannot believe without hesitation." The reader I think will clearly see that Anselm, the determined enemy of the Nominalists, distrusted the candour and fairness of Roscelin's accusers in describing his opinions, and supposed him to be less erroneous than they represented. If I do not mistake, this whole controversy originated from the hot disputes between the Nominalists and the Realists. The Realists seem to have drawn this inference from the principles of the Nominalists, of whom Roscelin was the head: If, as an exile in England he raised new commotions, contentiously maintaining, among other things, that the sons of priests and all born out of wedlock should never be admitted to the rank of clergymen, which was a very odious doctrine in those times. Being expelled from England for these things he returned to France, and residing at Paris renewed the old contention. But being pressed and harassed on all sides by his adversaries, he at last went to Aquitaine, and spent the remainder of his life there devoutly and peacefully.¹

you suppose, universal subjects are mere words and names, and the whole science of dialectics is concerned only with names, then doubtless the three persons in the Godhead will be in your view not three things, but only three names. By no means, answered Roscelin; the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are not mere names, but belong to the class of things. But while shunning Scylla he ran upon Charybdis; for his enemies thence inferred that he taught the existence of three Gods. If any of Roscelin's own writings were now extant, a better estimate could be formed of this controversy.

¹ Bulæus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. i. p. 485, 489; Mabillon's Annales Benedict. tom. v. p. 262; Hist. Littér. de la France, tome ix. p. 358, &c.; Pagl, Critica in Baronium, ad ann. 1094, tom. iv. p. 317, &c.; Longueval, Hist. de l'Eglise Gallicane, tome lii. p. 59, &c.

CENTURY TWELFTH.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS OF THE CHURCH.

1. A CONSIDERABLE part of the inhabitants of Europe, especially in its northern regions, were still ignorant of Christianity and devoted to the foolish superstitions of their ancestors. In the conversion of these, therefore, the zealous in religion occupied themselves in this century, yet not all of them with equal success or equal discretion. Boleslaus, duke of Poland, after vanquishing the Pomeranians, concluded a peace with them, on the condition that they should allow the Christian religion to be freely preached and expounded to them. Accordingly Otto, bishop of Bamberg, a man distinguished in this age for his zeal in propagating Christianity, was sent among them for this purpose in the year 1124. He baptized a considerable number, but was utterly unable to overcome the obstinacy of many. On his return to Germany a large part of those baptized by him relapsed into idolatry. He therefore took another journey into Pomerania in the year 1126, and amidst many difficulties succeeded in strengthening and extending the feeble church there.¹ From this time onward Christianity became so established among the Pomeranians, that Adalbert could be ordained as their first bishop.

2. Waldemar I. king of Denmark, obtained very great fame by the many wars he undertook against the pagan nations, the Slaves, the Wends, the Vandals, and others. He fought not only for the interests of his subjects but for the extension of Christianity; and wherever he was successful, he demolished the temples and images of the gods with their altars and groves, and commanded Christian worship to be set up. In particular he subdued, in the year 1168, the whole island of Rugen which lies near to Pomerania; and now he compelled its ferocious, savage, piratical inhabitants who had been addicted to senseless superstitions, to hear Christian preachers and to embrace the Christian religion. The king's designs were promoted and executed by Absalom, archbishop of Lund, a man of talents whom the king employed as his chief counsellor on all subjects.²

3. The Finns who infested Sweden with frequent inroads, were attacked by Eric IX. king of Sweden, called St. Eric after his death, and were subdued by him after many bloody battles. As to the year when this took place historians disagree.³ The vanquished nation was commanded to follow the religion of the conqueror, which most of them did with reluctance and disgust.⁴ The shepherd and guardian assigned to this new church was Henry, archbishop of Upsal, who had accompanied the king. But as he treated these new Christians too rigorously and attempted to punish severely

¹ See Canisius, Lect. Antiq. tom. III. par. II. p. 34, where is a Life of Otto, whom Clement III. in the year 1189, enrolled in the catalogue of saints. See the Acta Sanctor. mensis Julii, tom. I. p. 349, &c.; Cramer, Chronicle of the Church of Pomerania, book I. written in German; Schötgen's German tract on the conversion of the Pomeranians by Otto, Stutgard, 1724, 4to; Mabillon's Annal. Benedict. tom. vi. p. 123, 146, 323. [Likewise Bugenhagen's Pomerania, published by Balthasar, Greifswald, 1728, 4to, p. 33, 64, 78, &c. The precepts given by this apostle to his new converts were designed chiefly to wean them from their superstitious practices. They did not go into the essentials of Christianity. They must observe Sundays and the feast-days, they must fast, must bring their children to be baptized with certain formalities at Whitsuntide, must not murder their daughters as formerly, must refrain from polygamy, must not marry their godmothers, and in general must refrain from marrying kindred within the sixth and seventh degrees; they must not bury the bodies of Christians among those of pagans, must build no idol temples, consult no soothsayer, eat nothing that is unclean, do penance often, &c. See the Chron. Urspurg. et Halberstadt. ad ann. 1124.—Schl.

² Saxo Grammaticus, Hist. Danica, lib. xiv. p. 239; Helmsold, Chron. Slavorum, lib. II. cap. xii. p. 234, with the note there of Bangert; Pontoppidan, Annal. Eccles. Danica, tom. I. p. 404, &c. [Schroëckh's Kirchengesch. vol. xxv. p. 245, &c.—Mur.

³ Most of them, with Baronius, refer it to the year 1151. Vastovius places it in 1150, and Oernhielmus in 1157.

⁴ Oernhielmus, Hist. Eccles. Gentis Suecorum, lib. IV. cap. IV. sec. xiii.; Loccenius, Hist. Suecica, lib. III. p. 76, ed. Francf.; Erlundus, Vita Erici Sancti, cap. vii.; Vastovius, Vitis Aquilonia, &c. p. 65, &c.

a man of great influence who had committed murder, he was himself massacred, and the pontiff, Hadrian IV. enrolled him among the saints.¹

4. Towards the close of the century, perhaps in the year 1186, some merchants of Bremen or of Lubec trading to Livonia, took along with them Mainhard, a regular canon of St. Augustine in the monastery of Segeberg in Holsatia [Holstein], to bring that warlike and uncivilized nation to the Christian faith. But as very few would listen to him, Mainhard consulted the Roman pontiff, who created him the first bishop of the Livonians, and decreed that war should be waged against the opposers.² This war, first waged with the Esthonians, was extended farther and prosecuted more vigorously by Berthold, the second bishop of the Livonians, after the death of Mainhard; for this Berthold, formerly abbot of Lucca, marched with a strong army from Saxony and recommended Christianity, not by arguments but by slaughter and battle.³ Following his example the third bishop Albert, previously a canon of Bremen, entered Livonia in the year 1198, well supported by a fresh army raised in Saxony, and fixing his camp at Riga he instituted by authority of Innocent III. the Roman pontiff, the military order of knights-sword-bearers, who should compel the Livonians by force of arms to submit to baptism.⁴ New forces were marched from time to time from Germany, by whose valour and that of the sword-bearers the wretched people were subdued and exhausted, so that they at last substituted the images of Christ and the saints in place of their idols. The bishops and knights partitioned out among themselves the lands most unjustly wrested from the ancient possessors.⁵

5. The subjugation and conversion of the Slavonians, who inhabited the shores of the Baltic and were most inveterate enemies of the Christians, gave employment to both civil and ecclesiastical rulers during nearly the whole century. Among them prince Henry the Lion was distinguished. Among other measures conducive to the renovation of the Slavonian character, he restored and liberally endowed three bishoprics in Slavonia beyond the Elbe, namely, Ratzeburg, Aldenburg, [Oldenburg], which was soon after transferred to Lubec, and Schwerin.⁶ Among the religious teachers who assailed the ignorance and stupidity of this barbarous nation, the most distinguished was Vicelin of Hameln, a man who had few equals in that age, and who, from presiding over the regular canons of St. Augustine at Faldern, was at length made bishop of Aldenburg. For nearly thirty years, from A.D. 1124 to A.D. 1154, the time of his death, he laboured amidst innumerable difficulties, indefatigably, perseveringly, and successfully, in instructing the Slavonians and alluring them to Christianity. He also performed many other praiseworthy deeds which have rendered his name immortal.⁷

¹ See the Origines Livonie seu Chronicon vetus Livonicum, published with copious notes, Francof. 1740, fol. by Gruber, who in his notes mentions and corrects all the other writers on the subject. [We have also three epistles of Pope Innocent III. relating to the conversion of the Livonians. The first is addressed to all the Christians in Saxony and Westphalia; the second to the Christians in the countries of the Slavonians; and the third to the believers beyond the Elbe. In these the Pope commands those who were under vows of pilgrimage to Rome, to substitute for them a crusade against the Livonians. Raynald, Annales ad ann. 1199, No. 38, and Cod. Diplom. Polon. tom. v. p. 1.—Schl. [See also a full account of these conversions in Tooke's View of the Russian Empire, vol. i. p. 539-62, Lond. 1799, 3 vols. 8vo.—Mur.

² See the Origines Guelficæ, tom. iii. p. 16, 19, 34, 41, 55, 61, 63, 72, 82, and the valuable Preface of Scheidius, sec. xiv. p. 41; Ludewig's Reliquia Manuscriptorum, tom. vi. p. 230, &c.; Jo. Ern. De Westphalen's Monumenta inedita Rerum Cambricar. et Megapolens. tom. ii. p. 1598, &c. [According to Helmold in his Chronicon. Slavor. lib. i. cap. 69, it was Hartwich, archbishop of Hamburg who re-established these bishoprics. From the same Helmold it appears why the Slavonians so long opposed Christianity. They were drained by oppressive contributions and were refused the privileges enjoyed by Saxons. Pribešlav, a Pomeranian chief, said to the bishop who would convert him: "Dentur nobis jura Saxonum in prediis et redditibus, et libenter erimus Christiani, ædificabimus ecclesias, dabimus decimas," &c.—Schl.

³ A particular account of Vicelin is given by Müller, in his Cimbria Literata, tom. ii. p. 910, &c.; and by Lambecius, in his Res Hamburg. lib. ii. p. 12, and by others. But the illustrious De Westphalen has exceeded all others in diligence in his Origines Neomaster. et Bordesholmen. which are extant in the Monumenta inedita Cimbrica, tom. ii. p. 2344, &c. The preface of this volume also deserves to be consulted, p. 33, &c.; it also contains an engraved likeness of Vicelin.

¹ Vastovius, Vitis Aquilonia seu Vita Sanctior. Regni Sueogothici, p. 62; Benzellius, Monumenta Ecclesiæ Sueogothicæ, par. i. p. 33, &c.

² The apostles of those times, according to the example of the successors of St. Peter in that age, made use of the double sword, first the spiritual, and where this was ineffectual, the material sword. And this last Mainhard knew well how to use. In the war against the Lettes or Lithuanians, he taught his Livonians the art of erecting fortified castles, and in general a better method of carrying on war. His lieutenant was Dietrich, a Cistercian monk, who was afterwards bishop of Esthonia. He also was Mainhard's envoy to the Pope, who proffered indulgences to all that would assume the cross and march against the Livonians.—Schl.

³ Berthold was a Cistercian and was appointed successor to Mainhard in the year 1196, by the archbishop of Bremen, who wished to enlarge his province by the addition of Livonia. His first expedition to Livonia was unsuccessful. The Livonians believed that he came among them only to enrich himself out of them, and he found it best to make his escape. When he returned with an armed force in 1198 the Livonians killed him. But the army of crusaders so terrified the inhabitants that they admitted clergymen among them, though these they soon after chased out of the country.—Schl.

⁴ See Schurzleisch, Hist. Ordinis Eniferorum Equitum, Wittenb. 1701, 8vo.

6. It is scarcely necessary to repeat here, what has several times been remarked already, that barbarous nations brought into the pale of the Christian church in this manner, became disciples of Christ in name only and not in reality. The religion taught them was not the pure and simple doctrine which Christ taught, but a method of appeasing God by ceremonies and external acts, in several respects very nearly allied to the religion which they were required to abandon. Take away the history and the name of Christ, the sign of the cross, some prayers, and a disagreement in rites, and it will not be difficult to reconcile both to each other, to a great extent. Besides, many practices were still tolerated among these nations which were wholly inconsistent with the nature of Christianity, and which betrayed very great impiety; for the priests, with but few exceptions, did not labour to remove the spiritual maladies of their minds and to unite their souls to God, but to advance their own interests and those of the Roman pontiff, by extending and establishing their dominion.

7. In Asiatic Tartary, near to Cathay,¹ a great revolution took place near the beginning of this century very favourable to the cause of Christianity. For on the death of Coiremechan, or as others call him Kenchan, a very powerful king of the eastern regions of Asia at the close of the preceding century, a certain priest of the Nestorians inhabiting those countries, whose name was John, made so successful an attack upon the kingdom while destitute of a head, that he gained possession of it, and from a presbyter became the sovereign of a great empire. This was the famous Prester John, whose country was for a long time deemed by the Europeans the seat of all felicity and opulence. Because he had been a presbyter before he gained the kingdom, most persons continued to call him Prester John after he had acquired royal dignity.² His regal name was Ungchan. The exalted opinion of the power and riches of this Prester John entertained by the Greeks and Latins arose from this, that being elated

33. [This bishop had come to Rome to obtain the decision by an umpire of the controversies between the Armenian and Greek churches. On this occasion he related that a few years before, one John who lived in the extremities of the east, beyond Persia and Armenia, and was both a king and a priest, had with his people become a Nestorian Christian; that he had vanquished the Median and Persian kings, and attempted to march to the aid of the church at Jerusalem, but was obliged to desist from the enterprise because he was unable to pass the Tigris. This king was descended from the Magians mentioned in the gospel, and was so rich that he had a sceptre of emerald.—Schl.] William Rubruquis, Voyage, c. xviii. p. 36, in the Antiqua in Adam lineria, collected by Gerberon, and Alberic, Chronicon, ad ann. 1165 and 1170, in Leibnitz's Accessiones Historice, tom. ii. p. 345 and 355, and others. It is strange that these testimonies should have been disregarded by learned men, and that so many disputes should have arisen respecting Prester John and the region in which he lived, and should have continued down even to our times. But such is the human character, that what has most simplicity and plainness is despised, and what is marvellous and obscure is preferred. Peter Covillanus, who was directed in the fifteenth century by John II. king of Portugal, to make inquiries respecting the kingdom of Prester John, when he arrived in Abyssinia with his companions, on discovering many things in the emperor of the Abyssinians or Ethiopians analogous to what was then currently reported in Europe respecting Prester John, supposed that he had discovered that John whom he was ordered to inquire after. And he easily persuaded the Europeans, then scarcely emerged from barbarism, to fall in with his opinions. See John Morin, De Sacris Ecclesie Ordinationibus, par. ii. p. 367, &c. But in the seventeenth century many writings having been brought to light which had been unknown, the learned in great numbers abandoned this Portuguese conjecture, and agree that Prester John must have reigned in Asia; but they still disagreed as to the location of his kingdom and some other points. Yet there are some even in our times, and among the most learned men, who choose to give credit to the Portuguese, though supported by no proofs and authorities, that the Abyssinian emperor is that mighty Prester John, rather than follow the many contemporary and competent witnesses. See Renaudot, Hist. Patriarch. Alexandrin. p. 223, 337; Laftau, Hist. des Découvertes des Portugais, tome i. p. 58, and tome iii. p. 57; Henr. le Grand, Diss. de Johanni Presbyt. in Lobo's Voyage d'Abyssinie, tome i. p. 295, &c. [See above, note i. p. 322, and Mosheim's Hist. Tartaror. Eccles. p. 16, &c. Baronius, Annuales, ad ann. 1177, sec. 55, gives us the title of an epistle written by pope Alexander III. to Prester John, which shows that he was an Indian prince and a priest: "Alexander Episcopus, servus servorum Dei, charissimo in Christo filio illustri et magnifico Indorum regi, sacerdotum sanctissimo, salutem et Apostolicam benedictionem."—Mur. [That the Dalai Lama was the Prester John is denied by Paulsen, the real author of Mosheim's Hist. Tartaror. Eccles. Yet more recently Joh. Eberh. Fischer in his Introduction to the History of Siberia, p. 81 (in German), has maintained this opinion, and endeavoured to show that the Dalai Lonna (Lama), and Prester John are the same person; and that the latter name is a fictitious word which the Europeans did not correctly understand. And whoever is sensible how low a people may sink under the influence of superstition, will not deem the idolatry of the Thibetians full proof that the Grand Lama and Prester John could not be the same person. At least, if reliance may be put upon the accounts of the Augustinian eremite George (of which Gatterer's Algem. Hist. Bibl. contains an extract), it was in the beginning of the twelfth century that the regal power in Thibet was first joined with that of the Grand Lama; which is a new argument in favour of Fischer's opinion. See the Hist. Bibl. vol. liv. p. 191.—Schl. [But this hypo-

¹ In Marco Paolo and the oriental geographers, the names of Cathay and Mangi distinguish the northern and southern empires, which from A.D. 1234 to 1279 were those of the great Khan and of the Chinese. The search for Cathay, after China had been found, excited and misled our navigators of the sixteenth century in their attempts to discover the north-east passage. Gibbon's Decl. and Fall, vol. xi. p. 400.—R.

² The statements here made respecting the famous Prester John, whom our ancestors from the twelfth century onwards supposed to be the greatest and most prosperous of all kings, not only have the greatest appearance of probability among all the accounts which are given of him, but are also supported by the testimony of writers of candour and the most worthy of credit; namely, William of Tripoli (see Du Fresnoy, notes to Joinville's Vie de St. Louis, p. 89), a Dominikan and bishop of Gabul, in Otto of Frisingen's Chron. lib. vii. c.

with his prosperity and the success of his wars with the neighbouring nations, he sent ambassadors and letters to the Roman emperor Frederic I. to the Greek emperor Manuel, and to other sovereigns, in which he extravagantly proclaimed his own majesty and wealth and power, exalting himself above all the kings of the earth; and this boasting of the vain-glorious man the Nestorians laboured with all their power to confirm.¹ He was succeeded by his son or brother, whose proper name was David, but who was also generally called Prester John. This prince was vanquished and slain near the close of the century, by that mighty Tartar emperor Genghiskan.

8. The new kingdom of Jerusalem in Syria, established in the preceding century by the French, seemed at the beginning of this century to flourish and to stand firm. But this prosperity was soon succeeded by adversity; for most of the crusaders having returned home, and the Christian generals and princes who remained in Palestine being more attentive to their private interests than to the public good, the Mohammedans recovered from their sudden terror and consternation, and collecting troops and resources on every side, attacked and harassed the Christians with perpetual wars. During many years they opposed the enemy with valour; but when Atabec Zenghi,² after a long siege, had taken the city of Edessa and seemed disposed to attack Antioch, the courage of the Christians began to fail. They therefore implored the succour of the Christian kings of Europe, and with tears supplicated for new armies of crusaders. The Roman pontiffs favoured these petitions, and left no means untried to persuade the emperor and the other sovereigns to undertake another expedition to Palestine.

9. This new crusade was long a subject of debate in several popular assemblies and in the councils. At length, under the pontiff Eugene III. the celebrated abbot of Clairvaux in France, St. Bernard, a man of immense influence, brought the question to an issue. For when, in the year 1146, he preached the cross (as the phrase then was) in both France and Germany, but especially in a public assembly of the French at Vezelay, and promised in the name of God great victories and a most prosperous issue to the enterprise, Lewis VII. king of the French, his queen, and a vast number of nobles who were present, devoted themselves to the sacred war.³ Conrad III. emperor of the Germans, at first resisted the admonitions of St. Bernard; but after some delay, he followed the example of the French king. Both therefore proceeded towards Palestine with very numerous armies, by different routes. But the greater part of both armies perished miserably on the road, either by famine or by shipwreck, or by the sword of the Mohammedans, to whom they were betrayed by the perfidious Greeks, who feared the Latins more than they did the Mohammedans. Lewis VII. left his country in the year 1147, and arrived at Antioch in the month of March in the following year, with a small army, and much exhausted by its sufferings. Conrad commenced his march in the month of May, 1147, and in November of the same year joined Lewis at Nice, having lost the greater part of his troops by the way. Both proceeded to Jerusalem in the year 1148, and they led back to Europe the few soldiers who survived in the year 1149; for these princes were unable to effect anything, among other causes, on account of the disagreement between them. The only effect of this second crusade was to drain Europe of a great portion of its wealth, and of a vast number of its inhabitants.⁴

thesis of Fischer seems to be fully subverted by the arguments of Mosheim and Paulsen, Hist. Tartaror. Eccles. p. 137, &c. See Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. vol. xxv. p. 192.—Mur.

¹ Milman in his edition of Gibbon remarks—"The extent to which Nestorian Christianity prevailed among the Tartar tribes is one of the most curious questions in Oriental history. M. Schmidt (Geschichte der Ost Mongolen, notes, p. 383) appears to question the Christianity of Ong Chaghan [the Ungchan of Mosheim] and his Kerait subjects." According to Schlosser (Weltgeschichte, &c. vol. iii. par. ii. p. 268), the name was Wamchan, and the residence of this prince and his successors was Karakorum, south of the lake Balkal.—R.

² Atabec was an official title given by the Seljukian emperors, or Sultans, to the lieutenants or viceroys whom they placed over certain provinces. The Latin historians of the crusades, of whom a catalogue is collected by Bongarsius, call this Atabec Zenghi, Sanguinus. See Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient. article Atabec, p. 142. [Gibbon says—"The corruption of the name of Zenghi to Sanguin afforded the Latins a comfortable allusion to his sanguinary character and end: fit sanguine sanguinolentus." Decl. and Fall, vol. xi. p. 117.—R.

³ Specimens of Bernard's impassioned appeals in support of this second crusade are given by Neander in his Der heil. Bernard u. sein. Zeitalter, and by Wilkins in his Geschichte der Kreuzzüge, vol. iii. par. i.—R.

⁴ Besides the historians of the crusades mentioned by Bongarsius, see Mabillon's Annales Benedict. tom. vi. p. 399, 404, 407, 417, 451, &c.; Gervais, Hist. de l'abbé Suger, tome iii. p. 104, 128, 173, 190, 239, &c. This Suger, a famous abbot of St. Denis, was left by Lewis VII. to govern his kingdom during his absence. Vertot, Hist. des Chevaliers de Malte, tome i. p. 86, &c.; Masceon, De Rebus Imperii sub Conrado III. [The French army of crusaders consisted of above 100,000 armed men, of whom 70,000 were mounted

10. Yet the unhappy issue of this second crusade did not render the Christian cause in the East absolutely desperate. If the Christian princes had attacked the enemy with their combined strength and acted in harmony, they would have had little to fear. But all the Latins, and especially their chiefs, abandoning themselves without restraint to ambition, avarice, injustice, and other vices, weakened each other by their mutual contentions, jealousies, and broils. Hence a valiant general of the Mohammedans, Salaheddin, whom the Latins called Saladin, viceroy or rather king of Egypt and Syria, assailed the Christians in the most successful manner, captured Guy of Lusignan, the king of Jerusalem, in the fatal battle of Tiberias, A.D. 1187; and in the same year reduced Jerusalem under his power.¹ After this ruinous campaign the hopes of the Christians in the East rested wholly on the aid to be derived from the kings of Europe. And this aid the Roman pontiff obtained for them, after much and repeated solicitations; yet the issue equalled neither his designs, wishes, nor efforts.

11. The third crusade was commenced by the emperor Frederic I. surnamed Barbarossa, who with a large army of Germans traversed the provinces of Greece in the year 1189, and after surmounting numerous difficulties in Asia Minor and vanquishing the forces of a Mohammedan king resident at Iconium, penetrated into Syria. But the next year he unfortunately lost his life in the river Saleph, which passes by Seleucia, in a manner unknown, and a great part of his soldiers returned to Europe. The others continued the war under Frederic, the son of the deceased emperor; but the plague swept away very many of them, carrying off at length their general, the emperor's son, in the year 1191, when the rest dispersed and very few of them returned to their own country.²

12. The emperor Frederic was followed in the year 1190 by Philip Augustus, king of France, and Richard, surnamed the Lion-hearted, king of England. Both these went by sea, and reached Palestine with a body of chosen troops in the year 1191. Their first battle with the enemy was not unsuccessful; but in July of that year after the reduction of the city of Acre, the king of France returned to Europe, leaving however a part of his troops in Palestine. After his departure the king of England prosecuted the war with vigour, and not only vanquished Saladin in several battles, but also took Jaffa and Cesarea, cities of Palestine. But being deserted by the French and Italians, and moved also by other reasons of great weight, in the year 1192 he concluded a truce with Saladin for three years, three months, and three days; and soon after left Palestine with his troops.³ Such was the issue of the third crusade, which drained Germany, England, and France, both of men and money, but afforded very little advantage to the Christian cause in Asia.

13. During these wars of the Christians with the Mohammedans for the possession

culturassiers, and the rest infantry. The German army was of about the same number. The emperor moved first, pursuing a direct course through Hungary, Bulgaria, and Thrace, to Constantinople, where he was to wait for the arrival of the king. But the Greek emperor received him coldly, and by artifices induced him to cross the Dardanelles and proceed towards Palestine. The Grecian guides assigned him led him into desolate and dangerous positions in Lycæa, where the Mohammedans attacked and nearly destroyed his army. After the loss of all his baggage he was obliged to turn back with but a handful of men. The French army proceeded from Metz, crossed the Rhine at Worms and the Danube at Ratisbon, passed through Hungary, and arrived safely at Constantinople. There they were told the German army had proceeded on and were very successful against the infidels. Lewis now passed the straits and was at Nice when Conrad returned with the remnant of his ruined army. The sovereigns continued together for a few days and commenced their march southerly along the coast. But the emperor thinking it not honourable for him to attend a camp in which he had no command, returned to Constantinople and afterwards embarked for the Holy Land. Lewis led his army through Asia Minor, bending his course into the interior to avoid passing the large rivers near their mouths. The Mohammedans hovered around him, cut off his supplies, and at length attacked him in the mountains of Laodicea to great advantage, destroyed a large part of his army, and came near to capturing the king himself. At length he arrived with the wreck of his army at Attalia, the capital of Pamphylia, where the Greeks drained them of their resources, and so embarrassed their proceeding by land that the king, with part of his troops, was obliged to embark on board the few vessels he could obtain, leaving the remainder of his army to fight their way by land if they could. Those he thus left all perished. He and those with him arrived safe in Palestine. The emperor also rejoined him with a few troops. Their united forces formed but a small army; yet they would have been able to reduce Damascus if the Christian princes of the east had not disagreed and thus embarrassed their operations. The siege was abandoned, the sovereigns visited Jerusalem as pilgrims, and at length returned to Europe with less than a tenth part of the men who had enlisted in the crusade.—Mur. [Those who wish to trace the routes of the various crusades, will find a map on which they are carefully marked, in the 11th volume of Milman's Gibbon's Decl. and Fall, &c. There is also a similar chart in Michaud, Hist. des Croisades, vol. 1. with two useful maps illustrating the extent of the short-lived Christian kingdoms in the East, in the 3d and 6th volumes.—R.

¹ See the Arab Bohadin's Life of Saladin, which Schultens published in Arabic with a Latin translation, Leyden, 1782. fol. cap. xxiv. &c. p. 66, &c.; add Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient. article. Salaheddin, p. 472.

&c.; and Marigny, Hist. des Arabes, tome iv. p. 289, &c.; [and Gibbon's Decline and Fall, ch. 59.—Mur.

² These events are best illustrated by the celebrated Count de Bünau, in his life of Frederic I. written in German, p. 278, 293, 309, 333, &c.

³ Daniel, Hist. de France, tome iii. p. 426, &c.; Rapin, Hist. d'Angleterre, tome ii. p. 251, &c. [Hume's Hist. of England, ch. x. vol. 1. p. 403, &c.] Marigny, Hist. des Arabes, tome iv. p. 285, &c.

of the Holy Land, arose the three celebrated equestrian or military orders, whose business it was to clear the roads of robbers, to harass the Mohammedans with perpetual warfare, to afford assistance to the poor and the sick among pilgrims to the holy places, and to perform any other services which the public exigencies seemed to require. The first of these orders, the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, derived their name from an hospital in the city of Jerusalem consecrated to St. John the Baptist, in which certain pious and charitable brethren were accustomed to receive and afford relief to the needy and the sick visitants of Jerusalem. After the establishment of the kingdom of Jerusalem this hospital gradually acquired, from the liberality of pious persons, larger revenues than were requisite for the object of relieving the poor and the sick; and its president or master, Raymund du Puy, about the year 1120, with his brethren, offered to the king of Jerusalem to make war upon the Mohammedans at his own expense. The king approved the plan, and the Roman pontiffs confirmed it by their authority. Thus at once and to the surprise of all, from being attendants on the poor and the sick, removed from all bustle and noise, they became military characters; and the whole order was divided into three classes: knights or soldiers who were of noble birth, and whose business it was to fight for religion; priests who conducted the religious exercises of the order; and serving brethren, that is, soldiers of ignoble birth. This order exhibited the greatest feats of valour, and thus procured immense wealth. After the loss of Palestine the knights passed into the island of Cyprus; they afterwards occupied the island of Rhodes and held it a long time; when expelled from Rhodes by the Turks they obtained from Charles V. the possession of the island of Malta,¹ where their grand master still resides.²

14. The second order was wholly military, that is, it did not embrace both soldiers and priests. It was called the order of Templars from a house situated near the temple of Solomon in Jerusalem, which Balduin II. the king of Jerusalem gave to the knights temporarily, for their first residence. The order commenced A.D. 1118 at Jerusalem, and had for its founders Hugo de Paganis (Hugues des Payens), Godfrey de S. Amore (or St. Omer), and seven others whose names are not known. It obtained A.D. 1128 its full establishment and its rule from the council of Troyes in France.⁴ These knights were required to defend the Christian religion by force of arms, to guard the highways, and to protect the pilgrims to Palestine from the cruelties and robberies of the Mohammedans. By its valour this order likewise acquired great fame and vast wealth; but, at the same time, by its pride, luxury, cruelty, and other vices, incurred peculiar odium, which rose so high at last that the order was wholly suppressed by a decree of the pontiff and of the council of Vienne.⁵

15. The third order, that of the Teutonic knights of St. Mary of Jerusalem, was similar to the first in requiring care of the poor and the sick as well as military service. It originated A.D. 1190 at the siege of Acre or Ptolemais, yet some place its obscure beginnings somewhat earlier and at Jerusalem. During this siege some pious and benevolent Germans undertook to provide accommodations for sick and wounded soldiers; and the undertaking so pleased the German princes who were present, that they concluded to establish an association for that object, to be composed of German knights. The Roman pontiff, Celestine

¹ See Mabillon, Annales Benedict. tom. vi. p. 159, &c. [Mabillon there says: "Their rule was taken almost verbatim from that of St. Benedict, and consisted of the same number of chapters, viz. 72. Many persons suppose that it was drawn up by St. Bernard." Their rule received modifications from time to time; but their earliest regulations were the following:—The knights shall attend the entire religious services by day and by night; and if any one is prevented from attending by his military duties, he shall repeat thirteen Paternosters in place of matins, nine in place of vespers, and seven in place of each of the minor canonical hours. For each deceased brother 100 Paternosters shall be said daily for seven days; and his allotment of food and drink (his rations) during forty days shall be given to some poor person. The knights may eat flesh thrice a week, on the Lord's day, Tuesdays, and Thursdays, the other four days they must abstain from flesh, and on Fridays must be content with quadragesimal fare. Each knight may have three horses and one squire. No one may either hawk or hunt. See Fleury's Hi. d. l'Église, livr. lxvii. cap. 55.—Mur.]

² See Matth. Paris, Historia Major, p. 56, &c. for an account of the origin of the order. Peter de Puy, Hi. d. l'Ordre Milit. des Templiers, which was republished with many additional documents, Brussels, 1751, 4to; Gürtler, Hi. Templariorum Militum, Amstel. 1691, 8vo. [For a list of more recent writers, see Winer's Handb. d. Theologischen Literatur, Leips. 1826, p. 184.—Mur.]

¹ The writers who treat of these three orders are enumerated by Fabricius, Bibliograph. Antiquar p. 465, &c.; but some are omitted.

² The most recent and best history of this order is that composed by Renat. Aubert de Vertot, by order of the knights, and published first at Paris and afterwards at Amsterdam, 1732, 5 vols. 8vo; add Helyot, Hi. des Ordres, tome iii. p. 72, &c.

³ In the year 1798 the knights of Malta betrayed the island to the French fleet, then carrying Bonaparte to Egypt. The English immediately after commenced a blockade of the island, which lasted two years, when the island fell into the hands of the English, who have held it ever since. The order lost the greater part of its revenues during the French revolution; and from the time Malta was surrendered to the French it has been sinking into insignificance, and is now nearly if not altogether extinct.—Mur.

III. afterwards approved of the society and confirmed it by formal enactments. No one was to be admitted into this order except Germans of noble birth; and those admitted were to devote themselves to the defence of the Christian religion and the Holy Land, and to the care of the suffering poor and the sick. At first the austerity of the order was very great, clothing and bread and water being the only recompense of the soldiers for the labours they endured. But this rigour soon ceased as the wealth of the society increased. When the order retired from Palestine it occupied Prussia, Livonia, Courland, and Semigallia; and though it lost those provinces at the Reformation, yet it retained a part of its estates in Germany.¹

CHAPTER II.

ADVERSE EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

1. NEITHER the Jews nor the polytheists could give the Christians of the West so much trouble as formerly. The former were accused by the Christians of various crimes, pretended or real; so that their efforts were directed, not so much to make opposition to the Christians as to defend themselves in the best manner they could against their attacks. Such of the polytheists as remained in the North of Europe—and they were considerably numerous in several places—frequently made great slaughter among the Christians.² But the Christian kings and princes in their vicinity gradually brought their rage under restraints, and continued to wage war upon them till they had deprived them both of their independence and of their religious freedom.

2. The writers of this century are full of their complaints of the cruelty and rage of the Saracens against the Christians in the East. Nor is there any reason to question their veracity. But most of them have omitted to state the great causes of this cruelty, which were for the most part on the side of the Christians. In the first place, the Saracens had a right, according to the laws of war, to repel violence by violence; nor is it easy to see with what face the Christians could require of this nation, which they attacked and slaughtered with large armies, that it should patiently receive blows and not return them. Besides, the Christians in the East committed abominable crimes, and did not hesitate to inflict the most exquisite sufferings and distress upon the Saracens. And can any think it strange that they should deem it right to retaliate? Lastly, is it a new and surprising thing that a nation not distinguished for mildness and gentleness of temper, when provoked by the calamities of what was pronounced a holy war, should be severe upon those among their subjects who were united with their enemies in religion?

3. A vast change in the state of the Christians in northern Asia took place near the close of this century, in consequence of the victories of the great Genghiskan, commander of the Tartars. For this descendant of the Mongles or Moguls, a hero who has had few equals in any age, attacked David or Ungchan, the brother or son or at least the successor of the celebrated Prester John, and himself called by that name, and having conquered him in battle, slew him;³ then assailing the other princes who ruled over the Turks, the Indians, and the inhabitants of Cathay, he either slew them or made them tributary; and after this, invading Persia, India, and Arabia, he overturned the Saracenic empire and established that of the Tartars in those countries.⁴ From this time the influence of the Christian religion was greatly diminished in the countries which had been subject to Prester John and his successor David; nor did it cease to decline and sink gradually till it

¹ In addition to Duell's Hist. Ordinis Teutonici, Vienna, 1727, see Peter of Dulsberg, Chronicon Prusie, edited with the notes of Hartknoch, Jena, 1679, 4to; Helyot, Hist. des Ordres, tome iii. p. 140, &c.; the Chronicon Ordinis Teutonici, in Matthæus, Analecta Veteris Ævi, tom. v. p. 621, 658, ed. nova; the Prinlegia Ordinis Teutonici, in Von Ludwig's Reliquie Manuscript, tom. vii. p. 43. [For further information relative to these three military orders, and references to additional works, both ancient and modern, which treat of their history, see sec. 72 of Gieseler, Lehrbuch, &c. Cunningham's transl. vol. ii. p. 307, &c.—R.]

² Helmold, Chronicon Slavor, lib. i. cap. xxxiv. p. 48, cap. xxxv. p. 89, cap. xl. p. 99; Lindenbrog, Scriptor. Septentrion, p. 195, 196, 201; Lambecius, Res Hanburg, lib. i. p. 23.

³ Respecting the year in which Genghiskan invaded and conquered Prester John, the Greek, Latin, and oriental writers disagree very much. Most of the Latin writers fix on the year 1202, and thus refer the event to the thirteenth century. But Marco Paolo, the Venetian, De Regionibus Oriental, lib. i. cap. ii. lib. iii. and others state that it took place in the year 1187; and I prefer following their authority. Demetrius Cantimir, prince of Moldavia, deviates from both, and in his preface to the History of the Ottoman Empire, p. xlv. tome I. French ed. states, on the authority of the Arabians, that Genghiskan did not invade the territories of his neighbours till the year 1214.

⁴ Petit de la Croix, Hist. de Genghis Can, Paris, 1711, 12mo, p. 120, 121; Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient. artic. Genghiszkhan, p. 378; Asseman, Biblioth. Oriental. Fatic, tom. iii. par. i. p. 101 and 296, &c.; Carpin, Voyage en Tartarie, chap. v. in the Recueil des Voyages au Nord, tome vii. p. 350.

was wholly prostrated by either Mohammedan errors or idolatrous fables. Yet the posterity of John for a long time after this held, in the kingdom of Tangut which was his original seat, some degree of power, though much restricted and not independent; and these continued to adhere to the Christian religion.¹

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH

CHAPTER I.

THE STATE OF LEARNING AND SCIENCE.

1. AMONG the Greeks, though the times were calamitous and revolutions and intestine wars were very frequent, the study of literature and the liberal arts was highly honoured. This was attributable to the patronage and the literary zeal of the emperors, especially the Comneni; and likewise to the vigilance of the Constantinopolitan patriarchs, who feared lest the Greek church would lack defenders against the Latins if her priests should neglect learning. The learned and luminous commentaries of Eustathius, bishop of Thessalonica, upon Homer and Dionysius [Periegetes], show that men of the best talents applied themselves diligently to the study of classic literature and antiquities.² And the many respectable historians of the events of their own times, John Cinnamus,³ Michael Glycas,⁴ John Zonaras,⁵ Nicephorus Bryennus,⁶ and others,⁷ are proof that neither the disposition to benefit succeeding ages

History is in three parts; the first treats of the Jews from the creation to the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus; the second gives the Roman history from the founding of Rome to Constantine the Great, abridged chiefly from Dion Cassius; the third part brings the history of the Greek empire down to the death of Alexius Comnenus, A.D. 1118. The best edition is that of Du Fresne, Gr. and Lat. Paris, 1686, 2 vols. fol. Zonaras also wrote commentaries on the apostolic canons, on some canonical epistles of the Greek fathers, and on the canons of the councils; all of which were published Gr. and Lat. Paris, 1618, and with Beveridge's notes, in his Pandectæ Canonum, Oxon. 1672, fol. Some tracts and epistles of Zonaras have likewise been published.—Mur.

² Nicephorus Bryennius was the husband of the celebrated female historian Anna Comnena, and of course son-in-law to the emperor Alexius Comnenus, who raised him to the rank of Cæsar. He was much concerned in the public transactions from A.D. 1096 till A.D. 1137, the probable year of his death. He wrote the Byzantine history from A.D. 1057 to A.D. 1081, published Gr. and Lat. with notes by Poussin, Paris, 1651, fol. and by Du Fresne subjoined to the history of John Cinnamus, Paris, 1670, fol.—Mur.

³ Anna Comnena, the daughter of the emperor Alexius Comnenus, a woman of superior talents and learning, was born A.D. 1083, lost her mother in 1118, and her husband in 1137. After this she commenced writing her history of her father's reign from A.D. 1069 to 1118, which is properly a continuation of her husband's history. She completed it A.D. 1143, and called it Alexias, or De Rebus ab Alexio Patre Gestis. It is a well-written history, and important as giving a minute account of the first crusaders of whom she had personal knowledge. The best edition is that of Poussin, Gr. and Lat. with a Glossary, Paris, 1651, fol. or rather its reprint by Du Fresne, subjoined to Cinnamus, Paris, 1670, fol.

⁴ Constantinus Manasses about A.D. 1150 wrote a compendious history or Chronicon in verse, from the creation to A.D. 1081, which he addressed to Irene, the sister of the emperor Manuel Comnenus; published Gr. and Lat. Leyden, 1616, 4to, and Paris, 1653, fol.

⁵ Neophytus, a Greek presbyter and monk, who flourished A.D. 1190, composed a narrative of the calamities of Cyprus when taken by the English crusaders, A.D. 1191, published Gr. and Lat. by Coteller, Monumenta Ecclesiæ Græcæ, tom. ii. p. 457.

The preceding list contains the most noted Greek historians of this century.—Mur. [They are included among the well-known Byzantine historians, and their various works are to be found in the Corpus Byzantinæ Historiæ, published at Paris in 26 vols. fol. 1648-88.

A new edition of this series appeared at Venice in 1729, &c.; but Gibbon says "it is not less inferior in correctness than in magnificence to that of Paris." As I have already stated in note 6, p. 351, a more recent edition projected by the celebrated Niebuhr was commenced at Bonn in 1829. Mr. Milman describes it as "the most convenient in size, and containing some authors (Leo Diacorus, Johannes Lydus, Corippus, the new fragments of Dexippus, Eunapius, &c. discovered by Mai) which could not be comprised in the former collections." Milman's Gibbon's Decl. and Fall, &c. vol. xii. p. 248.—R.

¹ Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vatic. tom. iii. par. ii. p. 500, &c. [Moshelm, Ilust. Tartaror. Eccles. cap. ii. p. 29, &c.—Mur.

² Eustathius was archbishop of Thessalonica in the year 1185, when his eloquence saved that city from demolition by its Sicilian conquerors. He was alive in 1194. His excellent commentary on Homer was published, Rome, 1550, 4 vols. fol. and Basil, 1660, 3 vols. fol. He also wrote a good commentary on the geographical poem of Dionysius Periegetes, Gr. Paris, 1577, fol. He wrote nothing on theology so far as is known.—Mur. [For numerous references to authorities on the history and writings of this mediæval scholar, see Saxius, Ornamenticon, vol. ii. p. 251-53.—R.

³ John Cinnamus was secretary to Manuel Comnenus, a grammarian and a soldier, who flourished A.D. 1160 and was alive A.D. 1183. He wrote the history of the two Comneni, John and Manuel, comprising events from A.D. 1118 to A.D. 1176. The first part is very concise, the latter a full history, and both are written with fidelity and in a good style. The best edition is that of Du Fresne in six books, Paris, 1670, fol.—Mur.

⁴ Michael Glycas was a native of Sicily and flourished A.D. 1120. His Annales Quadrupartiti is a work not only historical, but also philosophical and theological. Part I. describes the creation of the world in six days; Part II. extends from the creation to the birth of Christ; Part III. to Constantine the Great; and Part IV. to the death of Alexius Comnenus, A.D. 1118. It was published Gr. and Lat. with notes by Labbé, Paris, 1660, fol. Glycas also wrote Disputatiuncule II. and many epistles of which fragments are preserved.—Mur.

⁵ John Zonaras, who flourished about A.D. 1118, was a native of Constantinople, and for many years in public civil life; but being bereft of his wife and children, he retired to a monastery, and solaced himself by writing for posterity. His Annals or Compendious

nor the ability to write with skill was wanting to many among the Greeks.¹

2 No one took more pains to excite and cherish the love of philosophy, it is said, than Michael Anchialus, patriarch of Constantinople.² The philosophy to which he was attached appears to have been that of Aristotle, for the cultivators of philosophy among the Greeks were chiefly employed in expounding and improving this system, as appears among other specimens from Eustratius's exposition of Aristotle's Ethics and Analytics.³ Yet the Platonic philosophy was not wholly neglected. On the contrary it appears that many, and especially those who embraced the principles of the mystics, much preferred this philosophy to the Peripatetic; and they considered Plato as suited to men of piety and candour, while Aristotle was suited to the disputatious and the vain-glorious. Their disagreement soon after gave rise to the noted controversy among the Greeks, respecting the comparative merits of the Platonic and the Aristotelian philosophy.

3. In a great part of the western world extraordinary zeal was awakened in this age for the prosecution of literature and the cultivation of every branch of learning, to which some of the pontiffs and the kings and princes, who could see the utility of learning in improving and consolidating the state, contributed by their authority and munificence. Hence associations of learned men were formed in many places, for teaching the various branches of human knowledge; and as the youth resorted to them in great numbers eager for instruction, those higher schools, which the next age called Universities, were gradually established. Paris exceeded all the other cities of Europe in the number of its learned men, in its schools of various kinds, as well as in the number of its students. Hence in this city, about the middle of the century, arose an institution similar to our learned bodies of the present time, which was as yet rude and imperfect, but which time gradually moulded into form and brought to perfection.⁴ Nearly at the same time a distinguished school for the various sciences was founded at Angers by the efforts and care of Ulger, the bishop; though here jurisprudence appears to have held the first rank.⁵ There was already at Montpellier a very celebrated school for the civil law, and for medical science.⁶ In Italy the school of Bologna, which had its commencement anterior to this century, now possessed high renown. It was chiefly resorted to by the students of the Roman law, both civil and ecclesiastical; and especially after the emperor Lotharius II. reinstated it and conferred on it new privileges.⁷ In the same country the medical school of Salerno, which had before been very celebrated, now attracted an immense number of students. While so many schools were rising up in Europe, the sovereign pontiff Alexander III. enacted a special law in the council of Rome, A.D. 1179, requiring schools to be everywhere set up or to be reinstated if they had before existed, in the monasteries and in the cathedral churches; for those which had formerly flourished in these situations, through the negligence of the monks and the bishops, were either wholly prostrate or much de-

¹ If the term be taken in its greatest latitude, including not merely the historians of the Greek empire and in the Greek language, but also historians of the Greek church, then it must include the monk Nestor, the father of Russian history, who flourished at Kiow in the latter part of the eleventh century and first part of the twelfth, and whose annals have procured reputation to Professor Schlözer. See his Probe Russischer Annalen, Bremen and Götting, 1768, 8vo.—Schl. [And Nestor's Annalen mit Uebersetz. u. Anmerk. by Schlözer, Götting, 1802—1809, 5 vols. 8vo.—Mur.]

² Balsamon, Præf. ad Photii Nomocanonem in Justell's Biblia. Juris Canon. Vet. tom. ii. p. 814.—[Michael Anchialus was patriarch of Constantinople from A.D. 1167 to A.D. 1185. According to Balsamon he was a consummate philosopher, and it is certain that he was a fierce antagonist of the Latins. He has left us five synodal decrees, published Gr. and Lat. in the Jus Gr. Rom. lib. iii. p. 227. He also composed a Dialogue which he had with the emperor Manuel Comnenus, upon occasion of the arrival at Constantinople of legates from the Roman pontiff, some extracts from which are published by Leo Allatius, De Conventu, &c. lib. ii. cap. iii. sec. ii. cap. v. sec. ii. and cap. ix. sec. iii.—Mur.]

³ Eustratius was metropolitan of Nice about A.D. 1110, and was reputed a learned man as well as a distinguished theologian. His comments on Aristotle's Ethics, and on the latter part of his Analytics, have been published. His tract against Chrysolanus, De Proclamatione Sp. Sancti, still exists in MS. besides (as is said) some other tracts on the same subject.—Mur.

⁴ Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. ii. p. 463, &c. Pasquier, Recherches de la France, livr. iii. c. xlix.; Lambecius, Hist. Biblioth. Vindob. lib. ii. c. v. p. 260; Hist. Littér. de la France, tome ix. p. 60—68.

⁵ Buleus, ubi supra, tom. ii. p. 215. Poquet de la Ivoniere, Diss. sur l'Antiquité de l'Université d'Angers, p. 21, &c. Angers, 1736, 4to.

⁶ Hist. Génér. de Languedoc, par les Bénédictins, tome ii. p. 517, &c.

⁷ The inhabitants of Bologna tell us their university was founded as early as the fifth century by Theodosius II. and they show the diploma of that emperor by which he enriched their city with such an ornament. But most writers contend that this diploma is a fabrication; and they adduce strong proofs that the school of Bologna was not more ancient than the eleventh century, and that its principal enlargement was in the twelfth century, particularly in the time of Lothair II. See Sigonius, Hist. Bononiensis, as published with notes among his works: Muratori, Antiquitates Italicae Medii Ævi, tom. iii. p. 23, 884, 898, and especially the very learned Keufel's elegant History of the University of Bologna, written in German, Halmst. 1750, 8vo. Compare Böhmer's Præf. ad Corpus Juris Canonici, p. 9, &c. [See also Coringius, Antiq. Academ. Diss. iii. p. 98—102; Mascovius, Comment. de Rebus Imperii sub Hen. IV. &c. Lips. 1748, p. 242.—R.] cayed.¹ But the daily increasing fame and glory of the higher schools or universities rendered this law of little effect; for the majority flocking to those new seats of learning, the monastic and cathedral schools gradually declined.

4. Among the benefits derived from these many literary associations at their very commencement was this, that not only were the boundaries of human knowledge extended, but a new division of the branches of it took place. Hitherto all learning had been confined to what were called the seven liberal arts; three of which, grammar, rhetoric, and dialectics, comprised what was called the Trivium, and the other four, arithmetic, music, geometry, and astronomy, were called the Quadrivium. Most persons were contented with the Trivium; but those who wished to be thought learned men of the first rank ascended to the Quadrivium. To these [seven liberal] arts were now added, besides the study of languages for which few had much taste, theology—not however the old and simple theology which was destitute of system and connexion, and rested solely on texts of scripture and sentences from the fathers, but philosophical or scholastic theology; also, jurisprudence or civil and canon law; and lastly medicine, or physic as it was then called.² For as peculiar schools were now devoted to these sciences, they were of course placed in the list of studies which merited the attention of men of erudition. And when this was done, the common distribution of the sciences had to be changed. Hence the seven liberal arts were gradually included under the term philosophy, to which were added theology, jurisprudence, and medicine. And thus these four Faculties, as they are called, were in the next century formed in the universities.

5. In Italy the reputation and authority of the old Roman law revived, and it caused all other systems of law then in use to go into desuetude, after the discovery at the capture of Amalfi, A.D. 1137, by the emperor Lotharius II. of the celebrated copy of the Pandects or Digest, of which there had been very little knowledge for many centuries, and which now came into the possession of the Pisans.³

From this time the learned began to study the Roman law with more eagerness, schools were opened for its study in the university of Bologna, and afterwards in other cities both in Italy and beyond it. The consequence was, that whereas men had previously lived under various laws, and every freeman had been at liberty to choose which he would obey, whether the Salic laws, or those of the Lombards, or of the Burgundians, &c. the Roman laws gradually obtained the ascendancy through the greater part of Europe, and excluded all others. It is an old opinion that Lotharius II. at the instigation of Irnerius or Guarnerus, the first teacher of the Roman law in the university of Bologna, published a decree that all should thenceforth obey the Roman law only, the others being abrogated. But learned men have shown that this opinion is supported by no solid evidence.⁴

6. The civil law being placed among the sciences to be taught in the schools, the Roman pontiffs and their friends deemed it not only useful but necessary that the canon law, or that which regulates the affairs of the church, should enjoy the same privilege. There existed indeed some collections of canons or ecclesiastical laws, but there was not one among them which was complete and fit to be expounded in the schools, in consequence both of their want of arrangement and their deficiency in copiousness of matter. Hence Gratian, a Benedictine monk, born at Chiusi and now residing at Bologna in the monastery of St. Felix and Nabor, about the year 1130 compiled from the writings of the ancient doctors, the epistles of the pontiffs, and the decrees of councils, an epitome of canon law, suitable for the instruction of youth in the schools.⁵ The Roman pon-

Ital. Med. Ævi, vol. iii. col. 884—998; and by Savigny in his Geschichte des Röm. Rechts, v. iii. p. 83, that the study of the Roman law and even of the Pandects had been cultivated in various parts of Europe prior to the capture of Amalfi. This celebrated copy of the Pandects is now in the Laurentian Library in Florence, and is in excellent preservation.—R.

⁴ See Congrius, De Origine Juris Germanici, cap. xxi.; Guido Grandus, Epist. de Pandectis, p. 21, 69, ed. Florence, 1737, 4to; Brenemann, Hist. Pandectar. p. 41, &c.; Muratori, Pref. ad Leges Longobardas, in his Scriptores Rer. Italicar. tom. i. par. ii. p. 4, &c.; and in his Antiq. Ital. Medii Ævi, tom. ii. p. 285, &c. On this subject Calixtus had a warm controversy with Barth. Nihusius, who adhered to the common opinion respecting Irnerius and Lotharius. The history of this controversy is given by Möller, Cimbria Literata tom. iii. p. 142, &c.

⁵ Of Gratian himself nothing more is known than is stated in the text. He completed his Decretum about A.D. 1151. It is divided into three parts. The first part is subdivided into one hundred and one Distinctiones. In these he treats of law in general and canon law in particular, in the first twenty distinctions; and then proceeds to treat of the different orders of the tiff, Eugene III. was highly pleased with the work; and the doctors of Bologna received it with applause, and immediately adopted it as their guide in teaching, and their example was followed first by the university of Paris, and then by the other universities. The most learned men of the Romish church acknowledge that Gratian's Decretum, as it is commonly called, or his Concordia Discordantium Canonum, as the author himself called it, is full of innumerable faults and mistakes.¹ Yet, as it admirably strengthens and supports the power of the Roman pontiffs, it has become in a measure sacred, and still retains that high authority which it unreasonably acquired in that illiterate and barbarous age.²

¹ See Böhmer's Jus Eccles. Protestantium, tom. iv. p. 705.

² The word Physica, though according to its etymology it denotes the study of natural philosophy in general, was in the twelfth century applied particularly to medicinal studies, and it has also preserved that limited sense in the English language.—Mach.

³ It has been shown by later inquirers, especially by Muratori in the Forty-fourth Dissertation of his Antiq.

clergy, their qualifications, ordination, duties, and powers. The second part is subdivided into thirty-six Causæ, each embracing several questions which are treated of in one or more chapters. This part properly contains the rules and principles of proceeding in the ecclesiastical courts in all the varieties of causes which occur. The third part is much shorter than either of the preceding. It is divided into five Distinctiones, and treats of the consecration of churches, worship, the sacraments, fasts and festivals, images, &c. This work, with the Decretalia of Gregory IX. in five books, the Liber Sextus Decretalium of Boniface VIII. the Constitutiones of Clement V. and the Extravagantes of John XXII. and others, constitutes the Corpus Juris Canonici, and forms more than one-half of the whole. It is a compilation from genuine and spurious canons, decrees, and decisions, without much discrimination; and is so carelessly made that the authors are frequently confounded, and one cited for another. It is therefore no great authority, nor is it regarded as such by modern canonists. Though favourable to the pretensions of the Roman pontiffs in the main, yet it is against their claims in several particulars; and this may have tended to sink its credit with both Catholics and Protestants. After all, it was a noble work for the age in which it was compiled, and justly entitles its author to the appellation of the father of canon law.—Mur.

¹ See among others Anton. Augustinus, De Emendatione Gratiani, cum Observationibus Baluzii et Van Mastricht, Arnheim, 1678, 8vo [and Gallandius, Sylloge de Vetustis Canonum Collect. Mentz, 1790, tom. ii. p. 185, &c.—R. [Numerous errors and mistakes having been discovered in the Decretum of Gratian, on which Augustinus wrote a treatise, it was subjected to a careful revision by order of the court of Rome, and then published with all the corrections which could be ascertained, by authority of Gregory XIII. A.D. 1580. Mur. [For further information on Gratian's compilation, and on the additions subsequently made to it, see Böhmer, Dissert. de Varia Decreti Gratiani Fortuna, prefixed to his well-known work already referred to, the Corpus Jur. Canon.; and Bernardus, Gratiani Canonum Genuini ab Apocry. Discreti, Turin, 1752, 4 vols. 4to.—R.

² See Van Mastricht, Hist. Juris Eccles. sec. 293, p. 325; Böhmer, Jus Eccles. Protestant. tom. i. p. 100, &c. and especially his Preface to his new edition of the Corpus Juris Canonici, Halle, 1747, 4to; Machiavel, Observationes ad Sigonii Hist. Bonon. tom. iii. Opp. Sigonii, p. 128, &c. He here adduces many new things respecting Gratian and his labours, from a very ancient Kalendarium Archigymnasii Bononiensis; but these statements are much questioned. Nor has that famous Kalendarium yet been published of which the Bolognians tell us so much, and of which they have repeatedly promised to give the world a copy, and thus end controversy respecting it. This fact increases suspicion;

³ If I do not mistake, the fragments of the Kalendarium which have been published bear manifest marks of gross fraud.

7. All the Latins who wished to rank among learned men eagerly studied philosophy. Most people about the middle of the century divided philosophy, taking the word in its broadest sense, into theoretical, practical, mechanical, and logical. Under theoretical philosophy was comprehended theology in that form in which it is pursued under the guidance of reason, that is, natural theology; also mathematics and physics. To practical philosophy belonged ethics, economics, and politics. Mechanical philosophy embraced the seven arts of common life, including navigation, agriculture, and hunting. Logic they divided into grammar and the art of reasoning; and the latter they subdivided into rhetoric, dialectics, and sophistics. Under the head of dialectics they included that branch of metaphysics which treats of general ideas. This distribution of the sciences was generally approved, yet some wished to separate mechanics and grammar from philosophy; but others opposed this, because they would have all science to be included under the name of philosophy.³

8. But the teachers of these several branches of philosophy were divided into various parties or sects, which had fierce contests with each other.⁴ In the first place there was a three-fold method of teaching philosophy. (1.) The old and simple method which did not go beyond Porphyry and the Dialectics ascribed to St. Augustine, and which advised that few persons should study philosophy lest divine wisdom should become adulterated with human subtleties. (2.) The Aristotelian which explained and elucidated the works of Aristotle. For Latin translations of some of the books of Aristotle were now in the hands of the learned;⁵ though these translations were rude, obscure, and ambiguous, so that those who used them in teaching often fell into strange incongruities and absurdities.¹ (3.) The free method, by which men attempted to investigate latent truth by their own ingenuity, aided however by the precepts of Aristotle and Plato. But those who pursued this method, commendable as it may be in itself, for the most part misapplied their ingenuity, and wearied themselves and their disciples with idle questions and distinctions.² These various opinions, contests, and defects of the philosophers induced many to hold all philosophy in contempt, and to wish to banish it from the schools.

³ These statements we have derived from several sources, but especially from Hugo de S. Victore, Didascal. lib. ii. cap. ii. p. 7, &c. Opp. tom. i. and from the Metalogium of John of Salisbury, in various passages.

⁴ See the poem of Godof. de S. Victore, on the sects of philosophers in this age, published by Le Beuf, Diss. sur l'Hist. Eccles. et Civile de Paris, tome ii. p. 254, &c.; Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. ii. p. 562, &c.; Wood, Antiq. Oxon. vol. i. p. 51; John of Salisbury, Metalogium and Policraticon, passim.

⁵ De Monte, Appendix ad Sigebert. Gemblac. published by D'Achory, subjoined to the Opp. Guiberti de Novigento, ad ann. 1128, p. 753. "Jacobus clericus de Venecia transtulit de Græco in Latinum quosdam libros Aristotelis, et commentatus est, scilicet Topica, Analyt. priores et posteriores, et Elenchos. Quamvis antiquior translatio super eosdem libros haberetur." Thomas à Becket, Epistol. lib. ii. ep. xciii. p. 454, ed. Brussels, 1682, 4to. "Itero proceps, quatenus libros Aristotelis, quos habetis, mihi faciatis exscribi.—Preceps etiam iterata supplicatione, quatenus in Operibus Aristotelis, ubi difficilliora fuerint, notulas faciat, eo quod interpretem aliquatenus suspectum habeo, quia licet eloquens fuerit alias, ut sepe audivi, minus tamen fuit in Grammatica institutus."

9. But none disputed more subtly or contended more fiercely than the dialecticians, who being occupied exclusively with universals as they were called or general ideas, confined their whole science to this one subject and explained it in different ways.³ There were at this time two principal sects among them, Realists and Nominalists, each of which was subdivided into several minor parties. The Nominalists of this age were indeed inferior in numbers and in authority to the Realists, yet they were not without followers. To these was added a third sect, that of the Formalists, which may be said to take middle ground between the disputants. But they really did no good; for they cast no light on the subject, and therefore only furnished new matter for controversy.⁴ Those devoted to the study of the medical art, astronomy, mathematics, and the kindred sciences, continued to repair to the schools of the Saracens in Spain, and many books of the Arabians were translated into Latin.⁵ For the high reputation of the Arabic learning, joined with zeal for the conversion of the Spanish Saracens to Christianity, induced many to apply themselves to the study of the Arabic language and literature.

CHAPTER II.

HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS AND THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH.

1. WHEREVER we turn our eyes we discover traces of the dishonesty, ignorance, luxury, and other vices, with which both the church and the state were contaminated by those who wished to be regarded as presiding over and taking the lead in all religious matters. If we except a few individuals who were of a better character

¹ Much exceedingly curious information as to these mediæval translations of Aristotle's works into Latin is to be found in Jourdain, Récherches Critiques sur les Traductions Latines d'Aristote, &c. Paris, 1819, 8vo. The result of his inquiries would appear to be, that while a very few of Aristotle's works, chiefly those on dialectics, were known in the West in Latin versions prior to the twelfth century, his principal works, those on philosophy both moral and political, on physics, and natural history, &c. were first known by means of translations into Latin, made in that century by Christian writers who frequented the Mahometan seminaries in Spain, and who there translated the Arabic versions which the Saracens had long before made from the Greek text, and sometimes even from a Syriac or Hebrew version. Jourdain thus describes the circuitous mode in which these Latin translations were made:—"Le Chrétien, avide de science, se rendoit à Tolède, s'attachoit à un Juif, ou à un Sarrazin converti, puisoit dans sa fréquentation quelque connoissance de la langue maure; quand il vouloit un livre, ce maître le lui expliquoit en idiome vulgaire (en Espagnol), et il mettoit cette traduction verbale en Latin." P. 235. Among these translators it is curious to find the well-known Michael Scott the astrologer, who thus employed himself at Toledo in 1217; see p. 139. On this topic, and on the intercourse between Christian and Arabian scholars through the medium of the Jews, see note L in the appendix to Hampden's Bampton Lectures, p. 443.—R.

² See John of Salisbury, Policraticon, p. 434* &c. and Metalogicum, p. 814, &c. and passim.

³ John of Salisbury, an elegant writer of this century, pleasantly says in his Policraticon, sive de Nugis Curialium, lib. vii. p. 451:—"He (the philosopher) is prepared to solve the old question about genera and species, and while he is labouring upon it, the universe grows old; more time is consumed upon it than the Cæsars spent in conquering and subduing the world, more money is expended than all the wealth which Cæsar ever possessed. For this single subject has occupied many so long, that after consuming their whole lives upon it they have not understood either that or anything else."

⁴ John of Salisbury, Policraticon, lib. vii. p. 451, 452: "Some (the Formalists) with the mathematicians abstract the forms of things, and to them refer whatever is said about universals. Others (the Realists) examine men's sensations of objects, and maintain that these go by the name of universals. There were also some (the Nominalists) who held that words constitute the genera and species; but their opinion is now exploded, and with the authors of it has disappeared. Yet there are still some treading in their steps (though they blush to own their master and his opinions), and, adhering only to names, what they take away from things and from sensations they attribute to words." The sect of Formalists therefore is more ancient than John Duna Scotus, whom the learned have accounted the father of the Formalists. See also John of Salisbury's Metalogicum, lib. ii. cap. xvii. p. 814, &c. where he recounts the contests of these sects: "Alius (says he) among other things) consistit in verbis, licet hæc opinio cum Roscelino suo fere jam evanuerit; alius sermones in tuctur; alius versatur intellectibus," &c.

⁵ Gerhard of Cremona, a celebrated Italian astronomer and physician, removed to Toledo in Spain, and there translated many Arabic books into Latin. See Muratori, Antiq. Italica Medii ævi, tom. iii. p. 936, 337. Peter Mirret, a French monk, went among the Saracens in Spain and Africa to learn geography. See D'Achery, Scripteg. Veter. Scriptorum, tom. ix. p. 443, old ed. Dan. Merley or Morlach, an Englishman fond of mathematics, went to Toledo in Spain, and thence brought away to his own country many Arabic books. See Wood's Antiq. Oxon. tom. i. p. 86, &c. Peter the venerable abbot of Cluny went into Spain, and having learned the Arabian language, translated into Latin the Koran and a life of Mohammed. See Mabillon, Annales Benedict. tom. vi. lib. lxxvii. p. 345. And this Peter (as he himself tells us, Biblioth. Cluniacensis, p. 1109) found in Spain on the Elbro, Robert Retenensis, an Englishman, and Herman, a Dalmatian, as well as others, pursuing the study of astrology. Many other examples of the kind may be collected from the records of this century.

and who lamented the profligacy and vices of their order, all of them, disregarding the salvation of the people, were intent on following their base propensities, increasing their wealth and honours, encroaching and trampling upon the rights of sovereigns and magistrates, and living in luxury and splendour. Those who wish to investigate this subject may consult Bernard's five books of Meditations addressed to the pontiff Eugene, and his Apology addressed to the abbot William; in the first of which works he censures and deplores the shameful conduct of the pontiffs and bishops, and in the last the corrupt lives of the monks.¹

2. The Roman pontiffs at the head of the Latin church laboured during the whole century, though not all with equal success, to retain the possessions and authority they had acquired, as well as to extend them still farther; while on the contrary, the emperors and kings exerted themselves to the utmost to diminish their opulence and power. Hence arose perpetual jarring and warfare between the empire and the priesthood (as it was then expressed), which were a source of great public calamity. Pascal II. who was created pontiff at the close of the preceding century, reigned securely at the commencement of this; nor was the opposing faction, which sided with the emperors, sufficiently powerful to fix an imperial pontiff in the chair of the deceased Guibert.² Pascal therefore in a council at

Rome A.D. 1102, renewed the decrees of his predecessors against investitures, excommunicated Henry IV. anew, and stirred up enemies against him wherever he could. Henry resolutely withstood these menaces and machinations; but two years after, A.D. 1104, his own son Henry V. took up arms against his father under pretence of religion; and now all was over. For after an unsuccessful campaign he was compelled by his son to abdicate the throne, and died friendless and forsaken at Liege A.D. 1106. Whether the son was induced to engage in this war with his father, by his ambition of reigning or by the instigation of the pontiff, does not appear. But it is certain that Pascal absolved the son from his oath of obedience to his father, and very zealously supported and defended his cause.³

3. But this political revolution was far from answering the expectations of Pascal. For Henry V. could by no means be induced to give up the right of investing bishops and abbots, although he conceded to the colleges of canons and monks the power of electing them. Hence the pontiff, in the councils of Guastalla in Italy and Troyes in France, A.D. 1107, renewed the decrees which had been enacted against investitures. The controversy was now suspended for a few years, because Henry was so occupied with his wars that he had no leisure to pursue it. But when his wars were closed, A.D. 1110, he marched with a large army into Italy, to settle this protracted and pernicious controversy at Rome. As he advanced slowly towards Rome, the pontiff finding himself destitute of all succour, offered to compromise the matter with him on these conditions: that the king should relinquish the investiture with the staff and the ring, and the bishops and abbots should restore to the emperor the regal privileges [or regalia] which they had received since the times of Charlemagne, namely, the power of levying tribute, holding lordships, coining money, and the like. Henry V. acceded to these terms in the year 1111; but the bishops both of Italy and Germany vigorously opposed them.

¹ Gerhohus, De Corrupto Ecclesie Statu, in Baluze, Miscellanea, tom. v. p. 63, &c.; Gallia Christiana, tom. i. p. 6; Append. tom. ii. p. 265, 273, &c.; Buleux, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. ii. p. 490, 690, &c. where he treats at large of the morals of the ecclesiastics and cenobites. [Hume (History of Eng. chap. x. A.D. 1189) says of Richard I. king of England, when about to enter on his crusade to Palestine, that he "carried so little the appearance of sanctity in his conduct, that Fulk, curate of Neuilly, a zealous preacher of the crusade, who from that merit had acquired the privilege of speaking the boldest truths, advised him to rid himself of his notorious sins, particularly his pride, avarice, and voluptuousness, which he called the king's three favourite daughters. You counsel well, replied Richard, and I hereby dispose of the first to the Templars, of the second to the Benedictines, and of the third to my prelates." Such a sarcasm from a monarch shows the notoriety of clerical vice as well as the peculiar direction it took in the principal classes of clerical persons. In the preceding chapter, A.D. 1189, Mr. Hume says: "We are told by Giraldus Cambrensis (cap. v. in Anglia Sacra, vol. ii.) that the monks and prior of St. Swithun threw themselves one day prostrate on the ground and in the mire, before Henry II. complaining, with many tears and much doleful lamentation, that the bishop of Winchester, who was also their abbot, had cut off three dishes from their table. How many has he left you? said the king. Ten only, replied the disconsolate monks. I myself, exclaimed the king, never have more than three; and I enjoin your bishop to reduce you to the same number."—Mur.

² On the death of Guibert or Clement III. the Antipope, A.D. 1100, his friends chose one Albert for his successor. But he was taken the very day of his election and confined by Pascal in the monastery of St.

Lawrence. Theodoric was next chosen in his place, who also fell into Pascal's hands one hundred and five days after his election, and was shut up in the monastery of Cava. The friends of Guibert then chose Magrinulph or Silvester IV. for Pope, but he was obliged to leave Rome and died shortly after. Thus Pascal was soon left in quiet possession of St. Peter's chair. See Bower's Lives of the Popes, vol. v. p. 350.—Mur.

³ We have here consulted, in addition to the original sources, those excellent historians whom we mentioned in the preceding century. [See note 3, p. 356.—Hermann de Tournay (Narratio, &c. in D'Achery's Spicilegium, tom. ii. p. 914), states that the pontiff wrote a letter to young Henry criminating his father, and exhorting him to aid the church against him.—Mur.

A violent conflict having taken place in the very church of St. Peter at Rome, Henry caused the pontiff to be seized, and conducted as a prisoner to the castle of Viterbo. When he had lain there some time a new convention was formed, as was unavoidable, in which the pontiff conceded to the king the right of giving investiture to bishops and abbots with the staff and ring. Thus peace being concluded, the pontiff placed the imperial diadem upon the head of Henry.¹

4. This peace, which was extorted by force of arms, was followed by greater commotions and more painful conflicts. In the first place, violent tumults were raised at Rome against the pontiff, who was accused of betraying the interests of the church, and of basely shrinking from his duty. To quiet these tumults Pascal assembled a council in the Lateran palace, A.D. 1112; and before that council he humbly confessed his fault in forming such a convention with the emperor, and submitted the matter to the pleasure of the council. The council rescinded the compact formed with the emperor. After this, in various synods and councils, both of France and Germany, Henry was excluded from communion, and was even classed among the heretics; than which nothing at that day was more dreaded.² The princes of Germany likewise made war upon him in several places in behalf of the church. To bring these many and great evils to a termination, Henry again marched an army into Italy in the year 1116, and held a convention at Rome, A.D. 1117, the pontiff having escaped by flight to Benevento. But the Normans came to the aid of the pontiff, and Pascal boldly preparing for war against the emperor made preparations for an assault upon the city of Rome. Important events were now anticipated, when the pontiff closed his life in the year 1118.

5. A few days after the death of Pascal, John Cajetan, another Benedictine monk from the monastery of Monte Cassino and chancellor of the Romish church, was created pontiff and assumed the name of Gelasius II. In opposition to him Henry set up another pontiff, Maurice Burdin, archbishop of Braga in Spain, who chose the name of Gregory VIII.³ Gelasius therefore finding himself not safe at Rome, or in Italy, retired into France and soon after died there, at Cluny. The cardinals who had accompanied him, as soon as he was dead elected Guido, archbishop of Vienne, count of Burgundy, and a relative of the emperor, for sovereign pontiff, who took the name of Calixtus II. It was fortunate both for the church and the state, that this man was made head of the church. Of noble birth and of elevated views, he prosecuted the contest with the emperor with no less vigour than success, both by decrees of councils and by other means, reduced Rome under his power, took the emperor's pontiff prisoner and cast him into prison, and fomented civil wars in Germany. At the same time, possessing more liberal views than his predecessors in the papal chair, and having no obstinacy of character, he did not reject moderate counsels, and could relax something of the demands of his predecessors, for the sake of restoring peace now so ardently desired.⁴

6. Thus after multiplied efforts, contests, excommunications, and threats, peace was ratified between the pontiff's legates and the emperor, in the diet of Worms, A.D. 1122, on the following conditions: that hereafter bishops and abbots should be freely chosen by those whose right it was to elect, but in the presence of the emperor or of his representative;⁵ that if the electors disagreed among themselves the emperor should interpose, and using bishops as his counsellors should end the contest; that the person elected should take the oath of loyalty to the emperor, receive what were called the regalia from his hand, and perform the duties due to him on account of them; and that the emperor should use a different mode of conferring the regalia from that before

¹ See Baluze, Vita Mauricii Burdini, in his Miscell. tom. iii. p. 471, &c.

¹ Besides the writers already mentioned, Mabillon, (Annales Benedict. tom. v. p. 681, and tom. vi. p. 1), deserves to be consulted; and likewise on each of the years of these and the subsequent transactions.

² Here again this pontiff, like Gregory VII. in the Berengarian controversy, placed his authority in subordination to the decisions of a council, and acknowledged a council to be his superior. The council also disapproved of the acts of the pontiff.

³ See Gervaise, Diss. sur l'Hérésie des Investitures, which is the fourth of those he has prefixed to the

⁵ If I do not greatly mistake, this unhappy contest between the emperors and the pontiffs respecting the investiture of bishops and abbots would not have been carried on with so much asperity, nor have been protracted so long, if men of liberal views and education had been at the head of the church. But during half a century five monks had governed the church—men born in obscurity, of coarse manners, and incapable of yielding at all, that is, possessing the characteristic fault of monks, an inflexible obstinacy and pertinacity. But as soon as a man of a better character and of a liberal mind ascended the chair of St. Peter, things assumed a different aspect, and there was a prospect of peace.

⁶ From this time therefore the people in Germany have been excluded from the election of bishops. See De Marca, De Concordia Sacerd. et Imper. lib. vi. c. ii. cap. 9. d. 783, ed. Böhmieri.

practised, and should no longer confer human prerogatives by the staff and the ring, the emblems of sacred or divine power, but by a sceptre.¹ This Concordat, as it is commonly called, was solemnly confirmed the next year in the Lateran council; and it continues in force to our times, although there has been some dispute between the pontiffs and the emperors respecting its true import.²

7. Calixtus did not long survive this pacification, for he died, A.D. 1124. His place was filled by Lambert, bishop of Ostia, known among the pontiffs by the name of Honorius II. Nothing memorable was done by him. At his death, A.D. 1130, there was a schism in the church of Rome; for a part of the cardinals chose Gregory, the cardinal of St. Angelo, whose pontifical name was Innocent II.; but another part of them created Peter de Leon pontiff, who was called Anacletus II. The party of Innocent was the weaker one at Rome and in Italy; he therefore fled into France and remained there two years. But he had the strongest party out of Italy; for besides the emperor Lotharius, the kings of France, England, and Spain, and some others, induced especially by the influence of St. Bernard the particular friend of Innocent, joined themselves to his party; while Anacletus was supported only by the kings of Sicily and Scotland. The schism was terminated by the death of Anacletus, A.D. 1138; after which Innocent reigned alone till the year 1143, and held several councils, among which was the second Lateran, A.D. 1139.³

8. After the death of Innocent, Guido, cardinal of St. Mark, under the name of Cælestine II. reigned during five months in peace. His successor, Lucius II. who formerly was Gerhard, a regular canon, governed the church during eleven months, but not prosperously. For he was disturbed in various ways by the tumultuous Romans; and in attempting to quell one of their insurrections, he was killed by the stroke of a stone. His successor, Eugenius III. formerly Bernard, a Cistercian monk, and a very distinguished disciple of the celebrated St. Bernard, abbot of Clair-vaux, came to the government of the church A.D. 1145, and during nine years encountered similar troubles and dangers until his death in 1152. For he was repeatedly driven from Rome, and at one time passed a long exile in France.⁴ Anastatus IV. previously Conrad, bishop of Sabino, had a more tranquil reign, but it was of short duration; for he died A.D. 1154, after filling the chair one year and four months.

9. Under his successor, Hadrian IV. who was an Englishman⁵ and a regular canon, and whose true name was Nicolas Breakspare, the contentions between the emperors and the Roman pontiffs, which were apparently settled in the times of Calixtus II. broke out anew. Frederic I. surnamed Barbarossa, [Red-Beard], as soon as he was chosen emperor, A.D. 1152, explicitly declared his intention to maintain the imperial authority and prerogatives throughout the empire, and especially in Italy; and to set bounds to the immense power and wealth of the pontiffs and of the clergy at large. Hadrian in view of this emergency, concluded it to be his duty to defend the authority and majesty of the church. Hence when the emperor was to be crowned, A.D. 1155, first a contest arose respecting the functions of an equerry, [holding the pope's stirrups when he mounted his horse or dismounted], which the pontiff would have Frederic perform. Then followed other disputes and controversies between them in relation to public matters, which were fiercely agitated by letters. These contests being in a measure settled, others followed of equal magnitude and difficulty in the year 1158, when the emperor, in order to set bounds to the daily increasing wealth of the pontiffs, the bishops, and the monks, made a law that no fiefs should be transferred to another person without the knowledge and consent of the lord of whom they were held;⁶ and also exerted all his powers to

¹ See Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Medii Ævi, tom. vi. p. 76; Schilterus, De Libertate Eccles. German. lib. iv. c. iv. p. 545, &c.; Rasponus, De Basilica Lateranensi, lib. iv. p. 295, &c.

² It was contested among other things whether the consecration should precede or follow the collation of the regalia. See Hoffmann, Ad Concordatum Henrici V. et Calixti II. Wittemb. 1739, 4to.

³ In addition to the common historians of the popes, see De Lannes, Hist. du Pontificat du Pape Innocent II. Paris, 1741, 8vo.

⁴ These tumults at Rome originated from a strong party of citizens, who adopted the principles of Arnold of Brescia, (see chap. v. sec. 10, below), and wished to shake off the yoke of priestly government, and restore the ancient form of the Roman empire: After an unsuccessful application to the emperor of Germany to make Rome his residence, and there to exercise the same powers as the old Roman emperors had done, they determined to restore the ancient Roman republic, and to re-instate the Roman senate in all its ancient grandeur. This being their object, all their movements were of course sedition against the pontiffs as temporal sovereigns. See Planck's Geschichte d. Christl. Kirchl. Gesellschaftsverfassung, vol. iv. p. 324, &c. and the authors referred to in note 4, part II. chap. v. sec. 10 of this century, page 427, below.—Mur.

⁵ He was the only Briton who has ever been Pope, though at various times, both before and since the Reformation, several have been cardinals.—R.

⁶ See Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Med. Ævi, tom. vi. p. 239, &c. where he shows that by this and other laws, reduce the minor states of Italy under his authority. An open rupture seemed about to take place, when the pontiff was removed by death on the first of September, A.D. 1159.¹

10. When a new pontiff was to be elected, the cardinals were divided into two factions. The one which was the most numerous created Roland of Sienna pontiff; the other the less numerous elected Octavianus, cardinal of St. Cæcilia. Roland assumed the name of Alexander III.; his competitor took that of Victor IV. The emperor, who for various reasons disliked Alexander, gave his support to Victor. The council of Pavia summoned by the emperor A.D. 1160, decided according to the emperor's pleasure. Victor therefore prevailed in Germany and Italy; and Alexander had to quit Rome and Italy, and to retire to France. In the midst of the commotion and strife Victor died at Lucca, A.D. 1164. But another pontiff was immediately elected by order of the emperor, namely, Guido, cardinal of St. Calixtus, who assumed the name of Pascal III. and who was acknowledged by the princes of Germany in the diet of Wurtzburg, A.D. 1165. Alexander however returned from France to Italy, prosecuted his cause with some success, and in the Lateran council at Rome, A.D. 1167, deposed the emperor, whom he had before repeatedly excommunicated, and absolved his subjects from their oath of allegiance to him. But not long after Rome was taken by the emperor, and Alexander was obliged to flee to Benevento, and leave the chair of St. Peter in the hands of Pascal.

11. The prospects of Alexander seemed to brighten up when the emperor, after losing the greater part of his army by a pestilential disease, was obliged against his inclinations to retire from Italy, and when Pascal was removed by death, A.D. 1168. But his expectations were soon disappointed. For the opposite faction elected John, abbot of Struma, to be pontiff with the title of Calixtus III.; and the emperor, though absent in Germany and occupied with various wars and contests, supported the new pontiff as far as he was able. After settling a partial peace in Germany, the emperor in 1174 marched again into Italy with a fine army, intending to chastise the cities and republics which had revolted from him. If success had attended this expedition of the emperor, he would doubtless have compelled Alexander to give place to Calixtus. But he met with disappointments and reverses; and after several years spent in alternate defeats and partial victories, being discouraged by so many discomfitures and difficulties, he concluded a peace with Alexander III. and a truce with his other enemies at Venice, in the year 1177.² Some tell us that the pontiff, placing his foot upon the neck of the suppliant emperor, repeated the words of David, Ps. xci. 13. But most of the moderns consider the report as entirely unsupported.³

12. Alexander III. whose conflict with Frederic I. procured him fame, had also no slight contention with Henry II. king of England, in the case of Thomas à Becket, archbishop of Canterbury. In the council of Clarendon A.D. 1164, several regulations were enacted, by which the extent of the regal power in respect to the clergy, was more accurately defined, and the prerogatives of the bishops and clergy were circumscribed within narrower limits. Becket refused to submit to these regulations, because in his opinion they were prejudicial to the divine rights both of the church at large and of the Roman pontiffs. Enmity now took place between the king and the archbishop, and the latter fled into France to Alexander III. who was then an exile there. The pontiff and the king of France procured a sort of reconciliation, and Becket returned to England. But as no means could induce him to yield to the wishes of the king, four of the courtiers,

¹ These transactions are well illustrated by count Bünaui, ubi supra, p. 115—242. To which add Fortunatus Olmus, Istoria della venuta a Venetia Occultamente nel an. 1177, di Papa Alessandro III. Venice 1622, 4to.; and Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Medii Ævi, tom. iv. p. 249, &c.; Origines Guelficæ, tom. ii. p. 379, &c.; Acta Sanctorum, tom. i. April. p. 46, in the Life of Hugo, abbot of Bonneval; and tom. ii. April. p. 596, in the Life of Galdinus of Milan, which two ecclesiastics acted as arbitrators and legates in negotiating this peace.

² See Bünaui, ubi supra, p. 242; Heumann, Pæciles, tom. iii. lib. i. p. 145; Biblioth. Italique, tome vi. p. 5, 16, and the writers mentioned by Sagittarius, Introd. in Hist. Eccles. tom. i. p. 639, tom. ii. p. 609.

³ See Matth. Paris, Historia Major, p. 82, 83, 101, 102, 104; Wilkins, Concilia Magnæ Brit. tom. i. p. 434, &c. [These articles of Clarendon or constitutions as they are called, were drawn up by the king and ratified in a full assembly of the great lords, barons, and prelates of the nation. The civilians yielded a ready assent to them, and most of the prelates were disposed to do the same. But Becket long refused, and at last very reluctantly subscribed to them. Of this compliance he afterwards repented, and obtained absolution from the pontiff, who at the same time disapproved of the articles and pronounced them null and void. The articles are exhibited in Harduin's Concilia, tom. vi. par. ii. p. 1607, &c. with the papal approbation or disapprobation subjoined to each.—Mur.]

Frederic first opposed a barrier to the power of the clergy.

¹ These events are carefully investigated by the illustrious Count Bünaui, History of Frederic I. written in German, p. 45, 49, 73, &c. 99, 105, &c.

doubtless with the king's privity, assassinated him in the church before the altar, in the year 1170.¹ The king after various altercations had to make such expiations for this crime as the pontiff dictated; and in the year 1173, the assassinated archbishop was enrolled among the martyrs or the glorified saints of the highest order.²

¹ Guil. Stephanides, Hist. Thomæ Cantuar. in Spark's Scriptores Rerum Anglicarum. London, 1723, fol. p. 4; Lupus, Epistole et Vita Thomæ Cantuar. Epistole item Alexandri III., Ludovici VII., Henrici II., in hac causa, ex M.S. Vaticano. Brussels, 1682, 2 vols. 4to, and in the Works of Lupus; Natalis Alexander, Selecta Hist. Eccles. Capita, sæc. 12. diss. x. p. 833, &c.; Stapleton, Tres Thomæ seu res gestæ Thomæ Apostoli, S. Thomæ Cantuar. et Thomæ Mori. Colon, 1612, 8vo. [Thomas was the son of a London merchant, and educated at Oxford and Paris. Having entered into the service of Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, he was sent to Bologna to study canon law. On his return he was made archdeacon of Canterbury; and not long after the king called him to court, and made him lord chancellor of England. On the death of Theobald A.D. 1162, the king made him archbishop of Canterbury. While chancellor he had served the king with great ability and lived in great splendour. But he now assumed an austere mode of life, and became a strenuous defender of the pretended rights of the church and a rigid disciplinarian. To restrain the usurpations of the clergy, the king caused the constitutions of Clarendon to be enacted. Against these and all other attempts of the king to reform abuses, Becket made strenuous opposition; and exerting his high powers as primate of all England, and possessing great and shining talents, and at the same time supported by the Pope and by the king of France, he was able to thwart all the plans of king Henry. The king therefore caused him to be prosecuted for malconduct while chancellor. He was also arraigned for contempt of the king, and condemned in a grand council of the nation at Northampton A.D. 1164. Becket now appealed to the Pope, contrary to the laws of the realm, and soon after fled to France. Protected by the pontiff and the king of France he treated Henry with insolence; and at length through the mediation of the pontiff and the king of France, Henry and Becket were so far reconciled that the latter was permitted to return to his see. But he now carried matters with a high hand, dealt out his anathemas and censures, and resisted all attempts of the king to restrain the exorbitant power of the clergy. The king was now in Normandy. The archbishop of York and several noblemen, whom Becket had excommunicated, repaired to the king complaining of the treatment they received from Becket. The archbishop remarked to him that so long as Becket lived, the king could never expect to enjoy peace and tranquillity. The king being violently agitated, burst forth into an exclamation against his servants whose want of zeal, he said, had so long left him exposed to the machinations of that ungrateful and imperious prelate. Four gentlemen of his household overhearing the exclamation, immediately formed the resolution to assassinate Becket. They asked leave to go to England and set out forthwith, without apprising the king of their designs. Soon after they were gone, the king conjectured from some circumstances and remarks of the men what they intended to do; and he sent messengers after them commanding them not to lay hands on the primate. But the messengers arrived too late, the deed was done. The king was now greatly distressed, and took every possible means to clear himself of suspicion and to pacify the Pope. The assassins fled to Rome, did penance, and obtained absolution from the Pope on condition of perpetual exile. The king also made his submission to the Pope, and with much difficulty obtained absolution some years after. See Hume's Hist. of Engl. chap. viii. vol. i. p. 322—361; Rapin, Hist. of Eng. and Collier's Eccles. Hist. of Eng. vol. i. p. 370. The works of Becket consist of his correspondence or letters, collected by John of Salisbury and edited by Christian Lupus, Brussels, 1682, 4to, with a Quadrilogus or the fourfold life of Becket by Heribert his chaplain, William of Canterbury, Alan abbot of Deoche, and John of Salisbury.—Mur. [See also the other histories of England by Lingard, Turner, Macintosh, &c. The most recent work on this subject is Gilles's Life and Letters of Tho. à Becket, Lond. 1846, 2 vols.

13. Alexander III. employed not only arms but also artifice and the influence of councils and laws, to establish the independence of the church, and especially to confirm the power of the Roman pontiffs. For (I.) in a council at Rome A.D. 1179, called the third Lateran council, in order to avoid the commotion so often produced by the election of a new pontiff, he ordained that the right of voting should belong exclusively to the cardinals; and that the person who had the votes of two-thirds of the college of cardinals should be considered the legitimate pontiff. This constitution has continued to the present time. Thus from that period the election of pontiffs assumed the forms which it still retains; and not only the people but even the clergy of Rome were wholly excluded from any participation in it. (II.) In the same council he, the first of all the pontiffs, sanctioned a crusade against heretics who were then troubling the church at large, and especially certain provinces of France.³ (III.) He took from bishops and councils the right of designating the persons who might be worshipped as saints, or placed canonization, as it is called, among the greater causes, that is, such as are to be decided solely by the pontiff.⁴ (IV.) Omitting some things of minor importance, we add this only, that he actually put in operation the power claimed by the pontiffs since the time of Gregory VII. namely, that of creating kings. For in the year 1179 he conferred the title of king on Alphonsus I. duke of Portugal, who had previously under Lucius II. made his tributary tributary to the church of Rome.⁵

8vo, which he published as a sequel to his edition of the various lives of the archbishop written in Latin by his contemporaries, published in 2 vols. 8vo, and of his Epistole, in 4 vols. 8vo, Lond. 1845.—R.

² Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. ii. p. 328, &c., and for his festival, p. 397; Colonia, Hist. Littér. de la Ville de Lyon, tome ii. p. 249, &c.

³ See Natalis Alexander, Selecta Hist. Eccles. Capita, sæc. xii. diss. ix. p. 819, where he treats at large of this council; also Harduin, Concilia, tom. vi. par. ii. p. 1671, &c. [MacLaine is stumbled that Mosheim and others should call this the third Lateran council, when it appears there had been six or eight councils previously held there. But there was no mistake made by Mosheim. This was the third general council of the Lateran, all the preceding, except two, having been provincial councils.—Mur.

⁴ The subject of canonizations has been treated under the ninth and tenth centuries, p. 306, 340; and that of pontifical elections under the eleventh century, p. 357, with the notes appended.

⁵ Baronius, Annales, ad ann. 1179; Innocent III. Epistole, lib. i. ep. 49, tom. i. p. 54, ed. Baluze. [It should be remembered that Alexander III. only confirmed the title of king to Alphonsus, it having long

14. Lucius III. who was previously Ubald, bishop of Ostia, was the first pontiff elected solely by the cardinals, according to the regulations of Alexander III. His reign, which commenced A.D. 1181, was a turbulent one; for he was twice driven from Rome by the citizens, who no doubt disliked a pontiff elected contrary to the ancient custom, or without the concurrence of the clergy and people. He therefore died an exile at Verona, A.D. 1185. His successor, Hubert Crivelli, bishop of Milan, known among the pontiffs by the name of Urban III. died of grief on account of the conquest of Jerusalem by Saladin, A.D. 1187, after performing nothing of much importance.¹ The next pontiff, Gregory VIII. previously Albert of Benevento and chancellor of the church of Rome, died in the second month of his pontificate. After him Clement III. previously Paul, bishop of Palestrina, reigned longer; for he continued to the fourth year and died A.D. 1191, yet few of his deeds are worthy the notice of posterity.² More famous was Celestine III. who before his election was Hyacinth of Rome and cardinal deacon; for in the year 1194 he laid under an interdict the emperor Henry VI. and Leopold duke of Austria, for having imprisoned king Richard of England on his return from the Holy Land; and also Alphonso X. king of Galicia and Leon, on account of an incestuous marriage; and he commanded, though without effect, Philip Augustus, the king of France, to receive back his repudiated wife Ingelburga.³ But this pontiff, and nearly all the others of the present century, were outdone and eclipsed by the pontiff elected near the end of the century A.D. 1198, namely, Lothair, count of Signi, a cardinal deacon, who assumed the pontifical name of Innocent III. But his reign before been applied to him by his army and by some neighbouring princes. See Pagl, Critica in Baron. ad ann. 1139, sec. xxliii.—Mur.

¹ He was the personal enemy of the emperor Frederic I. and quarrelled with him till the day of his death. But he could not coerce him, because the German bishops adhered to the emperor. He once resolved to excommunicate Frederic; but the people of Verona where he resided would not allow of such a transaction in their city. See Schmidt's Kirchengeschichte, vol. vi. p. 249, &c.—Mur.

² The most important of his acts was his compromise with the citizens of Rome, by which he gave the city a new form of government, yet retained the supreme power in his own hands. He therefore made Rome the place of his residence; whereas his three immediate predecessors had been unable to reside there. See Baronius, Annales, ad ann. 1183, no. 23.—Mur.

³ Though the king did not retreat when the interdict was laid on him, yet as the pope and the king of Denmark, who was brother to Ingelburga, continued to prosecute the matter, Philip concluded to end the contest by restoring his queen. See Daniel's Hist. of France, English edit. vol. i. p. 426, &c.—Mur.

will properly be described under the following century.

15. Of the flagitious conduct, the frauds, ignorance, and corruption of the inferior bishops, priests, and deacons, the whole history of these times, and the laws of the ecclesiastical councils, afford ample testimony.⁴ It is not strange therefore that the monks were in higher repute than the secular clergy; for being bound by their vows and by their respective rules of life, they had fewer opportunities of committing crimes. And yet these monks, who claimed pre-eminence in the church and despised and inveighed against both the secular clergy and the regular canons,⁵ had in most places departed entirely from their institutions and rules, and exhibited to the public, patterns of vice and wickedness rather than of virtue.⁶ The Cluniacensians were for a long time the best and most devout among the Benedictines; but under their abbot Pontius, being loaded with wealth and riches by the liberality of the pious, they entirely laid aside their former strictness and copied after the base lives of the other Benedictines. And though some of the succeeding abbots endeavoured to cure the evil, their efforts fell far below their wishes and their expectations; nor could the primitive sanctity of Cluny ever be restored.¹

⁴ "The ecclesiastics of that age had renounced all immediate subordination to the magistrate; they openly pretended to an exemption in criminal accusations from a trial before courts of justice, and were gradually introducing a like exemption in civil causes. Spiritual penalties alone could be inflicted on their offences; and as the clergy had extremely multiplied in England, and many of them were consequently of very low characters, crimes of the deepest dye, murders, robberies, adulteries, rapes, were daily committed with impunity by the ecclesiastics. It had been found, for instance, on inquiry that no less than a hundred murders had since the king's accession [A.D. 1154—1163], been perpetrated by men of that profession, who had never been called to account for those offences (Neubr. p. 394); and holy orders were become a full protection for all enormities. A clerk in Worcestershire having debauched a gentleman's daughter, had at this time proceeded to murder the father; and the general indignation against this crime moved the king to attempt the remedy of an abuse which was become so palpable, and to require that the clerk should be delivered up and receive condign punishment from the magistrate (Fitz-Steph. p. 33, Hist. Quad p. 32). Becket insisted on the privileges of the church, and confined the criminal in the bishop's prison lest he should be seized by the king's officers, and maintained that no greater punishment could be inflicted on him than degradation. And when the king demanded that immediately after he was degraded he should be tried by the civil power, the primate asserted that it was iniquitous to try a man twice upon the same accusation, and for the same offence." Hume's Hist. of Engl. vol. i. chap. viii. reign of Henry II. p. 333, 334.—Mur.

⁵ See the epistle of Rupert Tuitiensis, in Martene's Theaurus Anecdotor. tom. i. p. 285, &c. who places the monks before the apostles themselves.

⁶ See Nigel Wireker, an English poet of much wit, who lived about the middle of this century, in his Speculum Stultorum or Brunellus, a poem often published and in which he severely lashes the several orders of monks of his age, sparing almost none except the Carthusians. [This poem, among other editions, was published at Frankfurt, 1602, and at Wolfenbuttel, 1662, 8vo. In it an ass is represented as wishing to exchange his short tail for a long one, indicative of a monk aspiring after an abbey.—Schl.] Also Bernard's Considerationes ad Eugenium, lib. iii. cap. iv.

16. Among the *Cistercians, who were neither so old nor so rich an order as the Cluniacensians, there was far more appearance of innocence and sanctity. Hence a large share of the respectability which the Cluniacensians had enjoyed was transferred to the Cistercians; and they increased daily in numbers, wealth, and power. No man in this age contributed more to the advancement of this order than the celebrated abbot of Clairvaux, St. Bernard, a man of immense influence throughout Christian Europe, one who could effect whatever he pleased, often merely by his word or nod, and could dictate even to kings what they must do. He is therefore justly called the second parent and founder of the Cistercian order; and both in France and in Germany this order was called from him the Bernardine order.² A hundred and sixty monasteries owed their origin or their regulations to him; and when he died he left seven hundred monks in his monastery of Clairvaux. Among his disciples there were many who became archbishops and bishops, besides one sovereign pontiff, Eugene III.

17. But this prosperity of the Cistercians excited the envy of the Cluniacensians, and produced, first, strong dislike and afterwards open quarrels between these two opulent and powerful orders. Each of them followed the rule of St. Benedict; but they differed in dress and in the regulations superadded to the rule. The Cluniacensians accused the Cistercians of too great austerity; and on the other hand, the Cistercians taxed the Cluniacensians with having abandoned their former sanctity and regular discipline, which was strictly true. St. Bernard, the oracle and guardian of the Cistercians, in the year 1127 first attacked the Cluniacensians in writing. St. Peter Maurice, abbot of Cluny, replied to him with much modesty. The controversy was now propagated farther, and extended over other countries of Europe.³ To this contest, another of great warmth was added respecting tithes. In the year 1132, Innocent II. among other new privileges conferred on the Cistercians, exempted them from the payment of tithes on their lands; and as many of these lands had paid tithes to the Cluniacensians, they were greatly offended at this indulgence of the pontiff, and entered into warm controversy both with the Cistercians and with the pontiff himself. In the year 1153 this controversy was in some way adjusted, but how does not clearly appear.⁴

18. Of the regular canons whose origin was in the preceding century, many spent their time much better than the crowd of monks did; and they were not unserviceable to the church by keeping schools here and there, and by performing other offices.⁵ And as the pious and the good therefore treated them with much kindness, and as they were often put in possession of the goods of the unprincipled monks, the latter loaded them with abuse. The canons on the contrary assailed the monks both orally and in writings, and maintained that they ought to be excluded from sacred offices and honours, and to live in their cloisters secluded from the intercourse of men. Hence a long and bitter controversy arose between the monks and the canons, respecting their comparative merits and rank, in which both parties went to extremes.⁶ On the side of the monks, among others, the following eminent men in particular engaged ardently in the contest, namely, Peter Abelard, Hugo of Amiens, and Rupert of Duytz: the cause of the canons was defended, among others, by Philip Harveng, abbot of Good Hope.⁷ The remains of this old controversy are visible at the present day [1760].

19. To the Benedictine order a new sect was added near the commencement of this century, namely, the order of Fontevraud [Fontis Ebraldi], so named from the place where its first monastery was erected, on the confines of Angers and Tours, then a niacensis. tom. i. p. 687—695; add the Dialogus inter Cluniacensem et Cisterciensem, published by Martene, Theaur. Anecdotor. tom. v. p. 1573—1613. Compare Mabillon, Annales Bened. tom. vi. p. 80, &c. and Manriquez, Annales Cister. tom. i. p. 28, &c. [Flour, Hist. Eccles. livr. lxvii. sec. 49, 50.—Mur.

¹ See, beside many others, Martene's Amplissima Collectio Monum. Vet. tom. ix. p. 1119.

² See Mabillon, Annales Ord. Bened. tom. vi. passim; and in his life of St. Bernard prefixed to his edition of Bernard's works; Manriquez, Annales Cistercienses, nearly throughout the second volume, and in a part of the third.

³ Bernard's Apologia (for so his book is entitled) among his Opera, tom. i. p. 523—533. The reply of Peter Cluniacensis, surnamed Venerabilis, is extant among his epistles, lib. i. ep. 28, in the Biblioth. Clu-

⁴ See Manriquez, Annales Cister. tom. i. p. 232, &c.; Mabillon, Annales Bened. tom. vi. p. 212, 479, and his preface to the Opp. S. Bernardi; De Laines, Hist. du Pontificat d'Innocent II. p. 68, &c. 79, &c.; Hertius, De Exemptione Cisterc. a Decimis.

⁵ See the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome ix. p. 112, &c.

⁶ See Lambertus, Epistola, in Martene's Theaur. Anecdot. tom. i. p. 329, &c.

⁷ Abelard, Opp. p. 228, ed. Paris, 1616, 4to; Martene's Theaur. Anecdot. tom. v. p. 970, 975, 1614, &c. and his Amplissima Collectio, tom. ix. p. 971, 972; Harvengius, Opera, p. 385, Douay, 1621, fol.

wild spot beset with thorns. Its founder was Robert of Abrissel, first an eremite and then a monk, who prescribed for his followers of both sexes the rule of St. Benedict, but with the addition of some singular and very austere regulations. Among these regulations a very remarkable and altogether peculiar one was, that he united the monasteries for the two sexes, and subjected both the men and women to the government of a female, professedly in accordance with the example of Christ, who commended St. John to the care of his mother, and would have him to obey her as a mother.¹ Robert was equally successful with the other founders of new [monastic] sects in those times; for the novelty of the institution and the singularity of its form allured great numbers to embrace it. But he fell under strong suspicion of having undue and illicit familiarity with females, from which his modern disciples use all the means in their power to vindicate his character.²

20. Norbert, a German, and subsequently archbishop of Magdeburg, attempted to restore the discipline of the regular canons, which was now sinking in many places, and wholly prostrate in others. For this purpose, in the year 1121 he established a new sect at Premontre, in Champagne,³ which, recommending itself by sobriety of life and manners and cultivating literature and the useful arts, at once extended itself throughout Europe, and in a little time acquired immense riches.⁴ But this prosperity of the order soon extinguished their primitive zeal, and plunged the Præmonstratensians into all kinds of vice. They followed the rule called St. Augustine's, but with some slight alterations and the addition of certain severe laws, whose authority and influence however did not long survive their author.⁵

21. About the middle of the century, one Berthold, a Calabrian, with a few companions, migrated to Mount Carmel [in Palestine], and in the place where the prophet Elias of old is said to have hid himself, built an humble cottage with a chapel, in which he and his associates led a laborious and solitary life. As others continued to unite themselves with these residents on Mount Carmel, Albert, the patriarch of Jerusalem, near the commencement of the next century, prescribed for them a rule of life, which the pontiffs afterwards sanctioned by their authority and also changed in various respects, and

¹ Peter Abelard, Opera, p. 34, whose testimony is confirmed by the form still retained by the order, and is placed beyond all doubt; notwithstanding Mabillon, from his zeal for the Benedictine fraternity, labours after a sort to invalidate it in his Annales Benedict. tom. v. p. 423. Concerning this Robert and his order, see the Acta Sanctorum, tom. iii. Februar. p. 593, &c.; Dion. Sammarthianus, Gallia Christiana, tom. ii. p. 131, &c.; Peter Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome ii. art. Fontevraud, p. 1187, &c.; Helyot, Hist. des Ordres, tome vi. p. 83. On the present state of Fontevraud see Molon, Voyages Liturgiques, p. 108, &c. and Martene's Voyage Littér. de Deux Bénédictins, par. ii. p. 1, &c.

² The epistles of Godfrey of Vendome, and of Marbod, in which Robert is severely censured, are well known. In what manner these accusations are answered by the monks of Fontevraud may be learned from Jo. De la Mainferme, Clypeus Nascentis Ordinis Fontebraldensis, Paris, 1684, 8vo, and his Dissertationes in Epistolam contra Robertum de Arbrisello, Saumur, 1682, 8vo. There was a dispute on this subject with Peter Bayle. See the Dissertation Apologétique pour le Bienheureux Rob. d'Arbrisselles sur ce qu'en a dit M. Bayle, Antwerp, 1701, 8vo; not to mention Mabillon, Annales Benedict. tom. v. and vi. p. 9, 10, and many others.—[The founder of this order, Robert or Rodbert, was born about A.D. 1047 at Arbrissel, seven leagues from Rennes, became doctor of divinity at Paris in 1074, assisted the bishop of Rennes, was made arch-priest in 1085, formed a college of regular canons in 1094, became famous as a preacher, resigned an abbacy in 1098 to travel and preach, set up the monastery of Fontevraud in 1100, and employed several succeeding years in travelling about France and establishing monasteries, till his death in the year 1117. His order was confirmed by the pontiff in 1113; and Bertrade (formerly queen of France) was the first lady abbess. She died in 1115. About A.D. 1700 the order was divided into four provinces, those of France, Aquitaine, Auvergne, and Bretagne, which collectively contained fifty-seven priories. See Bayle, Dictionnaire, art. Fontevraud; and Ballet, Vies des Saints, tome i. Feb. p. 325, &c.—Mar.

³ Premontre, the original seat of this order, is placed by Mosheim and by Helyot in Champagne, by Macclaine in Picardy, and by some maps in the Isle of France. It is situated indeed near the borders of all three; but according to Busching's Geography (vol. ii. p. 373, ed. 5 Hamb. 1764), the last-mentioned is the true location; for Premontre belongs to the Laonnais, a dependence of the government of the Isle of France.—Von Einem.

⁴ The religious of this order were at first so poor that they had nothing they could call their own but a single ass, which served to carry the wood they cut down every morning and sent to Laon in order to purchase bread. But in a short time they received so many donations and built so many monasteries, that thirty years after the foundation of this order they had above a hundred abbeys in France and Germany. In process of time the order increased so prodigiously that it had monasteries in all parts of Christendom, amounting to 1000 abbeys, 300 provostships, a vast number of priories, and 500 nunneries. But this number is now greatly diminished. Besides what they lost in Protestant countries, of 65 abbeys which they had in Italy there is not one now remaining.—Macl.

⁵ See Helyot, Hist. des Ordres, tome ii. p. 156, and the writers cited by him; Van der Sterre, Vita S. Norberti Præmonstratensium Patriarchæ, Antw. 1658, 8vo; Hugo, Vie de S. Norbert, Luxemb. 1704, 4to; add Launoi (though sometimes uncandid), Inquisitio in Privilegia Ordinis Præmonstrat. cap. i. ii. in his Opp. tom. iii. par. i. p. 448, &c. On the present state of the place and the monastery of Premontre, see Martene's Voyage Littér. de Deux Bénédictins, tome ii. p. 49, &c. [The Præmonstratenses, or monks of Premontre, vulgarly called White Canons, came first into England A.D. 1146. Their first monastery, called New-House, was built in Lincolnshire by Peter De Saulia, and dedicated to St. Martial. In the reign of Edward I. the order in question had twenty-seven monasteries in England.—Macl. [They had six monasteries in Scotland—four in Galloway; one near Stranraer, and the others at Holywood, Whithorn, and Tongland; one at Dryburgh, and one at Ferne in Ross. Keith's Scott. Bish. p. 398, &c. This order had also several houses in Ireland.—R.

when it was found too rigorous and burdensome mitigated it considerably.¹ Such was the origin of the celebrated order of Carmelites, or as it is commonly called, the order of St. Mary of Mount Carmel, which subsequently passed from Syria into Europe, and became one of the principal mendicant orders. The Carmelites themselves reject with disdain this account of their origin, and most strenuously contend that the holy prophet Elias of the Old Testament was the parent and founder of their society.² But they are able to persuade very few (or rather none out of their society) that their origin was so ancient and illustrious; and many, even in the Romish communion, treat their pretensions with great severity.³

¹ I have here followed principally Papebroch, an accurate writer on this subject, and well supported by authorities, in the Acta Sanctior. Antwerp. mense Aprili, tom. iii. p. 774—802. It is well known that the Carmelites moved a great contest with this learned Jesuit at the court of Rome, for disparaging the dignity and antiquity of their order. The history of this long contest is given by Helyot, Hist. des Ordres, tome i. p. 282, &c. It was terminated in the year 1698 by Innocent XII. who imposed silence on both parties. [The Carmelites accused Papebroch before the pontiff Innocent XII. alleging that the volumes of the Acta Sanctiorum which bore his name were full of errors. The pontiff referred the case to the Congregation of the Index. The Carmelites being in high repute in Spain brought these books before the Inquisition of that country in the year 1691; and by that tribunal the 14 volumes for March, April, and May, were condemned A.D. 1695. Papebroch and his friends however obtained liberty to offer to the Inquisition a vindication of these volumes; but all their controversial writings with the Carmelites were, in the year 1697, proscribed by the Inquisition. The next year the pope interposed, commanding both parties to be silent and to drop the whole controversy.—Mur.]

² Of the many Carmelite writers who have written upon this subject, the neatest and most concise is Thomas Aquinas, a French Carmelite, in his Dissertatio Hist. Theol. in qua Patriarchatus Ordinis Carmelitarum Propheta Elias Vindicatur. Paris, 1632, 8vo. The invidious writers on this controversy with Papebroch are far more tedious.

³ See Harduin's Opp. Posthuma p. 612, &c.; Labat, Voyage en Espagne et Italie, tome iii. p. 87; Courayer, Examen des Défauts Théologiques, tome i. p. 455, &c. [The pretensions of the Carmelites to an antiquity reaching back to the time of Elijah are ridiculous in the extreme; and it is astonishing that they should dare to hazard their reputation by advancing such pretensions. The rule prescribed to them by Albert, A.D. 1205, consisted of sixteen articles, and it required them to confine themselves to their cells except when at work, and to spend their time in prayer; to possess no individual property; to fast from the feast of the holy cross till Easter, except on Sundays; to abstain from eating flesh altogether; to labour with their hands; and to observe total silence from vespers till the tierce of the next day. This rule was mitigated considerably by Innocent IV. On the conclusion of peace with the Saracens, A.D. 1229, the Carmelites left Syria. Some of them went to Cyprus, others to Sicily, and others to France. They came to England about 1240, and had about forty houses in that country. In the 16th century St. Theresa, a Spanish lady, undertook to reform the order. They were now divided into two classes. The Carmelites of the ancient observance were called the mitigated or moderate; the reformed or those of the strict observance were called bare-footed Carmelites, because they went barefooted. The former were distributed into forty provinces, subject to one general.

22. We will now mention the principal writers, both Greeks and Latins. Among the former, the most noted in after times were the following:—Philip Solitarius, whose Dioptra or dispute between the soul and the body is sufficiently known;⁴ Eustratius, who defended the cause of the Greeks against the Latins and explained some books of Aristotle;⁵ Euthymius Zigabenus, who on account of his Panoply against all Heretics and his expositions of the scriptures, may be ranked among the principal writers of the age;⁶ John Zonaras, whose Annals with some other works are still preserved;⁷ Michael Glycas, who also devoted himself to history and to some other species of writing;⁸ Constantine Harmenopolus, a respectable writer on both civil and canon law;⁹ Andronicus Camaterus, a strenuous polemic against the Latins and the Armenians who were opposed to the Greeks;¹⁰ Eustathius of Thessalonica, the most learned Greek of his time, and the

The latter quarrelled among themselves, and became divided into the congregation of Spain containing six provinces, and the congregation of Italy embracing all the rest.—Mur. [They had nine or ten houses in Scotland. Keith, ubi supra, p. 454, &c.—L.]

⁴ Little is known of this Grecian Monk, who flourished A.D. 1105. His Dioptra or Dialogue between the soul and the body, on the principles which should regulate man's life, is extant only in the Latin translation of Pontanus, Ingoldstadt, 1604, 4to, and in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xxi.—Mur. [See respecting him Fabricius, Biblio. Græca, tom. vi. p. 566—7, lib. v. cap. v.—L.]

⁵ See note 3, p. 397.—Mur.

⁶ See Simon's Critique de la Biblio. Ecclès. de M. Du Pin, tome i. p. 318, 324. [Euthymius was a monk highly esteemed by Alexius Comnenus for his erudition, and flourished about A.D. 1116. The Pinoplia Dogmatica Orthodoxæ Fidei aduersus omnes Hæreses, is a compilation from the Fathers made by order of the emperor and with the aid of several assistants, in defence of the doctrine of the Greek church against all its opposers. It is published (but not entire) by Gregoras at Tergovist in Wallachia, 1710, fol. His commentaries on the Psalms and on the four Gospels were published together in Gr. Verona, 1530, and the latter by Matthæi, Lips. 1792, 8vo. All his published works are extant in Latin in the Biblio. Patr. tom. xix.—Mur.]

⁷ See note 5, p. 396.—Mur.

⁸ Some have placed Glycas as late as the fifteenth century. See Lami, Diss. de Glyca, prefixed to his Delicia Virorum Erudit. tom. i. [See a notice of him in note 4, p. 396.—Mur.]

⁹ Constantine Harmenopolus was a learned civilian and judge at Thessalonica. Cave and others suppose he flourished A.D. 1150, but some place him two centuries later or about A.D. 1380. His best work is his Ἠπαρχικὸν νόμον or manual of civil law, edited, Gr. and Lat. with notes, Geneva, 1587, 4to. His Epitome Dictionum Sacrorumque Canonum, Gr. and Lat. is in Leunclavius, Jus. Gr. tom. i. So also his Liber de Sectis Hæreticis and some other tracts.—Mur.

¹⁰ Andronicus Camaterus was prefect at Constantinople and filled other high offices under Manuel Comnenus A.D. 1156, and was distinguished for his erudition and eloquence. He wrote Aduersus Latinos, or a dialogue between Manuel and the Roman cardinals then at Constantinople respecting the procession of the Holy Spirit; also a dispute of the emperor with Peter, an Armenian doctor; and a tract on the two natures of Christ, and other subjects.—Mur.

well-known commentator on Homer;¹ Theodorus Balsamon, who expended much labour in expounding and digesting the civil and ecclesiastical laws of the Greeks.²

¹ See note 2, p. 396.—Mur.

² For a fuller account of all these writers, see Fabricius, Biblioth. Græca. [Theodorus Balsamon was deacon, nomophylax, chartaphylax, and librarian of the great church at Constantinople, and afterwards patriarch of Antioch, though he never took possession of his see, it being in the hands of the Latins. He flourished A.D. 1180 and lived till A.D. 1203 or longer. He was the most learned Greek of his time and a powerful adversary against the Latin church. His works are commentaries on the apostolic canons, the councils and canonical epistles of the fathers (edited Gr. and Lat. by Justell, and still better by Beveridge, Oxon. 1672, fol.); Commentaries on the Nomocanon of Photius (edited Gr. and Lat. by Justell, 1615, 4to, and in the Biblioth. Juris Canon. tom. ii.); a collection of ecclesiastical constitutions in the Biblioth. Juris Canon. tom. ii.); and several other treatises on particular points and questions in ecclesiastical law, which were published by Leunclavius and Cotelier.]

The other Greek writers of this century were the following:—

Nicetus Seidus, an antagonist of the Latins A.D. 1110, from whom Leo Allatius has made some extracts, De Consensu, &c. lib. i. cap. xiv. &c.

Nicetus Byzantinus, a philosopher, i.e. a monk, A.D. 1120, who wrote a Defence of the synod of Chalcedon against the prince of Armenia, which is quoted by Leo Allatius, ubi supra, and published entire, Gr. and Lat. in the Gr. Orthod. tom. i.

Georgius, metropolitan of Coreyra A.D. 1136, distinguished himself as a writer and negotiator in the controversy with the Latins.

Antonius Mellissa, a Greek monk A.D. 1140, author of Loci Communes de Virtutibus et Vitiis, compiled from the fathers edited Gr. and Lat. by Gesner, Zurich, 1546, fol. and Geneva, 1609, fol.

Isaac, patriarch of the greater Armenia, flourished perhaps A.D. 1150, author of two invectives against the Armenians; Gr. and Lat. in Auctur. Nov. tom. ii.

Lucas Chrysoberges, a monk and patriarch of Constantinople A.D. 1155 (all 1148) to 1167, author of some Synodal decrees at Constantinople, A.D. 1166; published by Leunclavius. Jus Gr. Rom. lib. iii.

Hasil Achridenus, metropolitan of Thessalonica A.D. 1155, author of an epistle to Pope Hadrian IV. who solicited him to renounce the Greek church and connect himself with the Latin; extant Gr. and Lat. in the Jus Gr. Rom. lib. v.

Michael, a rhetorician and protedicius of the great church of Thessalonica A.D. 1160, who fell into the heresy of the Bogomils and afterwards renounced it. A short confession of his faith is published by Leo Allatius, De Consensu, &c. lib. ii. cap. xii.

Alexius Aristenus, nomophylax and œconomus of the great church of Constantinople A.D. 1166, A Synopsis Canonum with the scholia of this ecclesiastic is in Beveridge's Pandectæ Canonum, Oxon. 1672, fol.

Theorianus, a Greek theologian sent by the emperor Manuel Comnenus A.D. 1117, to bring the Armenians to the Greek faith. His successful discussion with Nauses, the Armenian patriarch, put into the form of a dialogue, was published Gr. and Lat. by Leunclavius, 1578, 8vo, and then in Fronto le Duc's Auctarium, Paris, 1624, tom. i.

Simeon, Magister and Logotheta about A.D. 1170. To him some ascribe the Synopsis Canonum on which Alexius Aristenus wrote Scholía; but the work was probably written before his day.

John Phocas, a native of Crete, first a soldier and then a monk and a married presbyter. In the year 1185 he made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem and the holy places; and on his return wrote a concise and accurate account of what he saw, entitled Compendiaria Descriptio Locorum ab Urbe Antiochia usque Hierosolymam, nec non Syria et Phœnicia, edited Gr. and Lat. by Leo Allatius, Synmict. par. i. p. 1, Colon. 1653, 8vo.

George Xiphilinus, patriarch of Constantinople A.D. 1193—1199, was author of Decretum de Juribus Territorium, extant, Gr. and Lat. in the Jus Gr. et Rom. lib. i. p. 283.

22. The following may be considered as the principal Latin writers:—Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux, from whom the Cistercian monks took the name of Bernardines. He was a man of genius and taste, and of correct views in many respects, but superstitious and deficient in judgment, one who was able to conceal a great thirst for dominion under the garb of extraordinary piety, and who did not scruple to load with false accusations all those who happened to incur his displeasure.³ Innocent

John Camaterus, patriarch of Constantinople A.D. 1199—1206. His Decretum de Nuptiis Consobrinorum was published Gr. and Lat. by Leunclavius, in the Jus Gr. Rom. lib. iv. p. 285.—Mur.

³ The works of St. Bernard have been splendidly edited by Mabillon, with learned prefaces to his treatises containing much valuable information, and an appendix comprising the ancient biographies of him: [printed at Paris, 1666, 2 vols. fol. and 8 vols. 8vo, and A.D. 1690, 6 vols. St. Bernard was born of honourable parentage at Fontaine near Dijon, A.D. 1091, and educated at Chatillon, where he distinguished himself much as a scholar. At the age of twenty-two he renounced the world and became a Cistercian monk. In the year 1115 he was created abbot of the newly-erected monastery of Clairval or Clairvaux in the territory of Langres, where he spent the remainder of his life and acquired an influence almost unbounded throughout Europe. He was remarkably austere in his mode of living and wholly absorbed in practical religion. His eloquence was bold, thrilling, and irresistible; for his conceptions were vivid, his language clear and strong, and his zeal determined and unyielding. In the year 1127 he attended the council of Troyes, and did much to procure the establishment of the order of Knights Templars. From the year 1130 he espoused the cause of Innocent II. against his competitors, and for ten years supported that pontiff and at last procured him a complete triumph. In the year 1140 he assailed Abelard, and contributed much to destroy his reputation and influence, and to reduce him to a state of wretchedness. In 1146 he set himself to rouse Europe to a new crusade, and actually persuaded the King of France and the emperor of Germany to march large armies to the Holy Land. The complete failure of the crusade, contrary to his predictions, much lowered his reputation. But he defended himself by ascribing the failure to the sins of the crusaders. In 1147 he procured the condemnation of the heresy of Gilbert, bishop of Poitiers. The same year he assailed the Petrobrusians and drew off many persons from that heresy. He also attacked and routed the Apostolici. In 1151 he exposed the arrogance and pride of the Roman pontiffs. He died A.D. 1153 in the sixty-third year of his age, was sainted, and reported to have wrought innumerable miracles both before and after his decease. A prolix life of him was written by several of his contemporaries. The best modern history of his life is that of Neander, entitled Der heil. Bernard und sein Zeitalter, Berlin, 1813 and 1830, 8vo. Milner's Life of Bernard, which makes up nearly the whole of his church history of the twelfth century, is worth reading, though written with partiality. His works are nearly all on practical religion and consist chiefly of letters and discourses.—Mur. [Neander's work on Bernard has been translated into English by Miss Wrench, and published in London, 12mo, 1843, for a charitable object. See Gibbon's character of Bernard in his Decline and Fall, vol. II. p. 113, &c.; and for a juster and more eloquent estimate of the character of this remarkable man, see Taylor's Franciscanism, p. 247—257. In the preface to her excellent translation, Miss Wrench gives some interesting particulars of the history and ultimate dissolution of the famous abbey of Clairvaux. It is now a house of industry for the reformation of criminals, two thousand prisoners being employed in the manufacture of stuffs. The only work of Bernard which has been made accessible to the English reader is his Meditations, translated by Warren, Lond. 1700, 8vo.—R.

III. the Roman pontiff, whose epistles and other productions contribute to illustrate the religion and discipline of the age.¹ Anselm of Laon,² a man of acuteness and a skilful dialectician. By him was educated Abelard, famous in that age for the acuteness and elegance of his genius, the extent of his erudition, his dexterity as a disputant, and the misfortunes which befel him.³ Godfrey or Geoffry of Vendome, who has left us epistles and some dissertations;⁴ Rupert of Duytz, the most famous expositor of the scriptures among the Latins of this century, a man generally of a sound judgment and not destitute of imagination and taste;⁵ Ilugo of St. Victor, a man of a

¹ The Epistles of Innocent III. were republished by Baluze in 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1682. [He was pontiff from A.D. 1198 to 1216, and will be noticed more particularly in the following century. Besides his Letters he wrote a number of Tracts and Discourses, chiefly of a practical and devotional character; also a commentary on the seven penitential Psalms, on the contempt of the world, and on the mysteries of the mass. But none of these is now of much value.—Mur.]

² Anselm of Laon was schoolmaster and dean of the cathedral of Laon about A.D. 1103, and died A.D. 1117. Abelard his pupil represents him as neither learned nor discriminating, but a man full of words without much meaning. (See Abelard's Hist. of his Own Sufferings, c. iii.) He was author of the Glossa Interlinearis, or Interlinear and marginal notes to the Old and New Testaments derived from the writings of the fathers, often published; e. g. Lyons, 1528, Antw. 1634, &c. The commentaries on Matthew and John, on the epistles of Paul, the Apocalypse, and the Canticles, published among the works of Anselm of Canterbury, are by some ascribed to Anselm of Laon.—Mur.

³ See Bayle, Dictionnaire, art. Abelard, tome i. p. 18, and tome iii. art. Piraclet, p. 2174; Gervais, Vie de Pierre Abelard et de Heloise, Paris, 1728, 2 vols. 8vo. The works of Abelard, comprised in one volume 4to, were published by Francis Anboise, Paris, 1616. But a collection twice or even thrice as large might be made; for, cul non dictus Ilylas?—[Abelard was born of noble parentage at Palais, near Nantes, A.D. 1079. He first studied under Rosceline, founder of the sect of Nominalists. Distinguished as a scholar, he removed to Paris at the age of twenty, to study dialectics under William de Champeaux. After a while he began to dispute with his teacher; and, as many of his fellow-students awarded to him the victory in several cases, his master became jealous of him and they parted. In A.D. 1099 he opened a school of his own at Melun, ten leagues from Paris; and his school being thronged, he removed it to Corbeil to be nearer Paris. The school of his former master and present rival declined fast. But soon after the health of Abelard failed, and he had to retire for two years. On resuming his school at Corbeil, he completely ran down his rival Champeaux. Abelard next removed to Laon to study theology under Anselm. Here again the pupil outshone the master and became his rival. He now came to Paris and lectured with vast applause on theology and philosophy, to a great concourse of students from different countries. But now at the age of forty, he seduced the celebrated Heloise, a fatherless girl of eighteen, who was placed under his instruction. She bore him a son, and to pacify her enraged relatives he privately married her. She however denied the marriage, lest it should destroy his prospects in the church, and retired to a monastery. Her uncle now hired ruffians, who entered his chamber by night and inflicted on his person a disgraceful and cruel mutilation. Heloise then took the veil, and Abelard became a monk at St. Denys. He now resumed lecturing, and also published his "Theology." [Introduction ad Theologiam, in his Opera, p. 973.—A.] This work brought on him the charge of heresy, A.D. 1121.—Still Abelard was popular as a lecturer. But having asserted that St. Denys the founder of the church at Paris was not the Dionysius of Athens, mentioned in the book of Acts, a new persecution commenced; and he retired from St. Denys, A.D. 1122, to a forest near Nogent in Champagne, where he lived in retirement. But students gathering round him there a new monastery grew up called that of the Paraclete. He had now six hundred pupils. Next he was chosen abbot of St. Gildas de Ruys near Vannes, where he spent many years. The convent of Argenteuil where Heloise was, being dispersed, Abelard gave her the convent of the Paraclete, where she spent the rest of her life, a devout abbess. Now the famous correspondence between Abelard and Heloise took place; a correspondence which Mr. Popo has transformed and altered greatly in his poetic version. Abelard was again accused of heresy by St. Bernard and others, appealed to the pope, was condemned unheard, set out for Rome A.D. 1140, reached Cluny where Peter the Venerable received him kindly, procured from the pope his acquittal, and also effected a reconciliation between him and St. Bernard. Abelard passed two years at Cluny, with reputation for piety and learning, and delivered acceptable lectures upon in declining health. He died there in 1142, aged sixty-three years. The learned and candid Du Pin, in his Auteurs Ecclesiastiques, cent. xii. ch. vii, after examining the fourteen charges of erroneous doctrine imputed to him, pronounces them all false or frivolous, except the two following, namely, the eleventh, that the Jews who crucified Christ did no sin by that act; and the twelfth, that the power of blinding and loosing belonged only to the inspired apostles, and extended only to the church militant. The Catholics generally, according to Bayle, have been less severe upon Abelard's character than the Protestants. His seduction of his pupil all must condemn. It appears also that he was both vain and selfish. Neither do his writings display those masterly talents which his reputation as a lecturer would lead us to expect. His printed works contain four Epistles to Heloise, seven Epistles to others, a history of his life till A.D. 1134, his apology or confession of faith, expositions of the Lord's prayer, the Apostles' creed, and the Athanasian creed; a reply to queries of Heloise, a tract against heresies, Commentaries on Romans, thirty-two sermons, directions for the nuns of the Paraclete, and his Introduction to Theology.—Mur. [See also Berrington's Lines of Abelard and Heloise, Lond. 1787, 8vo; and the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome xii. p. 85, &c. The works on which Bernard founded his charges were the Theologia Christiana in Martene, Thesaurus, tom. v. p. 1156, &c.; the Ethica, scu Scito te Ipsum in Pezlaus, Anecd., tom. iii. par. ii. p. 627, and his Sic et Non, on the contradictions of the fathers, which has been printed for the first time only about ten years ago, by Victor Cousin, in the Collection des Documents Inédits sur l'Histoire de France, published by the French government. The one which M. Cousin edited is in the volume entitled Œuvres Inédites d'Abailard, Paris, 1836, 4to; to which he has prefixed a valuable Introduction tracing the early history of scholasticism as it existed in France. Besides the Sic et Non, this volume contains Abelard's Dialectica in five parts, a fragment, De Generibus et Speciebus, with Glossa by him on Porphyry, the Categories, on a book De Interpretatione, and on the Topica of Boethius—all published for the first time.—R.]

⁴ Godfrey was abbot of Vendome from A.D. 1093, till after A.D. 1129. He was a zealous supporter of Urban II. who created him a cardinal, and held an extensive correspondence with pontiffs, cardinals, and bishops. His works, comprising epistles, eighteen tracts, and fifteen sermons, were published by Birmond, Paris, 1610, 8vo, and then in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xxi.—Mur.

⁵ Concerning Rupert of Duytz, (Tutlensis) besides the common historians, Mabillon treats particularly in his Annales Benedict. tom. vi. p. 19, 20, 42, 144, 168, 261, 282, 296; and also states the controversies into which he was brought. [Rupert was a German monk of St. Laurence near Liege, and then abbot of Duytz near Cologne. He commenced author A.D. 1111, and died 1135. He was known as a polemic in

prolific mind who has written on nearly all the branches of knowledge then cultivated, both sacred and profane, and who has said many things well;¹ Richard of St. Victor, the coryphæus of the mystics of that age, whose Arca Mystica in particular, containing the marrow of this sort of wisdom, was received with avidity;² Honorius of Autun, a theologian and philosopher, not without reputation;³ Gratian, a monk to whom canon law was indebted for a new form and increased authority;⁴ William of Rheims, who composed various tracts to subserve the cause of piety;⁵ Peter Lombard, often called Master of the Sentences, because he collected and arranged scientifically the theological opinions and decisions of the Latin fathers;⁶ Gilbert de la Porrée, a theologian and philosopher who is said to have explained some points in theology erroneously;⁷ William of Auxerre, much celebrated for his Summa Theologica or system of Theology;⁸ Peter of his day, and was accused of not holding the doctrine of transubstantiation, but perhaps falsely. He is chiefly known to us as a commentator on nearly the whole Bible; but he also wrote on the rites of worship through the year, on the conflagration of Duytz, contemplations on death, tracts on the will and omnipotence of God, the lives of some saints, &c. His works have been repeatedly printed; e.g. Paris, 1633, 2 tom. folo.—Mur.

¹ See the Gallia Christiana, tom. vii. p. 661. His works were printed together in three volumes folio, Rouen, 1648. Berlangius has written expressly of him in his Diss. de Hugone a S. Victore, Helmsst. 1746, 4to. Add Martene's Voyage Littér. tome ii. p. 91, 92. [Hugo of St. Victor was born A.D. 1096, but whether at Lyons in the Netherlands or in Lower Saxony, has been contested. He was an Augustinian canon in the monastery of St. Victor at Paris, where he died A.D. 1140, aged 44. So fully did he enter into the theological views of St. Augustine, and so exactly did he express them in his writings, that he was called Augustine the Second, and also the Mouth of Augustine. He commented largely on all parts of the Bible, wrote on Dionysius the Areopagite, and composed many tracts and works on philosophical, theological, and practical subjects. But a considerable part of the works ascribed to him and published as his have been adjudged to other authors.—Mur. [See also Quint. de Script. Eccles. tom. ii. p. 1138, and the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome xii. p. 7, &c. The only work of importance which is indubitably his production, is De Sacramentis Christ. Fidei.—R.

² Gallia Christiana, tom. vii. p. 669. [Richard of St. Victor was a Scotchman, but spent his life at Paris, being first a regular canon and then for nine years prior of St. Victor near the walls at Paris, till his death 1173. He was the intimate friend of St. Bernard and of Hugo of St. Victor. His writings are numerous tracts and treatises on practical and experimental religion, and on biblical and theological subjects, in all of which he spiritualizes almost continually. The best edition of his works is said to be that of Rouen, 1650, in 2 vols. folo.—Mur. [See also Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xxix. p. 275.—R.

³ This celebrated writer is usually called Honorius of Autun, but Le Beuf has shown that he was a German, in his Diss. sur l'Hist. Française, tome i. p. 254. [He was a presbyter and schoolmaster in the church of Autun in Burgundy, and flourished about A.D. 1130. His works are an account of the ecclesiastical writers compiled from Jerome, Gennadius, Isidore, and Beda; commentaries on the books of Solomon, a dialogue on predestination and free will, Gemma Animæ or on the mass and its ceremonies, on the visible creation, Elucidarium, on heresies, on the philosophy of the world, on the properties of the sun, a catalogue of the Popes, all published in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xx. besides many pieces never published.—Mur.

⁴ See note 5, p. 398.

⁵ William of Rheims was perhaps first a monk of Clairvaux under Bernard, and certainly was abbot of St. Thély near Rheims, and then during nine years abbot of St. Nicosius at Rheims. In the year 1153 he resigned his abbacy and became a Cistercian in the monastery of Signl. His works are, De Vita Solitaria, Speculum Fidei, Ænigma Fidei, Meditationes, De Con-

templando Deo, De Natura Corporis et Animi, Disputatio contra Petrum Abalardum, De Erroribus Guiberti de Conchis, De Sacramento Altaris, Expositio in Cantica Cantiorum, Commentarius in Epist. ad Romanos, and De Vita Sti. Bernardi. All, except the last, are in the Biblioth. Cisterciensis, tom. iv.—Mur.

⁶ Gallia Christiana, tom. vii. p. 68. [Peter Lombard was born at a village near Novaria in Lombardy, whence his surname of Lombardus. He first studied at Bologna and then went to France to study theology, being recommended to the notice and kind offices of St. Bernard. At Paris he acquired high reputation as early as A.D. 1141, was made professor of divinity there, and 1150 bishop of Paris till his death A.D. 1164. Besides his notes or commentary on the Psalms and his collections from the fathers on the epistles of Paul, he composed a very celebrated system of divinity extracted from the fathers, especially from Hilary, Ambrose, Jerome, and Augustine, entitled the Sentences, and divided into four books. This work was the text-book in theology for some ages; and in its general arrangements has served for a model nearly to the present day. The basis of his distribution is the maxim of Augustine, that all knowledge is either of things or of signs; and that things are divisible into such as are to be enjoyed and such as are to be used. Accordingly in the first book he treats of things which are to be enjoyed, viz. God, the supreme good of man, his nature, attributes, and subsistence in three persons. In the second book he treats of things to be used, viz. the creation, its production by the power of God, the formation of angels and men, the apostasy of angels, and the fall of man, of grace and free will, original and actual sin, &c. In the third book he treats of the incarnation and sacrifice of Christ, redemption, faith, charity, and good works, as conditions of salvation. The fourth book treats of the signs or sacraments of the church, except that in the seven last sections he treats of the day of judgment and the future state. See Du Pin's Auteurs Ecclesiast. century xii. chap. xv.—Mur. [Of the numerous editions of this once celebrated work, the Libri Quatuor Sententiarum, the best are those published at Louvain: by Aleaume in 1546, folio, and 1576, 4to. There is a question whether this work was derived from the Sententia of Bandinus, published also at Louvain by Chelidonius, 1557, 8vo, which is the opinion of Chelidonius and Cramer in his Fortsetzung von Bausen, part vi. p. 846; or whether Bandinus epitomized Peter Lombard, as Schroeckh in his Kirchengesch. vol. xxviii. p. 48, and Pœtzius in Theaur. Anecd. tom. i. p. 45 of the Introduction, are of opinion. This popular schoolman did not escape animadversion for some of his speculations respecting the human nature of Christ; and sixteen of his articles were condemned by the divines of Paris in 1300. See Gieseler, Lehrbuch, &c. Cunningham's trans. vol. ii. p. 319.—R.

⁷ Gilbert de la Porrée (Porretanus) was a Frenchman of Aquitaine, rector of the school at Paris, canon and A.D. 1141 bishop of Poitiers till his death, A.D. 1154. This distinguished scholar and philosopher advanced some views in theology and particularly respecting the Trinity, which were new and strange to his contemporaries, and which caused him to be charged with heresy. See the next chapter, sec. 11. His notes on the Psalms, commentaries on the epistles of Paul, and treatise on the Trinity, are said to exist in manuscript. All that has been published is his epistle to the abbot of St. Florentius appended to the works of Guibert by D'Achery.—Mur.

⁸ Le Beuf, Diss. sur la Somme Théologique de Guillaume d'Auxerre, in Malet's Continuation des Mémoires d'Hist. et de Littérature, tome liii. par. ii. p. 317. [He was archdeacon of Beauvais, and died at Rome A.D.

Blois, whose epistles and numerous tracts are still read with some advantage;¹ John of Salisbury, a man of genius and learning, who united eloquence with the study of philosophy and theology, as is manifest from his Metaphysics and his books De Nugis Curialium;² Peter Comestor, author of the Historia Scholastica, or that epitome of the history contained in the Old and New Testaments which was formerly studied by the youth in the schools.³ The names and merits of the other Latin writers may be learned from the works devoted to this subject.⁴

1230.—Schl. [But Schroeckh (Kirchengesch. vol. xviii. p. 157) places him near the end of the thirteenth century.—Mur.]

¹ Peter of Blois (Blasens's) was born at Blois, studied the liberal arts at Paris, civil and canon law at Bologna, and theology at Chartres under John of Salisbury. Perhaps he was made a canon at Chartres. In 1167 he went to Sicily and became tutor and afterwards secretary to William II. king of Sicily. Soon after on the banishment of his friend the archbishop of Palermo, he returned to France and was invited over to England, where he was made archdeacon of Bath, archdeacon of London, and chancellor to the archbishop of Canterbury. After a life of industry and virtue he died in England A.D. 1200. His works, consisting of 183 epistles, 65 sermons, and 17 tracts on various subjects then exciting interest, were published, Paris, 1667, fol. He also continued the history of Ingulphus of Croyland to the year 1118. Several other works of his are lost. See Du Pin, Auteurs Ecclesiast. cent. xii. chap. xi.—Mur.

² John of Salisbury in Wiltshire, England, one of the brightest geniuses of the age. He was a pupil of Abélard in 1136, and afterwards an intimate friend of Thomas à Becket, whom he accompanied in his exile for seven years; but he disapproved of Becket's resistance to the king of England. He returned to England, but on the death of Becket A.D. 1172, he again went to France, and in 1179 was made bishop of Chartres where he died three years after. His works are Polygraphicon or on the properties of courtiers, in which he displays much knowledge of the world, great wit, and very just views of men and things; Philobiblicum, an acute and learned treatise on logic, philology, and philosophy; the life of St. Thomas of Canterbury, several hundreds of epistles, and a commentary on Paul's epistles. These works have been published separately, but never all together.—Mur.

³ Peter Comestor was a native of Troyes and a priest and dean in that city, then chancellor of the university of Paris. Toward the close of life he retired to the monastery of St. Victor, where he died A.D. 1188. Numerous manuscript sermons of his still exist. Historia Scholastica is a biblical history of the world, from the creation to the end of the book of Acts.—Mur.

⁴ The Latin writers of this century omitted by Mosheim are the following, arranged alphabetically:—

Adam, a Scot and regular canon of the order of Premonstrants, flourished A.D. 1160, and died about A.D. 1180. He wrote a commentary on the rule of St. Augustine, a tract on the triple tabernacle of Moses, on the three kinds of meditation, and forty-seven sermons, published, Antw. 1659, fol.

Elmoth, an English and Danish Augustinian monk of Canterbury, who spent most of his life in Denmark, and about A.D. 1105 wrote the life and passion of St. Canute, king of Denmark.

Alfred, Ealred or Elred, either a Scot or an Englishman, a Cistercian monk and abbot of Revesby in Lincolnshire, flourished A.D. 1150 and died in 1166. He wrote the life and miracles of St. Edward, king and confessor, genealogy of the kings of England, De Bello Standardii Tempore Stephani Regis, Historia de Sanctimoniali de Waltham, published by Twissden, London, 1652. Also sermons on the lessons for the year, on Isaiah, Speculum Charitatis, Tractatus de Puero Jesu Duodecenni, De Spirituali Amicitia, published in the Bibliotheca Cisterciensis, tom. v. and in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xxiii.

Alanus de Insulis, a Fleming and monk of Clairvaux, an abbot and A.D. 1151—1167 bishop of Auxerre, but he resigned his bishopric and retired to Clairvaux, where he died A.D. 1182. He wrote a life of St. Bernard, published by Mabillon in the Opera Bernardi.

Albert or Alberic, a canon of the church of Aix, A.D. 1120. He wrote from the account of others Historia Hierosolymitana Expeditionis sub Godefride Bulhincio et Aliis, a very good history of the first crusade, from A.D. 1095 to 1120, published by Bongarsius, Gesta Dei per Francos, tom. i. p. 184.

Alger, a deacon and schoolmaster at Liege during many years, and then a monk of Cluny under Peter Maurice. He flourished A.D. 1133, and wrote De Sacramento Corporis et Sanguinis Domini a Cruce Berengarii, extant in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xxi. besides some other things not published.

Alexander III. pope A.D. 1159—1181, has left us 337 epistles.

Amedeus, bishop of Lausanne A.D. 1144—1158. He wrote eight homilies in praise of the Virgin Mary, in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xx.

Anastasius IV. pope A.D. 1153, 1154, has left us thirteen epistles.

Anselm, bishop of Havelburg in the duchy of Brandenburg, A.D. 1149, author of three dialogues against the Greeks, published by D'Achery, Spicileg. tom. xlii.

Arnold Carnotensis, abbot of the Benedictine monastery of Bonneval in the diocese of Chartres, an intimate friend of St. Bernard and still living A.D. 1162. He wrote a number of treatises on practical religion, published at the close of Cyran's works, ed. Oxon, 1682.

Arnulph, bishop of Luxen in Normandy, A.D. 1141. He accompanied Lewis, king of France, in his crusade to Palestine, A.D. 1147, was made papal legate to England in 1160, and much employed in public business till near his death, A.D. 1182. Many of his sermons, epistles, and epigrams, were published at Paris, 1585, 8vo, and then in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xxii. Some others have since been published.

Baldric, a native of Orleans and a monk and abbot of Angers A.D. 1095, and archbishop of Dol A.D. 1114—1131. He wrote Hist. Hierosolymitana. It is a history of the first crusade, from A.D. 1095 to 1100, and is extant among the Gesta Dei per Francos, and among the Scrip. Hist. Francici of Du Chesne, tom. iv. He wrote also the life of Hugo, archbishop of Rouen, and the life of Robert d'Arbrissell, founder of the order of Fontevraud.

Balduin, an English schoolmaster, a Cistercian monk and abbot, bishop of Worcester, A.D. 1181, and archbishop of Canterbury A.D. 1185—1191. He accompanied king Richard I. in his crusade, and died in the siege of Ptolemais. He wrote sixteen tracts on practical religion, De Commendatione Fratrum, and De Sacramento Altaris; all extant in the Biblioth. Cisterciensis, tom. v.

Berengosus, abbot of St. Maximin within the walls, Treves, flourished about A.D. 1110. He wrote De Laude et Inventione Crucis Dominicæ, and several monastic discourses, extant in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xii.

Bonaerius of Milan, teacher among the Cathari A.D. 1163. His Vita Catharorum Hæreticorum is in D'Achery's Spicileg. tom. xlii.

Callistus II. pope A.D. 1119—1124, has left us thirty-five epistles, published in the Concilia, besides five more in Baluze, Miscell. tom. ii. and five sermons in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xx.

Clement III. pope A.D. 1187—1191, has left us seven epistles.

Coelestine II. pope A.D. 1143, 1144, has left us three epistles.

Coelestine III. pope A.D. 1191—1198, has left us seventeen epistles.

Eadmer, Edmer, Ediner, or Edmund, an English Benedictine monk of Canterbury, the pupil and friend and biographer of Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury. He flourished A.D. 1121, and was for a time bishop of St. Andrews in Scotland, but resigned the see about A.D. 1124, and spent his old age at Canterbury. He wrote Historia Norworum sive sui sæculi, from A.D. 1066 to 1122, which has been highly extolled; the life of St. Anselm, and a few tracts on moral subjects

All these are printed with the works of Anselm. He also wrote the life of St. Wilfred, archbishop of York, extant in Mabillon, Acta Sanctorum Ord. Bened. secul. iii. par. 1. Numerous other tracts, historical and religious, are said to exist in manuscript in the Library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge.

Earnluph, a monk of Beauvais, whom Lanfranc invited over to England, where he was successively prior of Canterbury, abbot of Peterborough, and bishop of Rochester, and died A.D. 1124, aged eighty-four. He wrote De Incertis Conjugiis, and De Corpore et Sanguine Domini; in D'Achery's Spicilegium, tom. ii.

Ecbert, a German Benedictine monk and abbot of St. Florin in Schoonhoven, flourished A.D. 1154, and wrote thirteen Discourses against the Cathari, and the life of Elizabeth, his sister, the abbess of Schönaugen. His discourses are in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xxiii.

Elizabeth, a German Benedictine nun and abbess of Schönaugen in the diocese of Treves, where she died A.D. 1165 aged thirty-six years. She wrote her Visions or Revelations and a book of epistles, published, Cologne, 1628.

Eugene III. Pope A.D. 1145—1153, has left us eighty-nine epistles.

Florentinus, called Bravonius, an English monk of Worcester, who died A.D. 1118. That year he completed his chronicle from the creation to A.D. 1118, chiefly borrowed from Marianus Scotus; he also wrote a genealogy of the English kings, both published, Lond. 1592, 4to.

Folmar, head of the monastery of Trifflenstein in Franconia, about A.D. 1160. He opposed the received doctrine of transubstantiation for a time, but recanted. Some of his epistles were published by Gretser, subjoined to his Scriptores Cœliacensis ad. Waldenses, Ingolst. 1613, 4to.

Franco, a schoolmaster, Benedictine monk and abbot, at Laon, about A.D. 1111. He wrote De Gratia Dei (in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xxi.) and some other pieces, among which was a tract on the quadrature of the circle, and another on the principles of arithmetic.

Fulcherius Carnotensis, a monk or presbyter who accompanied Robert, duke of Normandy, in the first crusade; of which he wrote a history, entitled Gesta Francorum Hierusalem Peregrinantium ab anno 1035, ad annum usque 1124, composed in a coarse style. It was published imperfect in the Gesta Dei per Francos, and complete in Du Chesne's Scriptores Francici, Paris, 1640, tom. iv. p. 816.

Galfid called also Arthur, bishop of St. Asaph A.D. 1151—1175 (Geoffrey of Monmouth), author of a history of Britain from the earliest times to his own age, a work not in much repute, published, Paris, 1517, 4to, and among the Scriptores Britannia Minoris, Heidelberg, 1587, fol.

Galfid, or Gaultier Vinesau, (De Vins Salvo), a Norman English poet and historian, who flourished A.D. 1199; author of Historia sine Itinerarium Richardi Anglorum Regis in Terram Sanctam, and Pœmata de Glorioso Rege Richardo; published among the Historia Anglicana Scriptores, Oxford, 1687, tom. ii. also of some other works never published.—Mur.

Gaulfrid, a French monk, prior and presbyter of Limoges, A.D. 1183, and author of a Chronicon, relating especially to the history of France from A.D. 996 to 1184; published by Labbé, Biblioth. Nov. MS. tom. ii.

Gelasius II. pope A.D. 1118, 1119. He was nobly born at Ojeta, in Naples, educated at Monto Cassino, made chancellor and cardinal deacon at Rome. He had to fight for St. Peter's chair and to abandon Rome, and died in France. He has left us six epistles, and a life of St. Erasmus.

Gilbert or Gislebert, surnamed Crispin, a monk of Bec at the commencement of the century. He travelled to Rome, and had a dispute with a Jew, which he afterwards committed to writing and entitled De Fide Ecclesie Contra Judæos. He also wrote Contra Judæos, and a great number of Homilies, which are still preserved in manuscript. He died A.D. 1117.

Gilbert Follioth, an Englishman, abbot of Leicester and A.D. 1149 bishop of Hereford, and A.D. 1161—1187 bishop of London. He was competitor with Thomas à Becket for the see of Canterbury, and ever after sided with the king against Becket. The king employed him much. He was twice excommunicated by the Pope, which he did not regard. His commentary on the Canticles was published by Junius, Lond. 1638, 4to, and eight of his epistles are among the epistles of Becket, ed. Brussels, 1682.

Gille or Gillebert, an Irish bishop, who died A.D. 1139. He has left us Libellus de Statu Ecclesie, and two letters in Ussher's Epistol. Hibernic. Sylloge, p. 77.

Godfrey Viterbiensis, an Italian of Viterbo, a prebtor and secretary to the successive emperors, Conrad III. Frederic I. and Henry VI. He travelled much during forty years, and became acquainted with Greek, Hebrew, and Chaldaic. His death was in 1186. He wrote a universal history entitled Pantheon or Chronicon Universale, dedicated to Pope Urban III. extending from the creation to A.D. 1186, a work of vast compass, published by Pistorius, Scriptores Rerum Germanicar. Francf. 1584.

Guterius or Galterius, styled the chancellor, a Frenchman, A.D. 1120. He wrote a history of the capture of Antioch by the Christians, A.D. 1115, and their loss of it in 1119, when Guterius himself was taken prisoner; extant in the Gesta Dei per Francos, tom. i. p. 441.

Gueric, a disciple of St. Bernard, a canon and schoolmaster at Tours, and then a Cistercian abbot in the diocese of Rheims, died A.D. 1157. He wrote sermons on the lessons for the year, printed in an appendix to the works of Bernard, and in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xxiii.

Gulbert or Gilbert, abbot of St. Mary at Nogent, in Laon, flourished A.D. 1101, and died A.D. 1124. He wrote a tract on the composition of sermons, morals on Job, De Pignoris Sanctorum, several other tracts, and Gesta Dei per Francos, or history of the crusades from their commencement to A.D. 1100; published in Bongarsius' Collection, tom. i.

Guigo or Guido, of Dauphiny, a Carthusian monk and prior, who flourished A.D. 1120. He wrote Scala Claustralem, seu de Modis Orandi, several epistles, a life of St. Hugo of Grenoble, &c.

Gregory VIII. pope A.D. 1187—1187, has left us three epistles.

Hadrian IV. (Nicolas Breakspere), the only Englishman who ever filled the papal throne. Disappointed of an English monastery he went to France, studied at Paris, became an Augustinian monk, prior and abbot at St. Rufus near Valence. Going to Rome on business, Eugene III. created him a cardinal and bishop of Alba. In 1148 he was papal legate to Norway and Denmark. In 1154 he succeeded to the papal chair till his death in 1159. He has left us forty-four epistles.

Helmholt, a presbyter of Lubee and a canon, died A.D. 1170. He wrote Chronicon Sclavorum, from the time of Charlemagne to A.D. 1163, published by Bangert, Lubee, 1659, 4to.

Henry of Huntingdon, the son of a married English priest, canon of Lincoln, and archdeacon of Huntingdon, flourished A.D. 1150. He wrote Historia Anglorum ab Ipsi Gentis Primordiis usque ad Stephanum Regis Mortem (A.D. 1154), published by Saville, Lond. 1596, fol. and Francf. 1601.

Hermann, a converted German Jew of Cologne, who was persecuted by his unbelieving friends, became a canon, was contemporary with St. Bernard, and an intimate of Rupert of Deytz. He has left a tract respecting his own conversion, published by Carpvovius Lips. 1687.

Herveus, a Benedictine monk of Dol, A.D. 1130, wrote a commentary on the epistles of Paul attributed to St. Anselm, and printed among his works.

Hildegard, a German abbess of St. Rupert on the Rhine, born at Spanheim A.D. 1098, and died A.D. 1180. Her visions or revelations were solemnly approved and sanctioned by St. Bernard, by many leading bishops of France and Germany, by three different popes, and by a council at Troyes. She wrote Scienas, seu Visiones sine Revelationes, life of St. Robert a confessor, thirty-eight epistles, Miscellanies, and an exposition of the rule of St. Benedict, published, Cologne, 1566, and most of them also, Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xxiii.

Honorius II. pope A.D. 1124—1130, has left us eleven epistles.

Hugo Etherianus, a Tuscan, who went to Constantinople and was patronized by the emperor Manuel. He flourished A.D. 1177, and wrote and disputed strenuously against the Greeks. His tract on the intermediate state of the soul, and his work on the procession of the Holy Spirit against the Greeks, were published, Basil, 1543, and in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xxii.

Hugo, abbot of St. Flavinus in Burgundy, flourished A.D. 1101. He wrote Chronicon Firdanense, in two parts, the first from the birth of Christ to A.D. 1002, and the second to A.D. 1102, published by Labbé, Biblioth. Nov. Manus. tom. i.

Hugo, a Benedictine monk of Fleury, A.D. 1120. He wrote a Chronicon, from Ninus, king of Assyria, to Lewis the Meek, A.D. 840, and an Epilogue embracing the transactions of Lewis the Meek; also two Books De Regia Potestate et Sacrodotali Dignitate.

Innocent II. pope, A.D. 1130—1143, has left us fifty epistles.

John, archbishop of Lyons, who A.D. 1112 had a contest with his suffragans respecting lay-investitures, which he wished to suppress. His epistle to them on the subject is in Harduin's Concilia, tom. vi. par. ii. p. 1919.

John Brompton, an English Cistercian monk and abbot near York, A.D. 1198, the reputed author of the Chronicon ab anno 588 ad annum 1198, published by Twissen, Scriptores Decem Angli, Lond. 1652.

John Burgundio, a native of Pisa, flourished A.D. 1143, died 1194. He translated many homilies of Cyrillosim, John Damascenus, De Fide Orthodoxa, and Nemesius's eight books on philosophy.

John du Hexham, a native of Hexham in Northumberland and an Augustinian monk A.D. 1160. He continued the history of Simeon of Durham from 1130 to 1155; see next page.

John Belotus, rector of the theological school at Paris A.D. 1162 (all A.D. 1329) author of Rationale Divinorum Officiorum, published, Antw. 1570, 8vo, Lyons, 1583, and 1592, 8vo.

Leo Marsicanus, librarian of Monte Cassino and cardinal deacon A.D. 1101. He died after A.D. 1115, having been very active and devoted to the holy see. He left a chronicle of the monastery of Cassino from the time of St. Benedict to A.D. 1055; also some sermons and lives of saints which were never published.

Lucius II. pope A.D. 1144, 1145, has left us twelve epistles.

Lucius III. pope A.D. 1181—1185, has left us two epistles.

Nicolaus, a Cistercian monk of Clairvaux and secretary to St. Bernard; but being accused of forging letters in Bernard's name, he fled into Italy and long aspersed the character of Bernard. A book of his epistles is in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xxi.; also a book of his sermons in the Biblioth. Cisterciensis, tom. iii.

Odo of Cambrai, a schoolmaster at Orleans, abbot of St. Martin of Tours, chosen bishop of Cambrai A.D. 1105, but refused investiture from the emperor Henry IV. He wrote an exposition of the canon of the mass, and several other tracts, extant in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xxi.

Ordericus Vitalis, an Englishman, born at Attingham (in Shropshire), A.D. 1075, sent to Normandy at the age of eleven, where he became a monk, deacon, and presbyter, and flourished about A.D. 1140. He wrote an Ecclesiastical History from the birth of Christ to A.D. 1142, published by Du Chesne among his Scriptores Normannici, Paris, 1619, fol. p. 321.

Otho or Otto of Freysingen, of royal German extraction, and uncle to the emperor Frederick Barbarossa. He studied at Paris, became a Cistercian monk and abbot, was made bishop of Frisingen A.D. 1138, engaged in the second crusade, A.D. 1147, resigned his bishopric in 1156, and died two years after. He wrote a chronological history of the world from the creation to A.D. 1146; also the life and reign of Frederick Barbarossa. Both have been often published and particularly among the German historians, A.D. 1585 and 1670, tom. i.

Petrus Alfonsus, once Moses, a distinguished Spanish Jew. After his conversion, A.D. 1106, he wrote a dialogue against the Jews, in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xxi.

Peter Grossolanus or Chrysolanus, archbishop of Milan A.D. 1110—1116, which office he was obliged to abdicate. He was sent as a papal legate to Constantinople, and has left us an oration addressed to the Greek emperor, Alexius Comnenus, on the procession of the Holy Spirit; extant, Latin, in Baronius, Annal. ann.

1115, and Greek and Latin, in Leo Allatius, Orthod. Græc. tom. i.

Peter Maurice the Venerable, born of a noble French family, first a soldier and then a monk of Cluny, where he was abbot from A.D. 1123 to 1156. Pontius, the former abbot of Cluny, gave him trouble during the first years of his abbacy. In 1126 he commenced preaching and writing against Peter De Bruis. In 1140 he received Abelard, and reconciled both Bernard and the pope to him. He visited Italy on important business in 1145 and 1150, and was highly honoured by pope Eugene and the citizens of Rome. He wrote Epistolarum Libri vi. tracts against the Jews, against heresies and Islamism, against the Petrobrusians, on the transfiguration of Christ, on a translation of the Koran procured by him, and a few other pieces; all published in the Biblioth. Cluniensis, Paris, 1614, and the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xxii.

Peter, born at Rome A.D. 1110, a student and monk at Monte Cassino A.D. 1115—1137, then legate to the emperor Lotharius, who employed him at his court till his death. He wrote De Viri Illustris Monasterii Casinensis. Liber quartus Chronici Casinensis (A.D. 1046—1138) De Notis Literarum Romanarum, besides numerous tracts never published.

Peter Cellensis, abbot of the monastery of Colles near Troyes, and then of St. Remigius at Rheims, and, A.D. 1182—1187, bishop of Chartres. He wrote De Penitentia. Musica Tabernaculi Mystica Expositio. De Conscientia. Epistole. De Disciplina Clericali, and sermons on the lessons for the year; all published by the Benedictine monks, Paris, 1671.

Philip, bishop of Tarentum from A.D. 1136 to 1138, when he was deposed for not adhering to Peter Leunis, the anti-pope, went to France and became a monk at Clairvaux under St. Bernard. In 1150 he was made prior, and 1156 abbot of a convent in the diocese of Chartres; which however he resigned before his death, and returned to Clairvaux. He has left us twenty-five epistles, published by Charles Du Viseh, subjoined to his Scriptores Ordinis Cisterciensis, p. 336.

Philip Harveng, called Eleemosynarius, abbot of Good Hope in Hainault A.D. 1140; died 1180. He wrote tracts, biographies, and letters; published, Douay, 1620, fol.

Potho, a Benedictine monk of Prum in the diocese of Treves, A.D. 1152. He wrote De Statu Domus Dei and De Domo Sapientie in the Bibliotheca Patrum, tom. xxi.

Radulphus de Diceto, dean of St. Paul's, London. He was a traveller, flourished A.D. 1197, and wrote a brief Chronology from the creation to A.D. 1198, and Imagines Historiarum ab anno 1148, ad annum 1200; both published by Twissen, Scriptores Decem Angli.

Radulphus Niger, a Benedictine monk in the diocese of Beauvais, who flourished A.D. 1157 (and not in the preceding century as some suppose). His commentary on Leviticus published in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xvii. has been much commended. The commentary on the Canticles ascribed to St. Gregory and printed with his works, was the production of Radulph.

Richard Hagulstadensis, a monk and prior of Hauston [Hexham] in Northumberland, England; flourished A.D. 1180 and died in 1190. He wrote Historia de Statu et Episcopis Hagulstadensis (Hexham), Ecclesiæ Historiæ. De Gestis Regis Stephani, and De Bello Standardii, A.D. 1135; published by Twissen, Scriptores Decem Angli, Lond. 1652.

Robert, a Benedictine monk of St. Remigius at Rheims. He was in the first crusade, and wrote a history of it from A.D. 1095 to 1099; extant in Bongarsius' Collection, tom. i.

Robert, surnamed Retensis, an English student and traveller, who flourished A.D. 1120. He travelled through France, Italy, Dalmatia, and Greece, into Syria, where he stayed long and acquired the Arabic language. Returning he settled in Spain, studied astronomy, and was made archdeacon of Pampluna. He abridged the Koran and translated it into Latin. Huot pronounces the translation a wretched one.

Robert Pullen or Pullus, a distinguished English theologian and scholar. He was made archdeacon of Rochester, but to avoid the confusion of a civil war retired to Paris, and studied there some time. He returned in 1130 and read lectures at Oxford for five years, and preached every Sunday. He afterwards returned to Paris, and being deprived of the revenues of his archdeaconry he appealed to the Pope A.D. 1144, who invited him to Rome and made him a cardinal. He died A.D. 1150. His only work which has reached us is Sententie de Trinitate. It is a system of theology, but unlike Peter Lombard's Sentences, it is not a mere compilation from the fathers but a biblical and argumentative treatise, in which he shows himself a profound and orthodox divine. It was published by Mathoud, Paris, 1655, fol.

Rodolphus Ardens, chaplain to William IV. duke of Aquitain, A.D. 1101. He left sermons on the lessons for the year, published at Cologne, 1694, 2 vols. 8vo.

Rodulph, abbot of St. Trudo near Laon, about A.D. 1120. He wrote Chronicon Monasterii Sti Trudonis, published by D'Achery, Spicileg. tom. vii; also a life of St. Liebert, bishop of Cambrai—ibid.

Roger de Hoveden, a native of York, of illustrious English descent, one of the household of king Henry II. and then chief professor of theology at Oxford; flourished A.D. 1139, author of Annulus Anglicani, from A.D. 731 (where Bede ends) to A.D. 1202; published by Saville, Historici Anglici, Lond. 1595, fol. and Francef. 1601.

Saxo Grammaticus, a Dane, born of an honourable family in Zealand, dean of the cathedral of Roskilde, and much esteemed by Absalon, archbishop of Lund, who sent him to Paris on business and prompted him to write his History of Denmark. He flourished A.D. 1170, and died A.D. 1204. His Historia Danica from the earliest times to A.D. 1186 is written in a florid style and is highly esteemed; best edited by Stephanus, Scra, 1644, fol.

Sigebertus Gemblacensis, a monk and writer at Gemblours A.D. 1101, a partisan of the emperor Henry IV. in his contests with the pope. He wrote a Chronicle from A.D. 381, where Jerome ends, to A.D. 1112; printed among the Scriptores Germanici, Francef. 1585, fol. and by Mircus, Antw. 1608, also De Scripturibus Ecclesiasticis, Epistola pro Ecclesia Leodiensi et Cameracensi, ad Pp. Paschalis Papae, a life of Sigebert king of France, and some lives of saints. He died A.D. 1113.

Simon, an Englishman educated at Oxford, where he taught philosophy and theology. Afterwards he became a Benedictine monk and preceptor in the cathedral of Durham. Here he examined carefully the remains of the library which the Danes had much injured; and collecting materials from every quarter became an author. He flourished A.D. 1130, and wrote a history of the church of Durham from A.D. 635 to 1096, which another hand continued to A.D. 1154, a tract concerning the archbishops of York, another on the siege of Durham, and a history of the English and Danish kings from A.D. 730 to 1130, which John of Hexham continued to 1155, and from which Roger Hoveden took nearly the whole of his history. These works of Simon were published by Twissen in his Scriptores Decem Anglici.

Stephen Harding, an English monk of Sherburn. He travelled in Scotland, France, and Italy; became first a Benedictine, then a Cistercian in France, where he was made abbot A.D. 1109, and died A.D. 1134. He composed regulations for the Cistercians, and some other monastic pieces.

Stephen I. bishop of Augsburg A.D. 1113—1129, and then a monk of Cluny. He wrote a tract De Sacramento Altaris, &c. in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xx. p. 1872.

Stephen, a monk and abbot of Orleans and of Paris, one of the council of regents during the crusade of Philip Augustus, A.D. 1190, and bishop of Tournay, A.D. 1192—1202. He wrote between A.D. 1163 and the time of his death two hundred and seventy-eight epistles, published, Paris, 1682, 8vo; also thirty-one sermons chiefly on the festivals, and a commentary on the Decretum of Gratian, which are still in manuscript.

Theodoric, abbot of St. Trudo in the diocese of Laon, who died in exile at Ghent A.D. 1107. He wrote the life of St. Trudo, and of four or five other saints.

Urban II. pope A.D. 1185—1187, has left us five epistles.

William of Malmesbury was a native of Somersetshire, a Benedictine monk, and librarian and preceptor of the monastery of Malmesbury, where he flourished from 1130 to 1143. He wrote a history of the kings

CHAPTER III.

HISTORY OF RELIGION AND THEOLOGY.

1. So many causes conspired to debase religion and to tarnish and obscure its lustre, arising out of the numberless inventions of human ingenuity, that it may seem strange it was not wholly destroyed. In the first place, the Roman pontiffs would have nothing taught which militated against their arrogated supremacy; and therefore they required Christianity to be so explained and modified, as to support that form of the church which their predecessors had marked out. Those who would not obey their laws, or showed that they regarded the holy scriptures more than the authority of the Romish see, were cruelly destroyed with fire and sword. In the next place the priests and monks, finding it to be their interest that the people should be entirely ignorant and undiscerning, amused them with a species of theatrical shows, and placed all religion in empty ceremonies, corporeal austerities and inflictions, and reverence for the clergy. The of England from the first arrival of the Saxons, A.D. 449, to the twentieth year of Henry I. A.D. 1127; a continuation of it to A.D. 1143, and a history of the English bishops from the arrival of Augustine to his own times. These works were collected and published by Saville, Lond. 1596, fol. and Francef. 1601. His life of St. Aldhelm, bishop of Sherburn, in Mabillon's Acta Sanctorum, Ord. Bened. sec. 1. p. 1. Some other works of this celebrated English historian are said to exist still in manuscript.

William of Tyre. Whether born in France, Germany, or Palestine, he is supposed to have been related to the kings of Jerusalem. He was made archdeacon of Tyre A.D. 1167; soon after was sent on business to Constantinople, in 1169 undertook a journey to Europe, on his return was tutor to Baldwin the prince, and A.D. 1174, archbishop of Tyre. In the year 1178 he was at the council of the Lateran, and he spent some months at Constantinople. In 1189 Jerusalem being taken by the Saracens, he went to Europe to solicit aid from the kings of England and France. He opposed the election of Heraclius to the bishopric of Jerusalem, who compassed his death by poison, but in what year is unknown. He wrote a history of the crusades to Palestine, from A.D. 1096 to the year 1180, very highly esteemed, and published, Basil, 1549 and 1660, and by Bongarsius, Gesta Dei per Francos, tom. i. p. 625.

William Neuburgensis or Neubrigensis, surnamed Parvus, born at Bridlington in Yorkshire, A.D. 1126, a regular Augustinian canon in the monastery of Bridlington, where he died A.D. 1208, aged 72. He wrote, in a good Latin style, De Rebus Anglicis sui Temporis, from A.D. 1066 to the year 1197; best edited by Picard, Paris, 1610, 8vo.

Zacharias, bishop of Chrysopolis or a Fræmonstratensian monk of St. Martin of Tours, A.D. 1157. He wrote four books of commentaries on the Morodracon, or Harmony of the four Gospels by Ammonius of Alexandria, published, Cologne, 1535, fol. and in the Biblioth. Patræ, tom. xix.

[For further information on those of the above writers who belong to Britain, see Wright's Biogr. Britan. Liter. Anglo-Norm. period; and on those who wrote Chronicles, in the Introduction to the first volume of Lappenberg's Geschichte v. England, Thorpe's transl. —R.]

scholastic doctors united the precepts of the dialecticians with the opinions of the fathers to constitute a standard of truth; and in place of explaining the principles of revealed religion, they destroyed them altogether. Their opponents, the mystics, maintained that the soul of one truly pious does not move spontaneously, but by a divine impulse; and thus they did not merely set bounds to human ability but abolished it entirely.

2. Hence instead of religion, astonishing superstition and ignorance reigned everywhere among the people. Most persons placed more reliance upon relics,—generally false or at least dubious and uncertain,—than upon Christ and his merits, or upon prayers founded on his mediation.¹ Those who were able themselves to build churches or to contribute money to their erection and repair, esteemed themselves very happy and the favourites of heaven; and they whose poverty restrained them from doing so, cheerfully submitted to work like beasts in transporting stones and drawing carts, whenever a church was to be built; and they expected eternal salvation for these voluntary hardships.² Departed saints had more supplicants than God and the Saviour of men; nor was there much inquiry, as there was in after times, how they knew that glorified spirits heard and understood the prayers of their suppliants. For the old notion, derived by the Christians from the pagans, that the celestials often descend to this lower world and linger about the places to which in their lifetime they were attached, prevailed universally, until the scholastic doctors gave this subject a particular discussion.³ If any man or woman, either from a disordered state of mind or from a design to deceive, laid claim to divine revelations, the people at large unhesitatingly believed that God himself had conversed with them in order to instruct the world. This is manifest from the examples of the celebrated German prophetesses, Hildegard, abbess of Bingen, and Elizabeth, abbess of Schönaugen.⁴

3. The rulers of the church basely abused this ignorance and superstition of the people for their own enolument, or to extort money; and each order of the clergy had its own peculiar artifices for fleecing the people of their property. The bishops when they had occasion to raise money, either for good and laudable or for base and criminal objects, allowed transgressors to buy off the penalties enjoined by the canons, by advancing money for certain religious purposes, that is, they published indulgences; and what mighty enterprises and expensive works were accomplished in this century by means of indulgences, is known to all.⁵ The abbots and the monks who had not this power, resorted to other means for raising money. They travelled about the villages and through provinces, carrying in solemn procession the carcases and relics of holy men, which they allowed the people to see, to handle, and to kiss, by paying for the privilege. In this way they often amassed as great gains as the bishops by their indulgences.⁶

4. The Roman pontiffs, perceiving what advantages the inferior bishops derived from their indulgences, concluded that the power of the bishops to remit ecclesiastical penalties ought to be circumscribed, and the prerogative be almost wholly transferred to the Roman see. Accordingly they began, as the necessities or convenience of the church or their own interests required, to publish not merely the common and ordinary but likewise the entire and absolute, or the plenary remission of all finite or temporal penalties; and they cancelled not only the punishments which the canons and human tribunals inflict, but also those to be endured after death, which the bishops had never attempted to set aside.⁷ They

⁴ See Mabillon's Annales Benedict. tom. vi. p. 431, 529, 564. [See the notice of these prophetesses in the note to the preceding chapter, p. 414; also Naander, Heilige Bernard und sein Zeitalter, p. 210, &c. 300, &c.—Mur.]

⁵ Stephanus Obazinensis; in Baluze, Miscellanea, tom. iv. p. 130; Mabillon, Annales Bened. tom. vi. p. 533, &c.

⁶ Innumerable examples of this mode of extorting money may be collected from the records of this age. See the Chronicon Centulense, in D'Achery's Spiritualium, tom. ii. p. 354; the life of St. Romana, ibid. p. 137; Mabillon, Annales Benedict. tom. vi. p. 349, 644; Acta Sanctorum. Mensis Maii, tom. vii. p. 533, in the acts of St. Marculus, where a long journey of such relics is described; Mabillon, Acta Sanctorum, Ord. Benedict. tom. iv. p. 519, 520, and tom. ii. p. 732.

⁷ Morin, De Administratione Sacramenti Pœnitentie, lib. x. cap. 10, 21, 22, p. 768, &c.; Simon, Biblioth. Critique, tome iii. chap. xxiii. p. 371; Mabillon, Preface to the 5th century of his Acta Sanctorum, Ord. Bened. p. lxxi. &c. I designedly refer to none of the Protestant writers.

¹ See Guilbert of Nogent's three books, De Pignoribus (thus they styled relics) Nanctorum. In his works, published by D'Achery, p. 327, &c. where this discerning man assails the superstition of his age.

² See the tract of the abbot Haymo on this very custom, annexed by Mabillon to the sixth volume of his Annales Benedictini; and also those Annales, p. 392, &c.

³ That I may not be thought to give a false representation, I will quote a very explicit passage from the life of St. Altmann, bishop of Passau, in Tengenagel's Collectio Peter. Monument. p. 41: "Vos licet, Sancti Domini, somno vestro requiescat—haud tamen crediderim, spiritus vestros deesse locis, quæ viventes tanta devotione construxistis et dilexistis. Credo vos adesse cunctis illis degentibus, astare videlicet orantibus, succurrere laborantibus, et vota singulorum in conspectu divinis majestatis promovere."

first resorted to this power for the sake of promoting the crusades, and were sparing in the use of it; but afterwards they exerted it for objects of far less importance and of various kinds, and very often merely for their private emolument.¹ Upon the introduction of this new policy, the ancient system of canonical and ecclesiastical penances was wholly subverted; and the books of canons and the penitentials being laid aside, transgressors were no longer under restraints. To support this proceeding of the pontiffs an unheard-of doctrine was devised in this century, and improved and polished in the following century by St. Thomas; namely, that there is an immense treasury of good works which holy men have performed over and above what duty required; and that the Roman pontiff is the keeper and the distributor of this treasure, so that he is able, out of this inexhaustible fund, to give and transfer to every one such an amount of good works as his necessities require, or as will suffice to avert the punishment of his sins. This miserable and pernicious fiction, it is to be lamented, is still retained and defended.

5. This century abounded in expositors of the holy scriptures, if one may judge from the multitude of works professedly of this character; but if we estimate them by their skill and ability there were almost none at all. For very few inquired after the literal sense of the scriptures; and even these were destitute of the requisite means of ascertaining it.² Both the Greeks and the Latins were governed entirely by the authority of the fathers, and compiled from their writings, without discrimination or care, whatever seemed to throw light on the inspired volumes. The reader may inspect among the Greeks, Euthymius Zigabenus' exposition of the Psalms, the Gospels, and the Epistles, though he offers some remarks of his own which are not contemptible; and among the Latins, the labours of Peter Lombard, Gilbert de la Porrée, and Abelard, on the Psalms of David and the Epistles of Paul. Nor is higher commendation due to the best Latin expositors of nearly the whole Bible in this century; such as Gislebert [or Gilbert], bishop of London, called the Universal on account of the extent of his erudition,³ and Herveus, a very laborious Benedictine monk.⁴ Somewhat superior to the rest of the Latins was Rupert of Duytz, who expounded various books of the scriptures; and with him may be coupled Anselm of Laon, who composed or rather compiled a Glossa, as it was called, on the sacred books. Those who chose not to tread in the steps of the ancients and ventured to try the powers of their own genius, disregarding simplicity, searched after mysteries of every sort in the sacred pages. And in this species of interpretation, none excelled more than the mystic doctors as they are called; for they explained the whole Bible in conformity with the visions of their own minds, and the ideal systems of their own formation. Moreover, those interpreters who made dialectics and philosophy their study, pursued the same course in their expositions of the scriptures. This mode of interpretation may be seen distinctly in Hugo of St. Victor's Allegorical Explanations of both Testaments, in Richard of St. Victor's Mystical Ark, in William of Nogent's Mystical Commentaries on Obadiah, Hosea, and Amos,⁵ and in some others.

6. The most distinguished teachers of theology resided at Paris; and, of course, students in theology from all parts of Europe resorted to Paris, in order to attend the lectures of theologians who taught there. The professors of theology in France were divided into several sects. One sect was that of the ancient theologians, who supported their religious tenets simply by the declarations of holy Scripture and by the opinions of the fathers and the decisions of councils, and very rarely introduced anything of human reasoning. Such in this century were St. Bernard, Peter the Chanter, Gualter of St. Victor, and others, who strenuously contended against the philosophic theologians. Not totally distinct from this sect was that which after-

¹ Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Medii Ævi, tom. v. p. 761, &c. Franco; Pagl, Breviar. Romavor. Pontif. tom. ii. p. 60; Kuhnart, Vita Urbani II. in his Opp. Posthum. tom. iii. p. 333.

² One considerable cause of this incompetency was, that the monks, among whom nearly all the learning of the age was to be found, held it to be unlawful to learn Hebrew from Jewish teachers. A certain monk (as we learn from the statutes of the Cistercians A.D. 1198, no. 24 in Martene's Thesaur. Nov. Anecd. tom. iv. p. 1292) had learned Hebrew from a Jew; and the abbot of Clairvaux was directed to investigate the matter and to bring the monk to punishment. The French Benedictines, in their Hist. Littér. de la France, tome ix. can find among the vast multitude of clergymen who made pilgrimages to Palestine, only three persons who in that way acquired a knowledge of the Arabic and Greek; namely, William of Tyre, one Philip, and the Englishman Adelard. See Semler's Hist. Eccles. Selecta Cap. tom. iii. p. 161.—Schl.

³ Concerning him, see Le Boeuf, Mémoires concernant l'Hist. d'Auxerre, tome ii. p. 486. [He wrote notes on the Old and New Testaments, and commentaries on certain books, none of which were ever published.—Schl.]

⁴ An ample account of him is given by Liron, Singul. Virites Historiq. et Littér. tome iii. p. 29, &c. Add Mabillon, Annales Benedict. tom. vi. p. 477, 719.

⁵ His Prologue on Obadiah was published by Mabillon, Annales Benedict. tom. vi. p. 637, &c.

wards bore the name of the Positive and the Sententarii; for these, following the example of Anselm of Canterbury, Lanfranc, Hildebert, and others of the preceding century, supported religious doctrines principally by citations from Scripture and the writings of the fathers; but had recourse to reason and philosophy, especially for solving difficulties and refuting objections, in which some of them were more moderate and cautious, and others less so. The first in this century who thus explained the principles of religion systematically, is said to be Hugo of St. Victor, who was succeeded by many others. But the first rank in this species of labour belongs to Peter Lombard, or Peter the Italian of Lombardy and archbishop of Paris, whose four books of sentences, on their appearance in the year 1162,¹ at once acquired such authority that all the doctors began to expound them. And some tell us that all the doctors of much note, except Henry of Ghent and a few others, commented upon this Master of the Sentences, as Lombard was called, on account of this work.²

7. These Sententarii, as they were called, though not without faults nor entirely free from vain and futile speculations, yet resorted to dialectical subtleties with moderation, and did not force the doctrines of revelation to yield submission to human reason. But contemporary with them arose another and more daring sect of theologians, who had no hesitation to apply the terms and distinctions of the dialecticians to the truths taught by revelation, and to investigate the nature and relations of those truths by the principles of logic. The author of this mode of treating theology, which was afterwards called the scholastic because it prevailed in nearly all the schools, was Peter Abelard, a man of great acuteness, who was first a canon and a celebrated teacher as well of philosophy as of theology, and afterwards a monk and abbot of Ruys.³ Eager for the applause which he had obtained, others without number in France, England, and Italy, pursued the same course. In this way the peaceful religion of Jesus was soon converted into the science of wrangling. For these men did not explain anything, but by multiplying divisions and distinctions, obscured and perplexed the plainest truths, wearied both themselves and others with useless and abstruse speculations, so argued on both sides of the most important questions as to leave them undecided; and as there were many things in religion which were inadequately expressed in the phraseology of dialectics, they gave occasion for idle and vainglorious disputants to invent new terms, and to perplex themselves and others with enigmatical trifles.⁴

8. From this time therefore the teachers of theology began to be divided into two classes; the biblical, who were called the ancient and also Dogmatici and Positivi; and the scholastic, who were called the Sententarii and also the new. The former interpreted the sacred volume in their schools, though for the most part miserably, and confirmed them by the testimonies of Scripture and tradition, without calling reason and philosophy to their aid. The latter did nothing but explain the Master of the Sentences or Lombard; and they brought all the doctrines of faith, as well as the principles and precepts of practical religion, under the dominion of philosophy, and involved them in endless perplexities.⁵ And as these philosophical or scholastic theologians were deemed superior to the others in acumen and ingenuity, young men admired them and listened to them with the greatest attention; whereas the biblical doctors or those of the sacred page, as they were called, had very few and sometimes no pupils.⁶ This state of things prevailed generally in the schools of Europe down to the time of Luther.

9. But before these dialectical and metaphysical doctors could obtain such an

¹ See Bulaeus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. ii. p. 201, &c. p. 583, &c.; Wood, Antiq. Oxon. tom. i. p. 58; Launoi, De varia Aristotelis Fortuna in Acad. Paris. cap. iii. p. 187, &c. ed. Elswich, Wittemb. 1720, 8vo.

² See Bulaeus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iii. p. 657, &c.

³ Roger Bacon, in his larger work addressed to the Roman pontiff, Clement IV. (published from the manuscript by Sam. Jebb, Lond. 1733, fol.) par. ii. chap. iv. p. 28, says: "The Bachelor, who lectures on the text (of Scripture), gives place to the lecturer on the Sentences, who is everywhere preferred and honoured by all. For he who lectures on the sentences has the best hour for reading, according to his choice; he has also an associate and a chamber among the religious; but he who lectures on the Bible wants these, and begs for such an hour to read, as shall please the lecturer on the Sentences. Also the man who lectures on the Sentences disputes everywhere, and is accounted a Master; but the other who lectures on the text cannot dispute, as was exemplified this year at Bologna and in many other places, which is absurd. It is therefore manifest that the text is subordinate in this faculty (theology) to the one dominant Summa." These words clearly show what estimation was then put upon the sacred volume, and what authority philosophical theology enjoyed. More remarks follow in Bacon well worth reading. He lived in the thirteenth century.

¹ Lindenbrog's Scriptores Rerum Septentrion. p. 25.

² A host of these interpreters are exhibited by Possevin, Biblioth. Selecta, tom. i. lib. iii. cap. xiv. p. 242. [For a notice of Peter Lombard, and his Books of the Sentences, see note 2, p. 412.—Mur.]

³ This is acknowledged by Abelard himself; Epist. i. chap. ix. Opp. p. 20. See also Launoi, De Scholis Caroli Magni, cap. lix. Opp. tom. iv. p. 67.

ascendency in the schools, they had to pass through many perils, contests, and disasters. For they were opposed on the one hand by the ancient divines, and on the other by the mystics, who supposed true wisdom is to be acquired not by reasoning but by silence and contemplation, and to be drawn from the inmost recesses of the soul. The old contest therefore between faith and reason which had long been dormant among the Latins, was now revived, and produced great commotions everywhere. Of the patrons of the old theology, those who most violently assailed the scholastics were Guibert of Nogent,¹ Peter Cellensis,² Peter Cantor or the Precentor of Paris,³ and others; but especially Gualter of St. Victor in his four books against the four labyrinths of France and the new heretics.⁴ Of the mystics, Joachim, abbot of Flora,⁵ Richard of St. Victor, and others, inveighed against them, and especially against Lombard, notwithstanding he was much more moderate than the true and proper scholastics. The contention and discord were so great that the sovereign pontiff, Alexander III. in a very numerous and solemn convention, A.D. 1164, condemned this immoderate licentiousness of disputing on sacred subjects;⁶ and in the year 1179 he censured and disapproved of some things in the writings even of Lombard.⁷

10. But there was no more potent adversary of the dialectic theologians in this century than St. Bernard, whose zeal was immense, and his influence equal to his zeal. He therefore contended against them not only with words but with deeds, with ecclesiastical councils, and positive enactments. Bitter experience of this was felt by Peter Abelard, at that time the chief of the dialectic party, and certainly a man of far more learning and acuteness than St. Bernard, though much inferior to him in influence. Bernard prosecuted him before the council of Soissons in 1121, and before that of Sens in 1140, accused him of many and very great errors, and at last procured his condemnation.⁸ Abelard was said to have greatly corrupted the doctrine of three persons in the Godhead, to have attacked the majesty of the Holy Spirit, to have spoken dishonourably of the offices of Christ and of the union of the two natures in him, to have denied the doctrine of divine grace, in short, to have nearly subverted all religion. On some points undoubtedly Abelard expressed himself unsuitably and improperly, and his subtlety was not always without fault; but it is also manifest that St. Bernard, wholly ignorant of philosophy and distinguished rather for genius than for intellect, did not understand some of Abelard's propositions, and others of them he designedly perverted. For this good man used no moderation either in praising or in censuring.⁹

11. Nearly the same fate attended Gilbert de la Porrée, who after teaching philosophy and theology with much reputation, at Paris and elsewhere, was made bishop of Poitiers. For his two archdeacons, Arnald and Calo, who had been trained in the schools of the ancient theologians, having heard him speak too metaphysically respecting the divine nature, accused him of blasphemy before Eugene III. the pontiff, then in France; and to be more sure of success, they engaged St. Bernard on their side. Bernard, as was usual with him, prosecuted this business before the pontiff with the greatest vehemence, first in the council of Paris A.D. 1147, and then in that of Rheims in the following year. In the latter council, Gilbert in order to end the contest, submitted his opinions to the judgment of the council and the pope. All the errors charged upon Gilbert indicate too great fondness for nice distinctions, and a disposition to

¹ Tropologia in Oream; Opp. p. 203.

² Opuscula, p. 277, 399, ed. Benedict.

³ In his Verbum Abreviatum, sive Summa; published at Mons, 1639, 4to, by Galopin, cap. lii. p. 6, 7.

⁴ By the four Labyrinths of France, he means Abelard, Gilbert de la Porrée, Lombard, and Peter of Poitiers, who were the principal dialectic theologians of this century. See, respecting this work which was never published, Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. ii. p. 619—659.

⁵ Among his writings is a book against Lombard, De Unitate seu Essentia S. S. Trinitatis, which was condemned in the fourth Lateran council, A.D. 1215. See the Hist. de l'Abbé Joachim, surnommé le Prophète; Paris, 1745, 2 vols. 12mo; and Fabricius, Hist. media et infim. Lat. lib. ix. p. 107.—Schl.

⁶ Pag. Critica in Baronium, tom. iv. ad ann. 1164, no. xxi. p. 618.

⁷ Matth. Paris, Historia Major, p. 115; Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. ii. p. 402.

⁸ See Bayle, Dictionnaire, artic. Abelard, p. 181; Gervais, Vie d'Abelard et de Heloise; Mabillon, Annales Benedict. tom. vi. p. 63, 84, 324, 395; Martene, Thesaurus Anecdotor. tom. v. p. 1139, and numerous others.

⁹ See Gervais, Vie d'Abelard, tome ii. p. 162; Le Clerc, Biblioth. Ancienne et Moderne, tome ix. p. 352, &c.; Petavius, Dogmata Theol. tom. i. lib. v. c. 6, p. 217, &c. and St. Bernard himself in many parts of his works, which the index will point out. At last, after numerous vexations and sufferings, of which he himself has left a history, Abelard died a monk of Cluny, A.D. 1142. He was a great man and worthy of a better age, and of better fortune. [See note 3, p. 411.—Mur. In Neander's Der heilige Bernard u. sein Zeitalter, p. 217 and 305, &c. the student will find a pretty full account of Abelard's theological views and of Bernard's controversy with him, marked by all the originality and profound philosophical acumen characteristic of that eminent writer. See Life and Times of St. Bernard, Wrench's transl. p. 124—167.—R.]

bring the doctrines and truths of revelation under the empire of dialectics. For he maintained a new distinction between the divine essence and God, and also between the properties of the divine persons and the persons themselves, not indeed as real but only in thought (statu rationis) as metaphysicians say; and relying on these distinctions he denied that the divine nature became incarnate. To these he added other opinions derived from the same source, which were rather fanciful and useless than pernicious and false; but which the good Bernard, who was unaccustomed to such speculations, could not comprehend.¹

12. The state of moral or practical theology must be apparent from what has been stated. Among the Greeks, Philip the Solitary has left us a tolerably neat tract entitled Dioptra; in which he makes the soul to hold a dialogue with the body, and advances various thoughts calculated to promote piety. The other Greeks are not worth naming. The Latin divines, who treated of the duties of the Christian life were of two classes, the one scholastics, the other mystics. The former treated of the virtues as they did of the articles of faith, that is, in a dry, metaphysical manner, and generally combined moral theology with dogmatic. The latter very often express themselves beautifully, and in a manner suited to move the soul, yet without method or discrimination; and not unfrequently they tarnish Christian gold with the dross of Platonism. Most of those also who expounded the holy scriptures may be classed among the moral writers. For neglecting the literal sense, they forcibly accommodated the language of the sacred writers to the inculcation of internal holiness and the regulation of the life. This is manifest from Guibert's Morals on Job, Amos, and the Lamentations of Jeremiah, as well as from others.

13. The passion for controversial philosophy or dialectics, which had seized both the Greeks and the Latins, rendered them both pugnacious. At the same time it led men far away from the true method of discussing religious subjects. For they did not argue for the sake of elucidating the truth, but to confound and silence their adversary with subtle distinctions, with words without meaning, with the authority of names, and even with sarcasms and fallacies. Among the Greeks, Euthymius Zigabenus composed a prolix work against all heresies, which he entitled Panoplia. But to say nothing of his vanity and extreme credulity, nearly all his proofs are derived, as was the common fault of that age, from the declarations of the earlier writers. Constantine Harmenopolus wrote a short book on the heretical sects. Zonaras inveighed against them in verse. Among the Latins, Honorius of Autun composed a book on the heresies, and Abelard attacked them all. The miserable and persecuted Jews were assailed by many of the Latins; by Gilbert of Castillon,² Odo, [of Cambray], Peter Alfonsus, Rupert of Duytz, Peter Maurice, Richard of St. Victor, and Peter of Blois; the merits of whose works can be easily estimated by those who consider the character of that age. Against the Saracens, Euthymius and some others appeared as polemics.

14. The contests between the Greeks and the Latins, the subjects of which have already been mentioned, were carried on with great spirit on both sides. On the part of the Greeks, Euthymius, Nicetas, and others; and on the part of the Latins, among others, Anselm of Havelburg, Hugo Etherianus, and others contended with zeal³. Negotiations for a compromise were repeatedly entered upon, both at Rome and at Constantinople, at the instance especially of the Greek emperors of the Comnenian family, who supposed the friendship of the Latins would be very serviceable to the Greeks in the almost desperate state of their public affairs. But as the Latins aimed at nothing short of absolute dominion over the Greeks, and as the Greek patriarchs could by no means be persuaded to subject themselves entirely to the Roman pontiffs and to anathematize their ancestors, these negotiations for peace had the effect rather of irritating the feelings and increasing the hostility of the parties, than of producing a reconciliation.

15. The minor contests need not detain us long. The Greeks by nature prone to contend and dispute, were almost never free from religious controversies. In this century, especially under Manuel Comne-nus, who was a learned and over-inquisitive emperor, some contests on religious subjects were excited by the emperor himself; and they produced more excitement among the oppressed people than was consistent with the welfare of the state. In the first place, a long dispute arose under this emperor, in what sense it might be said the incarnate God was at the same time the offerer and the sacrifice. After a protracted discussion, during which the emperor had maintained an opinion at variance with the prevalent belief, he at length yielded, and came over to the generally received opinion. The consequence was that many persons of high respectability, who had disagreed with the church, were deprived of their offices.¹ What opinion was maintained by the emperor, and what was held by the church on this subject, we are nowhere distinctly informed. But it is probable that the emperor and some other learned men, disagreed with the mass of the Greeks, in respect to the Lord's supper, and the oblation or sacrifice of Christ in that ordinance.

¹ See Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. ii. p. 223, 232, &c.; Mabillon, Annales Benedict. tom. vi. p. 343, &c. 415, 433; Gallia Christiana, tom. ii. p. 1175; Matth. Paris, Historia Major, p. 56; Petavius, Dogmata Theologica, tom. i. lib. i. cap. viii.; Longueval, Hist. de l'Eglise Gallicane, tome ix. p. 147, &c. [The acts of the councils which condemned the opinions of Gilbert, and which evince his great ingenuousness, are in Harduin's Concilia, tom. vi. par. ii. p. 1297.—Schl.]

² Or Gilbert surnamed Crispin, a monk of Bec. See in the note, p. 414.—Mur.

³ See Leo Allatius, De Perpetua Consensione Ecclesie Orientalis et Occident. lib. ii. cap. xi. &c. p. 644, &c.

16. Some years afterwards a more violent dispute respecting the import of Christ's words, John xiv. 28, "My Father is greater than I," rent Greece into factions. As various explanations of this passage had long existed and some new ones were advanced about this time, the emperor who from an indifferent prince made but a poor theologian, added his explanation to the number; and summoning a council, he wished to obtrude it upon all as being the only true interpretation. He decided that these words of Christ refer to the created and passible flesh of Christ (κατὰ τὴν ἐν αὐτῷ κτιστὴν καὶ παθητὴν σάρκα). And this decision engraved on tables of stone he set up in the great church, and made it a capital offence for any one to teach otherwise.² But the authority of this decree expired with the emperor, and Andronicus afterwards strictly prohibited all curious discussions on religion, and on this subject in particular.³

17. Near the close of his life the same emperor excited another controversy respecting the God of Mohammed. The catechetical books of the Greeks anathematized the ὀλίσφουρον (spherical or globular shaped) and solid God of Mohammed. For thus the Greeks had translated the Arabic word elmed, which is applied to God in the Koran, and which has indeed this signification though it also signifies eternal.⁴ This execration the emperor ordered to be struck out of those books, as being very offensive to the Mohammedans converted to Christianity. The theologians resisted this order, alleging that it was not God in general, but the error of Mohammed respecting God which was anathematized; and that Mohammed affirmed God is not begotten nor doth he beget. After very tedious altercations and various attempts to settle the dispute, the bishops in a council consented that in the instruction of youth, the anathema should no longer be levelled at the God of Mohammed but at Mohammed himself, his religion, and all his followers.⁵

18. Among the Latins different opinions were maintained, and not merely in the schools but also in books respecting the Lord's supper. For though all seemed disposed to shun connexion with Berengarius, yet many were not very far from him in sentiment, among whom may be named Rupert of Duytz and others,⁶ inasmuch as the great Berengarian controversy had not yet plainly determined the mode of Christ's presence. This same Rupert was involved likewise in other controversies, and especially with Anselm of Laon and William of Champeaux, and with their disciples after their death respecting the will and omnipotence of God. The question was whether God wills and himself effects whatever takes place, or whether he only permits certain things which he would not have to be. Rupert maintained the latter, his opponents the former. He was also censured for teaching, among other erroneous things, that the angels were created from darkness, and that Christ at the last supper did not present his body to Judas.⁷

19. Besides these and other private contests, there was a public controversy, about the year 1140, respecting what is called the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary.⁸

⁴ Reland, De Religione Mohammedica, lib. II. sec. iii. p. 142. [This word elmed occurs in the Koran, Sur. cxli. where all modern translators as well as the Mohammedan expositors understand it to mean eternal. The passage as translated by Sale, is this: "Say, God is one God, the eternal God; he begetteth not, neither is he begotten; and there is not any one like unto him." It is probable that the Greek translator perverted the meaning of Mohammed, in order to render him ridiculous.—Mur.]

⁵ Nicetas Choniates, Annales, lib. vii. p. 113—116.

⁶ Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. II. p. 30, &c.

⁷ See Mengozzi, Epistola, published by Martone, Theaur. Anecdotor. tom. i. p. 290; Mabillon, Annales Benedict. [tom. v. p. 623, &c.] tom. vi. p. 20, 42, 168, 261, &c.

⁸ The defenders of the immaculate conception maintained that the Virgin Mary was conceived in the womb of her mother with the same purity which is attributed to Christ's conception in her womb.—Mack.

¹ Nicetas Choniates, Annales, lib. vii. sec. v. p. 112, ed. Venice.

² Nicetas Choniates, Annales, lib. vii. sec. vi. p. 113.

³ Nicetas, in Andronico, lib. II. sec. v. p. 175.

At this time some French congregations began to observe the festal day consecrated to this conception; the English had observed it for some time previously, being led to it as is reported by Anselm of Canterbury. Of the more distinguished churches, that of Lyons was the first or among the first to observe this festival. St. Bernard being informed of the matter addressed a letter to the canons of Lyons on the subject, in which he severely censured their conduct and opposed the idea of such a conception. This brought on the controversy; some standing forth in defence of the Lyonnois and the festival, and others supporting the opinion of St. Bernard.¹ In this century, however, though the feelings of the parties grew warm, there was some moderation in the discussion. But after the Dominicans had fixed themselves in the university of Paris, the controversy was carried on with far more violence; the Dominicans defending the opinion of St. Bernard, and the university approving the practice of the church of Lyons.

CHAPTER IV.

HISTORY OF RITES AND CEREMONIES.

1. THAT both the public and private worship of God among the Greeks through the influence of superstition, was enriched with various additional minute rites, is well attested. And the same passion infected all the Christian communities of the East. Every distinguished individual among the patriarchs of the Greeks, the Nestorians, or the Jacobites, wished to immortalize himself by some change or amplification of the forms of worship. For, from various causes the spirit of true religion and piety being nearly extinct, their whole attention was directed to its external signs. One therefore ordered the prayers to be recited in a new manner, another changed the mode of singing, another ordained some new honours to be paid to the relics and images of the saints, and another endeavoured to improve the dress and manners of the priests.

2. What rites prevailed among the Latins in this century and how they were interpreted, may be learned from Rupert of Dutz, De Divinis Officiis. The plan of this work does not admit of a detailed account of the additions to the public ceremonies.² We therefore only remark that the veneration for the virgin Mary, which had before been excessive, was not a little increased after it began to be extensively inculcated that she was conceived immaculately. For although Bernard and others opposed this doctrine as has been stated, yet the judgment of the ignorant and superstitious multitude was much more effective, than the decisions of the better informed; and about the year 1138 a solemn festival was instituted in honour of this conception, though neither the author nor the place of this new solemnity is sufficiently known.³

CHAPTER V.

HISTORY OF HERESIES.

1. THE Greeks and the other Oriental Christians of this century had sharp contests with various sorts of fanatics, who are represented as believing in a twofold Trinity, as rejecting matrimony and the eating of flesh, as despising all external worship of God, even baptism and the Lord's Supper, and as placing the life of religion exclusively in prayer, and holding that an evil demon dwells in the nature of all men which they must expel by incessant prayer. The author of this sect we are told was one Lucopetrus, whose principal disciple, Tychicus, is said to have put false interpretations upon many parts of the precious objects was carried farther and farther. Even the floors were painted and adorned with saints and angels. New churches were consecrated with sprinkling, inscriptions, anointing, lighting up candles, and with a blessing, perhaps also with singing. The decayed altars which were repaired must be consecrated anew. More than one altar was now to be found in the same church, for mention is made of the high altar. Altars were ornamented with gold, silver, precious stones, and costly pictures. Before the saints and images in the churches expensive lamps and candles were kept burning, which were to be put out only during three days preceding Easter. Baptism was no longer administered as formerly at certain seasons of the year, but as often as there were subjects presented. The holy supper was still given in both the elements. Clement III. ordained that none but unleavened bread should be used, and that the wine should be mixed with water. The bad custom of immersing the bread in the cup and then distributing it still continued. The doctrine of transubstantiation was very generally received in the Latin churches, and the adoration of the host was a natural consequence.—Un Finem. [We are informed by Alberic in his Chronicon, ad ann. 1200, that the Cistercian abbot Guido, whom the Pope had created a cardinal and despatched as his legate to Cologne, first introduced the practice at the elevation of the host in the mass, on a signal given by a bell, for the people to prostrate themselves and remain in that posture until the benediction on the cup; and that these bells attended the clergy in the administration of the sacrament to the sick, to give the signal for prostration. This new rite was also confirmed by a miracle; for a soldier prostrated himself in the mud to honour the sacrament as it passed along, and his clothes were not soiled.—Nehl.

¹ See Bernard's Epistola, clxiv. tom. i. p. 170, &c.; Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. ii. p. 135; Mabillon, Annales Benedict. tom. vi. p. 327; Colonia, Hist. Littér. de la Ville de Lyon, tome ii. p. 233, &c.

² We may add a few things to render the account more full. The adorning of churches with pictures and sacred volume, and especially upon the history of Christ as given us by Matthew.¹ It is certain that there had been for a very long time among the Greeks and Syrians, particularly among the monks, men of this description who were not perverse but rather beside themselves, and such still existed in this century. But credit cannot be given to all that is reported of them. And many reasons confirm the supposition that among these people there were many really pious and devoted Christians, who were offensive to the Greeks because they resisted the outrageous domination and the vices of the priesthood, and derided the monstrous mass of superstition which was sanctioned by public authority. The Greeks and the other nations of the East were accustomed to designate all persons of this description by the odious names of Messalians or Euchites, just as the Latins denominated all opposers of the Roman pontiffs Waldenses or Albigenses. But it should be noted that this name was very ambiguous among the Greeks and the Orientals, being applied promiscuously to all, honest or dishonest, wise or delirious, who disliked the public ceremonies, censured the vices of the clergy, and maintained that piety alone was essential.

³ Mabillon, Annales Benedict. tom. vi. p. 327, 412; Gallia Christiana, tom. i. p. 1198.

2. From this class of persons it is said the Bogomiles originated, whose founder, one Basil a monk, when he could not be reclaimed was burnt alive at Constantinople under the emperor Alexius Comnenus.²

¹ See Euthymius, Triumphus de Secta Messalianorum, in Kollius, Insignia Itineris Italici, p. 106—125. [Euthymius relates much that is fabulous in this book; that the original head of the Messalians was named Peter but that he called himself Christ; that he promised to appear again after his death, and thence obtained the nickname of Wolf-peter, λυκότροπος. For as his followers three days after his death were looking for his resurrection, the devil appeared to them in the form of a wolf. Tychicus also applied all the texts that speak of God the Father and the Holy Ghost to his spiritual father, Peter. As for the old Messalians, see this work, p. 171, &c.—Schl.]

² The emperor devised a singular method for detecting the opinions of this man which would do honour to the Inquisition. Basil had sent out, after the example of Christ, twelve of his followers as his apostles, in order to propagate his doctrines. One of these named Diablatius was arrested, and he acknowledged that Basil was at the head of the sect. Basil was accordingly searched out and brought to the emperor, who received him very flatteringly, admitted him to his table, and called him his very dear father. Thus deceived, Basil disclosed to the emperor all the mysteries of his sect; and the emperor caused his whole disclosure to be written down by a stenographer who was concealed in the chamber for the purpose. The emperor now laid aside the character of a learner, and attempted to confute the opinions of the enthusiast, but he defended himself vigorously and was not to be terrified by menaces of death. Upon this the emperor commanded all Bogomiles who persevered in their opinions to be burned alive. Among these, Basil was one and was burned. This account is given us by Anna Comnena in the passage referred to in the following note.—Schl.

What has been handed down to us respecting this man and his opinions, notwithstanding the Greeks have undoubtedly mixed some falsehoods with their statements, will satisfactorily show that his system was nearly allied to those of the ancient Gnostics and Manichæans. For he maintained that the world and human bodies were not created by God, but by an evil demon whom God cast out of heaven; and of course that our bodies are the prisons of our godlike spirits, and must therefore be subdued by fasting, contemplation, and other exhausting exercises, in order that the soul may regain its lost liberty; that marriage also should be avoided, and the kindred tenets which are well known and have been repeatedly stated. Hence also with the Gnostics and Manichæans, he denied that Christ the Son of God had a real body. He also rejected the law of Moses, and maintained that the human body at death reverts back to the mass of depraved matter, and has no prospect of a resurrection. So many instances of men of this description occur both in ancient times and in the history of this age, that it is not at all strange one of them should have raised up a sect among the Greeks. The name of this sect was derived from the divine mercy which they are said to have incessantly implored. For in the language of the Mysians [Mæsiens or Slavonians of Mæsia] Bogomilus is one who implores divine mercy.³

3. Among the Latins far more numerous sects existed. For as the defects of the public religion and the faults of the clergy were continually increasing; as the pontiffs in general neglected the most important duties of their office, and by various measures, particularly by their Indulgences, encouraged irreligion among the people; and as the bishops and the other clergy were more intent on gratifying their lusts than on promoting and diffusing real piety; honest men who had their own and others' salvation at heart could easily see, though not possessed of great discernment, that the true religion of the gospel was lost, and they desired and attempted its restoration. But very few of them were competent to so great an undertaking as that of reforming the prevailing religion; for most of them were deficient both in talents and learning, and living in those times of ignorance they did not understand the Bible. Hence they were often as far from the religion of Christ, as taught in the sacred volume, as they were from the Roman religion, which they were so extravagant in censuring and reforming.

³ See Anna Comnena, Alexias, lib. xv. p. 384, ed. Venice; Zonaras, Annales, lib. xviii. p. 336; Wolf, Hist. Bogomilorum, Witteb. 1712. 4to; Andreas, Dis. de Bogomilis, in Volgt's Bibliotheca Hist. Hæresiol. tom. i. par. ii. p. 125, &c.; Heumann, Dis. de Bogomilis. [They were also called Phundaites, from the phunda or girdle which they were accustomed to wear. In the Slavonic language Bog signifies God, and miloi is equivalent to the Greek ἐλεγον, show mercy. Besides the tenets mentioned in the text they rejected image-worship, discarded all mysteries in the sacraments, also the historical books of the Old Testament, together with Solomon's writings, and likewise the conclusion of the Lord's prayer as being an interpolation, and they admitted no learned men among them.—Schl.]

4. Among the sects of this age the first place is due to the Cathari, who have already been mentioned. Proceeding from Bulgaria they raised disturbance in nearly all the countries of Europe; and in all of them if apprehended, they were miserably put to death.¹ The religion of this sect had some affinity with that anciently professed by the Gnostics and Manichæans; and hence those who belonged to it were generally called by that name, though they differed on many points from the genuine Manichæans. They all agreed in the following opinions:—That evil originates from matter, that the creator of this world was a different being from the supreme God, that Christ had not a real body, nor was he truly born or crucified, that all human bodies are the work of an evil demon, and that they perish without a prospect of resurrection; they denied that baptism and the holy supper are of any use; they enjoined an austere and rigorous mode of living, abstinence from flesh and all animal substances, from wine, and matrimony; they despised the books of the Old Testament and revered only the New Testament, especially the four Gospels; and to pass over several things, they believed that rational souls by a lamentable misfortune are enclosed in these bodies, and must be liberated from them by continence, fasting, coarse fare, and other mortifications.²

5. These sentiments, which they held in common, were explained and defined differently by their teachers, so that they were divided among themselves into sects; which however, as they were all subject to persecution, disputed with moderation and calmness. There were two principal sects among these Cathari. The one approached near to Manichæism and maintained two eternal first causes of all things, the God of light who was the father of Jesus Christ, and the prince of darkness by whom they supposed the visible world was created; the other party maintained but one first cause, the father of Jesus Christ and the supreme God, by whom they affirmed the first matter was produced; but they added to this that the evil demon, after his revolt from God, digested and separated this matter into the four elements, so that it could be formed into a world. The former held also that Christ, clad in celestial flesh, descended into Mary and received nothing from her substance; while the latter believed that Christ assumed in Mary, though not from Mary, a body which was not real but imaginary.³ The sect which maintained two first causes was denominated, from the place where its principal bishop resided, the sect of Albano or the Albanensians; and it was subdivided into the adherents of Balazinansa, bishop of Verona, and the adherents of John de Lugio, bishop of Bergamo. The sect which maintained one first cause was divided into the church of Bagnolo, which is a town of Provence, and the association of Concorregio or Concorrezzo. To the church of Bagnolo or Baiolo belonged the community which resided in France, and bore the name of Albigenians.⁴

³ See Moneta's Summa adversus Catharos et Waldenses, published by Richini, Rome, 1743, fol. with a dissertation prefixed, De Catharis, but which is of no great value. Moneta was a respectable writer for the age in which he lived. See lib. i. p. 2, 5, lib. ii. p. 247, &c. [Moneta is in general the best historical writer on this subject. He was of Cremona and of the earliest Dominicans, after having been long a professor at Bologna. He was still alive A.D. 1233.—Schl.]

⁴ Reinerius Saccho, Summa de Catharis et Leonistis, in Martene's Thesaurus Anecd. tom. v. p. 1761, 1768. [Rayner himself lived seventeen years among the Cathari, and was a leader among them, which gives much weight to his history.—Schl.] Peregrinus Priscianus in Muratori's Antiq. Ital. Medii Ævi, tom. v. p. 93, where he gives a tabular view of the differences between these sects; yet he erroneously denominates those Albanenses whom he should have called Albigenenses, and who were a branch of the Baliolesians: perhaps it was a mistake of the printer. The opinions of these Baliolesians or Bagnolensians may also be well learned from the Collex Inquisitionis, published by Limborech, with his Historia Inquisitionis. But what Limborech has himself written concerning the opinions of the Albigenians (Hist. Inquis. lib. i. cap. viii. p. 30, &c.) is inaccurate, and not free from errors. I have spent much time in examining these sects, and discriminating among them; a subject which the partialities of authors and other causes have greatly obscured. But there is not room here to enlarge. [According to a note of Fuesli, in his Kirchen und Ketzerhistorie der mittlern Zeit, vol. i. p. 128 (whose correctness however I cannot judge of), the Albigenians here mentioned must not be confounded with the Albigenians who appeared in Languedoc; for they lived at Alby in Montferrat.—Schl.] [According to Rayner

¹ See the compilations of D'Argente, in his Collectio Judiciorum de Nomis Erruriis, tom. i. to which however much more might be added respecting this universally persecuted and exterminated set of men. [For the history of this sect in the preceding century, see p. 385, &c.—Mur.]

² Besides the writers hereafter quoted, see a Disputatio inter Catholicum et Patrum, published by Martene, Thesaur. Anecd. tom. v. p. 1703, &c. and Bonacursus, Manifestatio Heresis Catharorum, in D'Achery's Spicilegium, tom. i. p. 208, &c.

6. The internal arrangements of this church had many singularities, which cannot be explained in a narrow compass. The government was administered by bishops; but each of these had two vicars attached to him, one of whom was called the elder and the other the younger son. The other teachers or priests were called (Diaconi) ministers.¹ All these, but especially the bishops and their sons, were held in immense veneration. And as their moral principles were peculiarly rigid and austere, and not suitable nor tolerable to all, it was necessary to divide their people, as the Manichæan congregations were anciently divided, into two classes, the comforted (consolati), and the associated or confederated (federati). The former exhibited a great show of piety, and led in celibacy a life of peculiar rigour and destitute of all common gratifications and conveniences. The latter, except observing a few rules, lived in the manner of other people; but they entered into a covenant which in Italian was called covenenza, that before they died, or at least in their last sickness, they would enter farther into the church and receive the consolation, which was their term for initiation.²

7. Of far better character than these was the presbyter Peter de Bruys, who about the year 1110 attempted a restoration of true religion in Languedoc and Provence, provinces of France; and having drawn many to follow him, after journeying and labouring for twenty years, was burned by the enraged populace at St. Giles, A.D. 1130. The whole system of doctrines inculcated by this Peter upon his followers, who from him were called Petrobrussians, is not known; yet there are five of his opinions which have reached us: I. That persons ought not to be baptized until they come to the use of reason. II. That it is not proper to build churches, and that such as are built should be pulled down. III. That the holy crosses ought to be destroyed. IV. That the body and blood of Christ are not distributed in the sacred supper, but only the signs of them. V. That the oblations, prayers, and good works of the living, do not profit the dead.³

8. He was followed by one Henry, perhaps an Italian,⁴ an eremite monk, the parent of the sect of the Henricians.⁵ From Lausanne, a city of Switzerland, he came to Mans; and being driven thence, he travelled through Poitiers, Bourdeaux, and the adjacent regions, and at last in the year 1147 came to Toulouse. Everywhere he boldly declaimed against the vices of the clergy and the defects of the prevailing religion, with the applause of the multitude. When ejected from Toulouse by St. Bernard, he took to flight; but was apprehended by some bishop, brought before Eugene III. the Roman pontiff, then holding a council at Rheims, and by him committed to prison, A.D. 1148, where he soon after died.⁶ An accurate account of the doctrines of this man has also not come down to us. We only know that he too disapproved of infant baptism, inveighed severely against

³ See Peter the Venerable, Contra Petrobrusianos, in the Bibliotheca Cluniacensis. p. 1117; Mabillon, Annales Benedict. tom. vi. p. 316, &c.; Basnage, Hist. des Eglises Réformées, period iv. p. 140, &c. [See also Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. tom. xxix. p. 515, &c. Almost the only source of all that is known of Peter de Bruys and his doctrine is the epistle or tract of Peter the Venerable, abbot of Cluny, written expressly to confute the errors of Peter de Bruys, about A.D. 1141. This tract is printed in the Biblioth. Cluniacensis. Paris, 1614, fol. p. 1117—1230; and in the Biblioth. Max. Patrum Lugdunensis. tom. xxii. p. 1032, &c. The author states and confutes in as many chapters the five errors mentioned by Mosheim; and he says these were the chief errors disseminated by Peter de Bruys, though his disciple Henry advanced a great many others.—Mur. [See Neander's view of this individual in his Der heil. Bernard u. sein Zeitalter, Wrensch's transl. p. 265, &c.—R.]

⁴ This is the conjecture of Mabillon in his Preface to the works of St. Bernard, sec. 6; but Henry may have been a Swiss, as Fuessli supposes, ubi supra, p. 214.—Schl.

⁵ This name occurs often in a different application, denoting the adherents to the emperor Henry IV. in his contest with the popes respecting investitures. For, as is well known, the pope declared the principles of Henry in respect to investitures to be heresy; and his son, Henry V. had to adjure expressly the Henrician heresy. Thus, e.g. are his adherents denominated in the Acts of the council of Quedlinburg (Quintilimburgense), A.D. 1085, in Harzheim's Concil. Germ. tom. iii. p. 200.—Schl.

⁶ Gesta Episcoporum Cenomanensium, in Mabillon's Analecta Veteris Epi. p. 315, &c. new ed. The epistle of Gaudrifi inserted in the close of the sixth book of Mabillon's Life of St. Bernard, in the Opp. Bernardi, tom. ii. p. 1207; Matth. Paris, Historia Major, p. 71; Mabillon, Preface to the Opp. Bernardi, sec. 6; Annales Benedict. tom. vi. p. 346, 420, 434.

there were sixteen communities or associations of Cathari; namely, the Albanensians or those of Donnezacho, the members of which were at Verona and in other parts of Lombardy, about 500 in all; those of Concorezzo, spread over all Lombardy, and more than 1,500 in number; those of Basolo, at Mantua, Brescia, Bergamo, and in Milan; others at Vicenza, or in the margravate; in the territory of Florence; in the valley of Spoleto; the French at Verona and in Lombardy; at Toulouse; at Carcassone; in the region of Albi; the Slavonians; the Latins at Constantinople; the Greeks there; those at Philadelphia in Romania; the Burgalio and the Duguntie. In the whole world there were at that time not quite 4,000 Cathari. See Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. vol. xxix. p. 484.—Mur.

¹ See Reinerius Saccho, Summa de Catharis, p. 1766, &c.

² These statements may be substantiated from the writers who have been mentioned, especially from the Codex Inquisit. Tolosane, and others. [For a more full account of the Cathari, see Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xxix. p. 477, &c.; also the summary account by Neander, Der heilige Bernard u. sein Zeitalter, p. 235, 248.—Mur.]

the corrupt morals of the clergy, despised the festal days and religious ceremonies, and held clandestine assemblies. Some represent him as being a disciple of Peter de Bruys, but on what authority they rely I do not know.¹

9. While these persons were producing excitement in France, about the year 1115 one Tanquelin or Tanquelm, a man of no learning, produced very great commotions at Antwerp in Brabant, and collected a very numerous party. He was either deranged or a shameless villain, if credit is due to what his enemies say of him; for he travelled in great pomp, said he was God or the Son of God, ordered daughters to be debauched in presence of their mothers, and the like. But these statements are not merely hard to be believed, but absolutely incredible.² This Tanchelm seems to have imbibed the principles of the mystics, to have despised public worship, the sacred supper, and baptism, and to have held secret meetings for religious purposes. The cause of the numerous calumnies propagated against him probably was, that he, like others of this character, inveighed strongly against the priests and the whole clerical order. He was slain by one of the priests, but his sect did not die with him. It was however extinguished finally, it is said, by the celebrated St. Norbert, founder of the Premonstratensians.³

¹ I cannot easily believe he was so; for, to mention no other argument, Peter de Bruys would not tolerate crosses; but Henry entered into a city bearing the standard of a cross in his own hand. See Mabillon, Analecra, p. 316, &c. [Peter, abbot of Cluny, however, expressly calls him an apostle of Peter de Bruys (in the Biblioth. Cluniacensis, p. 1123): "qui duobus tantum hominibus Petro de Bruis et Henrico ejus pseudapostolo tam facile cessistis." Also, ibid. p. 1117, he says: "After that impious (Peter du Bruys) had been removed from one fire to another, from this transitory to an eternal, the heir to his wickedness (heres nequitia ejus) Henry, with I know not what others, did not reform but altered the diabolical doctrine; and as I saw written in a note-book containing his own words, he published not merely five but many errors. But as I have not yet full evidence that he thus thought or preached, I omit to confute them:" i.e. the additional errors.—How Henry altered or enlarged the doctrines of Peter does not appear. He seems to have been a very popular preacher against the vices of the clergy, and the formal heartless devotion of the age. And it is probable he dwelt more upon practical religion than doctrinal. See Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xxix. p. 517, &c. and Neander's Der heil. Bernard u. sein Zeitalter, p. 254—257.—Mur. [Wrench's transl. p. 269—282, a passage which is worthy of being carefully perused by the inquirer into this obscure portion of the history of the church.—H.

² The epistle of the church of Utrecht to bishop Frederick concerning Tanchelm, in Tengnagel's Collectio Veterum Monumentorum, p. 368, &c.; Bulaeus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. ii. p. 98; Argente, Collectio Judicior. de Novis Erroribus, tom. i. p. 10.

³ Hugo, Vie de S. Norbert, liv. ii. p. 126; Van der Sterre, Vita S. Norberti, cap. 35, p. 164, and the notes of De Hartoghe upon it, p. 387, &c. [Abelard speaks of Tanchelm (Introduc. ad Theologiam, lib. ii. Opp. p.

10. In Italy, Arnold of Brescia, a pupil of Peter Abelard, a man of learning and stern morals but of a restless temper, attempted a revolution both civil and ecclesiastical. Innocent II. compelled him, after being condemned in the Lateran council of 1130, to retire into Switzerland.⁴ But he returned on the 1066, as a layman who had the folly to give himself out for the Son of God, and allow churches to be erected to his honour. He first travelled to Rome in the garb of a monk, accompanied by a priest, but returned soon after to Utrecht and there obtained many followers. As there was then no bishop at Utrecht, the clergy wrote to the archbishop of Cologne for aid against him, and in this famous letter they style him antichrist, and say he set at nought the pope, archbishops, bishops, and the whole clergy, distributed Christ with his own hands, and maintained that he and his followers were the only true church. They state that he first preached to the ignorant people on the sea-coast, gained over many women, with whom he had illicit intercourse, and by their means propagated his errors. He now preached in the fields to large assemblies, and was surrounded by a body-guard like a king, who attended him with arms and a banner. He despised the sacraments, dissuaded from attending the eucharist, and forbade paying tithes to the priests. At last he called himself God, because he had the Holy Ghost as really as Christ had. Some so revered his divinity that they used the water in which he washed as a sacrament. He betrothed an image of the Virgin Mary, and his followers contributed a splendid feast for the occasion. In short the letter says, the enormities of Tanchelm and his followers are innumerable; and they have brought the public worship into such contempt that the person who most despises it is esteemed the best saint.—From Utrecht Tanchelm went to Antwerp (according to the author of the Life of St. Norbert), and was attended by 3,000 armed men. At length, about A.D. 1124 or 1125 a priest slew him. But his followers could not be brought to renounce his errors till St. Norbert came among them. "If we give credit to these statements," says Schroeckh (Kirchengesch. vol. xxix. p. 653), "though they appear somewhat overcharged, Tanchelm was both a madman and a villain, who scarcely deserves to be mentioned in a history of religion. Mosheim supposed he was a mystic who despised external worship, and severely lashed the vices of the clergy. But for this position there is not sufficient testimony."—Mur.

⁴ Arnold is not named in the canons of this council. The twenty-third reads thus: "Eos—qui religioſitatis speciem ſimulant, Domini corporis et ſanguinis ſacramentum, baptiſma puerorum, ſacerdotium, et ceteros eccleſiaſticos ordines, et legitimarum damnant ſœdera nuptiarum, tanquam hæreticos ab eccleſia Dei pellimus et damnamus, et per poteſtates externas coercere præcipimus." Thus it refers rather to Peter de Bruys. [For it recounts his errors. Besides, it excommunicates the persons referred to, and delivers them over to the secular sword; but Arnold was not excommunicated nor committed to the executioner at this time.—Mur.] Yet Otto of Freysingen (ad ann. 1130), expressly states that Arnold, as well as the Petrobrussians, was condemned by this council. He was also banished from Italy, and forbidden to return without permission from the pope. Gunther, in his Ligurinus, lib. iii. v. 275, where he states his doctrines, makes this just remark: "He gives us many just rebukes mixed with false ones; but our times would not bear faithful admonitions." After his banishment Arnold went first into France to Abelard; and from him to Guido, the papal legate, who not long after was himself pope, under the name of Celestine II. But St. Bernard persecuted him wherever he could find him, and compelled him to escape incarceration by fleeing to Zurich, where he became a teacher and was much listened to. Presently a letter was despatched from St. Bernard to the bishop of Constance, warning him to banish Arnold out of his diocese. After residing about five years at Zurich he returned to Rome, A.D. 1145, at a time when death of Innocent, and gave great trouble to the new pontiff Eugene. After various fortunes he was seized, and in the year 1155 crucified by the Prefect of Rome, and his body burnt to ashes. The unhappy man does not appear to have attempted any violence or injury to religion; but perceiving the immense evils and disorders which arose from the vast riches of the pontiffs, bishops, and priests, he thought the interests of the church and of the world required that the clergy should be stripped of their possessions, prerogatives, and revenues. He therefore maintained that all the wealth of the Roman pontiff, and also of the bishops and the monks, ought to be transferred to the civil authorities, and nothing be left for any of the ministers of God but their spiritual powers, and the tithes and voluntary gifts of Christians.¹ Venerable on several accounts he had numerous followers, who from him were called Arnoldists, and who in subsequent times often showed themselves as occasion permitted.²

11. But of all the sects which arose in this century none was more famous or obtained higher reputation for probity and innocence even with its enemies, and none could count more disciples, than that which was called from its founder the Waldensians; from the place where it originated, the Poor Men of Lyons or the Leonists; and from the wooden shoes worn by its teachers and the mark upon them, Insabbatati or Sabbatati.³ Peter a rich merchant of Lyons in France, born at Vaux or Valdum or Validium, a town in the marquisate of Lyons, and therefore called Valdensis or Validisius, being a very pious man procured the translation of certain books of the Scripture, especially the four Gospels, and of various passages from the fathers, from Latin into French after A.D. 1160, by the hand of Stephen de Evisa, a priest of Lyons.⁴ By attentively reading these books, he learned that the religion then commonly taught to the people in the Romish church differed altogether from that which Jesus Christ himself and his Apostles taught; and earnestly desiring salvation he distributed his property among the poor, and in the year 1180 with some other pious men whom he had associated with him, he took upon himself the office of a preacher. The archbishop of Lyons and the other prelates opposed this proceeding. But the simple and holy religion which these good men professed, the spotless innocence of their lives, and their contempt for all riches and honours, so touched the multitude who had some sense of religion, that they readily adhered to them.⁵ Hence they set up

³ They were called Leonists because they originated at Leona, so Lyons was called in that age. The more perfect among the Waldensians wore mean or wooden shoes, which in French are called sabots; and likewise the sign of the cross upon their sabots to distinguish them from others. And hence the names of Sabbatati [shod with sabots], and Insabbatati [marked on their sabots]. See Du Fresnoy, Glossarium Lat. Mœd. tom. vi. p. 4, art. Sabbatati; Eymericus, Directorium Inquisitionum, par. iii. No. 118, &c.

⁴ See Stephen de Borbone, De Septem Donis Spiritus Sancti, in Echard and Queti's Bibliotheca Scripturæ Dominicanorum, tom. i. p. 192. An anonymous tract, De Hæresi Puperum de Ingarduno, in Martene's Thesaurus Anecdotorum, tom. v. p. 177. [Stephen de Borbone calls the translator employed by Waldus, Stephen of Ansa, and others, of Einsa. And I suspect that Mosheim wrote Einsa, though by an error of the press Evisa occurs in both the old and the new edition of his Institutes. In placing the commencement of Waldus's attempt to reform religion after the year 1160, Mosheim has followed Moneta. But Stephen de Borbone says: "This sect began about the year of Christ 1170 under John, called Holesmanis, archbishop of Lyons."—Schl.

⁵ Those who assign a different origin to the Waldensians, and particularly those who say they were so called from the valleys in which they had lived many ages before the time of Peter Waldus, have no authorities for their opinion and are refuted by all the historians. [This opinion was first advanced by Beza, and John Leger (in his Hist. Générale des Eglises Vaudoises) has taken all pains to make it appear plausible. But they are well confuted by Fueseli, in his Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorie der mittlern Zeit, vol. i. p. 295, &c.—Schl.] I will readily grant that long before these times there had been resident in the valleys of Piedmont, persons who rejected the prevailing opinions of the Romish church, and who agreed in many things with the Waldensians. But those inhabitants of the valleys must be distinguished from the [proper] Waldensians or followers of Peter Waldus, whom all the writers represent to have originated at Lyons and to have derived their name from this Peter Waldus. [MacLaine here boldly attacks the opinions of Mosheim, and citing some of the arguments of Leger asserts the higher antiquity of the Waldensians, from whom he says Peter the citizens of Rome had been long struggling to restore the ancient consular government, and to free themselves from the civil authority of the pope. These disturbances Arnold promoted under the reigns of Eugene III. and Anastasius IV. But Hadrian IV. excommunicated him and ordered him into exile. Arnold laughed at it so long as the citizens supported him. At last the pope laid the city under an interdict [the first which was ever laid on Rome], and compelled the citizens to give up supporting Arnold. He had now to leave Rome, and went into Campania, where the margrave and the people received him as a man of God. In the year 1155, the emperor Frederick I. was advancing towards Rome, and entered into a negotiation with the pope respecting his approaching coronation. Here the pope stipulated, that Frederick should deliver Arnold of Braccia into his hands, Frederick fulfilled the stipulation, and Arnold was strangled to death; and to prevent the people from paying veneration to his corpse, it was burned, and the ashes thrown into the Tiber.—Schl. [See Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xxvi. p. 110, &c. 131, 153, &c.—Mur.] societies, first in France and then in Lombardy; and these multiplied and spread with amazing rapidity through all the countries of Europe, nor could they be exterof Lyons-derived the name of Waldus. It is of little consequence whether Peter Waldus gave name to the sect of the Waldensians or derived his own name from them; but the origin and antiquity of the sect are of more importance. On this subject Schroeckh (in his Kirchengesch. vol. xxix. p. 527, &c.) makes the following remarks. As to their age and origin, the ground of their separation from the Romish church, and especially whether they were heretics or reformers, there has been the more controversy between the Roman Catholics and the Protestants, because the interests of their respective churches were involved in the discussions. But these party and polemical narratives which have done so much harm to history are becoming more and more rare; and we purpose to state only what the lovers of truth of both parties may approve. It was usual formerly to trace the origin of the Waldenses to a very high antiquity; and it must be acknowledged that a writer of the thirteenth century who has been already mentioned first as a partisan and then an opposer of the Cathari, Reinerius Saccho, has given occasion for this opinion. In his Liber adv. Waldenses, cap. iv. (in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xxv. p. 262, &c.) he writes concerning them, under one of their appellations (Pauperes de Lugduno), "Their sect has been the most injurious of all to the church of God, on account of their antiquity; for they, according to some, originated in the times of the Romish bishop Silvester, in the fourth century; and according to others, existed as early as the days of the Apostles." But neither Reinerius nor the records of history give the least ground for this assertion, which he seems to have borrowed solely from some Waldensians. In more modern times various arguments have been adduced to support the same position. Especially has one of the principal historians of the Waldensians, himself once a preacher among them in the 17th century, John Leger, in his French work (Hist. Générale des Eglises Evangéliques des Vallées de Piemont, ou Vaudoises, Leyden, 1669, 2 tome fol.) given himself much trouble to prove that they existed long before the twelfth century. He first cites some ancient and modern historians who are thought to have found traces of them, but who were either too recent to be good witnesses in the case, or have confounded the Manichæans of the eleventh century and other opposers of the church of Rome with the Waldensians. The opinion he adopted from Beza, that these people of his own religion derived their name from the valleys (Vallées, or in their own language Vaux) in which most of them resided, is a mere conjecture founded on the resemblance of the words; though it has long been admitted that for centuries there had existed in the valleys of Piedmont various sorts of people, who were not in communion with the Romish church. Equally unsupportable is the assertion of Leger that the Waldensians were descended from Claudius, the famous bishop of Turin in the 9th century. With more plausibility he argues their high antiquity from a poem written in the Provencal dialect and entitled, The Noble Lesson (La Noble Leçon) which was supposed to be the production of a Waldensian, about A.D. 1100. The very name Waldensians (Vaudés) occurs in it. But Fuesslin, who has the most fully investigated this subject (ubi supra, p. 299, &c.) has shown that this poem may have been written long after the year 1100, and can hardly have been composed by an inhabitant of the valleys of Piedmont. Gieseler in his Text-book, vol. ii. sec. lxxxv. note 10, shows that the 1100 years mentioned in this poem are to be reckoned, not from the Christian era, but from the composition of the Apocalypse; so that the poem professes to have been written near the end of the 12th century. Basnage also has made Claudius (whom he misrepresents as separating from the communion of the Romish church) to be the father of the Waldensians, and has used other invalid proofs of their high antiquity (Hist. de l'Eglise, tome ii. p. 1434). In an essay (subjoined to the German translation of Fleury's Hist. de l'Eglise, vol. xi. p. 486, &c.) on the community which was persecuted under the name of the Manichæans, the same

¹ See Otto of Freysinger, De Gestis Frederici I. lib. ii. cap. xx.; St. Bernard, Epist. 195, 196, tom. i. p. 187, &c.; Bulteus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. ii. p. 157; Muratori, Droits de l'Empire sur l'Etat Ecclesiastique, p. 137, &c.; Bunau, Vita Frederici I. p. 41; Chausse, Nouveau Dictionnaire Hist. Crit. tome i. p. 482.

² For an account of Bernard's controversy with Arnold, see Neander's Der heil. Bernard u. sein Zeitalter, Wrench's transl. p. 169, &c.; and of his political career see Milman's Gibbon's Decl. and Fall, &c. vol. xli. p. 263, &c. Gieseeler in his Lehrbuch, &c. refers to several recent German writers who have treated of his history and theological views; see Cunningham's transl. vol. ii. p. 183, note 5.—R.

minated entirely by any punishments, whether by death or by other forms of persecution.¹

12. Peter Waldus and his associates did not aim so much to change the system of religion or to inculcate new articles of faith, as to restore the form of the church, the morals of the clergy, and the lives of Christians, to that primitive and apostolic simplicity which they thought they had learned, particularly from the words of Christ. They therefore taught that in the time of Constantine the Great the Romish church had degenerated from its original purity and sanctity; they denied the supremacy of the Roman pontiff; they would have the rulers and ministers of the church imitate the poverty of the apostles, and procure their own frugal and slender sustenance by manual labour; they asserted that authority to teach, to confirm, and to admonish their brethren, was to a certain extent given to all Christians; the ancient penitential discipline which was nearly subverted by the grants of indulgences—that is, the making satisfaction for sins by prayer, fasting, and liberality to the poor—opinion is maintained; and for proof of it a Waldensian confession of faith is relied on, which without any proof is assigned to the year 1120. And in the latest histories of the Waldensians by Protestants in Germany, we find this high antiquity of the sect assumed but not proved. The writers on the contrary who lived about the middle of the 13th century, several of whom were personally acquainted with the men who had been active in producing the sect of the Waldensians, unitedly tell us that it was Peter Waldus (called also Valdo, Valdensis, and in his native language probably Vaud), a rich citizen of Lyons, who gave between the years 1160 and 1180 both existence and an appellation to this sect.—Mur. [Mr. Maitland, formerly mentioned in connexion with the Paulicians (see the note in p. 323, above), supports the modern origin of the Waldenses and represents them as believers in most of the prevalent errors of the papal system. See his Facts and Documents, &c. On the other hand Mr. Faber, without noticing this work of Mr. Maitland, vindicates the antiquity of the Waldenses as a body of protesting dissidents against Romanist corruptions, in his Inquiry into the History and Theology of the Ancient Vallenses and Albigenses referred to in the above note. See Gieseler, Lehrbuch, &c. the whole of section 85, in Cunningham's translation, vol. ii. p. 376, &c. and also p. 398; Waddington's Hist. of the Church, vol. ii. p. 181, &c. and vol. iii. p. 371.—R.]

¹ See, in addition to the ancient writers concerning the Waldensians, e.g. Reinerius Saccho, Summa contra Valdenses; Moneta, Summa contra Catharos et Valdenses, published a few years since at Rome by Richini; the tract, De Heresi Pauperum de Lugduno, published by Martene, Theaur. Anecdotor. tom. v. p. 1777, &c.; Pilchdorf, Contra Valdenses, in the Biblioth. Max. Patrum, tom. xxv. and many others; Perrin, Hist. des Vaudois, Geneva, 1619, 8vo [also in English, Lond. 1624, 4to.—Mur.]; Leger, Hist. Générale des Eglises Vaudoises, liv. i. chap. xiv. p. 166; Usher, De Successione Ecclesiar. Occidentalis, cap. viii. p. 209, &c.; Basnage, Hist. des Eglises Réformées, tome i. period. iv. p. 329, &c.; Richini, Dis. de Waldensibus, prefixed to Moneta's Summa, p. 34; Bulsao, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. ii. p. 292, and many others [especially Fuesslin, ubi supra, vol. i. p. 293, 354.—Schl.]. [Also Gieseler's Text-book by Cunningham, ubi supra, and Hallam's Middle Ages, chap. ix. part ii. vol. ii. p. 319.—Mur.]

they wished to see restored; and these satisfactions on which they laid great stress they believed any devout Christian could enjoin upon those that confessed; so that it was not necessary for people to confess their sins to priests, but only to lay open their transgressions to individual brethren and look to them for advice; the power of forgiving sins and remitting their punishment they held to belong to God only, and therefore that indulgences were an invention of base avarice; they regarded prayers and other rites performed on behalf of the dead to be useless ceremonies, because departed souls are not detained and subjected to a purgation in some intermediate region, but are immediately after death either taken into heaven or sent to hell. These and such as these were the doctrines they inculcated. Their morals were very strict, for they explained our Saviour's sermon on the mount according to the literal import of the words; and therefore disapproved altogether of war, lawsuits, efforts to acquire wealth, capital punishments, taking any oath, or defending one's life or limbs against offered violence.¹

13. The Waldensian church was governed by bishops whom they styled Majorales or elders, and presbyters and deacons; for they supposed these orders instituted by Christ. But all these officers were to be like the apostles, that is, uneducated men and absolutely poor or possessing no property, and also labourers who procured their sustenance by the work of their hands.² The people [or laity]

were divided into the perfect and the imperfect; the former of whom voluntarily relinquished all their possessions, exhibited their absolute poverty in the manner of their dress, and emaciated their bodies by frequent fasting; while the latter lived more generously and more like other people, yet without any splendour or luxury, very much in the manner of the more strict Mennonites. There was however some disagreement among these Waldenses, and especially between those of Italy or Lombardy and the Ultramontanes, or those living in France and the other countries of Europe. The former looked upon the Romish church as a real church of Christ, though greatly corrupted; they admitted the validity of its seven sacraments, and offered to continue in its communion provided they might live in their own way. But the latter maintained that the Church of Rome had apostatized from Christ, was destitute of the Holy Spirit, and was that Babylonian harlot mentioned by St. John.³

14. Besides these larger sects which had numerous friends and advocates, many other smaller and more obscure ones started up, especially in Italy and France, but which seem soon to have become extinct.⁴ In Italy and especially in Lombardy, which was the principal seat of heretics, a singular party spread itself among the people denominated, though I cannot say why, the Pasagini or Pasagii, and also the Circumcised, which in common with the other sects was averse from the Romish church and its regulations, but was also specially distinguished by two peculiarities of sentiment. First, they taught that the law of Moses ought to be observed under the New Testament with the exception of the sacrifices; and accordingly they practised circumcision, abstained from the meats prohibited by Moses, observed the sabbath of the Jews, and the like. Secondly, they corrupted the doctrine of three persons in the divine nature, and taught that Christ was only the first and a spotless creature of God; a sentiment the

¹ See especially the Codex Inquisitionis Tolosane, published by Limborch; Moneta's Summa contra Valdenses, and the other writers of those times on the opinions of the Waldensians. Though some of them are more accurate than others, and some ascribe more and others fewer peculiarities to the sect, yet in general they admit the piety and the blameless lives of the Waldensians; and they plainly show that the sect offered no violence to the common faith of Christians, but only urged a return to the ancient practices of Christians, and opposed the defects in the public worship and in the conduct of the clergy. [And hence Peter Waldo himself did not renounce the Romish church. On the contrary, in the year 1179 he sent two of his followers to the council of the Lateran, who presented to the pope a copy of his translations from the Old and New Testaments, with notes and expositions of his own, and requested permission to preach and instruct people in religion. Alexander III. examined them and forbade their preaching, because they were illiterate. They made a similar attempt under pope Lucius III. but without success. On the contrary, this pope excommunicated them in the year 1184. See Fuessli, ubi supra, p. 335. Schell.—One application to the pontiff for his approbation, the abbot of Ursburg (in his Chronicon, ad ann. 1212), says, he himself was witness to. See Harduin's Concilia, tom. vi. par. II. p. 1692. The decree of Lucius III. excommunicating the Waldensians, A.D. 1183, is in Harduin, ubi supra, p. 1878.—Mur.

² A large proportion of them got their living by weaving; and hence the sect was called in some places that of the Weavers, in French Tisserands.

³ Moneta, Summa contra Catharos et Valdenses, p. 406, 416, and elsewhere. They appear likewise not to have had the same views in regard to the possession of property, as appears from Stephen de Borbone, in Echard's Scriptores Dominici, tom. I. p. 191. He divides the Waldenses, in other words indeed but amounting to the same thing, into the Poor Men of Lyons (these were the Ultramontanes), and the Poor Men of Lombardy. The former forbade all possession of property, the latter allowed of such possession. There are other passages in the ancient writers which confirm this distinction.

⁴ On the various more obscure sects, see Stephen de Borbone, in Echard's Scriptores Dominici, tom. I. p. 191.

less surprising considering the multitude of Arians there had been in Italy antecedently to this period.¹

15 In France, a class of persons who were called Caputiati from the covering worn on their heads, roamed about Burgundy, the region of Auxerre, and some other parts, producing excitement among the people. These people wore upon their hats or caps a leaden image of the Virgin Mary; and they wished to restore the primeval liberty of mortals and universal equality, to the exclusion of all subordination and civil authority. This madness was suppressed by Hugo, bishop of Auxerre, not with arguments but by military force.² Very different from these were the Apostolici, whom St. Bernard assailed with great earnestness. They bore this name generally according to Bernard, their adversary, because they wished to exemplify in their conduct the apostolic mode of living. They were for the most part rustics and people of low condition, who earned their food and clothing by weaving; but they had numerous and great friends and supporters of every rank and order. Their religion, according to the confession of their adversary himself, was free from errors, and their life was most blameless. Yet (1.) they deemed it unlawful to take an oath. (2.) They suffered their hair and beards to grow long. (3.) Though they had separate dwelling-houses they assembled together for labour and for worship. (4.) They preferred celibacy to marriage, and called themselves the chaste brethren and sisters. But (5.) each of the men had with him some sister after the manner of the apostles, with whom he lived familiarly, sleeping in the same chamber, though not in the same bed.³

16. At the council of Rheims, A.D. 1148, in which Pope Eugene III. presided, a certain man named Eon of Bretagne, and who was undoubtedly deranged, was condemned. Having heard in the common formula for exorcising evil spirits, these words pronounced—"Per Eum, &c. by him who will come to judge the quick and the dead," he concluded from the resemblance between the word Eum and his own name that he was the person who was to judge the quick and the dead. This senseless man should have been given over to the physicians, and not have been classed among the heretics. He died in prison; but many of his followers, who could not be dissuaded from reverencing him, were burned at the stake.⁴ This single example clearly shows how little sound sense and correct knowledge of religion then existed, even among the rulers of the church.

¹ See Bonacursus, Manifestatio Hæresis Catharorum, in D'Achery's Spicil-gium, tom. i. p. 211, new ed.; Gerh. Bergamensis, Contra Catharos et Pasagics, in Muratori's Antiq. Ital. Medi Ævi, tom. v. p. 151, &c. [Fuessell, in his Kirchen-und Ketzehistorie der Mittelern Zeit, vol. i. p. 46, assigns a very probable cause of the appellation Pasagini, supposing it equivalent to Pasagier and Passager, i.e. Roamers, in Greek ἀγῶται; which appellation the Greeks had given to a sort of Manicheans, according to the account of Peter of Sicily, in his History of the Manicheans, in the Biblioth. Max. Patrum, tom. xvi. p. 814. Schl.—[Another conjecture is, that they assumed the name of Pasagi, derived from the Greek Πᾶς ἅγιος, all holy. Their practising circumcision will account for their being called Circumcisi, the Circumcised.—Mur.

² Le Bœuf, Mémoires sur l'Hist. d'Auxerre, tome i. p. 317, &c. [Robert de Monte in his Appendix to Sigebertus Gemblacensis, says, the commencement of this sect was in the year 1182.—Schl. [See a more full account of them in Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. vol. xxix. p. 636, &c.—Mur.

³ St. Bernard, Sermo lxx. in Canticum, Opp. tom. iv. p. 1495, &c. ed. Mabillon. [A similar class of people who wished to revive the apostolical mode of living, appeared in the neighbourhood of Perigord in Guleune, as we learn from the letter of a monk named Heribert, inserted in Mabillon's Analecta, tom. iii. p. 467. But these went still farther. They abhorred images and the mass, and had priests, monks, and nuns, in their community. Their leader was named Lucius, and among their adherents they could reckon some of the nobility.—Schl.

⁴ William of Paris, Hist. Major, p. 68; William Neubrigensis, Hist. Rerum Anglicar. lib. i. p. 50; Bularus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. ii. p. 241. [He was a wealthy nobleman, of pleasing address, and drew a great number after him. With these he sometimes travelled rapidly over the country with great display; then retiring to places of obscurity, lived in luxury with his attendants. The lawlessness of the party and the multitudes who were captivated with them, led to his apprehension and imprisonment, and to the execution of his obstinate adherents. See William Neubrigensis, ubi supra, and Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xxix. p. 633, &c.—Mur.

CENTURY THIRTEENTH.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

1. ALTHOUGH that powerful emperor of the Tartars or rather the Moguls, Genghis Khan and his successors, who had carried their victorious arms through a great part of Asia, and had conquered China, India, Persia, and many other countries, greatly disturbed and distressed the Christians resident in those countries,¹ yet it appears from the most unquestionable testimony that numerous bodies of Nestorian Christians were still scattered over all northern Asia and China. The emperors of the Tartars and Moguls were themselves not particularly averse from Christianity; and some of their [subordinate] kings and chieftains had either retained this religion, which they received from their ancestors, or were converted to it by the preaching of the Nestorians.² Yet gradually many of them became infected with the Mohammedan religion, which at length banished Christianity entirely from their camps and courts.

2. As these Tartars from the year 1241 invaded Europe also, and cruelly harassed and devastated Hungary, Poland, Silesia, and the neighbouring countries, the Roman pontiffs thought proper to attempt a pacification with these new and ferocious enemies. Accordingly, in the year 1245 Innocent IV. sent several Dominicans and Franciscans as his legates to the Tartars.³ Afterwards Abaka, emperor of the Tartars, in the year 1274 sent envoys to Europe to the council of Lyons, under Gregory X.⁴ Nicolaus III. also in the year 1278 sent some Franciscans as legates to Coblai, the emperor of the whole nation. And in the year 1289 Nicolaus IV. sent to the same emperor John de Monte Corvino with some others, who also carried letters to the Nestorians. Nor were these legates wholly unsuccessful; for they instructed many both of the Tartars and of the Nestorians in the principles of the Roman religion, and gathered Christian churches not only in Tartary but also in China. To facilitate this business, John de Monte Corvino translated the books of the New Testament and the Psalms of David into the language of the Tartars.⁵

¹ Wadding, ubi supra, tom. iv. p. 35, tom. v. p. 128, &c. See this whole subject copiously and critically discussed in the above cited Hist. Tartarorum Eccles. which however might be much enlarged, and in some particulars corrected. [The subjects briefly and summarily stated in this section fill about seventy pages 4to of text, and the documents fill as many pages more of the Appendix to Mosheim's Hist. Tartarorum Eccles. — Mur.

² Raynald, Annales Eccles. tom. xiv. ad ann. 1278, sec. xvii. &c. p. 282, and ad ann. 1280, sec. 59, &c. p. 419, ed. Cologne; Peter Bergeron, Traité des Tartares, chap. xi. p. 61, and many others, cited in the Hist. Tartarorum Eccles. [Genghis-Khan conquered in battle Un-Khan, the fourth and last of the Christian kings in central Asia who bore the name of Prester John, in the year 1202. He now commenced his career of conquest, and during 25 years carried his victorious arms from the Chinese Sea to the Euphrates and the Euxine. His four sons harmoniously preserved the unity of the new empire, and extended and consolidated it. In the East, all northern China as well as Tibet and the countries bordering on Hindostan, were subdued. In the West, the countries from the Indus onward, including Persia, Mesopotamia, Armenia, Georgia, and the whole region about the Caspian, with the southern part of Russia in Europe, were permanently occupied; and Poland, Hungary, and part of Silesia, as well as Siberia and all northern Asia, were overrun and devastated, and then abandoned. This vast empire of the Moguls, while united, was subject to the great Khan or emperor, who resided first in Chinese Tartary and then at Pekin. The central and western provinces were governed by dependent sovereigns or viceroys, who were for the most part the sons and descendants of Genghis, and of course the brothers and relatives of the great Khan. After a very few generations, however, the principal of the provincial governors became nearly or altogether independent sovereigns; and three of them, the Khans of Kipzack and Russia, the Khans of Zagatal or Transoxiana, and the Khans of Iran or Persia, were lords of extensive empires. Genghis and

³ Gregory Abulpharajus, Historia Dynastiæ. p. 281, &c.

⁴ See Marco Paolo, the Venetian, De Regionibus Oriental. lib. i. cap. iv. and lib. ii. cap. vi. and in many other places; Haytho, the Armenian, Hist. Oriental. cap. xix. p. 35, cap. xxiii. p. 39, cap. xxiv. p. 41, &c.; Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Patric. tom. iii. par. ii. p. 526, and others; especially the Hist. Tartarorum Eccles. composed under my superintendence, and published at Helmstadt, 1742. 4to, which I may perhaps enlarge considerably in a future edition. [This purpose was never accomplished. — Schl.

⁵ See Wadding, Annales Minorum, tom. iii. p. 116, 149, 175, 256.

3. The same pontiffs made every effort in their power to sustain the interests of the Latins in Syria and Palestine, which were now nearly ruined; for as these pontiffs had learned by experience the great advantage to themselves, and the increase of their grandeur and authority, arising from these Asiatic wars waged under the pretence of religion, they were very solicitous to have them continued.¹ The first expedition was proclaimed by Innocent III.² Few however of the Europeans obeyed his summons. After various efforts, which were fruitless in most countries, some the succeeding emperors, as well as most of their viceroys in the West, were tolerant towards all religions; and they encouraged men of talents of every religion, warriors, statesmen, physicians, artists of various kinds, and men of letters. Hence, in their courts and camps, and in places of high trust in every part of the empire, were to be found Christians, Mohammedans, Jews, and Pagans, all enjoying the free use of their religion. Many Europeans, as Marco Paolo, the Venetian, and others, travelled freely from the Bosphorus to China; and in no age probably have the Europeans had so free access to the central parts of Asia as in this century. Genghis himself married a daughter of Prester John, and several of his descendants had Christian wives. Till near the close of the century most of the Mogul princes, though tolerant to all religions, were rather partial to that of the Christians. And this afforded to the Nestorians (the prevailing sect in those countries) a fine opportunity to propagate their religion all over the East, and particularly in China. The Roman pontiffs also sent not only ambassadors but missionaries, chiefly Franciscan and Dominican monks, quite to Peking and China; and in that country they gathered some churches, and at length established an archbishop (John de Monte Corvino), with several suffragans. Much greater success would doubtless have now attended the efforts of Christians in China and throughout the empire, had they been united. But the Roman Catholics and the Nestorians strove to undermine each other; and the Tartar Khans were the protectors of each in turn against the other. Moreover the wars of these Tartars with the Saracens of Syria and Arabia, and with the sultans of Egypt who oppressed the Christians of Palestine and the East, led them frequently to march armies into Syria, and to solicit alliances with the Christians of Europe against those Mohammedans their common enemies; and this was the cause of frequent embassies between the Moguls and the European sovereigns. But near the close of the century the Mohammedan religion gained the ascendancy, especially in the western parts of the Mogul empire; and the Khans themselves now leaned towards it, and in some instances allowed the Christians to be persecuted. In general however this empire was favourable to the Christian cause in Asia during this century; and had the Christians who attempted the propagation of their religion possessed more of its true spirit, and made united and vigorous efforts, they might probably have now converted more than half of Asia to the Christian faith, and perhaps have established a broad zone of permanent Christian light and influence, from Asia Minor quite to the Chinese seas. See Mosheim's Historia Tartaror. Eccles. cap. ii. p. 29, &c. and Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. vol. xxv. p. 191, &c. with the civil histories of the Tartars.—Mur. [See this subject treated with his characteristic research and accuracy by Gieseler, in the section xc. of his Lehrbuch, &c. Cunningham's transl. vol. ii. p. 408. I may add that the travels of the famous Marco Paolo were translated into English so early as 1579, and that the most recent and I believe the best edition is that by Marsden, Lond. 1818, 4to, with a valuable introduction and notes.—R.

¹ This was stated by some writers of that age; see Matth. Paris, Historia Major, p. 174, 365, and elsewhere.

² This was the fourth crusade.—R.

French nobles, having formed a league with the Venetian republic, put to sea with a very moderate force. The issue of this expedition was by no means such as the pontiff had anticipated. For these French and Venetians did not direct their course to Palestine, but to Constantinople, which they stormed in the year 1203, for the sake of restoring the emperor Isaac Angelus, who had implored their aid against the violence and usurpations of his brother Alexius. The next year a bloody sedition took place at Constantinople, in which the emperor Isaac died, and his son, Alexius junior, was strangled by Alexius Ducas, the author of the insurrection. On hearing of this parricide the generals of the crusaders again took possession of Constantinople on the 12th of April, A.D. 1204; and putting the tyrant Ducas to flight, they elected Baldwin, count of Flanders, emperor of the Greeks. In opposition to this Latin emperor, the Greeks created two years after another of their own nation, Theodorus Lascaris, who fixed his residence at Nice in Bithynia. From this period till the year 1261 there were two emperors of the Greeks, the one a Frank or Latin, and the other a Greek, of whom the latter resided at Nice, and the former made Constantinople his capital. But in the year 1261 the Greek emperor, Michael Palæologus, by means of his General, Cæsar Alexius, recovered Constantinople, and obliged the Latin emperor, Baldwin II. to flee into Italy. Thus terminated the empire of the Franks at Constantinople, after it had stood fifty-seven years.³

4. The next crusade was undertaken by the united forces of the Italians and Germans under the pontiff Honorius III. A.D. 1217.⁴ The commander-in-chief was Andrew, king of Hungary, with whom were Leopold of Austria, Lewis of Bavaria, and other princes. Andrew after a few months returned to Europe. The other generals captured the strongly fortified city of Damietta in Egypt, A.D. 1220. But their successes did not continue long; for the next year the Saracen fleet completely destroyed that of the Christians after having cut off its supplies; and this loss, which was utterly irreparable, was followed by the loss of Damietta and the frustration of the high hopes which the Christians had indulged.¹

³ These events are best stated by Du Fresnoy, Hist. de l'Empire de Constantinople sous les Empereurs Français, the first part of which contains Godfrey De Ville-Harduin, one of the French Generals, Hist. de la Conquête de la Ville de Constantinople par les Français. This work forms also a part of the great Corpus Histor. Byzantin. Paris, 1657, fol. See also, among others, Fontenay, Hist. de l'Eglise Gallicane, tome x. p. 216, &c.; the monk Gunther's Hist. Capta a Latinis Constantinopolea, in Cansius's Lectures Antiquæ, tom. ix. p. 1, &c. See, moreover, the Epistles of Innocent III. published by Baluze [and Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, chap. lx. lxi.—R.

⁴ This is usually accounted the fifth crusade; but its results were so paltry that some continental writers do not reckon it among these expeditions, and call the next crusade of 1228 the fifth. This is the numeration of Gieseler.—R.

5. The legates and missionaries of the pontiff now enrolled a new army of crusaders from almost every country of Europe, which was both more numerous and more respectable, because it was anticipated that the emperor Frederick II. would take the command of it in his own person. Frederick had made such a promise to the Roman pontiff, and it seemed unlikely he would violate his promise, seeing that he had married Jolanda, the daughter of the count of Brienne and king of Jerusalem in the year 1223, and had received with her the kingdom of Jerusalem as her dower. But under various pretences the emperor long delayed his voyage, and at length in the year 1228, after being excommunicated by Gregory IX. he set out with a small retinue to join the forces which were anxiously waiting in Palestine for his arrival. When he arrived there, instead of carrying on the war he terminated it. For without the knowledge and contrary to the wishes of those engaged with him in the enterprise, in the year 1229 he concluded a peace or rather a truce for ten years, with Melic-Camel the Mohammedan sultan; and as the principal condition was that he should receive the city and the kingdom of Jerusalem, so soon as the city was transferred to him he was crowned king of Jerusalem. Having made these arrangements he hastened back to Italy, in order to quell some commotions there which the pontiff had excited in his absence. This crusade therefore terminated more happily than the others.²

6. Other less noted and less fortunate expeditions to Palestine followed; as first in the year 1239, that of Theobald V.³ count of Campania and king of Navarre, with other princes of Germany and France; and then in 1240, that of Richard, count of Cornwall, and brother of Henry III. the king of England. The result of neither corresponded with the preparations made for them. In the former, the ambassadors of the emperor Frederick in Palestine renewed the truce with the Mohammedans, and the rest of the forces were vanquished by the barbarians at Gaza, while such as survived the slaughter returned to Europe. The chief cause of the disaster was the discord between the Knights Templars and those of St. John of Jerusalem. And hence Richard could effect nothing of importance; but with the consent of most of his confederates he concluded a truce such as the state of their affairs would permit with the king of Egypt, and returned to Europe in the year 1241.⁴

¹ See De Vitriaco, Historia Oriental. and Marinus Sanutus, Secreta Fidelium Crucis, in Bongarsius's Gesta Dei per Francos. [While the Christians were encamped before Damietta, we are told that St. Francis, the honest enthusiast who founded the Franciscan order, burning with zeal for the conversion of infidels and eager for a martyr's crown, went to Egypt and with a single attendant proceeded from the Christian camp towards that of the Saracens. When arrested at the outposts he exclaimed, "I am a Christian, carry me to your Sultan." The Mussulmans did so; and when the Sultan demanded of him who he was, how he came there, and who had sent him, he replied that he was Francis the servant of Jesus Christ, and that he was sent to him by the most high God to teach him and his people the way of salvation. Pleased with this address the Sultan entered into free conversation with him, and found so much amusement in his wild though gentlemanly flights of fancy, that he invited him to remain with him. Francis replied that he would do so, on condition that the Sultan would renounce Mohammedanism and embrace Christianity and would persuade his people to do the same; and added that if the Sultan doubted, he might order a great fire to be kindled, into which Francis would plunge himself along with some of the Mussulman priests, and if he perished it might be imputed to his sinfulness, but if not then the Sultan must be convinced. The Sultan said there were none of his priests who were willing to try the experiment. "Then," said Francis, "I will plunge in alone provided you will embrace Christ if I come out unhurt." The Sultan objected that his subjects would revolt and would kill him, if he should renounce their faith. He now offered Francis a large sum of money to distribute in charity among the Christians, but Francis spurned his money unless he would become a Christian. At length the Sultan dismissed him with a guard to conduct him safely to the Christian camp, and at parting requested his prayers, that God would vouchsafe to show him which was the true faith and the religion most pleasing in his sight. See De Vitriaco, Hist. Occident. cap. xxvii. and Bonaventura, Vita S. Francisci, cap. ix. sec. vii.—Mur.

² See the historians of the crusades, and the writers of the life of Frederick II.; also Muratori, Annali Italiane, and the writers of the history of the Germanic empire. [The Pope still considered the emperor as excommunicated, notwithstanding he had satisfied the demands of the pontiff by performing the crusade. By means of the clergy both in Asia and in Europe, the Pope exposed him to various dangers and difficulties; he invaded the emperor's territories in Apulia during his absence, contrary to all the rules then in force in regard to persons engaged in a crusade; he spread a report of his death and sent legates into Germany and Denmark to persuade some other person to suffer himself to be set up as emperor in opposition to Frederick. These surely were cogent reasons for the valiant emperor to hasten back to Italy, and restrain the haughty pontiff within the bounds of his duty.—Schell. (This is the fifth crusade of Gieseler and others; but Gibbon and the English historians consider it only as an ordinary expedition, and do not reckon it among the crusades.—H.)

³ It was Theobald VI. who engaged in this expedition. He was the posthumous son of Theobald V. who died as he was about to embark in the crusade of A.D. 1201. See Fleury, Hist. de l'Eglise, livr. lxxxi. sec. xxvi.—Mur.

⁴ The history of these transactions is most accurately and faithfully detailed by Gebauer, in his History of Richard the General, written in German, lib. i. p. 34, &c. It appears from the epistles of Peter de Vineis, that Frederick II. created Richard his viceroy for the kingdom of Jerusalem, and this accounts for the attempts of Gregory IX. to retard his voyage.

7. As the affairs of the Christians were now declining more and more in the East, Lewis IX. king of France, who was enrolled among the saints after his death and who is still regarded with peculiar veneration, in fulfilment of a vow made in his very severe sickness A.D. 1248, collected a powerful army and a great fleet and proceeded to Egypt, anticipating that the conquest of that country would facilitate the operations of war in Palestine and Syria.¹ At first he was successful, for he captured Damietta, a celebrated city of Egypt; but the progress of the war was most disastrous. The Mohammedans intercepted their supplies in the year 1250, and famine and pestilence raged in his camp; Robert, the king's brother, indiscreetly pursuing the enemy, was slain in battle; the king himself, two of his brothers, and the greatest part of his army, were made prisoners. This magnanimous and heroic monarch, who was also very pious according to the standard of that age, was ransomed at a great price,² and after four years spent in Palestine returned to France with a few followers in the year 1254.³

8. The king, whose invincible spirit was by no means discouraged by these disasters, renewed the war in the year 1270; for he supposed he had not yet fully satisfied his solemn vow to God. Collecting therefore an immense fleet, and accompanied by numerous princes and nobles, he set sail for Africa, intending to establish there an advanced post for the future wars in Asia.⁴ Immediately on his arrival he attacked and carried the fortress of Carthage; but soon after a pestilential disease swept off the greatest part of his forces in the harbour of Tunis, and on the 25th of August, A.D. 1270, the king himself became its victim.⁵ After him no sovereign of Europe dared again to venture on an enterprise of so much peril, labour, and expense. Hence the kingdom of the Latins in the East gradually wasted away, in spite of the efforts of the Roman pontiffs to preserve it; and on the capture of Ptolemais by the Mohammedans in A.D. 1291 it became wholly extinct.⁶ Among the causes of so great a loss, the valour of the enemy was one of the least; the principal causes were, the disunion of the Christians among themselves, the extreme profligacy of those who called themselves Christ's soldiers, and the ignorance and obstinacy of the papal legates.⁷

9. In the West, the fierce people of Prussia at the commencement of the century, were still adhering firmly to the superstition of their ancestors; nor could the priests occasionally sent among them by their arguments and exhortations induce them to embrace Christianity. Hence Conrad, duke of Masovia [in Poland], thought proper to apply coercion; and, proffering liberal rewards, in the year 1230 he invited the knights of the Teutonic order of St. Mary, who on their exclusion from Palestine had taken up their residence at Venice, to undertake the subjugation of the Prussians and their conversion to the Christian faith. They came into the country under Herman of Balcke as their leader, and after an uninterrupted and cruel war of fifty-three years with the Prussians, they with difficulty brought them to submit to the government of the knights, and to allow the Christian religion to take the place of that of their fathers.⁸

¹ This is reckoned the sixth crusade by all authorities.—R.

² The ransom which together with the restoration of Damietta the king was obliged to pay for his liberty was 800,000 gold bezants, and not 80,000 as Collier (Eccles. History, cent. xiii. vol. i. p. 456) erroneously reckons. This sum, which was equal then to 500,000 livres of French money, would in our days amount to the value of 4,000,000 of livres, that is, to about 190,000 pounds sterling.—MacL.

³ Of the 2,800 knights of noble birth who accompanied the king from France, not more than 100 were alive when he embarked from Palestine on his return. Joinville's Histoire de S. Louis, p. 81, &c.

⁴ This is the seventh and last crusade, for though Gregory X. endeavoured, at the general council held at Lyons in 1274, to organise another crusade, his efforts failed and these disastrous expeditions were never renewed. When Constantinople was taken by the Turks in 1453, the emperor Frederick III. and pope Nicholas V. united in proclaiming a new crusade; but the attempt again proved futile, owing to the growing weakness of the papal power, and the increasing enlightenment of the people of Europe.—R.

⁵ Here should be consulted, before all others, Histoire de S. Louis IX. du Nom Roy de France, écrite par

Jean Sire de Joinville, enrichie de Nouvelles Dissertations et Observations Historiques par Charles Du Fréme, Paris, 1668, fol.; and next the biographers of St. Lewis, especially De la Chaise, Histoire de S. Louis, Paris, 1688, two vols. 8vo, and finally, all the writers of histories of France [e.g. J. Gifford, Hist. of France, vol. i. p. 452, &c. and p. 473, &c. ed. Lond. 1791, 4to.—Mur.] Add Menço's Chronicon, in Matthai's Analecta Veteris Ævi, tom. iii. p. 172, 179; Wadding's Annales Minorum, tom. iv. p. 294, &c. et passim. Vulfms, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. iii. p. 212, 392, &c. Fontenay, Hist. de l'Eglise Gallicane, tome xi. p. 337, &c. 405, 575.

⁶ Matthai, Analecta Veteris Ævi, tom. v. p. 748; Ehard's Scriptores Dominici, tom. i. p. 422, &c.; Imola on Dante, in Muratori's Antiq. Ital. Medii Ævi, tom. i. p. 1111, 1112.

⁷ For these legates pursued exclusively the interests of the popes and of the Romish clergy; and they laboured, often by harsh means, by imprisonment, and by closing up their churches, to bring the patriarchs of Jerusalem and the entire Greek clergy in the countries held by the Latins under subjection to the Romish see; and they so irritated the Greeks that they were often more friendly to the Mohammedans than to the occidental Christians, and would rather be subject to a people who could be satisfied with an annual tribute, than live under a spiritual monarch whose avarice, as well as that of his legates, was insatiable.—SchL

⁸ See Matthai, Analecta Vet. Ævi, tom. iii. p. 18,

From Prussia these knights made inroads upon the neighbouring nations, particularly upon the Lithuanians; nor did they cease from slaughtering, devastating, and plundering all before them, till this people also feigned a compelled submission, not so much to Christ as to these his furious and bloody warriors.¹

10. In Spain the Christian kings of Castile, Leon, Navarre, and Aragon, waged perpetual wars with the Saracen princes who possessed Valencia, Andalusia, Granada, and Murcia; and such was their success that the territories of the Saracens were daily reduced to narrower limits, and the boundaries of the Christian church extended. The most distinguished in these contests were, Ferdinand, king of Castile and Leon, who obtained a place among the Saints, his father Alphonsus IX. king of Leon, James I. king of Aragon, and some others.² In particular, this James of Aragon, having conquered Valencia in the year 1236, spared no pains to convert to the Christian faith his new subjects, whom he could not expel from the country without serious injury to the state. Hence he ordered the Dominicans, whom he chiefly used for this purpose, to learn the language of the Arabians; and he established schools in the island of Majorca and at Barcelona for the education of preachers of the Christian religion. When these efforts were found to produce little effect upon the obstinate people, Clement IV. the pontiff, exhorted the king to expel the Mohammedans from Spain; and the king was not opposed to the measure, but the nobles frustrated the designs of the pontiff and king.³

CHAPTER II.

ADVERSE EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

1. How great injuries the Christian cause sustained in Asia will be manifest from what has been said of the Tartars and of the unhappy issue of the crusades. If the Saracens had imbibed the same principles as the Latin Christians of this century, they would not have suffered a single Christian to live in all Asia. But though they committed various enormities, and were not a little vexatious to the Christians, yet what to the Romans seemed holy and right was by the Saracens judged unrighteous and cruel, namely, to exterminate with fire and sword those who were of a different religion and would not abandon it. On the overthrow of the kingdom of Jerusalem, many of the Latins remained still in Syria, and retiring to the rugged mountains of Libanus they gradually lost their sense of religion and humanity to such a degree, that those who remain at the present day seem nearly destitute of all knowledge of God.⁴

2. The Latin writers of those times often complain of public enemies of the Christian religion, and even of mockers of the Supreme Being. Nor are these complaints entirely vain and incredible. For men of discernment who critically inspected the religion which the Roman pontiffs and their servants and friends preached and inculcated as the only true religion taught by Christ, and which they maintained by fire and sword, might easily be led to believe that Christianity was a fabrication, invented and propagated by the priests for their own advantage; and especially was such a conclusion easy, as there were none to teach them better. Besides, the Aristotelian philosophy, which reigned in all the schools of Europe and was regarded as identical with sound reason, led not a few to discard the doctrines commonly held and preached respecting divine providence, the immortality of the soul, the creation of the world, and other points, and thus to become promoters of irreligion.⁵

tom. v. 684—689; Peter of Duisburg's Chronicon Prussiae, published by Hartknoch, Jena, 1679, 4to; Hartknoch's History of the Prussian Church, written in German, book i. c. 1, p. 33, &c. and Antiquitates Prussiae, diss. xlv. p. 201, &c.; Baluze, Miscellanea, tom. vii. p. 427, 478, &c.; Wadding's Annales Minorum, tom. iv. p. 40, 63, &c.; Solignac's Hist. de Pologne, tome ii. p. 238, &c.

¹ Besides those just mentioned, see Ludewig's Reliquie Manuscriptorum Omnis Aevi, tom. i. p. 336, &c.

² See De Ferreras, History of Spain, the whole of vol. iv.

³ See Geddes, History of the Expulsion of the Moriscos, in his Miscellaneous Tracts, vol. i. p. 36, &c.

⁴ Certain tribes of the Derusi or Drusi residing on the Libanus and Antilibanus, pretend that they are descended from the Franks, and that they were once sovereigns of Palestine. These pretensions are somewhat questionable; yet it is certain that the descendants of the crusaders still exist in those regions, but so debased that they more resemble pagans than Christians. [A Jesuit missionary in Syria during the last century, describing the country and its inhabitants (in the Lettres Edifiantes et Curieuses, tome i. p. 451, &c. ed. Lyons, 1819), says, it is the tradition of the country that the Druses are descended from the rear-guard of the Franks, commanded by one Dreux, who were cut off in the retreat of the crusaders from the Holy Land, and compelled to take refuge in the fastnesses of Mount Lebanon. But according to later travellers the Druses seem to be a sect of Mohammedan rather than Christian origin. See Jowett's Christian Researches in Syria, p. 36. If any descendants of the crusaders still exist about Mount Libanus, it is much more reasonable to look for them among some of the sects of Roman Catholics there, as the Maronites, the Greeks, or the Syrians, than to suppose they have wholly lost their Christian principles and Roman Catholic character, and are now ranked among Mohammedans and pagans.—Mur.]

⁵ Not to mention St. Thomas's Summa contra Gentiles and others, the reader may consult Moneta's Summa

3. At the head of all the enemies of Christianity stood the emperor Frederick II. if credit is to be given to the sovereign pontiff Gregory IX. who in the year 1239 charged him before all the kings and princes of Europe with saying, that the whole world had been deceived by three barators (that is, impostors), Jesus Christ, Moses, and Mohammed.¹ This heavy charge the emperor deemed it necessary to refute by a public profession of his religious faith. It rested on the testimony of some German princes and particularly of Henry Raspo, landgrave of Thuringia, who deposed that they had heard Frederick utter such language.² Perhaps something like this did fall from the lips of Frederick when in a violent passion; for he was not unfrequently imprudent, and there were among the many learned men who attended him, some from the Aristotelian school who might have suggested to him such impious thoughts. Hence a fabulous story was handed down to posterity respecting a detestable book On the Three Impostors, which was said to have been written either by the emperor himself or by Peter de Vineis, a native of Capua and a man of great credit and influence, who was the emperor's prime minister.³ contra Catharos et Valdenses, who strenuously combats the enemies of religion in his times. In lib. v. cap. iv. p. 416, &c. he disputes at large against those who affirmed that the souls of men perish with their bodies. In lib. v. cap. xi. p. 477, he refutes the Aristotelian philosophers who taught that the world had existed from eternity and would continue to exist eternally. In lib. v. cap. xv. p. 551, he assails those who contemning the authority of the sacred volume subverted human liberty, and maintained the fatal necessity of all things, even of crimes. Add Tempier, the bishop of Paris, Indiculum Errorum, qui a Nonnullis Magistris Lutetie publice proutinque docebantur, written A.D. 1277, and extant in the Biblioth. Patr. Maximi, tom. xxv. p. 233, &c. See also Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. iii. p. 433; and Du Bois, Hist. Eccles. Paris, tom. ii. p. 501. These teachers, it may surprise us to learn, taught that all men have but one understanding, that all things are controlled by necessity, that there is no providence of God, that the world existed eternally, that the soul becomes extinct, and other similar doctrines which they supported by the principles of Aristotle. And to screen their lives and their safety they defended themselves against their oppressors in the very same manner as the Aristotelians of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries did, namely, by distinguishing between theological truth and philosophical. They said (as we are distinctly told by Stephen)—These things are true according to philosophy, but not so according to the Catholic faith.

¹ See Matth. Paris, Historia Major, p. 408, 459, Peter De Vineis, Epistolæ, lib. i. [Ep. xxxi. See also Raynald ad ann. 1239, where we find the epistle of Gregory IX. addressed to the Christian kings and princes, in which he says: "Probationes in fidelitatem sunt parate, quod iste rex pestilentius (namely Frederick), a tribus baratoribus, ut ejus verba utamur, scilicet Christo Jesu, Moysæ, et Mahometo totum mundum fuisse deceptum, et duobus eorum in gloria mortuis, ipsum Jesum in ligno suspensum manifeste proposuerit." The emperor's defence in answer to the Pope is in Harzheim's Concilia German. tom. iii. p. 562, &c. —Schl. [It should be remembered that Frederick had a long and violent quarrel with the Pope, and was at length excommunicated by them. This letter of Gregory was written after the emperor's excommunication and in justification of it. It is couched in very angry terms, and is a laboured attempt to blacken his character to the utmost; and this charge of blasphemy is only one among the many accusations heaped together by the enraged pontiff. —Mur.

² Gligas, Floris Temporum, p. 126; Ayrmann, Sylloge Anecdotorum, tom. i. p. 639, &c. [See also Harzenberg's Disert. de Secta non Timetum Deum Seculo xiii. vel nata vel efficta, &c. Brunswick, 1754, 8vo, p.

62, &c. In general the testimony of Raspo is that of an enemy, and of an enemy who was devoted soul and body to the Pope. Such testimony is little regarded in a court. Excommunication had now become a little too common; and the Pope must find out something new, something which had never before been heard of. He therefore represented the emperor, who had made himself suspected by his intimacy with Averroes and by his rejection of the prevailing superstition, as being a blasphemer and an atheist; and this in order to alienate from him those with whom the word excommunication had lost somewhat of its efficacy. —Schl.

³ See Oudin, Comment. de Scriptor. Eccles. tom. iii. p. 66; De Sallengre, Mémoires de Hist. et de Littér. tome i. par. l. p. 386, &c. [The book entitled De Tribus Impostoribus, sive Tractatus de Vanitate Religionum, is really a book which had no existence at the time that the most noise was made about it, and was spoken of by multitudes before it had been seen by any one person. Its supposed existence was probably owing to an impious saying of Simeon of Tournay, doctor of divinity in the university of Paris in the thirteenth century, which amounts to this: "That the Jews were seduced out of their senses by Moses, the Christians by Jesus, and the Gentiles by Mahomet." This or some expressions of a similar kind were imputed to the emperor Frederick and other persons, and that perhaps without any real foundation; and the imaginary book to which they have given rise has been attributed by different authors to Frederick, to his chancellor Peter de Vineis, to Alphonso king of Castile, to Boccacio, Poggio, the Aretius, Pomponace, Machiavelli, Erasmus, Ochino, Servetus, Rabelais, Giordano Bruno, Campanella, and many others. In a word, the book was long spoken of before any such work existed; but the rumour which was spread abroad encouraged some profligate traders in licentiousness to compose or rather compile a bundle of miserable rhapsodies under the famous title of The Three Impostors, in order to impose upon such as are fond of these pretended rarities. Accordingly, the Spaccio della Bestia Triomphante of Giordano Bruno and a wretched piece of impiety, called the Spirit of Spinoza, were the ground-work or materials from which these hireling compilers, by modifying some passages and adding others, drew up the book that now passes under the name of The Three Impostors, of which I have seen two copies in manuscript but no printed edition. See La Monnoye's Dissertation sur le Livre de Trois Imposteurs, published at Amsterdam in 1715, at the end of the fourth volume of the Ménagiana. See also an Answer to this Dissertation which was imprudently exposed to the public eye in 1716, from the press of Scheurleer in the Hague, and which contains a fabulous story of the origin of the book in question. Whoever is desirous of a more ample and a very curious account of this matter will find it in the late Prosper Marchand's Dictionnaire Historique, tome ii. at the article Impostoribus. —Macl.

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE STATE OF LITERATURE AND SCIENCE.

1. THE severe adversities to which the Greeks were exposed left them but little leisure or resolution for the diligent prosecution of learning. Yet a thirst for knowledge was not wholly extinguished among them, as is manifest from the writers they produced in this age. Among their historians the most distinguished were, Nice-tas Choniates,¹ George Acropolita,² Gregory Pachymeres,³ and Joel whose Chronology is still extant.⁴ From some tracts of Nicephorus Blemmida⁵ and Gregory

¹ Nicetas Choniates was a native of Chona (the ancient Colosse), in Phrygia, was educated by his older brother Michael Choniates at Constantinople, where he became distinguished as a civilian and public officer under Alexius Comnenus and Isaac Angelus. On the capture of Constantinople by the Latins, A.D. 1204, he retired with his family to Nice in Bithynia, where he was living in the year 1206. He wrote a history of the Greek empire from the death of Alexius Comnenus, A.D. 1180, to the decease of the Latin emperor Henry, A.D. 1206, published Gr. and Lat. Basil, 1557, Paris, 1647, fol. in the Corpus Hist. Byzant. He also wrote Theaurus Orthodoxæ Fidei, which is still extant in MS. and the first five books of which, in a Latin translation by Morell, were published Paris, 1580, and in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xxv.—A funeral oration on his death by his older brother, Michael Choniates, archbishop of Athens, in a Latin translation, is printed with his history and also in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xxv.—Mur.

² George Acropolita was born at Constantinople and received a learned education. He was sent to the court of Nice when young, A.D. 1228, and continued there most of his life. He rose to the highest civil offices in the gift of the emperors, and was much employed on embassies, and as a special judge or commissioner. He died A.D. 1282. His history of the Greek empire, from the invasion of the Latins in 1203 to the end of their reign at Constantinople, A.D. 1261, was published imperfect. Gr. and Lat. Leyden, 1614, 8vo, and entire with notes by Leo Allatius, Paris, 1651, fol. subjoined to his prolix essay, De Georgiis et Eorum Scriptis.—Mur.

³ Gregory Pachymeres was born at Nice A.D. 1242. After a good education he became an ecclesiastic at Constantinople, where he was in high reputation and rose to the highest offices under the patriarch. He was certainly alive in the year 1308. He wrote the history of the Greek empire from A.D. 1258 to 1308, published, Gr. and Lat. Rome, 1666, and 1669, 2 vols. fol. Also a paraphrase on Dionysius Areopagita, published with the works of Dionysius; likewise a tract on the procession of the Holy Spirit, and an epitome of Aristotle's Logic, both of which are extant.—Mur.

⁴ Of this Joel little is known except that he must have been witness of the desolations of Constantinople in the year 1204. He wrote a brief chronology of the world from the creation to A.D. 1204, published by Leo Allatius, Gr. and Lat. with the works of George Acropolita, Paris, 1651.—Mur.

⁵ Nicephorus Blemmida was a presbyter and a very austere monk of Mount Athos, who refused the patriarchate of Constantinople in the year 1255. He is said to have leaned to the side of the Latin church in their disputes with the Greeks. His two tracts, De Processione Spiritus Sancti, are extant in Latin, an-

Pachymeres, it appears that the Peripatetic philosophy still had its friends among them. Yet others preferred Plato, while the majority assiduously studied the younger Platonists, and supposed their system would advantageously coalesce with that of Aristotle. The writers of sermons and lives of the saints, the combatants against the Latins, and the expounders of their canon law, need not be enumerated. Among the Syrian Christians the most distinguished writer was, Gregory Abulpharajus, Maphrian [eastern primate] of the Jacobites, a man of superior genius and extensive learning, and truly respectable as a theologian, a historian, and a philosopher.⁶ With him may be joined George Elmacin, the author of a History of the Saracens.⁷

nexed to the first volume of Raynald's Annales Eccles. and Gr. and Lat. in Leo Allatius' Græc. Scriptores Orthodoxi, tom. i. Besides these, an epistle, and an epitome of logic and physics, have been published, and several other small works of his are preserved in manuscript.—Mur.

⁶ Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome i. p. 37; Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vatic. tom. ii. cap. xlii. p. 244. [Gregory Abulpharajus or Abul-Faraj Ibn Hakima, was the son of a physician, who was a Christian Jew named Aaron, and by the Arabs, Ibn Koph. He was born A.D. 1226, at Malatia in Armenia near the sources of the Euphrates, and became celebrated as a physician and a learned man. When the Moguls overran his country, A.D. 1243, he fled to Antioch with his parents, became a monk, and successively bishop of Guba, Lachena, Aleppo, and A.D. 1264, Jacobite Maphrian, or Primate of the East, till his death in 1289. The first work of his which was published was an abridgment of universal history from the creation to the year A.D. 1284, written in Arabic and divided into ten Dynasties. The six first relate to the old patriarchs, the judges and kings of the Hebrews, and the Chaldean, the Persian, and Grecian monarchs. The seventh relates to the Romans, the eighth to the Greeks of Constantinople, the ninth to the Arabians, and the tenth to the Moguls. The last two Dynasties make full half of the work and are altogether the most important; for in Greek and Roman history he was not well informed, while in that of the Arabs and Tartars he is perhaps a good authority. The whole was published, Arab. and Lat. by Pocock, Oxford, 1663, 4to, and the most valuable parts of the ninth Dynasty, which is by far the best, Dr. Pocock published in 1650, under the title of Specimen Historiæ Arabum, &c. This Arabic work is an abridgment of a much larger work in Syriac which was published, Syriac and Latin, under the title of Bar Hebræi Chronicon Syriacum, Lips. 1789, 2 tom. 4to. He also wrote many theological and other works, from which Asseman has given us extracts. See Schroeckh's Kirchengeschichte, vol. xxiv. p. 468, &c.—Mur.

⁷ George Elmacin was descended from a respectable family of Syrian Christians which had resided for five generations in Egypt, where they had held the offices of notary and privy councillor. His father, Abuljassir, was a notary or clerk to the council of war for forty-five years, and died A.D. 1230. Four of his grandfather's brothers were bishops. That he was a Christian there can be no doubt. Yet living among Mohammedans, and his family if not himself also holding

2. Far happier was the state of learning of every kind among the Latins. For the kings and princes of Europe, having learned by experience what advantages a nation may derive from the cultivation of learning and the useful arts, invited learned men to their territories, stimulated and encouraged a thirst for knowledge, and rewarded it with honours and emoluments. Those who acquired most glory and fame by such patronage were, the emperor Frederick II. who was himself a man of letters, as well as a distinguished patron of all sorts of learning, and Alphonso X. the king of Castile and Leon. The former founded the academy of Naples, caused the books of Aristotle to be translated into Latin, assembled all the learned men he could in his court, and gave many other proofs of his very great attachment to learning.¹ Alphonso perpetuated his fame by composing the Astronomic Tables and some other works.² Accordingly in this century schools of the higher order were erected almost everywhere; various privileges and immunities were conferred on the youth who resorted to them; and to the learned societies, which started up everywhere, the form of bodies politic was granted, and they were privileged with a jurisdiction peculiar to themselves.

3. But in those public schools or academies which were founded at Padua, Modena, Naples, Capua, Toulouse, Salamanca, Lyons, Cologne, and in other places, the whole circle of the sciences then known was not taught, but only certain parts of it or some particular sciences. That at Paris which excelled all others in several respects, as well as in the number both of teachers and students, was the first to embrace all the arts and sciences; and therefore first became a university, or as it was then expressed, studium universale. Afterwards some others were gradually formed upon the same plan. In this mother, therefore, of all the European universities, the doctors were first distributed into four colleges, according to the sciences of which they were professors; and these colleges afterwards received the name of faculties. Over each college, one of the doctors designated by the suffrages of the rest presided for a given time, and was called the Dean.³ The head of the whole university at first was the chancellor, namely the bishop of Paris; but as he seemed not adequate to all the duties, a rector was afterwards associated with him.⁴ The college of theology was principally founded and endowed in the year 1250 by Robert de Sorbonne, an opulent and pious man and a favourite of Lewis IX. or St. Lewis; and from him it derived the name of (Sorbonna) the Sorbonne, which it has retained to the present time.⁵

4. Those who wished to be enrolled among the teachers in any faculty, before they could obtain their object had to go through a long and very difficult process, called the [academic] course, and to undergo various examinations during many years. The design of these regulations was, to prevent the excessive multiplication of teachers, and to exclude persons deficient in knowledge and experience from entering upon duties which required the most solid acquisitions. Those who satisfactorily performed all that was required by the rules, were formally admitted to the rank of professors, and with certain public ceremonies similar to those used in the associations of the unlearned artists and mechanics, were hailed as Masters. This custom first introduced in the preceding century by the Jurists of Bologna, was in the present century at Paris first extended to the Theologians, and afterwards to the professors of physic and of the liberal arts. And this was the origin of what are called academical degrees, which like all human institutions have deviated far from their original design, and are continually varying more and more.⁶

offices under the government, he is careful to avoid all terms of reproach when speaking of Mohammed, his religion, and his followers. His history of the Saracens is in the form of Annals, and extends from the death of Mohammed to A.D. 1118. The countries he embraces are, Arabia, Syria, Egypt, and Persia. The work was published with the Latin translation of Erpenius, Arabic and Latin, by Golius, Lugd. 1625, fol. Elmacin prefixed to it a chronology from the creation to the time the history begins, but which has never been published. See Bayle, Dictionnaire, article Elmacin.—Mur.

¹ Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iii. p. 115; Giannone's Histoire de Naples [livr. xvi. chap. iii.] tome ii. p. 497. See also the observations of Fabricius, Biblioth. Latin. Medii Ævi, tom. ii. p. 618.

² Antonius, Biblioth. Vetus Hispanica, lib. viii. c. v. p. 217, and De Ferreras, Hist. d'Espagne, tome iv. p. 347. &c.

³ This took place about A.D. 1260. See Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. iii. p. 557, 564.

⁴ On this whole subject in addition to Conringius, De Antiquitatibus Academicis, which is an incomplete work, see De Boulay, [better known by his Latin name Buleus], Historia Academiae Parisiensis, a copious and excellent work in six volumes; and Hemeraus, De Academia Parisiensi qualis primo fuit in Invula et Episcoporum Scholia, Paris, 1637, 4to. The writers quoted by Conringius are not here enumerated.

⁵ See Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. iii. p. 223; Du Fresnoy, notes to Joinville's Life of St. Lewis, p. 36, &c. [The Revolution put an end to this famous theological faculty, and the buildings of the Sorbonne are now occupied by the university of Paris.—R.]

⁶ Besides the writers already referred to, see Iterus, De Gradibus Academicis, and Böhmer, Præf. ad Jus Canonicum, p. 14; Wood, Antiq. Oxon. tom. i. p. 24; Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. ii. p. 256, 682, 634, &c.

5. The belles lettres did not derive from these institutions and efforts so much advantage as the other branches of learning did. For most of the young men devoted themselves to either canon or civil law, which opened the way to preferment and wealth; or they attended only to philosophy, which promised them fame as men of acuteness and genius. The pontiffs therefore and the other bishops complained bitterly of the neglect of literature and polite learning, and endeavoured though in vain to divert the youth from the study of law and philosophy, to that of sacred literature and the liberal arts.¹ Still there are some among the writers of this age whom no man of candour can regard with contempt. Among the poets, William the Briton,² Walter Mapes,³ Matthew of Vendome,⁴ Alain de l'Isle, Gunther Ligurinus,⁵ James of Vitre, and some others, merit the praise of being sprightly and agreeable writers. Among the historians, Matthew Paris, distinguished for intelligence and good sense,⁶ Roderic Ximenius,⁷ Rigord,⁸ Vincent of Beauvais,⁹ Robert of St. Marino,¹⁰ Martin of Poland,¹¹ Gervais of Tilbury,¹² Conrad of Lichtenau,¹³ William of

¹ Matthew Paris was an English Benedictine monk, initiated at St. Albans A.D. 1217. He was a very exemplary man, in high favour with Henry II. and employed by the pope to reform some foreign monasteries. He is accounted the best historian of the middle ages, learned, independent, honest, and judicious. His great work is his Historia Major, or History of England from the arrival of William the Conqueror in 1066 to the 43rd year of Henry III. or A.D. 1259, which was the year of his death. His Historia Minor is an epitome of the preceding. He also composed the lives of the two Offas, kings of Mercia, the lives of the twenty-three abbots of St. Albans up to his time, likewise Additions to his Historia Major, and a chronicle from the creation to William the Conqueror. His works were best published by Wm. Watts, D.D. London, 1640, 41, 2 vols. fol.—Mur.

² Roderic Ximenes or Simonis was a Spaniard of Navarre, educated at Paris, and archbishop of Toledo from A.D. 1208 till his death, A.D. 1247. He wrote the history of Spain from the arrival of Hercules there to the year A.D. 1243, which he called the Historia Gothica. As ampications of this he wrote a history of the Ostrogoths from A.D. 453 to 555; a history of the Huns and Vandals from their origin to A.D. 555; a history of the Arabians from A.D. 570 to A.D. 1150; and a Roman history from king Janus to the emperor Augustus. The whole was published by Andreas Schott, Hispania Illustrata, tom. ii. p. 26, &c. Francf. 1603.—Mur.

³ Hist. de l'Acad. des Inscrip. et des Belles Lettres, tome xvi. p. 243, &c. where also William of Nangis is treated of. [Rigord was probably born in the south of France, of Gothic extract, a physician, historian, and a clerk of St. Denis. He wrote the life of Philip Augustus, king of France, in prose, which William Brito follows in his poetic history. It is in Du Chesne's Scriptores Hist. Francice, tom. v. p. 1, &c.—Mur.

⁴ Vincent of Beauvais was sub-prior of a Dominican cloister at Beauvais, and tutor to the sons of St. Lewis. He probably died about A.D. 1264. By direction of the king he wrote a huge work of vast reading and little judgment, a kind of encyclopedia, entitled Speculum Naturale, Doctrinale, et Historiale. The first part treats of natural history, geography, and chronology; the second of theology, philosophy, and all the other sciences; the third is a general history of the world. A fourth part, probably by a later author, entitled Speculum Morale, treats of practical religion. The whole was printed at Douay, 1624, in 4 vols. fol. See Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. vol. xxiv. p. 415, &c.—Mur.

⁵ See Le Beau, Mémoires pour l'Hist. d'Auvergne, tome ii. p. 490, where he also treats learnedly of Vincent of Beauvais, p. 494.

⁶ Martin Polanus, or of Poland, was a native of Troppau, in Silesia, then a part of Poland, and a Dominican monk there till he went to Rome, and was there made chief penitentiary under the pope for many years. At last he was appointed archbishop of Gnesen, in Poland, and of course primate of that kingdom, but died on his way thither, A.D. 1278. He wrote a chronicle of the pontiffs and emperors from the Christian era to A.D. 1287, which was continued by another hand to A.D. 1285, often published but of little value. He also wrote an index to the Decretum of Gratian and the Decretals, and several sermons. See Schroeckh, ubi supra, p. 521.—Mur.

⁷ Gervais of Tilbury was nephew to Henry II. king of England, and born at Tilbury in Essex. He flourished A.D. 1210. Henry II. made him marshal of Arles in France, and Otto IV. emperor of Germany, made much of him. To amuse the emperor he wrote his Otia Imperialia, published by Leibnitz in his Scriptores Rerum Brunnic. tom. i. Several others of his historical works still exist in manuscript.—Mur.

⁸ Conrad of Lichtenau or Conrad Urspergensis, served first in the court of the emperor Henry VI. but became a priest A.D. 1202, a Præmonstratensian monk in 1205, and abbot of a monastery at Ursperg or Aversberg in Swabia, A.D. 1215. He resided some time at Rome in early life, and died A.D. 1240. His Chronicle

¹ See Bulæus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iii. p. 265, where is an energetic epistle of Innocent III. Also Wood's Antiq. Oxon. tom. i. p. 124; Imola on Dante, in Muratori's Antiquit. Ital. Medii ævi, tom. i. p. 1262.

² See Hist. de l'Acad. des Inscriptions et des Belles Lettres, tome xvi. p. 255, &c. [William Brito or the Briton, because born in Bretagne, and hence also called Armoricus. He composed two histories of the French king Philip Augustus, in whose court he lived, the one in prose, the other in verse. The first terminates A.D. 1219; the latter extends farther, and is entitled Philippis. In both he copies from Rigord. Both are extant in Du Chesne's Scriptores Hist. Francice, tom. v. p. 63 and 93, &c.—Schl.

³ Wolfius, Lectiones Memorabil. tom. i. p. 430. [Walter Mapes was an English ecclesiastic, chaplain to king Henry II. and afterwards archdeacon of Oxford. He flourished about A.D. 1210; and having spent some time at Rome he was well acquainted with the corruptions of that court, as well as of the clergy at large. His short and satirical poems lash the vices of the times, and particularly of the clergy. Wolfius, ubi supra, has published six of his pieces, viz. Apocalypsis Gollie Pontificis, Ad Impios Prælatos, Ad Malos Pastores, Ad Christi Sacerdotes, Sermo ad Eosdem Prælatos Impios, and De Malis Romana Curie.—Mur. [For a list of the works of this facetious and satirical rhymist, see Balg, De Illust. Brit. Script. and Tanner's Bibliotheca, &c. The pieces bearing the name of Gollas are usually ascribed to Walter; but Wharton (Hist. of Poetry, vol. iii. p. 185) and others are of opinion that there was such a writer as Gollas. Walter's poems are in Latin rhyming verse, of which he was a very successful cultivator. The reader will see some specimens of his style in Croke's Essay on Latin Rhyming Verse, Oxf. 1828, p. 95 and 100.—R.

⁴ Matthew of Vendome (Vindocinensis) is placed by some at the beginning of the century, by others in the middle, and by others near its end. He wrote in elegiac verse the History of Tobias, father and son, which he entitled Tobiale; published, Lyons, 1505, and Bremen, 1642.—Mur.

⁵ Gunther was a schoolmaster at Paris, and then a Cistercian monk in the diocese of Basle, and flourished about A.D. 1210. His poetic history of the capture of Constantinople by the Latins was published by Canisius, Lectiones Antiquæ, tom. v.; and his celebrated poetic Life of Frederick Barbarossa has been often published separately, and also in Justin Reuber's Scriptores Germanici, p. 407—734.—Mur.

Nangis,¹ and some others, deserve to be mentioned. Those who composed lives of the saints detail rather the superstitions and misfortunes of the times than the achievements of the eminently pious. Among these writers, James of Vitre [de Vitriaco] stands prominent, who was likewise author of a History of the Lombards, full of insipid stories.²

6. To Greek literature some attention was paid by Roger Bacon, a man of extraordinary genius, by John Balbus,³ Robert Capito, and a limited number of others. The Hebrew language and theology had still fewer cultivators. Yet we learn that Raymund Martini, the intelligent author of the Pugio Fidei, Bacon, Capito, and a few others, were no inconsiderable proficient in such learning. The Arabic language and literature were studied by many of the Spaniards, but especially by the Dominican monks, to whom the Christian kings of Spain committed the instruction of the Jews and Arabians resident in Spain.⁴ The Latin grammarians, even the best of them, are all jejune and barbarous. This is manifest from the one who had the highest reputation, and whose work was taught in all the schools from this century on to the sixteenth, Alexander de Villa Dei, a Franciscan monk. His Doctrinale, composed in the year 1240 in what are called Leonine verses, involves the rules of grammar in more nonsense and darkness than can well be supposed by one not acquainted with the book.

7. The Latins who had before followed various philosophers, gradually submitted themselves in this century exclusively to the authority and the principles of Aristotle. Certain books of Aristotle, especially his Metaphysics, were read in Latin and publicly explained to the students at Paris, near the commencement of this century.⁵ But as it appeared that from these books Almeric had derived his errors respecting God and some other subjects, the council of Sens in the year 1209 publicly decreed that these books should be disused.⁶ Yet a few years afterwards, A.D. 1215, the logic of Aristotle was again introduced into the university of Paris, while his physical and metaphysical books were still excluded.⁷ Subsequently the emperor Frederick II. who was a great friend to learning, ordered the books of Aristotle and of other ancient philosophers to be translated, some from Arabic and others from Greek into Latin, by selected persons (as he expresses it⁸) well skilled in each language. And as this translation was recommended by the emperor himself to the university of Bologna, and doubtless to others also, the influence of Aristotle was increased immensely in all the schools of Europe. And this influence was much extended by the many subsequent Latin from Belus, king of Assyria, to A.D. 1229, is useless for ancient history, but valuable for the times within his personal knowledge. He was no flatterer of the popes. The work was published at Strasburg, 1548 and 1609, fol. with those of Regino and Lambert of Aachenburg.—Mur.

¹ William of Nangis, a Benedictine monk of St. Denis, Paris, flourished A.D. 1301, and wrote a Chronicle from the creation to A.D. 1301; also the life of Lewis IX. and that of Philip III. kings of France. The Chronicle was published by D'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. xi. p. 405, and the two biographies by Du Chesne, Scriptores Hist. Franc. tom. v.—Mur.

² See Scheelhorn, Amanitates Liter. tom. xi. p. 324, &c. [It was not James de Vitriaco but James de Voragine, who composed the Historia Lombardica, as is correctly stated in chap. ii. sec. 45. James de Voragine was born in Liguria in Italy, became a Dominican monk, provincial of his order for Lombardy, general of the order, archbishop of Genoa. He flourished A.D. 1290, is said to have favoured the emperor against the pontiffs, and died about A.D. 1298. He was a pious and charitable man, but credulous and a great collector of fables. His History of the Lombards is a mere collection of legends of the saints, often published in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, but always disliked by intelligent Catholics. He also wrote a Chronicle of Genoa, published by Muratori, Scriptores Herum Ital. tom. ix. and many sermons which have been printed. See Cave's Hist. Liter. ad ann. 1290.—Mur. He was called De Voragine or Varagine from his birth-place, Varraggio, a sea-port town near Genoa. So popular was his worthless History that it was called the Legenda Aurea, and above fifty different editions of it appeared prior to the year 1600. It was early translated into English, and one of the greatest rarities of Caxton's press (Lond. 1483, fol.) is this Golden Legend. For further particulars respecting this James of Varraggio, see Echart and Quetif, Biblioth. Ordini. Prædic. vol. i. p. 451; and Tournon, Hist. de l'Ordre de S. Dominic, vol. i. p. 583, &c.—R.

³ This John, who is sometimes called John de Balbus or De Janua, that is, Genoa, cannot well be placed in this list. For he says of himself, near the beginning of the famous Catholicon [a general Latin dictionary] which he composed: "Hoc difficile est scire, et maxime mihi, non bene scienti linguam Grecam." And that this is not to be attributed to his excessive modesty appears from the contents of the book.—Schl.

⁴ See Simon's Lettres Choiesies, tome iii. p. 112;

Antonius, Biblioth. Vet. Hispanica, passim; and the Historians of Spain.

⁵ Patricius, Discussiones Peripateticæ, tom. i. lib. xi. p. 145; Launoi, De Variæ Aristotelis Fortuna in Acad. Paris. cap. i. p. 127, ed. Elswich. It is commonly said that those books of Aristotle were translated into Latin from the Arabic. But Rigord (De Gestis Philippî Regis Francor. ad ann. 1209, in Du Chesne's Scriptores Hist. Franc. p. 119) expressly says: They were brought from Constantinople, and translated out of Greek into Latin. [See note 1, p. 400, above.—R.

⁶ Launoi, ubi supra, cap. iv. p. 195, and his Syllabus Rationum quibus Durandi Causa Defenditur, Opp. tom. i. par. i. p. 8, &c.

⁷ Natalis Alexander, Selecta Hist. Eccles. Capita, tom. viii. cap. iii. sec. 7, p. 76.

⁸ Peter de Vinsels, Epistolæ, lib. iii. Ep. lxxvii. p. 503, &c. This epistle is directed Ad Magistros et Scholares Bononienses. But it is probable the emperor sent similar epistles to the other schools in Europe. It is commonly said that Frederick caused Latin translations to be made of all the works of Aristotle which are extant, and that this was in the year 1220. But neither position can be proved from this epistle, nor as I suppose from any other testimonies.

translators of some of the works of Aristotle, such as Michael Scot, Philip of Tripoli, William Fleming, and others, though all of them were deficient in knowledge and in acquaintance with the languages.¹

8. Aristotle reached the summit of esteem and reputation when the mendicant orders, the Dominicans and Franciscans, embraced his philosophy, taught it universally in the schools, and illustrated it by their writings. For these monks from this time onward stood foremost in learning both sacred and profane in Europe, and were followed by nearly all who would rise above the vulgar in knowledge. The first persons who published expositions of Aristotle were Alexander Hales, an Englishman and a Franciscan doctor at Paris, who acquired the title of the Irrefragable Doctor;² and Albert the Great, a German Dominican and bishop of Ratisbon, a man of superior genius and the guide of the age in which he lived.³ After these a pupil of Albert,⁴ Thomas Aquinas, a Dominican, who was the great luminary of the schools and was called the Angelic Doctor, exalted the glory of Aristotle more than all others. For he expounded his books both orally and in writing, and also caused a new Latin translation of his works to be made by one of his associates, more correct and more perspicuous than the former.⁵ Through the influence of these men therefore and a few others, notwithstanding the opposition of many divines and the disapprobation of the pontiffs, Aristotle became the dictator in philosophy among the Latins.

9. There were however some persons in Europe of superior genius and penetration, who, while they valued Aristotle highly, wished to extend the boundaries of human knowledge, and were disgusted with the meagre and jejune method of philosophising derived from the books of Aristotle.⁶ Among them the following obtained very deservedly the highest reputation, namely, Roger Bacon, an Englishman and Franciscan monk called the Admirable Doctor; an extraordinary man, skilled far beyond the standard of his age in philosophy, mathematics, chemistry, the mechanic arts, and in various languages, and also much renowned for his important discoveries;⁷ Arnold of Villa Nova, a Frenchman as many believe, though some make him a Spaniard, greatly distinguished for his knowledge of the medical art, philosophy, chemistry, poetry, languages, and of many other things;⁸ and Peter de Abano or de Apono, an Italian and a physician of Padua, surnamed the Reconciler on account of the book he wrote entitled, the Reconciler of the Differences among Philosophers and Physicians; a man of acuteness and profoundly read in philosophy, astronomy, the

⁶ Roger Bacon, quoted by Jebb in the preface to Bacon's larger work, says: "Never were there so great an appearance of wisdom and so great ardour in study, in so many faculties and so many countries, as during the last forty years; for doctors are scattered everywhere—in every city, in every castle, in every borough, students, principally under the two orders (i.e. the Dominicans and the Franciscans who were almost the only people that pursued literature), which was never the case till within about forty years; and yet never were there so great ignorance and so great misapprehension. The mass of students doze and yawn like asses over the bad translations (he alludes to the books of Aristotle, the translations of which he would censure as being ridiculous and exceedingly faulty), and waste altogether the time, labour, and expense, they lay out upon them. Appearances are all which engross their attention; and they care not what it is they know, but only to appear very learned before the senseless multitude."

⁷ That such was his character strikingly appears from his Great Work (Opus Majus) as it is called addressed to the Roman pontiff, Clement IV. and published by Stephen Jebb, M.D. from a Dublin manuscript with a learned preface and notes, London, 1733, fol.; a work well worth perusing. The other works of Bacon which were numerous still remain for the most part in manuscript. See concerning him Wood's Antiq. Oxon. tom. i. p. 136, &c.; Wadding's Annales Minorum, tom. iv. p. 264, &c. tom. v. p. 51; Gale, Ad Jamblichum de Mysteriis Egyptiorum, p. 235; Nouveau Diction. Histor. et Crit. tome i. art. Bacon, p. 3, &c. [Rees' Cyclopædia, art. Roger Bacon.—Mur.]

⁸ See Antonius, Biblioth. Vetus Hispanica, tom. II. lib. x. cap. i. p. 74; Joseph, Vie d'Arnaud de Villeneuve, Aix, 1719, 12mo; Nicéron, Mémoires des Hommes Illustres, tome xxxiv. p. 82; Eymeric, Directorium Inquisitorium, p. 282, where there is an account of his errors. [Arnold or Arnaud de Villeneuve was born about the middle of this century, studied at Paris and Montpellier, visited the schools in Italy and in Spain, where he studied physic under Arabian masters and learned their language. His reputation was very high as a physician and a scholar. At Paris he uttered so freely his opinions of the monks and the mass as to bring himself into danger, and he retired to the court of Frederick of Aragon. He died about a.d. 1312. His works which were numerous were collected and published at Lyons, 1520, fol. and at Basle, 1585. See Rees' Cyclopædia, art. Arnaud.—Mur.]

¹ Concerning these translators of Aristotle, see Wood's Antiq. Oxon. tom. i. p. 119; and Jebb's Pref. ad Opus Majus Rogeri Baconi, Lond. 1733, fol. I will subjoin the opinion of Bacon, a very competent judge, concerning these translations of Aristotle, as taken by Jebb from a manuscript, If I had control over these books of Aristotle (the Latin translations), I would cause them all to be burned; for it is a loss of time to study in them, and a cause of error and a furtherance of ignorance beyond what can well be expressed.

² See Wadding's Annales Minorum, tom. iii. p. 233, &c.; Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iii. p. 200, 673, &c.

³ Fabricius, Bib. Lat. Medii ævi, tom. i. p. 113, &c.

⁴ This is according to the opinion of the Dominicans which appears most probable. See Anton. Tournon, Vie de S. Thomas, p. 90. But the Franciscans eagerly maintained that Thomas was a pupil of Alexander Hales. See Wadding's Annales Minorum, tom. iii. p. 133, &c.

⁵ Most persons suppose that the author of this new Latin version of the works of Aristotle, which Thomas Aquinas caused to be made, was William de Moerbeka, a Dominican of Flanders, well acquainted with both Latin and Greek and archbishop of Corinth. See Ehard's Scriptores Dominicani, tom. i. p. 338, &c.; Oudin, Comment. de Scriptor. Eccles. tom. iii. p. 468; Foppens, Biblioth. Belgica, tom. i. p. 416. But others, though supported by fewer authorities, attribute the work to Henry Kossein who was also a Dominican. See Ehard's Scriptores Dominic. tom. i. p. 469, &c.

medical art, and mathematics.¹ But all those received this as the reward of their talents and industry, that they were ranked by the ignorant multitude among magicians and heretics, and hardly escaped being burned at the stake. Bacon was confined many years in a prison; and both the others after their death were, by the Inquisition, judged worthy of the flames.

10. In what manner theology was taught will be stated in a subsequent chapter. The science of law, now divided into sacred or canon law and civil, was prosecuted by vast numbers; but each was disfigured and obscured rather than elucidated by numerous silly expositions. Several persons undertook to collect what are called the decretal epistles of the pontiffs, which constitute no small part of the canon law.² The most distinguished in this labour was Raymund of Pennafort, a Catalonian and general of the Dominican order. He compiled his work under the direction of Gregory IX. and divided it into five books. Gregory directed this to be annexed to the Decretum of Gratian, and to be expounded in all the schools.³ Near the end of the century Boniface VIII. caused a new collection to be made, which being subjoined to the five previous books is called the sixth book of the Decretals.⁴

¹ Of him no one has written with more industry than Mazzuchelli, Notizie Storiche e Critiche intorno alla Vita di Pietro d'Abano, in Calogera's Opuscoli Scientifici e Filologici, tom. xxiii. p. 1—54. [He was born at Apono or Abano, a village near Padua, about the year 1250, studied Greek at Constantinople and medicine and mathematics at Paris, and taught medicine at Padua. He was prosecuted by the Inquisition as being a magician at the time of his death, A.D. 1315. His book entitled Conciliator, &c. discusses more than 200 questions and problems, chiefly medical, but others philosophical, astrological, &c. It was first published, Venice, 1471, fol. and frequently afterwards. Bayle's Dictionnaire, art. Apono, and Schroeckh's Kirchen-gesch. vol. xxiv. p. 533, &c.—Mur.]

² Concerning them see Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iii. p. 98, &c.

³ Gerh. von Mastricht, Hist. Juris Eccles. soc. cccliii. p. 384; Chiffet, De Juris Utriusque Architect. cap. vi. p. 60, &c.; Echard and Quetif's Scriptores Dominicani, tom. i. p. 106, &c.; Acta Sanctor. Antwerp. tom. i. Januarii, ad diem vii. p. 404, &c.

⁴ The five books of the decretals are digested under a series of Tituli, and divided into books according to the order of subjects. The Liber Sextus Decretalium pursues the same arrangement, and therefore is divided into five books. Subsequently another collection was made by order of Clement V. called Clementina, which is divided also into five books. Several smaller collections afterwards made, first by John XXII. and then by various pontiffs, are not so digested, but are thrown together promiscuously and are therefore called Etragantes. The Decretum of Gratian, the five books of Decretals by Gregory, and the others mentioned in this note, constitute the Corpus Juris Canonici. The voluminous expositors of the Canon Law do not comment upon all the books now enumerated in their order, but they follow the five books of the Decretals regularly through, and introduce what occurs in Gratian, the Liber Sextus, &c. at the proper places; thus their commentaries are always divided into five parts and are generally in five vols. fol.—Mur.

CHAPTER II.

HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS AND GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH.

1. BOTH the Greek and Latin writers censure and condemn without reserve the iniquities and vices of their bishops and religious teachers; nor will any one acquainted with the events of this period pronounce their complaints excessive.⁵ Some men of high rank attempted to heal this malady which from the head diffused itself throughout the body; but their power was inadequate to so arduous a task. The Greek emperors were impeded by the calamities of the times, and the Latins, on account of the power of the Roman pontiffs and the superstition of the age, could effect nothing of importance.

2. A vivid picture of this is presented to us by the history of the Latin pontiffs. For all who had any share in the government of the church were like sovereign lords, at least in their feelings and disposition. They stoutly maintained with violence and menaces, with both wiles and weapons, those fundamental principles of the papal canon law, that the Roman pontiff is the sovereign lord of the whole world, and that all other rulers in church and state have so much power and authority as he sees fit to permit them to have. Resting on this eternal principle as they conceived it to be, the pontiffs arrogated to themselves the absolute power not only of conferring sacred offices or benefices as they are called, but also of giving away empires and divesting kings and princes of their crowns and authority. The more intelligent indeed for the most part considered [genera]l councils as superior to the pontiffs; and those kings and princes who were not blinded by superstition restrained the pontiffs from intermeddling with worldly or civil affairs, required them to be contented with the regulation of things sacred while they maintained their own power to the utmost of their ability, and even claimed for themselves supremacy over the church in their respective territories.⁶ But they had to do these things cautiously, if they would not learn by experience that the pontiffs had long arms.

⁵ See the expressive letter of the pontiff Gregory IX. to the archbishop of Bourges A.D. 1227, for correcting the vices of all orders of the clergy, published by Samaritanus, Gallia Christiana, tom. ii. Appendix, p. 21, &c. See also Du Fresnoy's notes to the life of St. Lewis, p. 99, where he treats especially of the disorders of the court of Rome.

⁶ As specimens the reader may peruse the letters of Innocent III. and the emperor Otho IV. published by Gebauer, in his German History of the Emperor Richard, p. 611, 614. And the French and English kings, as well as some others, were equally active with Otho in defending their rights against the pontiffs.

3. In order to lord it more absolutely and more securely over both church and state, the pontiffs claimed in particular the right of appointing all presiding officers in the church of every rank and description, bishops, abbots, canons, &c. at their discretion. Thus they who had formerly contended with so much zeal for the free election of presiding officers in the church against the encroachments of emperors and kings, now themselves prostrated all right of free elections; and either reserved to themselves the richer benefices, or provided for the vacant churches by assigning to them their dependants and friends; and they even set aside prelates who were duly elected in order to substitute others in their places.¹ The pretence was, care for the safety of the church and fear lest heretics should creep into the fold of Christ.² Innocent III. first assumed this power, and after him Honorius III. Gregory IX. and others. But the progress of this usurpation was resisted in some measure by the bishops who had before been accustomed to confer the smaller benefices, but most of all by the kings of France and England, who issued their complaints, their edicts, and their laws on the subject.³ In particular Lewis IX. or St. Lewis, king of France, in the year 1268, before he embarked in his crusade, published the famous ordinance called by the French the Pragmatic Sanction, by which he carefully secured the rights of the Gallican church against the machinations of the pontiffs.⁴ This vigilance rendered the pontiffs more cautious and slow in their proceeding, but it did not divert them from their purpose. And Boniface VIII. declared boldly and distinctly that the whole church is under the control of the pontiffs; and that kings and patrons and religious bodies have only the powers which the vicars of Christ choose to give them.

4. The legates sent into the different provinces by the pontiffs eagerly imitated their masters; for they unhesitatingly invaded the rights of religious bodies, and conferred the lesser benefices and sometimes the larger also at their pleasure, on those whom they favoured on account of their money or for other reasons;⁵ they extorted money in various ways and often in such as were most iniquitous; they deceived the unguarded by forged [papal] briefs and by other artifices; they not unfrequently disturbed the public tranquillity and put themselves at the head of factions; they carried on a most scandalous and wicked traffic in relics and indulgences, and did other things even worse than these. And hence all the writers of those times are full of complaints of the crimes and villanies of the papal legates.⁶ Alexander IV. was accordingly compelled in the year 1256 to issue a severe edict against the fraud and avarice of legates;⁷ but men who had influence in the court of Rome and were supported by powerful friends could easily evade its force.

5. From the ninth century onward no additions of any consequence had been made to the wealth and patrimony of the church of Rome; but in this century under Innocent III. and afterwards under Nicolaus III. very large accessions of property were obtained, partly by force of arms and partly by the munificence of emperors and kings. As soon as he was consecrated, Innocent brought under subjection to himself the prefect⁸ of the city of Rome, who hitherto had sworn fealty to the emperor, and also the senator. He next recovered the marquise of Ancona, the duchy of Spoleto, the county of Assissi, Montebello, and many other cities and fortresses, which as he asserted had been rent from the patrimony of St. Peter.⁹ Frederick II. also to secure the favour of the pontiff in his contest with Otho IV. was very liberal to the Romish church, not only giving very

¹ A great many examples of such Provisions and Reservations can be collected in this century. See Baluze, Miscellanea, tom. vii. p. 443, 466, 470, 488, 491, 493, &c.; Gallia Christiana, tom. i. p. 69, Appendix; Wadding's Annales Minorum, in the Diplomata pertaining to this century, passim; Wood's Antiq. O. on. tom. i. p. 148, 201, 202 [and Hallam's View of the Middle Ages, chap. vii. par. ii. vol. ii. p. 10, 8th ed.; Gianone, Istoria Civile di Napoli, lib. xiv. cap. iii. sec. ii. and lib. xix. cap. v. sec. ii. — Mur.

² See an epistle of Innocent IV. in Baluze, Miscellanea, tom. vii. p. 465.

³ See Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. iii. p. 659, &c. and especially tom. iv. p. 911, &c.

⁴ In addition to the other writers on the ecclesiastical law of France, see Buleus, ubi supra, tom. iii. p. 399. [The ordinance called the Pragmatic Sanction may be seen in Raynald's Annales Eccles. tom. ii. App. ad ann. 1268, no. 37, p. 618. See also Gifford's History of France, vol. i. p. 477. — Mur.

⁵ Examples may be seen in Baluze, Miscellanea, tom. vii. 437, 475, 480, &c.

⁶ In place of all other writers, the single and excellent historian Matthew Paris may be consulted. Historia Major, p. 313, 316, 549, and p. 637, where he says: "The legates, whoever they may be, and all papal nuncios, are wont to impoverish all the countries they enter, or in some way to throw them into disorder." See also Buleus, Historia Acad. Paris, tom. iii. p. 659, &c.

⁷ It was published by Lamd, Dolice Eruditor. tom. iii. p. 309.

⁸ At that period one man possessed all the powers of the Roman senate, and acting in their place bore the title of the Senator. — Mur.

⁹ See Pagi, Breviarium Romanor. Pontif. tom. iii. p. 161, &c.; Muratori, Antiq. Italica, tom. i. p. 323, &c.

valuable lands to Richard, the pontiff's brother,¹ but permitting Richard count of Fondi in the year 1212 to bequeath all his property to the church of Rome.² He likewise confirmed the donation of Matilda. Afterwards Nicolaus III. would not crown Rudolph I. until he had in the year 1278 confirmed and acknowledged all the claims of the church, including many which were quite dubious; and the princes of the German Roman empire were required to do the same. Having obtained this [general] acknowledgment, Nicolaus reduced to subjection many cities, villages, and towns of Italy which had hitherto been subject to the emperors, and particularly the whole of Romandiola and Bologna. Thus it appears from a full view of the subject, that it was under these two pontiffs the Romish church attained by force, cunning, and management, to that extensive temporal dominion which it possesses at the present day.³

6. Innocent III. who governed the Latin church [from A.D. 1198] till the year 1216, was learned according to the conception of that age, and also laborious, but rough, cruel, avaricious, and arrogant.⁴ He adopted the principles of Gregory IX. and claimed absolute dominion, not only over the church but also over religion and the whole world. He therefore created kings both in Europe and Asia according to his pleasure. In Asia he gave a king to the Armenians. In Europe he conferred the honours of royalty A.D. 1204 on Primislaus the Duke of Bohemia; in the same year by his legate he placed a royal crown on Jolannicius, duke of the Bulgarians and Walachians; and in person crowned at Rome and saluted as king, Peter II. of Aragon, who had rendered his dominions tributary to the church.⁵ Many other proofs of his claiming such absolute power over all the world while Europe remained silent and amazed, may be easily gathered out of his Epistles.

7. Not content with these acts of sovereignty he compelled emperors and the greatest monarchs of Europe to fear and respect the power of the Romish church. Near the commencement of the century when Philip duke of Swabia and Otho IV. the third son of Henry the Lion, contended for the empire of Germany, he at first favoured the side of Otho and terrified Philip with his denunciations; and on the death of Philip A.D. 1209 he placed the imperial diadem upon Otho at Rome. But as Otho would not comply in all things with his wishes, he changed his mind and pronounced him unworthy of the throne; and in the year 1212 substituted in his place Frederic II. his own pupil, son of Henry VI. and king of the two Sicilies.⁶ Philip Augustus, king of France, he excommunicated for having dismissed his wife, Isemburgis, daughter of the king of Denmark, and marrying another woman; nor did he cease to harass the king with anathemas till he received back his former wife.⁷

8. But no one suffered more disgracefully and severely from the arrogance of Innocent, than John, surnamed Lackland, the king of England and [lord of] Ireland. He resolutely withstood the pontiff, who had designated Stephen Langton to be archbishop of Canterbury. The pontiff therefore first excommunicated him in the year 1208; and afterwards, in the year 1211, absolved the English and Irish from their oath of allegiance to the king; and finally, in the year 1212, divested him of his authority, and gave the kingdoms of England and Ireland to Philip Augustus, the king of France. Terrified by these decrees and dreading a war, John made his kingdoms tributary to the pontiff in the year 1212.⁸ This imprudence brought

⁶ This history is drawn out at large in the Origines Guelphicæ, tom. iii. lib. vii. p. 247, &c.

⁷ Bulaeus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iii. p. 8, &c.; Daniel's Hist. de la France, tome iii. p. 475, &c.; Du Bois, Hist. Eccles. Paris. tom. ii. p. 204, &c. p. 257 &c.

⁸ These events are stated at large by Matthew Paris, Hist. Major, p. 189, &c. 192, 193, &c. See also Bulaeus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iii. p. 67; Rapin's Hist. of Eng. vol. ii. p. 304, &c. [and Hume's Hist. of Eng. vol. i. chap. xi. also MacLaine's translation and enlargement of this section as subjoined.—Mur.] This prince opposed vigorously the measures of Innocent, who had ordered the monks of Canterbury to choose Stephen Langton, a Roman cardinal of English descent, archbishop of that see, notwithstanding the election of John de Gray to that high dignity, which had been regularly made by the convent, and had been confirmed by royal authority. The pope, after having consecrated Langton at Viterbo, wrote a scathing letter in his favour to the king, accompanied with four rings, and a mystical comment upon the precious stones with which they were enriched. But this present was not sufficient to avert the just indignation of the offended monarch, who sent a body of troops to drive out of the kingdom the monks of Canterbury, who had been engaged by the pope's menaces to receive Langton as their archbishop. The king also declared to the pontiff that if he persisted in imposing a prelate upon the see of Canterbury, in opposition to an election already made, the consequences of such presumptuous obstinacy would in the issue prove fatal to the papal authority in England. Innocent was so far from being terrified by this menacing remonstrance, that in the year 1200 he sent orders to the bishops of London, Worcester, and Ely, to lay the kingdom under an interdict, in case the monarch refused to yield and receive Langton. John, alarmed at this terrible menace and unwilling to break entirely with the pope, declared his readiness to confirm the election made at Rome; but in the act drawn up for that purpose, he wisely threw in a clause

¹ Muratori, Antiq. Italicæ, tom. v. p. 652.

² Raynald's Continuation of Baronius' Annals, ad ann. 1212, sec. ii.

³ See Raynald, ubi supra, ad ann. 1278, sec. 47, &c.

⁴ See Matth. Paris, Historia Major, p. 206, 230.

⁵ Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Medii Ævi, tom. vi. p. 116; De Ferreras, Histoire d'Espagne, tome iv. p. 8.

extreme disgrace and immense evils upon the king. Of the Lateran council under Innocent, in the year 1215, we shall have occasion to speak hereafter.

9. Honorius III. previously called Cencius Savelli, who succeeded Innocent, A.D.

to prevent any interpretation of this compliance which might be prejudicial to his rights, dignity, and prerogative. This exception was rejected, and the interdict was proclaimed. A stop was immediately put to divine service; the churches were shut; the administration of all the sacraments was suspended except that of baptism; [and the eucharist, with confession, under the last necessity]; the dead were buried in the highways without the usual rites or any funeral solemnity. But notwithstanding this interdict, the Cistercian order continued to perform divine service, and several learned and respectable divines, among whom were the bishops of Winchester and Norwich, protested against the injustice of the pope's proceedings.

The interdict not producing the effects expected from it, the pontiff proceeded to a still farther degree of severity and presumption, and denounced a sentence of excommunication against the person of the English monarch. This sentence, which was issued out in the year 1208, was followed about three years after by a bull, absolving all his subjects from their oath of allegiance, and ordering all persons to avoid him on pain of excommunication. But it was in the year 1212 that Innocent carried his impious tyranny to the most enormous length, when assembling a council of cardinals and prelates he deposed John, declared the throne of England vacant, and wrote to Philip Augustus, king of France, to execute this sentence, to undertake the conquest of England, and to unite that kingdom to his dominions for ever. He at the same time published another bull, exhorting all Christian princes to contribute whatever was in their power to the success of this expedition, promising to those who seconded Philip in this grand enterprise the same indulgences which were thus granted to those who carried arms against the infidels in Palestine. The French monarch entered into the views of the Roman pontiff, and made immense preparations for the invasion of England. The king of England on the other hand assembled his forces, and was putting himself in a posture of defence, when Pandulf, the pope's legate, arrived at Dover, and proposed a conference in order to prevent the approaching rupture and to conjure the storm. This awful legate terrified the king who met him at that place, with an exaggerated account of the armament of Philip on the one hand, and of the disaffection of the English on the other; and persuaded him that there was no possible way left of saving his dominions from the formidable arms of the French king, but of putting them under the protection of the Roman see. John, finding himself in such a perplexing situation, and full of distrust both in the nobles of his court and in the officers of his army, complied with this dishonourable proposal, did homage to Innocent, resigned his crown to the legate, and received it again as a present from the see of Rome, to which he rendered his kingdoms tributary and swore fealty as a vassal and feudatory. In the act by which he resigned thus scandalously his kingdoms to the papal jurisdiction, he declared that he had been compelled to this measure neither by fear nor by force; but that it was all his own voluntary deed, performed by the advice and with the consent of the barons of his kingdom. He obliged himself and his heirs to pay the sum of seven hundred marks for England, and three hundred for Ireland, in acknowledgment of the pope's supremacy and jurisdiction; and consented that he, or such of his successors as should refuse to pay the submission now stipulated to the see of Rome, should forfeit all their right to the British [English] crown.—Maccl. [See the Romanist view of these transactions in Lingard's Hist. of Eng. 4to, vol. iii. p. 15. They are also treated of at length by Hurter in his Geschichte des Papst Innocenz des Dritten u. sein Zeitgen. Hamb. 1834. 2 vols. 8vo, translated into French by MM. Jäger and Vial, 2 vols. 8vo. The original documents are in Rymer's Fœdera, &c. vol. x.—R.

1216, and governed the Roman church more than ten years, did not perform so many deeds worthy of being recorded; yet he was very careful that the Romish power should receive no diminution. Pursuing this course, he had a grievous dispute with the emperor Frederick II. a magnanimous prince, whom he himself had crowned at Rome in the year 1220. Frederick imitating his grandfather, laboured to establish and enlarge the authority of the emperors in Italy, to depress the minor states and republics of Lombardy, and to diminish the immense wealth and power of the pontiffs and the bishops; and to accomplish these objects he continually deferred the crusade, which he had promised with an oath. Honorius on the other hand continually urged Frederick to enter on his expedition to Palestine; and at the same time he encouraged, animated, and supported the cities and republics which resisted the emperor, and raised various impediments to his increasing power. Yet this hostility did not at present break out in open war.

10. But under Gregory IX. whose former name was Hugolinus, and who was elevated from the bishopric of Ostia to the pontificate, A.D. 1227, an old man but still bold and resolute, the fire which had been long burning in secret burst into a flame. In the year 1227 the pontiff excommunicated the emperor, who still deferred his expedition to Palestine; but without proceeding in due form of ecclesiastical law, and without regarding the emperor's excuse of ill health. In the year 1228 the emperor sailed with his fleet to Palestine; but instead of waging war, as he was bound to do, on recovering Jerusalem he made a truce with Saladin. While he was absent the pontiff raised war against him in Apulia, and endeavoured to excite all Europe to oppose him. Therefore Frederick hastened back in the year 1229, and after vanquishing his enemies made his peace with the pontiff in the year 1230. But this peace could not be durable, as Frederick would not submit to the control of the pontiff. Therefore as the emperor continued to press heavily on the republics of Lombardy, which were the pontiff's friends, and transferred Sardinia, which the pontiff claimed as part of the patrimony of the church, to his son Entius, and wished to withdraw Rome itself from the power of the pontiff, and did other things very offensive to Gregory; the pontiff in the year 1239 again laid him under anathemas, and accused him to all the sovereigns of Europe, of many crimes and enormities, and particularly of speaking contemptuously of the Christian religion. The emperor, on the other hand, avenged the injuries he received, both by written publications and by his military operations in Italy, in which he was for the most part successful; and thus he defended his reputation and brought the pontiff into perplexity and difficulty. To rescue himself in some measure, in the year 1240 Gregory summoned a general council to meet at Rome, intending to hurl the emperor from his throne by the votes of the holy fathers. But Frederick in the year 1241 captured the Genoese fleet, which was carrying the greater part of the prelates to the council at Rome, and seizing the persons and the treasures of the prelates he cast them into prison. Broken down by these calamities and by others of no less magnitude, Gregory sank into the grave a few days after.¹

11. The successor of Gregory, Geoffry of Milan who assumed the name of Celestine IV. died before his consecration; and after a long interregnum in the year 1243, Sinibald, of the Genoese family of Fiesque who were counts, succeeded under the pontifical name of Innocent IV. a man inferior to none of his predecessors in arrogance and insolence of temper.² Between him and Frederick there were at first negotiations for peace, but the terms insisted on by the pontiff were deemed too hard by the emperor. Hence Innocent, feeling himself unsafe in any part of Italy, A.D. 1244 removed from Genoa to Lyons in France; and the next year assembled a council at Lyons, in the presence of which but without its approbation (whatever the Roman writers may affirm to the contrary³) he declared Frederick unworthy of the imperial throne. This most unrighteous decision of the pontiff had such influence upon the German princes who were infected with the superstition of the times, that they elected first Henry, landgrave of Thuringia, and on his death William, count of Holland, to the imperial throne. Frederick continued the war vigorously and courageously in Italy and with various success, until a dysentery terminated his life in Apulia on the 13th of December, A.D. 1250. On the death of his foe, Innocent returned to Italy in the year 1251.⁴ From this time especially (though their origin was much earlier), the two noted factions of Guelphs and Gibellines, of which the former sided with the pontiffs and the latter with the emperors, most unhappily rent asunder and devastated all Italy.⁵

12. Alexander IV. whose name as count of Segni and bishop of Ostia was Raynald, became pontiff on the death of Innocent, A.D. 1257, and reigned six years and six months. Excepting some efforts to put down a grandson of Frederick II. called Conradin, and to quiet the perpetual commotions of Italy, he busied himself more in regulating the internal affairs of the church than in national concerns. The Mendicant Friars or the Dominicans and Franciscans, especially owed much to his benevolence.⁶ Urban IV. before his election to the pontificate in 1261 was James, patriarch of Jerusalem, a man born of obscure parentage at Troyes. He distinguished himself more by instituting the festival of the body of Christ than by any other achievement. He indeed formed many projects but he executed few of them, being prevented by death in the year 1264, after a short reign of three years.⁷ Not much longer was the reign of Clement IV. a Frenchman and bishop of Sabina, under the name of Guido Fulcodi, who was created pontiff in the year 1265. Yet he is better known on several accounts, but especially for his conferring the kingdom of Naples on Charles of Anjou, brother to Lewis IX. the king of France, who is well known to have beheaded Conradin, the only surviving grandson of Frederick II. after conquering him in battle; and this if not by the counsel, at least with the consent of the pontiff.⁸

¹ Besides the original writers who are all collected by Muratori, Scriptores Rerum Italicar. and the authors of German and Italian history, of whom however few or none are impartial, the reader should consult especially Peter de Vineis, Epistole, lib. i. and Matthew Paris, Historia Major. Add also Raynald's Annales; Muratori's Annales Italie, tom. vii. and Antiq. Italice, tom. ix. p. 325, 517, &c. and others. But this whole history needs a fuller investigation.

² See Matthew Paris, Historia Major, especially on A.D. 1254, p. 771.

³ This council is classed among the general councils, yet the French do not so regard it. [See Bossuet's Defensio Declarationis Cleri Gallici, tom. i. p. 311; Natalis Alexander, Hist. Eccles. Selecta Cap. secul. xiii. diss. v. art. iii. sec. viii.; Du Pin's Auteurs Eccles. centur. xiii. cap. i.; and Walch's Hist. der Kirchenveramml. p. 739, &c. There were about 140 prelates in the council. Frederick's advocate appealed to a more general council. The pontiff maintained it to be general enough. Walch allows that the council assented to the excommunication of the emperor but not to his deposition, which was the mere sovereign act of the pontiff, and at which all present were astonished. — Mur.

⁴ See in addition to the writers already mentioned Nicol. de Curbio, Vita Innocentii IV. in Baluze's Miscellanea, tom. vii. p. 353, &c.

⁵ Muratori's Dis. de Guelphis et Gibellinis, in his Antiq. Ital. Medii ævi, tom. iv. p. 606.

⁶ Two biographies of him are found in Muratori's Scriptores Rerum Italicar. tom. iii. par. i. p. 592, &c. — Schl.

⁷ His biography also may be seen in Muratori, ubi supra, tom. iii. par. i. p. 593, and par. ii. p. 405. — Schl.

⁸ Two lives of him likewise are in Muratori, ubi supra, tom. iii. par. i. p. 594. — Schl.

13. On the death of Clement IV. there were vehement contests among the cardinals respecting the election of a new pontiff, which continued till the third year; when at last A.D. 1271 Thibald of Placentia, and archdeacon of Liege, was chosen and assumed the name of Gregory X.¹ He had been called from Palestine where he had resided; and having witnessed the depressed state of the Christians in the Holy Land, nothing more engaged his thoughts than sending them succour. Accordingly, as soon as he was consecrated he appointed a council to be held at Lyons in France, and attended it in person in the month of May, A.D. 1274. The principal subjects discussed were the re-establishment of the Christian dominion in the East, and the reunion of the Greek and Latin churches. This has commonly been reckoned the fourteenth general council; and it is remarkable for the new regulations it established for the election of Roman pontiffs and the celebrated provision which is still in force requiring the cardinal electors to be shut up in conclave.² Neither did this pontiff, though of a milder disposition than many others, hesitate to repeat and inculcate that odious maxim of Gregory VII. that the pontiff is supreme lord of the world and especially of the Roman empire. For in the year 1271 he sent a menacing letter to the princes of Germany, admonishing them to elect an emperor forthwith, and without regarding the wishes or the claims of Alphonso, king of Castile, otherwise he would appoint a head of the empire himself. Accordingly the princes assembled and elected Rudolph I. of the house of Hapsburg.

14. Gregory X. died in the year 1276, and his three immediate successors were all chosen and died in the same year. Innocent V. previously Peter of Tarantaise, was a Dominican monk and bishop of Ostia. Hadrian V. was a Genoese, named Ottobonus and cardinal of St. Hadrian. John XXI. previously Peter, bishop of Tusculum, was a native of Portugal. The next pontiff who came to the chair in 1277 reigned longer. He was John Cajetan of the family of Ursini, a Roman and cardinal of St. Nicolaus, and assumed the title of Nicolaus III. As has been already observed, he greatly enlarged what is called the patrimony of St. Peter; and as his actions show, had formed other great projects which he would undoubtedly have accomplished, being a man of energy and enterprise, had he not prematurely died in the year 1280.

15. His successor Martin IV. elected by the cardinals in 1281, was a French nobleman named Simon de Brie, a man of equal boldness and energy of character with Nicolaus. For he excommunicated Michael Palæologus the Greek emperor, because he had violated the compact of union with the Latins, which was settled at the council of Lyons under Gregory X.; and Peter of Aragon he divested of his kingdoms and of all his property, because he had seized upon Sicily; and he bestowed them gratuitously on Charles son to the king of France; but he was projecting many other things in conformity with the views of the pontiffs, when he was suddenly overtaken by death, A.D. 1285. His plans were prosecuted by his successor, James Savelli, who was elected in 1285 and took the name of Honorius IV. But his distressing disease in his joints [both in his hands and his feet], of which he died in 1287, prevented his attempting anything further. Nicolaus IV. previously Jerome d'Ascoli, bishop of Palæstrina, who attained to the pontifical chair in 1288 and died in 1292, was able to attend to the affairs both of the church and of the nations with more diligence and care. Hence he is represented in history sometimes as the arbiter in the disputes of sovereign princes, sometimes as the strenuous assertor of the rights and prerogatives of the church, and sometimes as the assiduous promoter of missionary labours among the Tartars and other nations of the East. But nothing lay nearer his heart than the restoration of the dominion of the Christians in Palestine, where their cause was nearly ruined. In this he laboured strenuously indeed but in vain, and death intercepted all his projects.³

16. After his death the church was without a head till the third year, the cardinals disagreeing exceedingly among themselves. At length on the 5th of July, 1295, they unanimously chose an aged man greatly venerated for his sanctity, Peter surnamed De Murrone, from a mountain in which he led a solitary and very austere mode of life, who assumed the pontifical name of Celestine V. But as the austerity of his life tacitly censured the corrupt morals of the Romish court, and especially of the cardinals, and as he showed very plainly that he was more solicitous to advance the holiness of the church than its worldly grandeur, he was soon considered as unworthy of the office which he had reluctantly assumed. Hence some of the cardinals, and especially Benedict Cajetan, easily persuaded him to abdicate the chair in the fourth month of his pontificate. He died A.D. 1296 in the castle of Fumone, where his successor detained him a captive lest he should raise disturbance. But afterwards Clement V. enrolled him in the calendar of the saints. To him that sect of Benedictine monks who were called after him Celestines owed its origin; a sect still existing in Italy and France, though now nearly extinct and differing from the other Benedictines by their more rigid rules of life.¹

¹ The records of this election were published by Wadding, Annales Minorum, tom. iv. p. 320, &c.

² The acts of this council are in Harduin's Concilia, tom. vii. p. 666, &c.—Mur.

³ A biography of this pope may be seen in Muratori's Scriptores Rerum Italicar. tom. iii. par. i. p. 612.—Schl.

17. He was succeeded A.D. 1294 by Benedict, cardinal Cajetan, the man by whom especially he had been induced to resign the pontificate and who now assumed the name of Boniface VIII. This was a man formed to produce disturbance both in church and state, and eager to the highest degree of indiscretion for confirming and enlarging the power of the pontiffs. From his first entrance on the office he arrogated sovereign power over all things sacred and secular, overawed kings and nations with the terror of his bulls, decided the controversies of sovereigns as their arbiter, enlarged the code of canon law by new accessions, namely, by the sixth book of Decretals, made war among others particularly on the noble family of Colonna which had opposed his election; in a word, he seemed to be another Gregory VII. at the head of the church.² At the close of the century [A.D. 1300] he established the year of jubilee which is still solemnized at Rome.³ The rest of his acts and his miserable exit belong to the next century.⁴

¹ See Helyot, Hist. des Ordres, tome vi. p. 180. [This Pope wrote a history of his own life which, with his other works, is in the Biblioth. Max. Patrum. Lugd. tom. xxv. p. 765. Other biographies of him are to be found in Muratori's Scriptores Rerum Italicar. tom. iii. par. i. p. 653, &c. His life is also written by Papebroch, Acta Sanctor. tom. iv. mens. Maii, p. 483.—Schl.

² A formal biography of him written by Rubens, a Benedictine monk, was published at Rome, 1681, 4to, under the title of Bonifacius VIII. e Familia Cajetanorum principum Romanorum Pontifex. [Another biography of him by Guilo is extant in Muratori's Scriptores Rerum Ital. tom. iii. par. i. p. 611. The history of his contests with the king of France was written by De Puy, entitled Hist. du Différend de Philippe le Bel et de Boniface VIII. Paris, 1585, fol.; also by Ballet, Histoire des Demeurs du Pape Boniface VIII. avec Philippe le Bel, Paris, 1718, 12mo.—Schl. [For a summary account of this quarrel see Gifford's History of France, vol. i. p. 507, &c.—Mur.

³ In this account of the pontiffs I have chiefly followed Papebroch, Pagi, and Muratori in his Annales Italiae, yet always consulting the original writers whom Muratori has collected in his Scriptores Rerum Italicar.

⁴ On the history of the Popes contained in the preceding sections (from section 6 to sec. 17) the student should refer to Gieseler, who has given a very carefully digested summary of their several reigns, particularly of the first and the last of them, Innocent III. and Boniface VIII. and, as usual, has furnished the reader with many valuable quotations and references to authorities in the notes. See Cunningham's transl. vol. ii. p. 200—250. Waddington has devoted chapter xx. of his Hist. of the Church (vol. ii. p. 278—320) to the same period, commencing however from the death of Innocent.—R.

18. Although Innocent III. in the Lateran council of 1215 had forbidden the introduction of any new religions, that is, new orders of monks,⁵ yet by Innocent himself and by the subsequent pontiffs many religious orders before unknown were not only tolerated, but approved and endowed with various privileges and honours. And considering the state of the church in this age, it is not strange that this law of Innocent was tacitly abrogated. For passing by other reasons, the opposers of the church, particularly the heretics, were everywhere multiplying; the secular clergy, as they were called, were more attentive to their private interests than to those of the church, and lived luxuriously upon the revenues provided by their predecessors; the old orders of monks had nearly all abandoned their original strictness, and disgusted the people by their shameful vices, their sloth, and their licentiousness; and they all advanced rather than retarded the progress of the heretics. The church therefore had occasion for new orders of servants, who should possess both the power and the disposition to conciliate the good-will of the people, and diminish the odium resting on the Romish church by the sanctity of their deportment, and to search out and harass the heretics by their sermons, their arguments, and their arms.

19. Some of the orders of monks which originated in this century are now extinct, while others are in a very flourishing state. Among those now extinct were the Humiliati, who originated anterior to the thirteenth century, but were first approved and subjected to the rule of St. Benedict by Innocent III. These were suppressed by Pius V. on account of their extremely corrupt morals, A.D. 1571.⁶ The Jacobites, mendicants who were established by Innocent III. but ceased to exist in this very century, subsequently I think to the council of Lyons.¹ The Vallischolares who were collected not long after the commencement of the century by the Scholars, that is, by the four professors of theology at Paris, and hence were first called Scholars; but afterwards from a certain valley in Campania to which they retired in the year 1234, their name was changed to Vallischolares [Scholars of the Valley].² This society was first governed by the rule of St. Augustine, but it is now united with the canons regular of St. Génévieve. The fraternity of the Blessed Virgin mother of Christ, which began to exist A.D. 1266 and was extinguished in the year 1274.³ The Knights of Faith and Charity, established in France to suppress public robberies, and approved by Gregory IX.⁴ The Eremite brethren of St. William, duke of Aquitaine.⁵ I pass over the Brethren of the Sack, the Bethlehemites, and several others. For scarcely any century was more fruitful than this in new sects of monks, living under various rules and regulations.⁶

⁵ Acta Concilii Lateran. IV. canon xiii. :—"Ne nimia religionum diversitas gravem in ecclesia Dei confusionem inducat, firmiter prohibemus ne quis de cetero novam religionem inveniat; sed quicunque voluerit ad religionem converti, unam de approbatis assumat. Similiter qui voluerit religiosam domum fundare de novo, regulam et institutionem acceperit de religionibus approbatis." See Harduin's Concilia, tom. vii. p. 31.—Mur.

⁶ Helyot's Hist. des Ordres, tome vi. p. 161.

20. Among the new monastic sects which still exist were the Servants of the Ever-blessed Virgin, a fraternity founded in the year 1233 in Tuscany, by seven pious Florentines at the head of whom was Philip Benizi. This sect adopted indeed the rule of St. Augustine, but it was consecrated to the memory of the holy widowhood of the blessed Virgin, and therefore wore a black habit⁷ and had other peculiarities. The holy wars of the Christians in Palestine, in which many Christians became captives among the Mohammedans, produced near the close of the preceding century the order of Brethren of the Holy Trinity, which first acquired stability and permanence in this century. Its originators were John de Matha and Felix de Valois, two pious Frenchmen who led a solitary life at Cersfroy in the diocese of Meaux, where the principal house of the sect still exists. These monks were called Brethren of the Holy Trinity, because all their churches are dedicated to the Holy Trinity; also Ma-thurini, because their church in Paris has for its tutelar saint St. Mathurin, and likewise Brethren of the Redemption of Captives, because they are required to make the redemption of Christian captives from the Mohammedans a primary object, and to devote one-third part of their revenues to this purpose. Their rule of life formerly was austere, but by the indulgence of the pontiffs it is now rendered easy to be kept.⁸

21. But the sects now mentioned, and indeed all others, were far inferior in reputation, in privileges, in the number of members, and in other respects, to the Mendicant Orders (those which had no permanent revenues or possessions) which were first established in Europe during this century. This sort of monks had then become exceedingly necessary in the church. For the wealthy orders, withdrawn by their opulence from solicitude about religion and from obsequiousness to the pontiffs, and indulging themselves in idleness, voluptuousness, and all kinds of vice, could no longer be employed in any arduous enterprise; and the heretics were of course allowed to roam about securely and to gather congregations of followers. Besides, all the parties opposed to the church looked upon voluntary poverty as the primary virtue of a servant of Jesus Christ; they required their own teachers to live in poverty like the apostles; they reproached the church for its riches, and for the vices and profligacy of the clergy growing out of those riches; and by their commendation of poverty and contempt of riches, they chiefly gained the attention and good-will of the people. A class of people therefore was very much wanted, who by the austerity of their manners, their contempt of riches, and the external sanctity of their rules of life, might resemble such teachers as the heretics both commended and exhibited, and whom neither their worldly interests and pleasures nor the fear of princes and nobles could induce to neglect their duties to the church and to the pontiff. The first to discern this was Innocent III. whose partiality for the orders professing poverty

¹ Matth. Paris, Historia Major, p. 161.

² Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. iii. p. 15; Acta Sanctor. mens. Februar. tom. ii. p. 482.

³ Sammarthanus, Gallia Christiana, tom. i. p. 653. &c.

⁴ Gallia Christiana, tom. i. Append. p. 165; Martone's Voyage Littér. de deux Bénédictins, tome ii. p. 23, &c.

⁵ Bolland, De Ordine Eremitar. S. Gulielmi, in the Acta Sanctor. Febr. tom. ii. p. 472, &c.

⁶ Matth. Paris, Historia Major, p. 815, ed. Watts.

⁷ "Tot jam apparuerunt ordinis in Anglia, ut ordinum confusio videretur inordinata." The same thing occurred in other countries of Europe in this age.

⁸ Besides the common historians of the monastic orders who are not always accurate, see Paul the Florentine's Dialogus de Origine Ordinis Serenorum, in Lami's Delicie Erudit. tom. i. p. 1—48.

⁸ Besides Helyot and the others, see Toussaint du Plessis, Hist. de l'Eglise de Meaux, tome i. p. 172 and 566, &c.; Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. ii. p. 525, &c.; Wood's Antiq. Oxon. tom. i. p. 133, &c. In ancient writers this sect is called the Order of Asses, because their rule requires the brethren to ride on asses and forbids their using horses. See Du Fresnoie's Notes on Joinville's Life of St. Lewis, p. 81, &c. But by the allowance of the pontiffs they may at the present day use horses if they have occasion, and they do use them. A similar order was instituted in Spain A.D. 1228, by Paul Nolasco, and called the Order of St. Mary for the Ransoming of Captives. See the Acta Sanctor. Januarii, tom. ii. p. 980, &c.

was most manifest;¹ and the subsequent pontiffs, learning by experience the great utility of these orders, continued to cherish and encourage them. This partiality of the pontiffs becoming manifest, so great was the increase of numbers in these orders, that they became a heavy burden not only upon the people but upon the church.

22. This serious evil Gregory X. endeavoured to obviate in the general council of Lyons A.D. 1272. For he prohibited all the orders which had originated since the council of Innocent III. held at Rome in 1215; and in particular he reduced the unbridled throng (as he denominates them) of the Mendicants to four orders; namely, Dominicans, Franciscans, Carmelites, and Augustinian Eremites.² The Carmelites, who were first established in Palestine in the preceding century, were in this removed to Europe; and by Honorius III. A.D. 1226, placed among the approved orders in the western church. The order of Augustinians or Eremites was formed by Alexander IV. in the year 1256; for he required various societies of Eremites, of which some followed the regulations of William the Eremite, and others wished to be considered as following Augustine, and others called themselves by other names, all to unite in one fraternity and live under the same rules, namely, those said to be prescribed by Augustine.³

23. As these orders had liberty from the pontiffs to spread themselves everywhere, and to instruct the people and to teach the youth, and as they exhibited a far greater show of piety and sanctity than the older orders of monks, all Europe suddenly burst forth in admiration and reverence for them. Very many cities, as appears from the most credible documents, were divided for their sakes into four sections, of which the first was assigned to the Dominicans, the second to the Franciscans, the third to the Carmelites, and the fourth to the Augustinians. The people frequented almost exclusively the churches of the Mendicants, and but seldom asked for the sacraments, as they are called, or for burial, except among them, which naturally called forth grievous complaints from the ordinary priests who had the charge of parishes. Indeed the history of this and the following centuries shows, that so great was the reputation and influence of these mendicant Friars that they were employed in transactions of the highest magnitude, in negotiations for peace, in the ratification of treaties, in controlling the policy of courts, in arranging financial concerns, and in various other functions totally at variance with the monastic profession.

24. But the Dominicans and Franciscans acquired much greater glory and power than the other two orders of mendicants. During three centuries they had the direction of nearly everything in church and state, held the highest offices both ecclesiastical and civil, taught with almost absolute authority in all the schools and churches, and defended the authority and majesty of the Roman pontiffs against kings, bishops, and heretics, with amazing zeal and success. What the Jesuits were after Luther began the Reformation, the same were the Dominicans and Franciscans from the thirteenth century to the time of Luther,—the soul of the whole church and state, and the projectors and executors of all the enterprises of any moment. Dominic, a Spaniard of Calahorra and of the illustrious family of Guzman, a regular canon of Osma, a man of very ardent temperament, burning with hatred against the heretics who then greatly disquieted the church, went with a few companions into France to engage in combat with them; and with sermons, writings, military force, and the tremendous tribunal of the Inquisition which owed its origin to him, he attacked most vigorously and not without success the Albigenses and the other opposers of the church. Then going into Italy after such achievements, he readily acquired great favour with the pontiffs, Innocent III. and Honorius III. and obtained leave to establish a new fraternity to be especially opposed to heretics. At first he and his associates adopted the rule of the canons commonly called St. Augustine's, with the addition of a few precepts which were more rigid; but he afterwards went over to the class of monks, and in a convention of the fraternity at Bologna in the year 1220, he enjoined upon them poverty and contempt for all permanent revenues and possessions. Soon after the transaction at Bologna, he died in the year 1221.¹ The members of the order were at first called Preaching Friars (Fratres Prædicatorum), because their attention was principally devoted to instructing mankind by preaching; but afterwards they were named from their founder Dominicans.²

¹ Innocent III. sent these Mendicant friars into all parts of the world, as heralds of the papal power; and to increase their respectability and influence, he exempted them from the jurisdiction of the bishops, and declared them to be responsible immediately and solely to the see of Rome.—Schl.

² Concilium Lugdun. II. A.D. 1274, Can. xxlii. (in Harduin's Concilia, tom. vii. p. 715) "Importuna potentium inlatio religionum (thus the monastic orders are described) multiplicationem extorsit, verum etiam aliquorum presumptuosa temeritas diversorum ordinum præcipue Mendicantium—effrenatam: quæ multitudinem advenit.—Hinc ordines mendicantes post dictum concilium (Lateranense A.D. 1215) adinventos—perpetuo prohibitioni subieciimus."

³ This ordinance is found in the Bullarium Romanum, tom. i. p. 110, of the new edition. Besides the writers on all the monastic orders and the historians of the Augustinian order in particular, see the Acta Sanctorum, mensis Februarii, tom. ii. p. 472.

25. Francis the son of a merchant of Assisi in Umbria, a dissolute and reckless youth, upon recovering from a very threatening sickness which he had brought upon himself by his licentious, vicious conduct, exhibited in his life and behaviour a kind of religious idiocy; and subsequently in the year 1208, having accidentally heard in a church the words of the Saviour, Matt. x. 10, he conceived that the essence of the gospel, as taught by Jesus Christ, consisted in absolute penury of all things; and therefore he prescribed this for himself and some others who followed him. He was unquestionably an honest and pious man, but grossly ignorant, and weakened in his intellect by the force of his disease. His new fraternity was viewed by Innocent III. as well suited to the exigencies of the church at that time, and was formally approved by Honorius III. A.D. 1223; and it had become very numerous when its founder died in the year 1226. To manifest his humility, Francis would not allow the members of his order to be called Brethren (Frates), but only Little Brothers (Fraterculi); in Italian, Fratercelli; in Latin, Frates Minores [Minorites], which is the name they still retain.

¹ See Echard and Quetif's Scriptores Ordinis Domin. Paris, 1719, fol. tom. i. p. 84, &c.; Acta Sanctorum. April, tom. iii. p. 872, &c.; Jansenius, Vita S. Dominici, Antw. 1673, 8vo, and the long list of writers mentioned by Fabricius, Biblioth. Lat. Medii Ævi, tom. ii. p. 137, &c.; to which may be added several others, and especially Bremond's Bullarium Ordinis Dominici, published at Rome, but which has not fallen in my way. [Also the Annales Ord. Prædicatorum, Rome, 1756, fol. tom. i. which volume is wholly devoted to the life of St. Dominic.—Schl. [That St. Dominic was of the noble family of Guzman has been disputed, but it is agreed that he was born at Calahorra, A.D. 1170, and that he was early sent to the high school at Valencia, where he studied theology four years and led an austere and studious life. In the year 1199, the bishop of Osma made him a presbyter and a canon of his cathedral. He soon after became sub-prior of that body. He was now very devotional, studious, zealous for the faith, and a great preacher. In 1206 the bishop took Dominic with him into the south of France, where they met the papal legate and others then labouring with little effect to convert the Albigenses. The bishop of Osma told them they did not take the right course, that they ought to go forth unadorned and without purse or scrip, like the apostles. He and Dominic set them a pattern, which they followed with better success. After visiting Rome, the bishop had leave from the pope to preach in France during two years. He did so with Dominic to assist him. Many others also laboured with him. After the return of the bishop to Spain, Dominic continued to preach to the heretics, sometimes with assistants and sometimes almost alone. In 1208 a papal legate was murdered and a crusade commenced. Dominic persevered with great zeal and fortitude, preaching and begging his bread from door to door. He gradually drew around him several persons of like spirit. In the year 1215, he attended the general council of the Lateran, and obtained leave to establish a new order of monks, yet adopting some one of the already approved rules. He adopted that of St. Augustine, founded monasteries of Preaching Friars in diverse places, and was constituted general of the whole. He was very active and efficient till his death in 1221. His sixty monasteries divided into eight provinces now fell under the care of his successor and biographer, Jordan, a noted preacher of the Order, educated at Paris. He presided over the Dominicans till A.D. 1237, and was succeeded by Raymond du Pennafort till 1275; when John of Wildeshausen became the general. In the year 1277 the Order had thirty-five cloisters for men in Spain, fifty-two in France, thirty-two in Tuscany, fifty-three in Germany, forty-six in Lombardy, thirty in Hungary, thirty-six in Poland, twenty-eight in Denmark, forty in England, besides some in other countries, and a large number of nunneries. The next year it counted four hundred and seventeen cloisters. See Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. vol. xxvii. p. 382, &c.—Mur.]

² In ancient writers they are sometimes called also Major Friars (Frates Majores). See Matthæus, Analecta Veteris Ævi, tom. ii. p. 172. But this was rather a nickname by which they were distinguished from the Franciscans, who called themselves Minor Friars (Frates Minores). In France and the neighbouring countries they were called Jacobins or Jacobites, because the first domicile granted to them at Paris was and is still sacred to St. James [Rue de St. Jacques.—In England they were called Black Friars from the colour of their habit; and the part of London where they first dwelt is still called by this name.—Mur.]

³ The life of St. Francis was written by Bonaventura, and has been often published. But of all the writers who give account of him, the most full is Lucas Wadding [an Irish Franciscan monk who died at Rome A.D. 1657], in the first volume of his Annales Minorum, a work containing a very ample history of the Franciscan order, confirmed by innumerable documents and published with considerable enlargement by Joseph Maria Fonseca ab Elhora, Rome, 1731 and onwards, in eighteen volumes, folio. The same Wadding published the Opuscula Sti. Francis, Antw. 1623, 4to, and the Biblioth. Ordinis Minorum, Rome, 1650, 4to. The other writers on this celebrated order are mentioned by Fabricius, Biblioth. Lat. Medii Ævi, tom. ii. p. 573, &c. [St. Francis was born at Assisi, A.D. 1182, and at his baptism was named John. But his father, being a merchant, who did much business in the south of France, brought him into such familiar intercourse with Frenchmen that he learned to speak their language fluently, and was thence called Franciscus. His father educated him for his own business and early employed him in traffic. But he was negligent in business, profligate, and debauched, yet generous to the poor and brave. He always acted from the impulse of feeling, and his imagination overpowered his judgment. After his sickness he resolved to be religious, and became as extravagant in this course as he was before in his worldly pleasures. Meeting one day a leper he dismounted from his horse, kissed the sores of the sick man, and gave him alms in order to overcome the revolting feelings of his nature. He fancied that Christ appeared to him, and that he had visions and prophetic dreams. In a pilgrimage to Rome he saw a multitude of beggars about the church of St. Peter, and exchanged clothes with one of the most shabby, and herded some days with the rest. Praying one day near the walls of a decayed church at Assisi, he heard a voice saying, "Go, Francis, and repair my house which you see is decayed." He immediately went and sold a large amount of cloth belonging to his father, and brought the amount to the priest of that church, who hesitated to receive it. His father was offended, and attempted to arrest him as a deranged person; in which light he was now generally viewed by his fellow-townsmen. In the year 1206 his father took all property out of his hands, lest he should

26. These two orders wonderfully supported the tottering fabric of the Romish church in various ways; such as by searching out and extirpating heretics, by performing embassies for the advantage of the church, and by confirming the people in their loyalty to the pontiffs. Sensible of their good services and fidelity, the pontiffs employed them in all the more important offices and transactions, and conferred on them the highest and most invidious privileges and advantages.¹ Among these squander it; and he now clothed himself in skins and lived like a beggar, travelling up and down the country and exhorting all to be religious. Some regarded him as insane and others as a saint. By begging he raised money to repair not only the old church before mentioned, but likewise two others; one of which, near Assisi was called the church of Portiuncula, where he fixed his head-quarters, and at length established his new order of monks about the year 1208. Absolute poverty, entire obedience, much fasting and prayer, with constant efforts to convert sinners, were the requisites for admission to his order. In the year 1210 he had but eleven followers, when he obtained leave of the pope to continue his monastery. In 1211 he sent his monks all over Italy to preach and beg their bread. The order now increased rapidly and was in high repute. Francis himself travelled, and preached, and had revelations, and wrought miracles. Once while preaching he could not be heard for the chattering of numerous swallows. He turned to them and said: "My sisters, you have talked long enough, it is time now for me to speak; do you keep silence while the word of God is preached." They instantly obeyed. In 1212 he attempted to sail to the East in order to preach to the Mohammedans, but the winds drove him back. In the year 1214 he went to Morocco, and preached a while without effect among the believers in Mohammed. In 1215 he attended the Lateran council, when Innocent III. publicly declared his approbation of the Franciscan society. In 1216 he held at Assisi the first general chapter of his order; the next year cardinal Ugolino, afterwards pope Gregory IX. became patron of the order; the year following, 1219, no less than five thousand are said to have attended the general chapter. He now sent his preachers abroad all over Europe. He himself this year went to Egypt and preached to the sultan of that country. On his return he found that his deputy-general, Elias, had relaxed somewhat the strictness of his rules; but he restored things to their former state. He would not allow splendour in his churches nor the formation of libraries, and individuals must not own even a psalter or hymn-book. In 1220 five Franciscan missionaries were put to death in Morocco, which contributed much to raise the fame of the order, and to enlarge it. In 1222 the pope gave the Franciscans a right to preach everywhere, and to hear confessions and grant absolutions in all places. In 1224 St. Francis, after praying for greater conformity with Christ, had scars or fungus flesh, it is said, formed on his hands and feet and side, to represent the five wounds of Christ. During the two following years he lived an invalid at Assisi, and at last died on the 14th of October, 1226. See Bonaventura, ubi supra, and Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. vol. xxvii. p. 405, &c.—Mur.

¹ Matth. Paris, Historia Major, p. 634, says: Our lord the pope now made the Franciscans and Dominicans, contrary to their wishes I suppose and to the injury and scandal of their order, his publicans and his bedels.—Ibid. p. 639. Our lord the pope has not ceased to amass treasures, making the Dominican and Franciscan monks, even against their inclinations, not fishers of men but of money. See also p. 662, 664, and many other places. At the year 1236, p. 354, he says: The Franciscans and Dominicans were counsellors and envoys of princes and even secretaries to our lord the pope; thus securing to themselves too much secular favour. At the year 1239, p. 465, he says: At that time the Dominicans and Franciscans

prerogatives it was not the least, that in all places and without license from the bishops they might preach publicly, be confessors to all who wished to employ them, and grant absolutions. They were also furnished with ample power to grant indulgences, by which the pontiffs aimed to furnish the Franciscans especially with the means of support.² But these favours conferred in such profusion upon the Dominicans and Franciscans, while they weakened the ancient discipline, and infringed upon the rights of the first and second orders of the clergy, produced deadly hatred between the mendicant orders on the one hand, and the bishops and priests on the other, and caused violent struggles and commotions in every country of Europe and even in the city of Rome itself.³ And although the pontiffs of this and the following centuries used various means to compose and terminate these commotions, yet they were never able to extinguish them; because the interests of the church required that its most faithful servants and satellites, the Mendicant monks, should continue to be honoured and secure.⁴

27. Among these contests of the Mendiwere the counsellors and special envoys of kings; and as formerly those clothed in soft raiment were in kings' houses, so at this time those clothed in vile raiment were in the houses, the halls, and the palaces of princes.

² See Baluze, Miscell. tom. iv. p. 490, tom. vii. p. 392. It is notorious that no sect of monks had more or ampler indulgences for distribution than the Franciscans. Without them these good friars, who were required to have no possessions and revenues, could not have lived and multiplied. As a substitute for fixed revenues therefore this extensive sale of indulgences was granted them.

³ See Baluze, Miscell. tom. vii. p. 441.

⁴ See Launo, Episcopus Ecclesie Traditio circa Canonem; Omnis Utriusque Sexus; Opp. tom. i. par. i. p. 247, &c.; Simon, Critique de la Biblioth. des Aut. Ecclési. par M. Du Pin, tome i. p. 326; Lenfant, Hist. du Concile de Pise, tome i. p. 310, tome ii. p. 8; Eberhard's Scriptores Dominici, tom. i. p. 404, &c. The writers of this and the following centuries are full of these contests. [Ecclesiastical discipline was injured by the privileges granted to the Mendicant monks, especially because these monks, being dependant on the kindness of the people for their daily support (as in after times the Jesuits were), endeavoured to secure the good-will of the people by the indulgent manner of treating them in their confessions; and thus the parish churches became almost empty, while those of the Mendicants were full of worshippers. They also received pay for saying masses, and allowed to the rich a burial in their inclosures; for which they were very generously rewarded. This however was only the beginning of the disquietude. As the proceedings of the mendicants were supported by the ambitious pontiff, Gregory IX. they kept no terms with the bishops nor with the civil authorities. They depreciated in their writings and in the schools the power of the bishops, and exalted that of the pope. They spoke of the former as mere clergymen, who were bound to obey implicitly the commands of Christ's viceregent; while the latter they represented as a visible deity. Such good services must be appreciated and rewarded, and such useful men must be esteemed and valued.—Schl.

cants with the bishops, the priests, the schools, and the other monastic orders, the most noted is that of the Dominicans with the university of Paris; which commenced in the year 1228, and was protracted with various success till A.D. 1259. The Dominicans claimed the privilege of having two theological chairs in that university. One of these the university took from them, and also passed a statute that no order of monks should be allowed two theological chairs in the university. The Dominicans pertinaciously insisted on having a second chair; and as they would not be quiet, the university severed them from its connexion. Violent commotion ensued on both sides. The controversy was carried before the court of Rome, and Alexander IV. in the year 1255 ordered the university not only to restore the Dominicans to their former standing in that literary body, but also to allow them as many [professorial] chairs as they chose to occupy. The university boldly resisted and a perplexing contest ensued. But Alexander IV. terrified and overwhelmed the Parisian doctors with so many severe edicts, mandates, and epistles (to the number it is said of forty), that in the year 1259 they yielded, and according to the will of the pontiff, conceded both to the Dominicans and to the Franciscans all they wished for.¹ Hence arose that inveterate dislike and alienation, not yet entirely extinct, between the university of Paris and the Mendicant orders, especially that of the Dominicans.

28. In this famous dispute, no one pleaded the cause of the university more strenuously and spiritedly than William of St. Amour, a doctor of the Sorbonne, a man of genius and worthy of a better age. For in his other writings and sermons, but more especially in his book on The Perils of the Latter Times, he attacked with great severity all the Mendicants collectively, maintaining that their mode of life was contrary to the precepts of Christ, and that it had been inconsiderately and through mistake, as he expresses it, confirmed by the pontiffs and the church. This very celebrated book derived its title from the position of its author—that the prediction of Paul, 2 Tim. iii. 1, &c. concerning the perils of the latter times was fulfilled in the Mendicant Friars, which he endeavours to evince from their Everlasting Gospel, a book of which more will be said hereafter. Against this formidable adversary the ire of the Dominicans especially was kindled; and they did not cease to persecute him till Alexander IV. in the year 1256 ordered his book to be publicly burned and the author to quit France, that he might no more excite the Sorbonne to hostility against the Mendicants. William obeyed the mandate of the pontiff and retired to his native country in Burgundia. But under Clement IV. he returned to Paris, explained his book in a larger work, and at last died there in the highest estimation.²

29. This general odium against the Mendicant orders, arising from the high privileges conferred on them by the pontiffs, was not a little increased by the immense pride and arrogance which they displayed on all occasions. For they pretended to be divinely commissioned to explain and defend the religion of Christ; the priests of all other classes and orders they treated with contempt, declaring that they themselves alone understood the true way of salvation; they extolled the efficacy of their indulgences, and they boasted immoderately of their familiar intercourse with God, with the Virgin Mary, and with all the glorified saints. By such means they so deluded and captivated the uninformed and simple multitude, that they employed them alone as their spiritual guides.³ A prominent place among the instances of their crafty arrogance is due to the fable, circulated by the Carmelites, respecting Simon Stock, a general of their order who died near the beginning of the century. They said that the Virgin Mary appeared to him, and promised him that no person should be eternally lost who should expire clothed in the short mantle worn on their shoulders by the Carmelites, and called the scapular.¹ And this fiction equally ridiculous and impious has found advocates even among the pontiffs.²

¹ See Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iii. p. 138, &c. 240, 244, 248, 266, &c.; Cordesius (whose assumed name is Alltophilus), Præfatio Histor. et Apolog. ad Opera Guil. de S. Amore; Touron, Vie de S. Thomas, p. 134; Wadding's Annales Minorum, tom. iii. p. 247, 366, &c. tom. iv. p. 14, 52, 106, 263. Among the ancients, Matth. Paris, Historia Major, A.D. 1228, and Naugis, Chronicon, in D'Achery's Spicilegium, tom. iii. p. 38, &c.

² See among others, Matthew Paris, Historia Major, in various places, and particularly on A.D. 1246, p. 607, 630, &c.

30. But these very orders, which seemed to be the principal supports of the Romish power, gave the pontiffs immense trouble not long after the decease of Dominic and Francis; and the difficulties, though often dispelled for a time, continually recurred and brought the church into great jeopardy. In the first place, these two most powerful orders contended with each other for precedence, and reviled and combatted each other in their publications with invectives and criminations. Attempts were frequently made to stop these contentions, but the firebrand which kindled them could never be extinguished.³ In the next place, the Franciscan fraternity was early split into factions which time only strengthened and rendered inveterate; and these factions not only disturbed the peace of the church, but shook even the sovereign powers and majesty of the pontiffs themselves. Nor will it appear doubtful to one who attentively considers the course of events in the Latin church from this period onward, that these mendicant orders, in part undesignedly and in part knowingly and intentionally, gave mortal wounds to the authority of the Romish church, and caused the people to wish for its reformation.

31. St. Francis prescribed absolute poverty to his friars. While all the previous monastic orders adopted the policy of denying to their members severally the right of private property, but allowed the collective bodies or fraternities to possess estates and revenues from which all the individuals received support, Francis would not allow his friars, either individually or collectively, to be owners of any property.⁴ But immediately after the death of their founder many of the Friars-Minors departed from this rigorous law; and their inclinations were gratified by Gregory IX. who in the year 1231 published a more mild interpretation of this severe rule.⁵ But others among them were greatly dissatisfied with this relaxation of their primitive austerity. These being persons of a morose disposition and prone to go to extremes, were by some called the Zealous (Zelatores) or the Spiritual, and by others the Cæsarians from one of their number named Cæsarius who was their leader.⁶ A perplexing controversy having thus arisen, Innocent IV. in the year 1245 decided according to the views of those who wished their rule to be relaxed, declaring that they might hold lands, houses, furniture, books, &c. and might use them freely; but that the right of property, the legal possession or ownership of the whole, should belong to St. Peter and to the church of Rome, without whose consent nothing should be sold, exchanged, or in any way transferred to others. But this exposition of their rule the Spirituals declared to be an unrighteous perversion of it; and some of them retired into the woods and deserts, and others were sent into exile by Crescentius, general of the order.⁷

32. John of Parma, who was elected general of the order, A.D. 1247, changed the whole face of things among them. Being himself of the same mind with the Spirituals he recalled the exiles, and required the brethren to conform to the letter of the law as prescribed by St. Francis.⁸ But the recompense he received for restoring the Franciscan community to its pristine state was, that in the year 1249 he was accused before the pontiff, Alexander IV. and was compelled to resign his office. His companions who refused to abandon their opinions were thrown into prison, and he himself with difficulty escaped the same fate.⁹ His successor, the celebrated Bonaventura who ranked high among the scholastic theologians, wished to be thought neutral, and made it his grand object to prevent an open rupture and separation between the two parties. Yet he could not prevent the laxer party from obtaining in the year 1257 a solemn ratification from Alexander IV. of the interpretation put upon their rule by Innocent IV.¹⁰ On the other hand, those who favoured the views

¹ See the tract of Launoi, De Vito Simonis Stockii, in his Opp. tom. ii. par. ii. p. 379, &c.; Acta Sanctorum, tom. iii. ad diem xvi. mensis Maii; Raynaud, Scapulare Marianum, in his Opp. tom. vii. p. 614, and others.

² Even the modern pontiff, Benedict XIV. [who died A.D. 1758] did not hesitate to give countenance to this fable, yet in his usual prudent and cautious manner; De Fæstis B. Mariæ Virginis, lib. ii. cap. vi. Opp. tom. x. p. 472, ed. Rome.

³ See the Alcoran des Cordeliers, tome i. p. 256, 266, 278, &c.; Wadding's Annales Minorum, tom. iii. p. 380, and the whole history of these times.

⁴ The rule of St. Francis, cap. vi. is this: "Fratres sibi nihil approprient, nec domum, nec locum, nec aliquam rem; sed sicut peregrini et advenæ in hoc sæculo. In paupertate et humilitate famulantes Domino, vadant pro elemosyna (i.e. must beg) confidenter. Hæc est illa celsitudo altissimæ paupertatis, quæ vos carissimos meos fratres hæredes et reges regni colorum instituit."

⁵ His Bull is extant in Roderic's Collectio Privilegorum regularium Mendicantium et non Mendicantium, tom. i. p. 8.

⁶ Wadding's Annales Minorum, tom. iii. p. 99, &c.

⁷ Wadding, ubi supra, tom. iv. p. 128, and tom. iii. p. 171, &c.

⁸ Wadding, tom. iii. p. 171.

⁹ Wadding, tom. iv. p. 4, &c.

¹⁰ The decree is exhibited by Wadding among other documents, Annales Minorum, tom. iv. p. 446.

of the Spirituals were so successful, that in an assembly of the order A.D. 1260, they procured the abrogation of the interpretation of Innocent, and particularly so far as it differed from the previous interpretation of Gregory IX.¹

33. To this first contest respecting the meaning of their rule, another was added of no less magnitude. From the beginning of the century there were circulated in Italy and other countries various prophecies of the famous Joachim, abbot of Flora in Calabria, who was considered by the vulgar as a man divinely inspired and equal to the ancient prophets. Most of these prophecies were included in a book which was commonly called, The Everlasting Gospel, and by the vulgar, The Book of Joachim.² This true or fictitious Joachim among many other things foretold in particular the destruction of the Romish Church, the defects and corruptions of which he severely censures; and also the promulgation of a new and more perfect Gospel by poor persons divinely commissioned in the age of the Holy Spirit. For he taught that two imperfect ages [or dispensations], that is, modes of worshipping God had already passed, namely, those of the Father and of the Son; and that a third more perfect was at hand, namely, that of the Holy Spirit. These predictions and whatever affirmations were attributed to Joachim, were eagerly swallowed by the Spirituals, who were for the most part well-meaning but delirious and fanatical persons, and who applied them to themselves and to the rules of life prescribed by St.

Francis;³ for they maintained that he had taught men the true Gospel, and that he was that angel whom John in the Revelation saw flying through the heavens.⁴

34. At the time when these contentions were at their height, about the year 1250, Gerhard, one of the Spirituals, wrote an avowed exposition of this Everlasting Gospel ascribed to Joachim, and entitled his work An Introduction to the Everlasting Gospel.⁵ This treatise, among many other

¹ See Baluze, Miscellanea, tom. i. p. 221, 228, 235, 246; Echard, Scriptores Dominici, tom. i. p. 202; Codes Inquis. Tholosana, published by Limborch, p. 301, 302, 305, &c.

² As both the ancients and the moderns have given inaccurate accounts of this infamous book, I will here subjoin some remarks which may serve to correct their mistakes.

I. They nearly all confound The Everlasting Gospel (or The Gospel of the Holy Spirit, which was another title of the book according to William of St. Amour, De Periculis Novissimorum Temporum, p. 38) with The Introduction to the Everlasting Gospel or to the books of the abbot Joachim. Yet these two books were totally different. The Everlasting Gospel was attributed to the abbot Joachim, and consisted (as before observed) of three books. But the Introduction to this Gospel was the work of some Franciscan monk, and it explained the obscure predictions of this Gospel and applied them to the Franciscans. Neither the university of Paris nor Alexander IV. complained of The Everlasting Gospel itself, but the Introduction to it was complained of, and condemned, and burned, as is manifest from the epistles of Alexander on the subject published by Bulaeus, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. iii. p. 292. The book of the abbot Joachim or The Everlasting Gospel was undoubtedly, as such worthless books usually are, made up of enigmas and ambiguous assertions, and it was therefore treated with contempt. But the interpretation of it or the Introduction to it was a very dangerous book.

II. As to the author of the Introduction, the ancient writers are not agreed. All make it the production of some one who belonged to an order of Mendicants. But those who favour the Franciscans say he must have been a Dominican; while those who defend the Dominican cause throw back the accusation on the Franciscans. The majority however assert that John of Parma, general of the Franciscans, who belonged to the party of the Spirituals and is known to have too much favoured the opinions of the abbot Joachim, was the author of the disgraceful production. See Wadding, Annales Minorum, tom. iv. p. 9, who endeavours, though very unsatisfactorily, to exonerate him from the charge. See also the Acta Sanctorum, tom. iii. Martii, p. 157, &c.; for John of Parma obtained a place among the glorified saints who reign with Christ, notwithstanding he is represented as preferring the Gospel of St. Francis to the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Echard however in his Scriptores Dominici, tom. i. p. 202, 203, has shown, from the MS. records of the legal process against The Everlasting Gospel which are still preserved in the Sorbonne, that the author of the infamous book was a Franciscan friar named Gerhard. This Gerhard was the intimate friend of John of Parma; and he not only maintained fiercely the cause of the Spirituals, but he so heartily imbibed all the opinions ascribed to the abbot Joachim, that he chose to lie in prison 18 years rather than abandon them. See Wadding's Annales Minorum, tom. iv. p. 4, 7. And yet those Franciscans who are called Observantines, that is, such as pretend to follow the rules of their founder more strictly than the others, place this Gerhard among the saints of the highest order; and they tell us that he possessed both the gift of prophecy and the power of working miracles. See Wadding's Annales, tom. iii. p. 213, 214.

III. Nearly all tax with the crime of producing this detestable book the whole body of Mendicant monks, or at least the two orders of Dominicans and Fran-

¹ Wadding, tom. iv. p. 128. The miserable and distracted state of the order is lucidly depicted in an epistle of Bonaventura, which may be seen in Wadding, ubi supra, p. 58.

² What Merlin is to the English, Malachy to the Irish, and Nostradamus to the French, the same is the Abbot Joachim to the Italians; a man who foretels what is to come, who is divinely aided and foresees the fate of empires and the revolutions in the church. Great numbers of his predictions were formerly in circulation and are so still; nay, have had not a few who attempted to explain them. That Joachim predicted some things and also spoke of a future reformation in the church, which he saw to be very necessary, I have no doubt. But most of the predictions once believed to be his undoubtedly originated from other authors. And among these I place The Everlasting Gospel, which was the production of an obscure and insipid writer, who published his dreams under the attractive name of Joachim in order to give them currency. The title of this foolish book was borrowed from the Revelation, ch. xiv. 6. It consisted of three parts [or libri]; of which, the first was entitled Liber Concordiarum vel Concordia Veritatis, the second, Apocalypsis Nova, and the third, Psalterium Decem Chordarum. This is remarked by Echard, Scriptores Dominici, tom. i. p. 202, from a MS. copy in the Sorbonne.

³ Wadding himself does not deny this, though he is a staunch friend to the Spirituals, Annales Minorum, tom. i. p. 3-6. He also speaks favourably of the abbot Joachim absurd and impious things, contained this most detestable asseveration—that the true and eternal Gospel of God was exhibited to mankind by St. Francis, who was the angel mentioned in the Revelation, chap. xiv. ver. 6; that the Gospel of Christ would be abrogated in the year 1260, and this new and eternal Gospel take its place; and that the ministers by whom this great change would be brought about were to be itinerant barefooted friars.¹ When this book was published at Paris, A.D. 1254, the theologians there and all good men burst out in the highest indignation against the Mendicant monks, who were before sufficiently odious on other accounts. For this reason Alexander IV. though reluctantly, in the year 1255 forbade the circulation of the book, yet in a manner so guarded and cautious as to injure the reputation of the Mendicant orders as little as possible. But the university of Paris did not desist from complaints and accusations till the book was publicly burned.²

35. The dissensions of the Franciscans, which had been quieted by the prudence of Bonaventura, broke out again after his death. For that portion of the order who desired greater liberty wished to have the rule of the founder wholly abrogated, and they think both these orders were willing to advance their fame for piety and their influence among mankind by means of this work. But the fact was far otherwise. The crime is chargeable only on the Franciscans, as is evident from the remains of the book itself; yet not on all the Franciscans, as justice requires us to state, but only on that class of them who are called the Spirituals; indeed, it is perhaps not chargeable on all of these, but only on that portion of them who believed in the prophecies of the abbot Joachim. After these remarks it will be more easy to understand correctly what the following writers tell us concerning The Everlasting Gospel; namely, Schmid, in his Diss. on this subject, Helmst. 1700, 4to; Ussher, De Successione Ecclesiarum Occidentaliū cap. ix. sec. 20, p. 337; Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iii. p. 292, &c.; Natalis Alexander, Historia Eccles. sæcul. xlii. artic. iv. p. 9, and many others. This book is not a monument of the pride and insolence of all the Mendicant orders, as most writers have supposed, but of the impious folly of a part, and a very small part, of the Franciscan family.

¹ See Guilelmus de S. Amore, De Periculis Novissimor. Temporum, p. 38, 39, who tells us that this book was first published in the year 1254, but that the opinions contained in it had originated 50 years before, i.e. A.D. 1200. Copious extracts from the book are given by several of the ancient writers. See Cörnerus, Chronicon, in Eccard's Corpus Histor. Mediæ ævi, tom. ii. p. 850; the Chronicon Egnandandum, in Matthæus, Analecta Vet. ævi, tom. ii. p. 517; Ricobaldus, in Eccard's Corpus, &c. tom. i. p. 1215, and others. Yet among these extracts there is much discrepancy, which originated, I suppose, from some writers quoting from The Everlasting Gospel of Joachim, while others quoted from friar Gerhard's Introduction to it, without discriminating between the two works.

² See Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iii. p. 229, &c.; Jordanus, Chronicon, in Muratori's Antiquit. Ital. tom. iv. p. 998. [See also Gieseler's Text-book of Eccl. Hist. by Cunningham, vol. ii. p. 300, &c. and the notes there.—Mur.]

as being morally wrong and requiring what is beyond the powers of human nature; but at the solicitation of those attached to the primitive strictness, Nicolaus III. resisted the measures of these innovators, and published in 1279 the famous constitution, by which he not only confirmed the rule of St. Francis but interpreted it in the most particular manner.³ In this constitution he enjoined upon the friars, as their rule demanded, a renunciation [expropriatio] of all right of property or ownership, but allowed them the simple use of things necessary, the retention not the property; and ordained that the dominion of these necessities, houses, books, and other furniture should belong, as Innocent IV. had decided, to the church of Rome. In the conclusion he severely prohibited all private expositions of his statute, lest it should afford new grounds of contention, reserving the right of interpreting it exclusively to the Roman pontiffs.⁴

36. This constitution of Nicolaus did not satisfy the Zealous or the Spirituals, who were considerably numerous particularly in Italy and France, and especially in the province of Narbonne. Those in Italy made no disturbance; but those in France and particularly in Narbonne, being of a warmer and more excitable temperament and led on by Peter John Oliva, openly testified their dissatisfaction and again produced violent contentions.⁵ This Peter, famed for his writings, opinions, and sufferings, was in high estimation for sanctity and learning, and therefore had numerous followers; and he really inculcated many things wisely and well. In particular he censured with great freedom the corruptions and defects of the Romish religion. This he did in his writings and particularly in his Postilla or commentary on the Revelation, in which he did not hesitate to affirm that the church of Rome was that whore of Babylon that John saw in vision. Yet he was at the same time most profoundly superstitious, and was contaminated with a large share of those opinions which the Spirituals pretended to have learned from the abbot Joachim; and he had an inipious veneration for St. Francis, who he maintained was wholly conformed to Christ.¹ In the great dispute respecting the rule of St. Francis he seemed to be of neither party; for he conceded to the brethren the beggarly use of things necessary (pauperem rerum necessarium usum), and when several times summoned before his superiors he would not express dissatisfaction with the interpretation of Nicolaus III. Yet he inclined much to the side of the more strict or the Spirituals, who would not allow even the order collectively to possess any property; and he contended that those who held these views were to be esteemed and loved rather than persecuted.² He is therefore regarded as the leader and head of all those among the Franciscans, who maintained these contests with the pontiffs respecting the renunciation of property required by St. Francis.³

³ Some contend that this constitution was promulgated by Nicolaus IV. but they are confuted by Wadding, Annales Minorum, tom. v. p. 73.

⁴ This celebrated constitution is inserted in the Corpus Juris Canonici, lib. vi. Decretal. [lib. v.] tit. xli. cap. 3, p. 1028, ed. Boehmer, and is commonly designated by its first word, Etia.

⁵ He is also called in ancient writers Peter of Beziers (Biterrensis), because he lived long and was a teacher in the monastery of Beziers. Sometimes also he is called from his native place Peter of Serignan; for he was born in the castle of St. Mary at Serignan in France. I note these circumstances, because some have made three persons out of this individual.

37. Relying on the influence of this man, whom the multitude accounted a prophet of God and a most holy man, the Spirituals resolutely assailed the opposite party; but the prudence of the generals of the order for a time so held their passions in check, that neither party could overcome the other. Such prudence however was not in Matthew Aquaspartanus, who was made general of the order in the year 1287. For he suffered the ancient discipline to become prostrate, and even the appearance of poverty to become extinct. Hence there arose, first in the marquisate of Ancona in Italy and afterwards in France and in other countries, great commotions among the Spirituals both the more moderate and the more rigid; and Matthew, after labouring in vain to quell these commotions by imprisonments and penalties, at length in the year 1289 resigned his office.⁴ His successor Raymund Gaufridi endeavoured to restore peace by recalling the exiles, liberating the imprisoned, and banishing a few of the more untractable into Armenia. But the evil had now become too inveterate to be easily cured. For the more lax censured the tenderness and kindness of the general towards the Spirituals; nor did they cease to persecute him till under Boniface VIII. they got him deposed. At the same time the Spirituals, especially in France, seceded from the rest and openly condemned the interpretation of their rule by Nicolaus III. Hence from the year 1290 onward, the prospect was open sedition and schism.⁵

38. Some of the Italian Spirituals in the year 1294 asked permission of the pontiff, Celestine V. to form themselves into a distinct community, which might live in that real poverty absolutely void of all possessions and all property, which St. Francis had prescribed to his followers; and the indulgent pontiff, who was a great admirer of poverty, readily granted their request, and placed at the head of this new fraternity friar Liberatus, a man of a most austere life.⁶ But as Celestine soon after resigned the pontificate, his successor Boniface VIII. who rescinded all the acts of Celestine, suppressed this new order which had assumed the name of Celestine Eremites of St. Francis.⁷ The more lax Franciscans therefore now persecuted this class with great severity, and accused them among other things of Manichæism. Hence many of them emigrated first to Achaia, and afterwards from thence to a small island, in order there to lead that miserable kind of life which they regarded as the most holy. But the fury of their brethren still pursued them in their exile. Those who remained in Italy in spite of Boniface VIII. continued to live according to their favourite rules; and they gathered associations of their order, first in the kingdom of Naples and then in the marquisate of Ancona and in the Milanese territory. From Italy they at length spread themselves over the greatest part of Europe; and down even to the Reformation by Luther, they were involved in the hottest warfare with the church of Rome, in which vast numbers of them perished miserably in the flames through the efforts of the Inquisition.⁸

¹ See the Littera Magistrorum de Postilla Fratris P. Joh. Olivi, in Baluze's Miscellanea, tom. i. p. 213, and Wadding's Annales Minorum, tom. v. p. 51.

² His sentiments may be learned best of all from his last discourse, in Baluze, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. iii. p. 535, and Wadding's Annales Minorum, tom. p. 378.

³ See concerning this celebrated man, who died A.D. 1297, in addition to the common writers (Raynald, Nat. Alexander, Oudin, and others), Baluze's Miscellanea, tom. i. p. 213, and his Vita Pontif. Avenion, tom. ii. p. 752, &c.; D'Argentre's Collectio Judiciorum de Novis Eccles. Erroribus, tom. i. p. 226, &c.; Wadding's Annales Minorum, tom. v. p. 108, 121, 140, 236, and especially p. 378, where he labours with all his might, though with little success, to excuse and justify the man; Baluze, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. iii. p. 535, &c.; Schelhorn's Amenitates Liter. tom. ix. p. 678, &c.; Histoire Générale de Languedoc, by the Benedictines, tom. iv. p. 91, 179, 182. His bones together with his books were burned by order of the pontiff in the year 1325. See Raynald's Annales, ad ann. 1325, sec. xx.

⁴ See Wadding's Annales Minorum, tom. v. p. 210, 211, 235.

⁵ Wadding, Annales Minor. tom. v. p. 108, 121, 140, and especially p. 235, 236.

⁶ Wadding, Annales, tom. v. p. 324, 338, &c.

⁷ Wadding, Annales, tom. vi. p. 1, &c.; Bullarium Magnum Continuat. tom. iii. lv. [ed. Luxemb. 1741, tom. ix.] p. 108, 109.

⁸ In what I here state and also in what I am about to state on this subject, I cannot name any writers whom I have followed. For this part of the church history of the middle ages has not been accurately and faithfully delineated, although it is well worthy of

39. At this time therefore or near the close of this century, originated in Italy the Fratricelli and Biziochi, parties who in Germany and France were denominated Beguards, and which Boniface VIII.¹ first and afterwards other pontiffs condemned, and wished to see persecuted by the Inquisition and exterminated in every possible way. The Fratricelli, who also called themselves in Latin Fratres Parvi, (Little Brethren), or Fraterculi de Paupere Vita (Little Brothers of the Poor Life), were Franciscan monks, but detached from the great family of Franciscans, who wished to observe the regulations prescribed by their founder, St. Francis, more perfectly than the others, and therefore possessed no property, either individually or collectively, but obtained their necessary food from day to day by begging.² For they said that Jesus Christ and his apostles had neither individual nor common property, and that the Franciscans were ordered by their founder to imitate them. They likewise, after the example of St. Francis, wore tattered, shabby, and sordid garments; they declaimed against the corruptions of the Romish church, and the vices of the pontiffs and bishops; they predicted a reformation and purification of the church, and the restoration of the true gospel of Jesus Christ by the genuine disciples of St. Francis: in short, they assented to nearly all the opinions which were circulated as coming from the abbot Joachim. They extolled Celestine V. as the legal founder of their sect; but Boniface and the succeeding pontiffs who opposed the Fratricelli, they denied to be true pontiffs.³

being placed in a clearer light, for it exhibits great examples; and these rebellious Franciscans, though superstitious, hold a distinguished rank among those who prepared the way for the Reformation in Europe and instilled into the people a hatred of the church of Rome. Raynald, Bezovius, and Spondanus, in their Annales, and Eymericus in his Directorium Inquisitionum, Natalis Alexander, and others, all treat of these subjects, which are of greater importance than most persons are aware; but they do not treat them properly, fully, and distinctly. And as the Protestant historians all borrow from these, it is not strange that they also are defective. Wadding, though an indefatigable writer, yet while handling these subjects proceeds like one treading upon coals of fire concealed under ashes; he obscures, suppresses, dissembles, excuses, concedes, and doubts. For he was favourably disposed towards the more rigid Franciscans, yet he dared not openly say that they were injuriously treated by the pontiffs. He saw that the Romish church was shaken by these his friends, and that the majesty of the pontiffs was seriously injured and depressed by them; but he is extremely cautious not to let this appear too clearly to his readers. I could not therefore follow any writer throughout as my guide. But I have access to various testimonies of the ancient writers, and I also have in my hands not a few documents which were never published, namely, diplomas of the pontiffs and temporal sovereigns, acts of the Inquisition, and others, from which everything I shall say may be fully substantiated. And if God shall spare my life, these documents may perhaps come before the public. [This has not taken place; and it is desirable that those who have these documents in their possession should not withhold them from the world.—Schll.] There was accordingly published from his manuscripts a volume entitled De Beghards et Beguinabus Commentarius, accompanied with various documents, notes, and suitable indices by G. H. Martini, Leip. 1790, 8vo. See Mosheim's more full account of this work in a subsequent note on section 40 of this chapter, p. 461.—Mur.

¹ See Trithemius, Annales Hirsaugienses, tom. ii. p. 74. Yet this writer is faulty in many particulars, and deserves no credit in what he says of the origin and the opinions of the Fratricelli. He everywhere confounds indiscriminately the sects of this period. Bulaeus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. p. 541, where may be seen the decree of Boniface VIII. against the Biziochi and Beguards, passed A.D. 1297; Jordanus, Chronicon, in Muratori's Antiq. Italica, tom. iv. p. 1020. Add also the common writers, though none of them is free from errors.

² The Fratricelli held many common principles with the Spirituals, yet they were diverse from them. The Spirituals did not renounce communion with the other Franciscans from whom they differed, and they were not disposed to form a new sect; but the Fratricelli would have nothing to do with the great family deriving its name from St. Francis, and they appointed for themselves a distinct head or leader. The Spirituals did not wholly prohibit the Franciscan family from holding property in common, provided they were not its legal owners; but the Fratricelli would not allow their members, either separately or collectively, to hold any property, and they observed that absolute poverty which Francis had required both in his Rule and in his last Testament. Some other particulars are omitted.

³ The accounts given of the Fratricelli by both the ancients and the moderns, and even by those who exhibit most accuracy and research, are more confused and contradictory than can well be imagined. Trithemius (Annales Hirsaugienses, tom. ii. p. 74) makes them to be the progeny of Tanchelinus; and he most unsuitably confounds them with the Cathari and other sects of those times. And most of the others who treat of the Fratricelli are no better informed than he. The Franciscans leave no stone unturned in order to evince, that the pestilent sect of the Fratricelli did not originate from their order. Of course they resolutely deny that the Fratricelli professed to follow the Franciscan rule; and they maintain that this name designated a confused rabble of various sorts of persons of different religious views, whom Hermann Pongilupus, of Ferrara in Italy first collected together near the close of the century. In place of all others may be consulted on this subject, Wadding, Annales Minorum, tom. vi. p. 279, &c. who is most copious in wiping this disgrace from his order. But the indefatigable man has accomplished nothing by all his efforts. For he himself concedes and also proves by unquestionable authorities, that the Fratricelli did profess and did in practice follow, the Rule of St. Francis. And yet he denies that they were Franciscans, meaning however only this, that they were not such Franciscans as those were who lived in subordination to the general prefect of the order, and who admitted the exposition of the rule of St. Francis given by the pontiffs. He therefore proves only that the Fratricelli were Franciscans who had withdrawn from the great family of the order, and who rejected the decrees of the pontiffs and the authority of the general prefect which no one calls in question. This Hermann (or Armann as he is constantly named in the records of the trials) Pongilupus, whom Wadding, with many others, represents as being the parent of the Fratricelli, lived at Ferrara in this century, and was highly esteemed for his sanctity; and after his death in 1269, he was magnificently entombed in the principal church of Ferrara, and was long held by all for a distinguished saint, whose sanctity God had demonstrated by numerous miracles. But as the Inquisitors of heretical pravity had long been suspicious of him, because he led that austere course of life pursued by the class of the Cathari denominated the Comforted, after his death they made such critical tiarii into his life, that after several years they detected his impieties. Hence in the year 1300, by order of Boniface VIII. his bones were burned, his tomb demolished, and an end put to the extravagant reverence of the people for Pongilupus. The records of this judicial process were first published by Muratori, in his Antiq. Italia Medii Aevi, tom. v. p. 93-147. From these ample records it is most manifest, that all those learned men are mistaken who represent Arnann Pongilupus as the parent of the Fratricelli. He had no concern with them whatever; nay, he was dead some time before this sect arose. On the contrary, this celebrated man was one of the Cathari or Paulicians or Manichaeans, and of that branch of them called Pagnolists from the town Bagnolo in Languedoc. Some of the moderns have correctly understood this point, that the Fratricelli were a more rigid sort of Franciscans; but they have erred in supposing them to differ from the Beguards or Beguins in nothing but their name. See Limborch, Hist. Inquirit. lib. i. c. xix. p. 69, who shows himself not well acquainted with these affairs; Baluze, Miscellanea, tom. i. p. 195, and in his Vita Pontif. Avenionens. tom. i. p. 509; Beausobre, Dict. sur les Adamites, subjoined to his Historia Belli Hussitici, p. 380. And even Wadding is not opposed to this opinion. See his Annales Minorum, tom. v. p. 376. But the Fratricelli certainly did differ, as I shall presently show, from the Beguards, not only in their opinions but also in their practice and mode of life.

40. As the great Franciscan family had its associates and dependants, who observed the third rule prescribed by St. Francis and who were usually called Ter-

The principal cause of the numerous mistakes made in the history of the Fratricelli undoubtedly was, the ambiguity of the name. Fraterculus or Fraterculus (Little Brother) was a term of reproach among the Italians of that age, which they applied to any one who assumed the appearance of a monk, and in his dress, demeanour, and habits, made a considerable show of piety or holiness, yet did not belong to any of the approved monastic sects. See Villani, istoria Fiorentina, lib. viii. c. 34, p. 423. Imola on Danté, in Muratori's Antiq. Italia, tom. i. p. 1121. As there were in those times many such persons strolling the country, though differing much in their mode of life and opinions, this term was of course applied to persons of various descriptions and characters. Thus the Cathari, the Waldenses, the Apostoli, and many other sects who broached new doctrines, were commonly branded with this epithet;—and foreign writers, not aware of this fact, thought they discovered sometimes in one sect and sometimes in another those noted Fraterculi who gave the pontiffs so much trouble. But this term Fratricelli or Fraterculi, when applied to those stricter Franciscans who aimed to observe the rule of their master perfectly, had not its vulgar import and was not a term of reproach or a nickname, but an honourable appellation which these devotees of the severest poverty coveted and preferred before all other names. Fratricellus is the same as Fraterculus or Little Brother, and this is equivalent to Frater Minor. And everybody knows that the Franciscans chose to be called Frates Minores, as expressive of their humility and modesty. These well-meaning people therefore did not assume a new name, but only applied to themselves the ancient name of their order in the form it took in the Italian language; for those who are in Latin called Frates Minores are in the Italian called Fratricelli. Of the many proofs which are at hand I will subjoin one only, namely, a passage from William de Thoca in his life of Thomas Aquinas, in the Acta Sanctorum, tom. i. Martii, cap. ii. sec. 21, p. 666: "Destruxit (sill. St. Thomas) et totum pestiferum pravitalis errorem—cujus sectatores simul et inventores se nominant Fraterculos de Vita Paupere, ut etiam sub hoc humilitatis sophistico nomine simplicium corda seducant—contra quem errorem pestiferum Johannes Papa XXII. mirandam edidit decretalem."

And this very decretal of John XXII. which Thoco calls admirable, to mention no other proofs, is sufficient to evince that what I have here said of the Fra-tiarii,¹ so also the sect of the Fratricelli, who wished to be thought the genuine fraternity of St. Francis, had numerous Tertiarii of its own. These were called in Italy, Bizochi and Bocasoti; in France, Beguini; and in Germany, Beghardi, by which name all the Tertiarii were commonly designated.² These differed from the Fratricelli, not in their opinions but only in their mode of life. The Fratricelli were real monks, living under the rule of St. Francis; but the Bizochi or tricelli is accordant with truth. It is extant in the Extravagantes of John XXII. [Tit. vii, cap. i.—Mur.] in the Corpus Juris Canon. tom. ii. p. 1112, ed. Boehmer. The pontiff says: "Nonnulli profana multitudinis viri, qui vulgariter Fratricelli, seu Frates de Paupere vita, Bizochi, sive Beguini nuncupantur, in partibus Italiae in insula Sicilia—publice mendicare solent." These Fratricelli he then divides into monks and Tertiarii, or what is the same as I shall presently show, into the Fratricelli and the Beguini. Of the proper Fratricelli he thus speaks: "Plurimi eorum regulam, seu ordinem Fratrum Minorum—se proferri ad litteram conservare confingunt—præterdentes se a sancte memorie Coelestino Papa Quinto, prædecessore nostro, hujus status seu vite privilegium habuisse. Quod tamen, etsi ostenderent, non valeret; cum Bonifacius Papa Octavus ex certis causis rationabilibus omnia ab ipso Coelestino concessa—viribus penitus evacuaverit." What could be more explicit and clear? The pontiff then proceeds to the other portion of these people who were called Bizochi, or Beguini: "Nonnulli etiam ex ipsis asserentes se esse de tertio ordine beati Francisci Penitentium vocato, prædictum statum et ritum eorum sub velamine talis nominis satagunt palliare."

¹ Besides his two rules both very strict and austere, the one for the Friars Minors [or Minorites], and the other for the Poor Sisters, called Clarissians from St. Clara [the first abbess among the Franciscans], St. Francis also prescribed a third rule more easy to be observed for such as wished to connect themselves in some sort with his order and to enjoy the benefits of it, and yet were not disposed to forsake all worldly business and to relinquish all their property. This rule required only certain plain observances, such as fasts, prayers, continence, a coarse and cheap dress, gravity of manners, &c. but did not prohibit private property, marriage, public offices, and worldly occupations. This third rule of St. Francis is treated of by all the writers on the Franciscan order, and especially by Wadding, Annales Minorum, tom. ii. p. 7, &c. and by Helyot, Hist. des Ordres, tome vii. p. 214. Those who professed this third rule were called Frates de Penitentia [Penitentiary Brethren], sometimes also Frates de Sacco, on account of the meanness of their dress, but commonly Tertiarii [Tertiaries]. This institution of St. Francis was copied by other orders of monks in the Romish church, as soon as they perceived its advantages. And hence most of the orders at the present day have their Tertiarii.

² The Tertiarii connected with those rigid Franciscans who were distinguished by the title of Fratricelli, sprung up in the marquise of Ancona and in the neighbouring regions, in the year 1296 or 1297, and were called Bizochi as we learn from the bull of Boniface VIII. against them drawn up in 1297, and which is published by Buleus, in his Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iii. p. 441. John XXII. mentions the same appellation in his bull quoted in a preceding note. See also Du Fresnoy, Glossar. Latinit. Medie, tom. i. p. 1189, who observes that the name is derived from Bizochi, in French Besace, on account of the wallet or bag which these mendicants used to carry. [No: he says, Some have supposed it so derived, but he thinks they were called Bizochi and Bicchini from the grey colour of their garments; for from the Italian bipio, he says, is derived the French bleu, grey or ash-coloured.—Mur.] The name Bocasotus (or as it is written in Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iii. p. 510) Vocasotus, is undoubtedly of the same origin and import. It occurs in

Beguini lived in the manner of other people, except in regard to dress and a few observances prescribed for this class of persons by St. Francis; so that they were mere laics or secular brethren as the ecclesiastical phrase is.¹ These Bizochi Jordanus, from whom a signal passage will hereafter be quoted. The names Beghardi and Beguini, by which this sort of people were called in France and Italy, are very notorious in the church history of the middle ages. But what both the ancients and the moderns state concerning the persons who bore these appellations is so vague and contradictory, that it is not strange we should find no part of the religious history of this period involved in more obscurity and uncertainty, than that of the Beghardi and Beguini. I will therefore dispel this obscurity as far as I am able, and expose the origin of these sects.

The words Beghardus or Boggehardus, and Begutta, and also Beghinus and Beghina, differ only in orthography and are all of the same import. The Germans and the Dutch say Beghard and Begutta, which are the forms most used in the ancient German language. But the French substituted the Latin instead of the German orthography, and pronounced Beghinus and Beghina after the Roman manner. Thus those who in Germany and Holland were called Beghardi and Beguttæ were in France and Italy called Beghini and Beguinæ; yet the Latin form was gradually preferred before the German even by the Germans and the Dutch, for which very probable reasons might be assigned, if this were the proper place. [It probably arose from the fact that those who wrote on the subject were priests, and retained the orthography adopted in the papal bulls.—Schl.] Concerning the derivation and the import of these names there are many opinions, which it would be tedious to enumerate and to refute. I have done this in another place; for I have commenced and nearly completed an extensive and copious work concerning the Beghardi and Beghini, in which I have carefully investigated the history of all the sects to which these names were applied, examining numerous documents, a great part of which were never published; and I have detected very many mistakes of learned men in this part of church history. In this place, therefore, disregarding the various conjectures and opinions of others, I will briefly state the true origin and signification of these terms. Beyond all controversy they are derived from the old German word beggen or beggeren [in English, to beg.—Mur.], which we now pronounce in a softer manner, beguiren. It signifies to beg for anything earnestly and heartily. The syllable "hard," which is a frequent termination of German words, being subjoined to this produces the name Beggehard, which denotes a person who begs often and importunately. And as none ask and importune more frequently and earnestly than the Mendicants do, hence in the language of the old Germans a Beghard is a mendicant or beggar, which word still exists in the language of the English. Beghutta is a female who gets her living by begging. Christianity being introduced into Germany, the word beggen or beggeren was applied to Religion, and denoted that duty which is enjoined upon Christians, namely, to offer devout and fervent prayer to God. This word beggen therefore as we may learn from the Gothic or Frankic version of the four Gospels by Ulfilas [in which bidjan is to pray, and bidagwa is a beggar.—Mur.], signifies to pray earnestly and devoutly to God. This application of the word coming into use, a man distinguished from others by praying much and fervently was called a Beghard or one that prays, and a woman constant in this duty was called Begutta, a female that prays. And as those who pray more than others make a display of unusual piety, therefore all who wished to be accounted more religious than others were usually denominated Beghardi and Beguttæ; that is, in modern phraseology, Praying Brothers and Praying Sisters.

Whoever duly considers these statements will successfully find his way amidst the many difficulties attending the history of the Beghardi and Beghinæ; and he will see whence arose such a multitude of Beghardi and Beghinæ in Europe, from the thirteenth century onward; and why so many sects (more than thirty might be named), differing greatly in their sentiments, institutions, and practice, were all called by these names. In the first place, Beghardus (or Beg-gart, as it was commonly uttered) was the term among the Germans for an importunate beggar. Therefore when they saw persons, under the pretence of piety and devotion, adding themselves to a life of poverty and neglecting all manual labour, begging their daily bread, they called them all by the common name of Beghardi, or if females, Beghuttæ, without any regard to the sentiments or opinions by which they were distinguished from each other. Those called Apostoli were beggars; the more rigid Franciscans were beggars; the Brethren of the Free Spirit (of whom we shall treat hereafter) were beggars; and others were beggars. Among these there was a vast difference; yet the Germans called them all Beghardi on account of that mendicancy into which they had thrown themselves; nor was this strange, for this their common characteristic was visible to all eyes, while their other traits of character were not so easily discerned.

But secondly, the term Beghard in this century also denoted a man who prayed very much and affected uncommon piety. Thus it was equivalent to the modern term Pietist [among the Germans]. Therefore all those who forsook the ordinary mode of living and were distinguished by the gravity and austerity of their manners, were designated by the common appellation of Beghardi or Beguttæ, or, among the French, Beguini and Beguinæ. This use of these terms was at first so extensive (as might be shown by many examples) that even the monks and nuns were called Beghardi and Beguttæ. But afterwards their application was more restricted, and they were appropriated to those who formed an intermediate class between the monks and common citizens, yet resembled the former in their habits and manners. The Tertiarii therefore of all the different orders, Dominicans, Franciscans, &c. were called Beghardi, as is abundantly attested; for although they were only citizens, yet they were more strict in their devotional exercises than common citizens. The Brother Weavers, the Brethren of St. Alexius, the followers of Gerhard the Great, and many others; in short, all who exhibited an exterior of higher sanctity and piety were Beghardi and Beguttæ, notwithstanding they obtained their support by labour and troubled no one by their begging.

The terms Beghardi and Beguttæ, Beguini and Beguinæ, if we regard them in their origin, were therefore honourable appellations; and they were used as such in works of the highest respectability at that age; as for instance in the Testament of St. Lewis, the king of France. But gradually these words, as often happens, changed their original import and became terms of reproach and derision. For among those mendicant monks and among those professing more than ordinary piety, there were found many whose piety was childish and superstitious, or who were crafty impostors, concealing crimes and villanies under a mask of piety, or who united with their piety corrupt doctrines contrary to the prevailing religion of the age. These characters caused the appellation Beghard or Beguin to become dishonourable, and to be used for one who is stupidly or senselessly religious, or who imposes upon mankind by a show of piety and poverty, or who debases his piety by grievous errors in doctrine. The term Lollard underwent a similar change in its import, as will be shown hereafter.

¹ See the Acta Inquisit. Tholosana, published by Limborch, p. 298, 302, 310, 313, but especially p. 307, 329, 382, 389, &c. Of the other passages illustrative of the history of the Fratricelli and Beguini, I will subjoin one from Jordanus' Chronicon, ad ann. 1294, in Muratori's Antiq. Ital. Mediæ ævi, tom. iv. p. 1020, which will briefly confirm nearly all I have said: "Petrus de Macerata et Petrus de Forosempromio, apostatæ fuerunt ordinis Minorum et hæretici. His potentibus eremitico vivere, ut regulam B. Francisci ad litteram servare possent. Quibus plures apostatæ adhaeserunt, qui statum communis dabantur et declarationes regulæ, et vocabant se Fratres S. Francisci" (he ought to have said Fratricellos, or Parvos Fratres de Paupere Vita), "et Seculares" (these were the Tertiarii, the friends and associates of the Fratricelli, but who continued to be seculars and were

moreover were divided into two classes, the perfect and the imperfect. The former lived by begging, did not marry, and had no fixed residence; while the latter had permanent places of abode, married, possessed property, and engaged in the various occupations of life like other citizens.¹

41. Totally different from these austere Franciscan Beguini and Beguinæ were the German and Belgic Beguinæ, who did not indeed originate in this century, but now first emerged into notice and in a short time became immensely numerous.² Certain pious females, including both widows and maidens, in order to keep themselves pure from the corruptions of the age, formed themselves into associations and lived in appropriate houses, amidst exercises of devotion and regular manual labour under a directress; yet reserving to themselves the right of marrying and of withdrawing from the association at their pleasure. And as all females who made pretensions to more than ordinary piety were called Beguttæ or Beguinæ, that is, Praying Ladies, so these also received the same appellation³. The first association of this description was formed at Nivelles in Brabant, A.D. 1226; and so many others followed soon after throughout France, Germany, and the Netherlands, that from the middle of the century onward, there was scarcely a city of any note which had not its Beguinagia as they were called, or Vineyards as such associations were sometimes denominated, borrowing a name from the book of Canticles.⁴ All these female associations did not adopt the same regulations; but the greater part of them devoted the time which was not occupied in prayer and other religious exercises to various kinds of labour, and especially to weaving. Those who were really indigent, or disabled, or sick, sought relief in the kindness of the pious and benevolent.

42. This female institution was soon after imitated in the Netherlands by unmarried men, both widowers and bachelors, who associated and lived together in appropriate houses, praying and labouring unitedly under a director or chief, yet reserving to themselves, in the same manner as the females, the liberty of returning at any time to their former mode of life if they pleased.⁵ These were called according to the phraseology of the age Beghards, corruptly pronounced Bogards by the Belgians; and by some, Lollhards; and in France at first Bons Valets (Boni Valeti) or Bons Garçons (Boni Pueri), and afterwards Beguins, and also from the occupation of most of them, Brother Weavers (Fratres Textores). The first association of these Beghards, it appears, was formed excluded from the rank of Friars). "Seculares autem vocantur Bizoclos, vel Fratricollos, vel Bocasotos." (Hero Jordanus errs in saying that the seculars were called Fratricolli, for this name was appropriated to the real monks of St. Francis and did not belong to the Tertiarii. His other statements are correct; and they show that these more rigid adherents to the rule of St. Francis were divided into two classes, namely, Friars and Seculars, and that the latter were called Bizochi). "Ii dogmatizabant, quod nullus summus Pontifex regulam B. Francisci declarare potuit. Item, quod angelus abstulit a Nicolao Turtio Papatus auctoritatem.—Et quod ipsi soli sunt in via Dei et vera ecclesia." &c.

¹ This distinction appears clearly from comparing, among others, several passages in the Acta Inquisit. Thol. See p. 303, 310, 312, 313, 319, &c.

² There was much discussion in the Netherlands in the seventeenth century respecting the origin of these Beghards and Beguinæ, of which I have given a full account in a work not yet published, De Beguinis. During this discussion the Beghinæ brought forward diplomas or written documents of the most authentic and unexceptionable character, from which it appears that there were associations of Beguinæ in the Netherlands, as early as the eleventh and twelfth centuries. They were able indeed to produce but three such documents, the first dated A.D. 1065, the second A.D. 1129, and the third A.D. 1151. The whole were published at Vilvorden by the Beghinæ then resident there. See Miræus, Opera Diplomatico-historica, tom. II. cap. xxvi. p. 948; and tom. III. p. 628, ed. nova, Puteanus, De Beghinarum apud Belgas Instituto et Nomine Suffragio; which tract, with another of the same Puteanus on the same subject, is extant in Ryckel's Vita S. Beggæ cum Annotat. p. 65, 227, Douay, 1631, 4to. Hence, while it must be admitted that those are in error who affirm that the class of females who are still called Beghinæ or Beguttæ first appeared in the twelfth or thirteenth century; yet the very small number of the documents and testimonies puts it beyond controversy, that the Beguinæ were a very obscure party previously to the thirteenth century—it may be that they possessed only that one Beguinagium which was at Vilvorden, in Brabant.

³ All the Beghards and Beghinæ still existing in the Netherlands, though existing under regulations very different from their original ones, eagerly maintain that they derived their name and their institution in the seventh century from St. Begga, duchess of Brabant, and daughter of Pepin, mayor of the palace in Austrasia; which lady they of course revere as their patroness, and regard as a kind of tutelary divinity. See Ryckel, Vita S. Beggæ cum Annotat. published at Douay and Louvain. This is a ponderous volume, but in other respects a slender work and stuffed with anile fables. Those who are unfriendly to the Beguini and Beguinæ contend that they derived their origin from Lambert le Begue, a priest of Liege in the twelfth century and a very pious man. See Peter Coens (a learned canon of Antwerp), in his Disquisitio Historica de Origine Beghinarum et Beghinagiorum in Belgia, Louvain, 1627, 12mo, than whom no one has more learnedly defended this opinion. Both these opinions have many and distinguished advocates, but none that are good authorities; and both of them may be easily confuted.

⁴ See Matth. Paris, Historia Major, ad ann. 1243 and 1250, p. 540, 696; Thomas Cantimprænsis, in his Bonum Universale de Apulia, lib. II. cap. II. p. 478, ed. Colvener; Herenthal in his unpublished Annals, an important extract from which is exhibited by Ryckel, in his notes Ad Vitam S. Beggæ, sec. 196, p. 355, &c. The origin and establishment of the Beguinagia, founded in the Netherlands during this and the following century, are detailed at great length by Miræus, in his Opera Historico-diplomatica; by Gramay, in his Antiquitates Belgicæ; by Sanderus, in his Brabantia et Flandria Illustrata; and by other historians of Belgian affairs.

⁵ Matth. Paris, Historia Major, ad ann. 1253, p. 539, 540.

at Antwerp in the year 1228, and it continues still in a flourishing state, though the fraternity have departed widely from their pristine mode of life. This association was followed by many others in Germany, the Netherlands, and France; yet these associations of Beghards were not so numerous as those of the Beghine [or female Beghards].¹ The Roman pontiffs never formally approved or confirmed with their sanction these associations of male and female Beghards, yet they tolerated them, and often at the request of influential men and women, protected them with their edicts and bulls against the violence and the plots of their enemies, of whom they had not a few. At the present day most of the houses belonging to both the sexes of Beghards are either destroyed or converted to other uses; yet in the Belgic provinces the houses of female Beghards are sufficiently numerous, while those for males are very few.

43. It remains that we briefly notice the names and merits of those among the Greeks and the Latins who acquired most fame by their writings. Among the Greeks the following are the most noted:² Nicetas Acominatus, to whom we are indebted for a history and a Thesaurus of the orthodox faith;³ Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople, of whose productions there are extant among some others a tract against the Latins, and an exposition of the Greek Liturgy;⁴ Theodorus Lascaris, who has left us several tracts on different topics in theology, and who also wrote against the Latins as nearly all the Greek authors did, this being a subject to which both their genius and their national attachments prompted them;⁵ Nicephorus Blemmida, one of those who endeavoured to restore harmony between the Greeks and Latins;⁶ Arsenius, whose Synopsis of the Greek ecclesiastical law is pretty well known;⁷ George Acropolita, known as the author of a history, and as a man in public life;⁸ John Beccus or Veccus, who brought himself into much trouble by advocating the cause of the Latins with more warmth than the zeal of most Greeks for their church would tolerate;⁹ George Metochita,¹⁰ and Constantine Meliteniota,¹¹ who expended much effort without effect to unite the Greeks and Latins; George Pachymeres, famed for his exposition of Dionysius the father of the mystics, and for a history of his own times;¹² and George of Cyprus, who acquired more fame by his invectives against the Latins and his attacks upon John Veccus, than by his other writings.¹³ devoted to literature, became emperor A.D. 1255, waged successful wars against the Bulgarians and others during three years, then resigned the empire and retired to a monastery, where he died A.D. 1259, aged thirty-six. Very few of his tracts have been published. — Mur.

¹ See above, p. 438, note 5. — Mur.

² Arsenius, surnamed Autorianus, was born at Constantinople, became a monk and an abbot at Nice, retired from office and lived at Mount Athos, was made patriarch of Constantinople by Theodorus Lascaris A.D. 1255, and tutor to Lascaris' son at his father's death A.D. 1259; resigned the patriarchate soon after, resumed the office in 1261, opposed and excommunicated the emperor Michael who had put out the eyes of Arsenius' royal pupil, was deposed and banished to the Proconnesus where he lived in exile many years. The time of his death is not ascertained. His Synopsis Dogmaticorum Canonum, written while he was a monk, and arranged under one hundred and forty-one Tituli, is in Justell's Biblioth. Juris Canon. Greek and Latin, tom. ii. p. 749. His testament or will was published, Greek and Lat. by Coteller, Monumenta Eccl. Gr. tom. ii. p. 168. — Mur.

³ See above, p. 438, note 2. — Mur.

⁴ Veccus was chartophylax of the great church of Constantinople, and a man of genius and learning. He at first strenuously opposed the Latins. For this the emperor Michael imprisoned him with others. By reading the writings of Nicephorus Blemmida, Veccus was converted into a friend and most zealous advocate of the Latins. Michael now made him patriarch of Constantinople A.D. 1274. On the death of Michael A.D. 1283, fearing the rage of the people he resigned his office, was the next year banished, and passed the remainder of his days in exile. His writings in defence of the Latins and in apology for his conduct are numerous, and were published, Greek and Lat. by Leo Allatius, in Græcia Orthodoxa, tom. i. and ii. and elsewhere. — Mur.

⁵ George Metochita was a deacon of the great church of Constantinople, and a friend and associate of John Veccus. With him he contended in behalf of the Latins, and with him suffered exile for this offence. He flourished A.D. 1276; the time of his death is not known. His writings, all in defence of the Latins, were published by Leo Allatius, Græcia Orthodoxa, tom. ii. — Mur.

⁶ Constantine Meliteniota was archdeacon of Constantinople under John Veccus, joined with Veccus and Metochita in defending the cause of the Latins, and passed through much the same sufferings. He died in exile in Bithynia. His tract on the union of the Greek and Latin churches, and another on the procession of the Holy Spirit, are extant, Gr. and Lat. in Leo Allatius, Græcia Orthodoxa, tom. ii. — Mur.

⁷ See above, p. 438, note 3. — Mur.

⁸ George of Cyprus, who assumed the name of

¹ See Ryckel's Vita S. Beggie, p. 635; Sander's Flandria Illustrata, lib. iii. cap. xvi. p. 136; Graunye, in his Antiq. Flandriae, and especially in Gundavo, p. 22; Miræus, Opera Diplomatico-histor. tom. iii. cap. clxviii. p. 145, and in several other places; Helyot, Hist. des Ordres, tome vii. p. 248, who however makes many mistakes. Gerhard Antonius, the Pater Minister (as the head of the sect is called) of the Beghards of Antwerp, in his Epistola ad Ryckelium de Beghardorum Origine et Fatis, in Ryckel's Vita S. Beggie, p. 489, who studiously casts obscurity on not a few things in order to exalt his sect.

² Concerning them all, in addition to the writers De Scriptoris Ecclesiasticis, see Fabricius's Bibliotheca Græca.

³ See above, p. 438, note 1. — Mur.

⁴ He was called Germanus II. in distinction from a patriarch of the eighth century. He was a monk of the Propontis, created patriarch about A.D. 1222, deposed in 1240, restored again, and died in 1254. His exposition of the liturgy sadly interpolated was published, Greek and Latin, in Fronto le Duc's Auctarium, tom. ii. and about twelve of his sermons and homilies, with seven of his epistles and decrees, have been published in different collections of ancient works, by Combes, Gretser, Leo Allatius, Coteller, Leunclavius, &c. — Mur.

⁵ Theodorus Lascaris was born at Nice, was much

44. The Latin writers form a long list, from which we shall produce those only who are most frequently quoted. Joachim, abbot of Flora in Calabria, was perhaps a pious man and not wholly ignorant of the truth; but he was a man of small parts, of weak judgment, and addicted to visionary and enthusiastic notions; both in his lifetime and after his death the ignorant multitude regarded him as inspired of God. His predictions became far-famed and have been often published.¹ Stephen Langton, archbishop of Canterbury, expounded many of the books of holy scripture.² Francis, founder of the famous society denominated Minorites or Franciscans, wrote some pieces designed to enkindle devotional feelings in the soul, but they display little energy or ingenuity.³ Alain de l'Isle was not the least among the dialecticians and acute reasoners of that age; he also paid attention to chemistry and has said many things wisely and well.⁴ James of Vitré [de Vitriaco] obtained reputation by his Oriental history,⁵ as did James of Varragio [de Voragine] by his Historia Lombardica.⁶ Among those who cultivated metaphysical or philosophical theology in this century, the most distinguished were Albertus Mag-

Gregory, was born and educated in the Latin church in Cyprus. At the age of twenty he went to Constantinople, changed his sentiments, became a monk and one of the court clergy, was created patriarch A.D. 1284, opposed and persecuted Veevus, was obliged to resign his office in 1299, retired to a monastery, and died not long after. He wrote largely against the Latins and in confutation of Veevus. His chief works are his Tomus Orthodoxus or Columna Orthodoxie, and discourses against the blasphemies of Veevus, still remaining in manuscript.

Besides the Greek writers enumerated by Mosheim, the following are noticed by Cave, in his Historia Literaria, tom. ii. :—

Nicolaus Hydruntinus, who flourished A.D. 1201 and was the Greek interpreter in all the negotiations of cardinal Benedict, both at Constantinople and in Greece, for a reconciliation of the Greek and Latin churches. He wrote in Greek various tracts against the Latins, from which only some extracts have been published.

Nicetas Maronita, chartophylax of the great church of Constantinople and then archbishop of Thessalonica who flourished A.D. 1201. He wished to effect a union of the Greek and Latin churches, and wrote six books on the procession of the Holy Spirit with a view to reconcile the two parties. Leo Allatius has published some extracts from the work, Adv. Hottinger, cap. xix. His answers to the questions of Basil are extant, Greek and Latin, in the Jus Gr. Rom. lib. v. p. 345.

Manuel Caritopolus, patriarch of Constantinople about A.D. 1250, wrote some tracts on ecclesiastical or canon law, which Leunclavius published, Greek and Latin, in his Jus Gr. Rom. lib. iii. p. 238, &c.

George Moschamper, chartophylax of the great church of Constantinople, who flourished about A.D. 1276. He was bitterly opposed to the Latins and wrote several pieces against them, which were answered by John Veevus. Nothing of his has been published.

Simon, born in Crete but of a Constantinopolitan family, is supposed by Cave to have flourished about A.D. 1276. A long epistle of his, addressed to John Nomophylax, De Concilio qua Processionem Spiritus Sancti a Filio Definivimus, was published Greek and Lat. by Leo Allatius, Adv. Hottinger, p. 324. He wrote two other tracts on the same subject, never published. —Mur.

¹ Gregory di Lauro composed in Italian a copious life of Joachim which was published at Naples, 1660, 4to. His prophecies were first printed at Venice, 1517, 4to, and often subsequently. [He was a Cistercian monk and abbot of different monasteries in Italy, the last of which, that at Flora, he himself founded. He flourished A.D. 1201 and died previously to A.D. 1215. He wrote De Concordia Veteris et Novi Testamenti, Commentaries on Jeremiah, Psalms, Isaiah, some portions of Nahum, Habakkuk, Zechariah, and Malachi, on the Apocalypse; also fifteen prophecies concerning the Roman pontiffs, besides some other prophecies. All the above were printed at Venice in different years previously to A.D. 1600. —Mur.

² Stephen Langton was an Englishman, but educated at Paris, where he became chancellor of the university and a canon of Paris. Innocent III. invited him to Rome and made him a cardinal. In the year 1206 the same pontiff made him archbishop of Canterbury against the will of the king, who refused him access to his see till he was compelled to it by the Pope in 1212. In 1215 Langton encouraged rebellion in England and aided the invasion by the French, for which he was accused and had to pay a heavy fine in 1218. He died in 1228. He wrote commentaries on a large part of the Bible, besides letters and sermons, nearly all of which remain in manuscript in the public libraries of England. —Mur. [See an account of him and his works, with a very curious specimen of his preaching on a stanza of a French popular song, in Wright's Biogr. Brit. Liter. Anglo-Norman Period, p. 442, &c. —R.

³ See above, p. 452, sec. 25, and note 3. His works, consisting of epistles, discourses, prayers, and monastic regulations, were collected and published by John de la Haye, Paris, 1651, fol. —Mur.

⁴ There were several of the name of Alan in this century, who have been strangely confounded both by the ancients and the moderns. See Le Boef, Mémoires sur l'Hist. d'Auxerre, tome I. p. 309, and Diss. sur l'Hist. Eccles. et Civile de Paris, tome II. p. 293, &c. [This Alanus de Insulis or Alain de l'Isle was a native of Flanders, studied at Paris, was called the Doctor Universalis on account of his extensive learning, was for a time bishop of Auxerre, but resigned the mitre and became a Cistercian monk. Cave supposes he flourished about A.D. 1215. His works as collected and published by Du Viesch, Antw. 1655, fol. consist of a commentary on the Canticles, on the art of preaching, a penitential, on the parables, a collection of memorable sayings, a poem in eleven books on a perfectly good man, two books against the Waldenses, eleven sermons, and a few other tracts. Du Viesch, in his Biblioth. Scriptor. Cisterciens. Colon. 1656, 4to, added Alain's commentary on the prophecies of Merlin and his tract on the philosopher's stone. —Mur.

⁵ Jacobus de Vitriaco or James of Vitré was born near Paris, educated in that city, became a priest in his native village, and a regular canon in the diocese of Nanterre. His zeal led him to Toulouse where he preached against the Albigenses, thence he went to Palestine and became bishop of Acco, or Ptolemais. About A.D. 1220 the Pope recalled him to Rome, made him cardinal bishop of Tusculum, and sent him as his legate into France to preach up a crusade. He returned to Rome, spent several years tranquilly, and died A.D. 1244. His oriental and occidental history is in three books; the first describes the country and nations of the east, and traces their history from the time of Mohammed to A.D. 1210; the second book gives the history of Europe during the author's own times; the third returns to the oriental nations and brings down their history to A.D. 1218. The first and third books were printed at Douay, 1597, 8vo, and in Bongarsius, Gesta Dei per Francos, tom. II. He also wrote a letter describing the capture of Damietta, which is in Bongarsius, ubi supra, and an epistle to Pope Honorius III. and sermons on the gospels and epistles for the year. —Mur.

⁶ See Echard's Scriptores Dominiani, tom. I. p. 454, and Bolandus' Prof. ad Acta Sanctor. tom. I. p. 9 [also p. 441, note 2, above. —Mur.

nus,¹ Thomas Aquinas,² and Bonaventura.³ That these men possessed very inquisitive minds, acute and superior understandings, and uncommon penetration in regard to abstruse and difficult subjects, no candid man will deny, although they assented to various things which are incorrect. Of the others who prosecuted the same species of theology, a long list appears in which are found men of subtlety and dexterity. That age held in reputation William of Paris, a man of acuteness;⁴ Alexander Hales, the expounder of Aristotle;⁵ Robert Capito,⁶

¹ Concerning Albertus Magnus, see Echart's Scriptores Dominici, tom. i. p. 163. [Albert the Great was born of noble parentage at Lunningen in Swabia, A.D. 1205, was early sent to Passau for education, and became a Dominican monk in 1223. Strange stories are told of his obtuseness in early life, and of his subsequent miraculous facility in acquiring knowledge. He was a universal scholar, but particularly distinguished in mathematics, natural philosophy, metaphysics, and scholastic theology. He taught at Hildesheim, Ratisbon, Cologne, and other places in Germany, and likewise at Paris. In 1238 he was made vicar-general of the Dominicans for two years, and afterwards provincial of the order for Germany. In 1249 he fixed himself at Cologne, and was president of the school there. In 1260 the pontiff obliged him to accept the bishopric of Ratisbon, but he resigned it in 1263 and retired to his favourite literary retreat at Cologne. He died in 1280, aged 75. His works in twenty-one volumes folio were published by Peter Jammy, at Lyons, A.D. 1651. They comprise eight works on dialectics, twenty-eight on natural philosophy, commentaries on the Psalms, Lamentations, Baruch, Daniel, the twelve minor prophets, the four Gospels, and the Apocalypse; many sermons, a compendium of theology in seven books, commentaries on Lombard's four books of Sentences, and various other pieces.—Mur.] [Concerning Albertus Magnus and his philosophical system see Ritter, Geschichte der Christl. Philos. vol. iv. p. 181—256.—H.

² Concerning Thomas Aquinas, called the Angel of the Schools, see the Acta Sanctorum, tom. i. Martii, p. 655, &c. and Tournon's Vie de St. Thomas, Paris, 1737, 4to. [Thomas was of the family of the counts of Aquino in the kingdom of Naples, and was born at Aquino A.D. 1224. Educated in monasteries where he displayed great precocity of genius, he became a Dominican monk at Naples in the year 1241 contrary to the will of his parents. His mother was denied access to him by the monks, who sent Thomas from one place to another to conceal him. At length in his attempted removal to Paris she and her other sons seized him. For two years they kept him a prisoner in their castle, and used every effort to persuade him to renounce a monastic life without effect. In 1244 he escaped through a window, went to Naples, and was conducted to Paris, and thence to Cologne, where he heard the lectures of Albert the Great. From Cologne he was called to Paris to lecture on the Sentences. He and Bonaventura received their doctorates in theology at Paris on the same day A.D. 1255. A few days after he returned to Italy and taught theology in the universities of Bologna, Rome, Fondi, Foggia, and Pisa. In the year 1263 he was appointed provincial Definitor (Visitor) of his order for the province of Rome, and in that capacity attended the general convention of the order in London the same year. He at last settled down at Naples on a stipend from the king, as a permanent teacher there. He now refused the archbishopric of Naples offered him by the Pope. In 1274 the Pope called him to the council of Lyons, to maintain the principles of the Romish church against the Greeks; but he died on his way thither at Terracina, on the 7th of March, 1274, aged 50 years. His works as printed at Rome, 1570, fill 18 volumes, folio, and in the edition of Paris, 1636—1641, 23 volumes, folio. They comprise comments on nearly all the works of Aristotle, and on the Sentences of Lombard, a huge system of theology, entitled Summa Theologiae in partes tres divisa, many miscellaneous pieces, commentaries on the Scriptures, sermons, &c.—Mur.] [For further information respecting the life, writings, and philosophical speculations of this celebrated divine, see chapter lxxix. in the 11th volume of the Encyclopædia Metropolitana, p. 793, &c. entitled Thomas Aquinas and the Scholastic Philosophy, from the pen of Dr. Hampden of Oxford, whose Bampton Lectures on the Scholastic Philosophy, Oxf. 1833, contain a valuable survey of that system. See also Ritter, ubi supra, vol. iv. p. 257—354, presenting a careful analysis of the philosophical and religious views of this "doctor angelicus."—R.

³ Concerning Bonaventura, the patron saint of Lyons

in France, see Colonia's Hist. Littér. de la Ville de Lyon, tom. ii. p. 307; Hist. de la Vie et du Culte de S. Bonaventure, par un Religieux Cordelier, Lyons, 1747, 8vo. [John Bonaventura (called Eustachius and Eutychius in Greek) was born of honourable parentage at Bagnarea in Tuscany, A.D. 1221, and became a Franciscan monk in 1243. He studied and gave lectures on the Sentences at Paris, where he took his doctor's degree in 1255. The next year he was unanimously elected general of his order, an office which he held till his death and filled with great advantage to the fraternity. He was called the Seraphic Doctor, and was a man esteemed and confided in by every one. In 1272 the cardinals, being unable to agree upon a new pontiff, submitted the election to Bonaventura, who nominated Theobald of Liege, or Gregory X. In 1274 Gregory created Bonaventura cardinal bishop of Alba, and called him to the general council of Lyons. He died at Lyons while the council was in session, July 15th, A.D. 1274, aged 53. His funeral was attended by the Pope, the emperor, and the whole council. Bonaventura was a scholar, a man of an acute mind, a good writer, and a very devout man. He united mystic with scholastic theology, and was a voluminous writer on practical religion. His works as printed at Rome, 1558, in eight volumes, fol. comprise commentaries on the Scriptures, a full comment on the Sentences of Lombard, a great number of tracts, chiefly on ascetic and practical subjects, letters, sermons, &c.—Mur.

⁴ See especially the Gallia Christiana of the Benedictines, tom. vii. p. 95. [William of Paris, D.D. was born at Aurillac, in Auvergne (and thence called William Alvernus), became an eminent scholar and divine, and was bishop of Paris from A.D. 1228 till his death, March 29th, 1249. His works were printed by Peroneus, Orleans, 1674, in two volumes, fol. They consist chiefly of tracts on moral and practical subjects; yet there are several on dogmatic theology. He is not to be confounded with Matthew Paris, the historian, as he too often is in the references throughout the original of this work of Mosheim, through the mistake no doubt of the printer.—Mur.

⁵ Alexander Hales or De Hales was an Englishman of Gloucestershire, but was early sent to Paris, where he spent most of his life in the study of scholastic theology and canon law and in teaching them to others. He was called the Irrfragable Doctor. He was a Franciscan, flourished about A.D. 1230, and died at Paris, August 27, 1245. His works as published separately consist of commentaries upon the Scriptures, commentaries on certain books of Aristotle, commentaries on the Sentences of Lombard, a system of theology, and a few tracts.—Mur.

⁶ Concerning him, Wood has written largely, Antiq. Oxon. tom. i. p. 81, 105. [Robert Grossetête or Capito was born at Stradbroke in Suffolk, and educated at Oxford and Paris. Returning to England he became archdeacon of Leicester, and then bishop of Lincoln from A.D. 1235 till his death, October 9th, 1253. He was a man of great learning and of an independent mind. The physical sciences, law, divinity, and the original languages of the Bible, all engaged his attention. He resisted the domination of the pope, and laboured to reform the clergy. His writings consist of translations, comments on Aristotle and Dionysius the Areopagite, sermons, letters, and other tracts, most of which still remain in manuscript. For a full account of him, see Milner's Church History, cent. xiii. c. 7.—Mur.

Thomas Cantipratensis,¹ John Peckham,² William Durand,³ Roger Bacon,⁴ Richard Middleton,⁵ Ægidius de Colonna,⁶ Armand

¹ Thomas Cantipratensis was born of noble parents at Lève near Brussels, studied under Albert the Great at Cologne, became a regular canon at Cantimpre near Cambrai, and afterwards a Dominican monk, subprior at Louvain, and a bishop, suffragan, and assistant to the bishop of Cambrai. He flourished A.D. 1255. His principal work is entitled Bonum Universale de Apibus; in which he gives precepts for the conduct of all orders of men, deriving his illustrations from bees. He also wrote several lives of reputed saints.—Mur.

² John Peckham was born of low parentage at Chichester in Sussex, England, studied at Oxford and Paris, became a Franciscan, taught with applause at Oxford, Paris, Lyons, and Rome. While at Rome, A.D. 1278, the pope created him archbishop of Canterbury. On his arrival in England the pope demanded of him 4,000 marks of silver for the use of the holy see. Peckham had to pay it. He next had contention with the archbishop of York. He became vastly rich, founded a college, raised his relatives to affluence, and died about A.D. 1291. He wrote Collectanea Bibliorum, and forty-seven synodical decrees which have been published, and a number of theological tracts which remain in manuscript.—Mur.

³ William Durand, LL.D. was born in Provence, France, of noble parents. He studied the civil and canon laws at Bologna, and took his doctorate there. He also taught law at Bologna and Mutina, and became so famous as a pleader that he was called the father of practice. He was auditor-general in the court of Rome, canon of Beauvais, and dean of Chartres. In 1274 he was the pope's proctor at the general council of Lyons. Nicholas III. made him governor of the papal dominions with the title of rector and count of the patrimony. In this capacity he commanded successfully in several battles. In 1286 he was made bishop of Mende in France. In 1296 the pope sent him as ambassador to the Saracens in the East; but he died at Nicotia in Cyprus. He was a learned man, a profound jurist, and a respectable theologian. He wrote Speculum Juris, a large work, Reperitorium Juris, extracted from the preceding, Rationale Divinum Officium, also some law tracts.—Mur.

⁴ See above, p. 442, note 7. Roger Bacon was nobly born at Ilchester, Somersetshire, England, about A.D. 1200. He studied at Oxford and then at Paris, where he took his degree. Languages, history, law, the physical sciences, and theology, were his pursuit. Returning to England he taught at Oxford, became a Franciscan monk, devoted himself to the physical sciences, expended much time and money on experiments in optics, mechanics, and chemistry, was esteemed a magician, and confined many years as such to a monastery. He died about the year 1284, aged 78, and was buried at Oxford. His Opus Majus addressed to pope Clement IV. contains an abstract by his own hand of all the works he had then published, and nearly supersedes the necessity of reading any of his other printed works.—Mur.

⁵ Richard Middleton or De Mediavilla, the Doctor solutus et copiosus, was an English Franciscan monk and theologian, who first studied philosophy, law, and theology at Oxford, and afterwards at Paris where he obtained a high reputation. In the year 1282 he was one of the commissioners appointed by the provincial of his order to try the cause of Peter John Olivi, which trial has been censured. He returned to England, and taught with great applause at Oxford, and died about A.D. 1300. He wrote four books of questions on Lombard's Sentences, and Quodlibeta Theologica, containing eighty questions in theology, both of which works have been published; also commentaries on the gospels and the epistles of Paul, and some tracts which are not published.—Mur.

⁶ Ægidius Colonna or De Columna, the Doctor Fundatissimus, was born at Rome, of the illustrious family of the Colonna, studied at Rome and in other places, became an Augustinian eremitic monk, was invited to Paris to be tutor to prince Philip, son of Philip the Bold, and taught many years in the university of Paris. In 1292 he was made prior-general of his order.

de Bello Visu,⁷ and others. But none of these attained to equal renown with the triumvirate above mentioned. Hugo de S. Caro was thought to have done much to advance sacred knowledge by his Concordance to the holy scriptures.⁸ William of St. Amour waged war with boldness and resolution, but not successfully, upon the fraternities which sought renown for piety in mendicity.⁹ Humbert de Romanis endeavoured by his writings to guide the conduct and regulate the lives of the monks.¹⁰ William Perald acquired very high reputation in that age by his Summa Virtutum et Vitiorm.¹¹ Raymond Martini still lives in his Pugio Fidei, or his work against the Jews and Saracens.¹²

In 1296 Boniface VIII. made him archbishop of Bourges. Whether he became a cardinal or not has been disputed. He died A.D. 1316, aged 69. His writings are very numerous though but partially published, and never collectively. They are on scholastic theology, dialectics, on the Sentences of Lombard, vindications of Thomas Aquinas and Bonaventura, and numerous other tracts.—Mur.

⁷ Armand of Bellevue or De Bello Visu was a Dominican monk, born at Bologna, and master of the sacred palace at Rome. He is supposed to have lived near the end of this century. His works are a commentary on the Psalms, meditations, prayers, sermons, and an explanation of difficult terms in theology and philosophy.—Mur.

⁸ Hugo of St. Cher, D.D. or De Sancto Caro, a Dominican monk, was born in Dauphiny, and studied at Paris, was papal ambassador to Constantinople under Gregory IX., became provincial of his order for France, was created a cardinal in 1249, after which he was repeatedly papal legate, especially to Germany. He died A.D. 1260. His works are, Poëtille or a brief commentary on the whole Bible, Venice, 1600, in eight volumes, sermons for the year, Speculum Sacerdotum et Ecclesie, and a Concordance to all the deliverable words in the Latin Bible, to which Conrad of Halberstadt added the particles, about A.D. 1290, and which has been often printed.—Mur.

⁹ William of St. Amour or De S. Amore. He was a native of Burgundy, and one of the leading doctors at Paris in the middle of this century. In the controversy between the university and the Dominicans he stood in the front of the battle. The pope ordered him to be degraded and banished in 1266. But supported by the university he held his ground, and fought more eagerly. See above, p. 454. His works were published at Constance (Paris), 1632, 4to.—Mur.

¹⁰ Humbert de Romanis or of Romans in Burgundy became a Dominican monk while studying at Paris, A.D. 1225, was made general of the order in 1254, resigned the office 1263, and died in 1274. He wrote Instructions for monks, a commentary on the rule of St. Augustine, two hundred sermons on various subjects, lives of monks, on the three monastic vows, and on the erudition of preachers. Most of these are in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xxv.—Mur.

¹¹ See Colonia, Hist. Littér. de la Ville de Lyon, tome ii. p. 322, &c. [William Perald or Perald, i.e. De Petra Alta, was born in the diocese of Vienne, became a Dominican monk in 1219, and some say archbishop of Lyons in 1272. He died in 1275. His Summa de Virtutibus et Vitiis has passed through numerous editions. This is his only work known, unless he is the author of the sermons for the year ascribed to William of Paris.—Mur.

¹² Raymond Martini or Des Martins, a Catalanian, and a very celebrated Dominican monk who flourished in Spain, A.D. 1278. At the suggestion of Raynond de Pennafort, general of his order, he composed his celebrated Pugio Fidei (Dagger of the Faith), in which he confutes the Jews and Saracens out of their own writers. It is a learned work, was long the chief

John of Paris deserves an honourable place among the defenders of truth and rectitude, because he contended for the power of temporal sovereigns against the machinations of the pontiffs, and because he openly professed his dissatisfaction with the prevailing doctrine respecting the Lord's supper.¹

arsenal for other writers against the Jews and Mohammedans, and was printed with notes by Voisin, Paris, 1651, fol. and Leips. 1687, fol.—Mur.

¹ His Determinatio de S. Cena was published by Peter Allix, London, 1686, 8vo. See Eclard's Scriptores Dominicani, tom. i. p. 501, &c.; Baluze, Vitus Pontif. Avenion. tom. i. p. 4, 576, 577, &c.—[John of Paris was a Dominican monk and a distinguished theologian of Paris, about A.D. 1290. When Boniface VIII. attacked Philip the Fair, king of France, John stood forth in defence of the king in a tract, De Regia Potestate et Papali. While he was preaching in the assemblies of his order and giving theological lectures in the schools with much applause, he advanced the idea that possibly Christ's presence in the eucharist was by impanation or uniting himself to the elements, and not by a transmutation of their substance; the masters of Paris cried out against him. He was condemned of error, and forbidden to preach or to lecture; but he appealed to the pope, went to Rome, and died soon after his arrival, A.D. 1304. His tract, De Regia Potestate et Papali, is in Goldast's Monarch. Imp. tom. ii. p. 107.

Besides those named by Mosheim, Cave notices the following Latin writers of this century:—

Sylvester Giraldus, called Cambrensis from his country, and Barrius from his family. He was the son of William de Barri, and born at Mainarpu near Pembroke in South Wales, England. His uncle David, bishop of Man, made him archdeacon of Brechin. He went to Paris for study, and there taught theology in the English college three years. On his return he made some figure at the court of Henry II. In 1185 he attended the Prince John, commanding an expedition to Ireland, was offered the bishopric of Wexford, which he refused. He continued some time in Ireland to examine its geography and antiquities; then returned to Wales, where he composed his history. Afterwards he accompanied Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury, in his pilgrimage to Palestine. In 1198 he was made bishop of Man; and a controversy arising respecting that see, he went to Rome in the year 1300, and finally lost his prelate. He lived to be more than seventy years old, but the time of his death is unknown. His printed works are, a Topography of Ireland, the Conquest of Ireland by the English, Travels in Cambria (Wales), and a Description of Cambria; all extant in the Scriptores X. Angliæ, Francf. 1602, fol. Several of his theological productions remain in manuscript.

Gervasius, an English Benedictine monk of Canterbury, well acquainted with the Anglo-Saxon history. He flourished A.D. 1201, and wrote an account of the conflagration and repair of the cathedral of Canterbury, sketches of the dissensions between the monks of Canterbury and the archbishop Baldwin, a Chronicle of English history from A.D. 1112 to A.D. 1199, and Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury from Augustine to Hubert inclusive; all of which are in the Scriptores Decem Angliæ, Lond. 1652, fol.

William de Selignacio, nade bishop of Auxerre A.D. 1206, and afterwards bishop of Paris till his death, 1223. He wrote a Summa Theologica (system of theology), printed at Paris, 1500.

Arnold of Hildesheim and abbot of Lubec flourished A.D. 1209, and continued Helmsold's Chronicon, from 1171 to 1209. He is considered as good authority in Slavonic affairs, but not in others. His continuation is published, in some editions imperfect, with Helmsold.

Absalom, a canon of St. Victor, Paris, and an abbot in the diocese of Treves, A.D. 1210, has left us fifty-one sermons on the festivals.

Robert de Monte or Robert de Torinnois, abbot of St. Michael de Monte in the diocese of Avranches in Normandy. Some think he flourished A.D. 1210, but others make him to have died A.D. 1186. The continuation of the Chronicon of Siebert Gemblacensis, from 1112 to A.D. 1210, or at least to A.D. 1182, is ascribed to him. He also wrote some historical and other tracts. All are published by D'Achery, in Append. ad Opp. Guiberti, Paris, 1651, and in his Spicilegium.

Willibrord of Oldenburg, canon of Hildesheim A.D. 1211. After visiting Palestine he wrote an account of his travels in that country, published by Leo Allatius, Symmicta, par. i. p. 104.

Uclinandus, a Frenchman, who after a dissolute life became a Cistercian monk at Mous Frigidus, in the diocese of Beauvais. He flourished A.D. 1212, and died A.D. 1227. His great work or Chronicle from the Creation to A.D. 1204, with some sermons, martyrdoms of saints, &c. was published by Tissier, in his Biblioth. Cisterciensis, and by Surius.

Alexander Neckam, born at St. Albans, studied in England, visited the universities of France and Italy, returned to St. Albans, removed to Exeter, became a canon regular of St. Augustine, and was abbot there from 1215 till his death, A.D. 1227. His works, which are chiefly commentaries on the scriptures, were never published but are preserved in manuscript.

Honorius III. pope A.D. 1216—1227, famous for his zeal for crusades against the Saracens and the Albigenses, and for excommunicating the emperor Frederick II. has left us nineteen epistles, extant in the Collections of Councils, Baluze's Miscellanea, and Wadding's Annales.

Antonius de Padua, a Portuguese of Lisbon, who removed to Italy, lived at Padua, became a Franciscan theologian and preacher, was called to Rome and honoured by the pope and cardinals, and died A.D. 1231. He was a weak man though a popular preacher. Many of his sermons and mystic expositions of the scripture have been published.

Jordan, of Saxon origin, born in the diocese of Mentz, became a Dominican monk in 1220, provincial of his order for Lombardy in 1222, and general of the order in 1223. He died about 1236, leaving a tract on the origin of his order, and one or two devotional works.

Cæsarius, a German, who became a Cistercian monk at Heisterback, in the diocese of Cologne, A.D. 1119, was made master of the novices there, and then prior of a monastery near Bonn. He flourished A.D. 1225, and wrote De Miraculis et Visionibus sui Temporis, in twelve books or Dialogues (full of fables), a life of St. Engelbert, bishop of Cologne, and a number of sermons; all of which have been published.

Gregory IX. pope A.D. 1227—1241, famous for his conflicts with the emperor Frederick II. His works, consisting of numerous epistles and decrees, were collected and published with notes by Amelius, Antw. 1572, fol.

John Algrin, a French divine, dean of Amiens, chanter of Abbeville, archbishop of Besançon in 1225, and a cardinal A.D. 1227, after which he was sent into Spain to preach a crusade against the Saracens. He died A.D. 1236. His commentary on the Canticles was printed, Paris, 1521, fol.

Raymund de Pennaforti or De Rupe-Forti, a Catalan of Barcelona, descended from the royal line of Aragon and the counts of Barcelona, born A.D. 1175, taught canon law at Bologna, became canon and archdeacon of Barcelona, a Dominican monk, served the papal court in the department of confessions, was general of his order A.D. 1238—1240, resigned and refused the archbishopric of Tarragona and some other sees, and died A.D. 1275, aged one hundred years. He wrote Summa de Casibus Pœnitentialibus, seu de Pœnitentiis et Matrimonis, printed with notes, Fribourg, 1603, and compiled by order of Gregory IX. the part of the Corpus Juris Canonici called Libri v. Decretalium, or the Decretals of Gregory.

Philipp Greivius, chancellor of the university of Paris, about A.D. 1230, has left us 330 sermons on the Psalms of David, printed, Paris, 1523, 8vo. Some others of his commentaries exist in manuscript.

Conrad of Marburg, a distinguished Dominican monk and preacher, confessor to Elizabeth, margravine of Thuringia. He flourished A.D. 1230, and wrote the life and miracles of Elizabeth, his patroness, published by Leo Allatius, Symmicta, par. i. p. 269.

Petrus de Vineis, chancellor to the emperor Frederick II. and the defender of his rights against the Pope. He made a public speech against the papal encroachments in a diet at Pavia, A.D. 1230, and was the emperor's ambassador and advocate in the council of Lyons, A.D. 1245. His six books of epistles relating to the affairs of the emperor Frederick were first published, Basil, 1566, 8vo.

Edmund Rich, archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. 1234—1240. He was a great patron of learning as his foundations at Oxford declare, and a zealous reformer of the discipline of the church and the morals of the clergy. He went to Rome to complain of the vices and corruptions in the church, spoke boldly there, incurred enmity and a heavy fine, returned discouraged, resigned his office, and went to France where he died. In 1456 he was canonized as a saint. His Speculum Ecclesie is in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xxv. and his twelve ecclesiastical laws are in Lindwood's Provinciale Anglorum.

Lucas, a Spaniard of Leon, who after travelling in Italy, Greece, and Palestine, was in 1236 made bishop of Tuy in Galicia, Spain. He wrote a confutation of the errors of the Albigenses, printed in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xxv. the life and miracles of St. Isidore, published by Mabillon and Holandus, and continued the Chronicon of Isidore to his own times, extant in Schott's Hispania Illustrata, tom. iv.

Godofridus, a German monk in the convent of St. Pantaleon within the city, Cologne. He flourished A.D. 1237, and wrote Annals from A.D. 1162 to A.D. 1237, published by Freher, Scriptores Germanici, tom. i. p. 239.

Innocent IV. pope A.D. 1243—1254, a very ambitious and arrogant pontiff. He wrote commentaries on the five books of Decretals, and a very large number of epistles which are extant in the Collections of Councils and in Wadding's Annales and Regestum Pontificum.

John de S. Gemignano, a Dominican monk, intimate with Thomas Aquinas, and an eminent theologian and preacher who flourished about A.D. 1244. Gregory IX. sent him to preach up a crusade in the region about Naples against the emperor Frederick II. His Summa de Exemplis et Hierum Similitudinibus was often published and particularly Cologne, 1670, 4to. His funeral and quadragesimal sermons have also been published.

Peter, the son of Cassiodorus, was an English knight who flourished about A.D. 1250. His epistle to the English church, advising it to shake off the tyrannical yoke of the Roman pontiff, is in the Catalogus Testium Veritatis, p. 365.

Theobald Stampensis, an English secular priest who perhaps flourished A.D. 1250, by some placed much earlier, has left five epistles, in D'Achery's Spicilegium, tom. iii.

David de Augusta, a Franciscan monk of Augsburg, A.D. 1250, wrote some directions for monks, extant in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xxv.

John Seneca, a distinguished jurist and rector of the church of Halberstadt, A.D. 1250. When Clement IV. demanded a tenth of all clerical salaries in France and Germany for a crusade to Palestine A.D. 1265, John resisted openly and accused the pontiff of avarice, for which he was deposed and excommunicated. He died A.D. 1267. His commentary on the Decretum of Gratian has been often printed with the text.

Gertrude, a German Benedictine nun at Rodalsdorf, abbess there in 1261, and afterwards removed to Helfden where she died A.D. 1290. She wrote in German Exercitia Spiritualia, which being translated into Latin were published with the works of Mechtilda, a contemporary sister in the same nunnery.

Robert de Sorbona or De Sorbonne, confessor or at least chaplain to St. Lewis, king of France, a canon first at Soissons and then at Paris. In the year 1252 he founded the divinity college called the Sorbonne in the university of Paris. He died after the year 1271 leaving three devotional tracts—on conscience, on confession, and the journey to Paradise, extant in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xxv.

Ruinertus Saccho of Piacenza, a distinguished philosopher and theologian. He was first a leading man among the Waldenses [Cathari.—R.], but abandoning them he became a Dominican monk and Inquisitor-general. He flourished A.D. 1254 and died in 1269. He wrote Summa de Catharis et Leonistis, extant in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xxv. and with the notes of Gretser, Ingolst. 1614, 4to.

Alexander IV. pope A.D. 1254—1261, has left us

nearly three hundred epistles, three of which are in the Concilia, and the rest in Wadding's Annales and Regest. Pontif.

Albert, a Benedictine monk of Stade in the archbishopric of Bremen, and A.D. 1232 abbot there till 1236, when he went to Rome, resigned his abbacy in 1240, became a Franciscan, and at length general of the latter order. He wrote a Chronicle from the creation to A.D. 1256, which is better than most others. It was printed at Helmst. 1587, 4to, and Wittemb. 1608, 4to.

John Gualensis or Wallis, an English Franciscan monk of Worcester, who taught philosophy and theology at Oxford and at Paris, and was called the Arbor Vitae on account of his excellent doctrines. He flourished A.D. 1260 and died at Paris in a year not ascertained. His religious works were all published at Lyons, 1511, fol. Some others of his works on canon law have also been published.

Bonaventura Brocardus of Strasburg, a Dominican monk who went into the East, and resided long there about the middle of the century. His description of places in the Holy Land was printed, Ingolst. 1604, 4to, Cologne, 1624, 8vo, and often elsewhere.

Urban IV. was papal legate in Pomerania, Prussia, Livonia, and Germany, then patriarch of Jerusalem, and A.D. 1261—1264 pope. His paraphrase on the 50th Psalm is in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. ii. His epistles are in the Concilia, and twenty-four others in Wadding's Annales and Regest. Pontif.

Henry de Segusio, bishop of Ambrun before A.D. 1258, and cardinal bishop of Ostia, A.D. 1262, died A.D. 1271, so distinguished for knowledge of both civil and canon law that he was called Pons et Splendor Juris. He wrote Summa Ultriusque Juris which is often called Aurea Summa Hostiensis, and an exposition of the six books of the Decretals; both have been printed.

Clement IV. pope A.D. 1265—1268, has left us numerous epistles and bulls, extant in various collections of documents.

Gilbert or Guibert, a Franciscan monk and professor of theology in the university of Paris, A.D. 1270. Several of his tracts are extant.

Nicolaus Manapus, a Dominican monk, penitentiary in the court of Rome, and then patriarch of Jerusalem, died at Ptolemais, A.D. 1288. His Biblia Pauperum, or Examples of Virtue and Vice, has been often printed.

Gregory X. pope A.D. 1271—1276, has left us twenty-five epistles.

Robert Kilwarbus (Kilwarby) studied at Oxford and Paris, became a Franciscan, and archbishop of Canterbury A.D. 1272, went to Rome in 1277, was made a cardinal, and died in 1280. He left a number of theological and scientific works preserved in manuscript but never published.

Innocent V. pope A.D. 1276, during five months, left a Compendium Theologicum, and a Commentary on the four books of Sentences.

John XXI. (or XIX.) pope A.D. 1276—1288, has left several epistles, some treatises on logic, and one on the cure of diseases, which have been published.

Henry of Ghent or Gandavensis, long a teacher of philosophy and theology in the Sorbonne, and called Doctor Sollemnis. He died A.D. 1293, leaving a Summa Theologiae, Quodlibeta Theologica on the four books of Sentences, De Viris Illustribus, or an account of ecclesiastical authors; besides several other works never printed.

Udalric Ulric, a German of Strasburg, pupil of Albertus the Great, a Dominican monk, and theologian of Paris, died prematurely about A.D. 1280, leaving a Compendium of Theology, besides other works not printed.

Mechtildis, a German lady of high family and a Benedictine nun of Helfden. She flourished A.D. 1280, and died before A.D. 1290. Her Revelation or five books of spiritual grace, composed in German and translated into Latin, were published with other works of a similar character, Paris, 1513, and Cologne, 1536.

Guido Balfus, a native of Reggio and a citizen and archdeacon of Bologna, an eminent jurist, flourished A.D. 1283. He wrote three books of Commentaries entitled the Trivium, on the five books of the Decretals, published, Venice, 1580.

Nicolaus IV. pope A.D. 1288—1292, left numerous epistles, many of which are published by Bsovius and Wadding; besides commentaries on the Scriptures,

CHAPTER III.

HISTORY OF RELIGION AND THEOLOGY.

1. THE inveterate defects of the prevailing religion, though very great and fundamental, were yet increased by considerable accessions. The Greeks and Orientals were gradually diverted more and more from the principles of truth and rectitude by their hatred of the Latins, by their immoderate veneration for the fathers and antiquity, by the calamities of the times, and by the heedlessness and stupidity of their prelates. Among the Latins, besides the sovereign pontiffs who it appears would tolerate nothing which was even remotely injurious to their majesty and authority, the scholastic doctors, among whom the Dominican and Franciscan monks stood foremost and were the most subtle, by philosophising, disputing, dividing, and distinguishing, exceedingly obscured the and theological treatises and sermons, never published.

Theodoric de Apoldia, a native of Erfurth and a Dominican monk, who flourished A.D. 1289. He wrote the life of Elizabeth, daughter of Andrew king of Hungary, and widow of Lewis, landgrave of Thuringia, published by Canisius, Lectiones Antiq. par. ii. p. 147; also the life of St. Dominic, founder of the order of Dominicans, published by Surius, at August 5th.

Augustinus Triumphus, of Ancona, an Augustinian eremite monk, who spent several years at the university of Paris but more at Venice, and at last fixed his residence at Naples, where he died A.D. 1298, aged 85. He wrote Summa de Potestate Ecclesiastica, published, Rome, 1479, 4to, and 1582, fol. several devotional pieces, a book of extracts from St. Augustine, besides several theological works, extensive commentaries on the Scriptures, and many sermons, never published.

William Major, a Frenchman, penitentiary of Angers, and bishop of the same, A.D. 1290–1314. He wrote the history of his episcopacy up to the year before his death; published by D'Achery, Spicileg. tom. x.

Guilto, of noble birth in Burgundy, studied theology and canon law nine years at Paris and Orleans, and after filling several other offices was abbot of St. Germain of Auxerre, from A.D. 1277 to 1309, when he resigned his office and lived a retired life till his death in 1313. He wrote the history of the abbots of his monastery from A.D. 1189 to 1277, published by Labbe, Biblioth. Nov. M.S. tom. i.

Henry (according to some, Amandus) Suso, of noble birth in Swabia, a distinguished Dominican theologian and lecturer at Constance, who flourished A.D. 1290, and died about the close of the century. He wrote various tracts, epistles, and sermons, in German, which Surius translated into Latin and published, Cologne, 1588, 8vo.

Boniface VIII. pope A.D. 1294–1303, has left numerous epistles and bulls published by Bzovius and Wadding; besides the Liber Sextus Decretalium, which is a part of the Corpus Juris Canonici.

Engelbert, a Benedictine monk, distinguished as early as A.D. 1273, and abbot of Admont in Styria from A.D. 1297. He wrote an heroic poem or panegyric on the coronation of Rodolph of Hapsburg, and a tract on the rise, progress, and fall of the Roman empire; the last is in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xxv, and the first is in all the collections of German historians.

Thomas Wickes or Wicelius, an English regular canon of St. Augustine in the monastery of Osnaburg, near Oxford, who flourished about A.D. 1299. He wrote a Chronicle of England from William the Conqueror A.D. 1066 to the year 1304, which was published among the Scriptores Historia Anglicana, tom. ii. Oxford, 1687, fol.

simple and beautiful religion of Christ. The most pernicious among them—for all were not equal offenders—were those who led the mass of people to believe that men can perform more than God requires of them, and that all religion consists in the external homage of the lips and in certain bodily gestures.

2. In the fourth and very full council of the Lateran, A.D. 1215, Innocent III. a most imperious pontiff, without asking the opinion of any one, published seventy decrees, in which, besides other enactments calculated to increase the power of the pontiffs and to give importance to the clergy, he extended the religious system by adding to it some new doctrines, or as they are called articles of faith. For whereas there had hitherto been different opinions respecting the manner in which Christ's body and blood are present in the eucharist, and no public decision had defined what must be held and taught on this point, Innocent pronounced that opinion to be the only true one which is now universal in the Romish church; and he consecrated to it the hitherto unknown term Transubstantiation.¹ He also required it to be held as an article of faith, that every one is bound by a positive divine ordinance to enumerate and confess his sins to a priest, which indeed had before been the opinion of some doctors, but it was not the public belief of the church; for up to this time, although the confession of sins was held to be a duty, yet every one had been at liberty according to his pleasure either to confess them mentally to God alone or orally to a priest also.² The reception of both these dogmas as of divine authority, in consequence of the injunction of Innocent, produced many regulations and decisions, wholly unknown in the Scriptures or in the early ages of the church, and calculated to foster superstition rather than piety.

¹ See, among many others, Albertin, De Eucharistia, lib. iii. p. 972. [The decree of Innocent is in Harduin's Concilia, tom. vii. p. 16, 17: "Una vero est fidelium universalis ecclesia, extra quam nullus omnino salvatur. In qua idem ipse Sacerdos et Sacrificium Jesus Christus: cujus corpus et sanguis in sacramento altaris sub speciebus panis et vini veraciter continentur, transubstantiatis, pane in corpus, et vino in sanguinem, potestate divina, ut ad periculum mysterium unitatis acclamans de suo quod accipit ipse de nostro. Et hoc utique sacramentum nemo potest conficere, nisi sacerdos, qui fuerit rite ordinatus secundum claves ecclesie, quas ipse concessit apostolis et eorum successoribus Jesus Christus."—Mur.] [This ominous and fatal word first occurs in its Latin form, transubstantiatio, in a sermon of Hilbert of Tours (No. 93, Synodus ad Sacerdotes, in his Opera, col. 685, &c. Bened. edit.), and the verb transubstantiare was first used by Stephen, bishop of Autun from 1113 to 1129, in his treatise De Sacramento Altaris, cap. xiv. in the Biblioth. Patr. Max. tom. xx. p. 1879.—R.]

² See Dailé, De Confessione Auriculari, and many others. [This decree of Innocent is in Harduin, ubi supra, p. 35, art. xxi. It is in this form: "Omnis utriusque sexus fidelis, postquam ad annos discretionis pervenerit, omnia sua solus peccata confiteatur fideliter, saltem semel in anno, proprio sacerdoti; et inunctam sibi penitentiam studeat pro viribus adimplere, &c. aliquin et vivens ab ingressu ecclesie arceatur, et moriens Christiana careat sepultura."—Mur.]

3. Nothing perhaps will show more clearly the general unsoundness of the religion of the age and its discordance with the Bible than the history of the societies of Flagellants, which first originated in Italy in the year 1260, and afterwards spread over a large part of Europe. A great multitude of persons of all ranks and ages and both sexes ran about the streets of cities and country towns, with whips in their hands, lashing miserably their naked bodies; and they expected by this voluntary punishment, by their frightful countenances and their distracted cries, to procure the divine compassion for themselves and others.¹ This method of propitiating the Supreme Being was perfectly accordant with views entertained in that age of the nature of religion. Nor did these Flagellants do anything but what they had learned from the monks, and particularly from the mendicant orders. Hence they were at first highly revered and extolled for their sanctity, and not by the populace only but even by their rulers and governors. But when the turbulent, the extravagant, and those contaminated with absurd opinions, joined themselves to the more decent and moral Flagellants, the emperors and the pontiffs issued decrees to put a stop to this religious frenzy.

4. The expounders of the sacred volume in this century differed not at all from those who assumed that office in the previous times. Most of them declared it to be their aim to draw out the internal juice and marrow of the sacred books, that is, to elicit their recondite or secret sense; and for the most part they do it so clumsily, that a discerning man can hardly escape a nausea while reading their commentaries. Those who are disposed to put their power of endurance to the test may peruse the lucubrations of Hugo of St. Cher, Stephen Langton, and Anthony of Padua, on various parts of the Bible. None pursued this course more intently or more ridiculously than the mystic doctors, of whom not one is so obtuse but he can see clearly in the sacred writers all the principles of his mystic theology. Nor were their opponents, the scholastics, entirely averse from this method of interpretation; though they were at more pains to collect the opinions of the ancient interpreters than to devise new ones; as the example of Alexander Hales, William Alvernus, and Thomas Aquinas, will show. They likewise call in occasionally the aid of dialectics. To assist the expounders of the sacred books, Hugo of St. Cher composed his index of the words in these books or his Concordance to them.² The Dominicans by direction of Jordan, the general of their order, set forth a new edition of the Latin version of the scriptures, carefully corrected by the older copies.³ The Greeks attempted nothing in this department worthy of notice. But among the Syrians, Gregory Abulpharajus very learnedly explained a large portion of the Bible.⁴

5. It would be tedious to enumerate all those who treated systematically either theoretical or practical theology; for all who possessed a tolerable share of discernment and ability to write applied themselves to this branch of theology, and especially all those who taught in the schools, among whom the Dominicans and the Franciscans held the first rank. But it is not necessary to recite the names of these doctors, or to specify all their lucubrations; for whoever has made himself acquainted with Albertus Magnus or with Thomas Aquinas, his disciple, knows them all. The first place among these writers on systematic theology belongs to Thomas Aquinas, who was commonly called the Angel of the Schools or the Angelic Doctor. For as soon as his Summa, or system of theology, both dogmatical and practical, began to circulate, all eagerly caught hold of the work and made it, in connexion with Lombard, the Master of the Sentences, the basis of instruction and the source of correct knowledge. Some indeed have denied that this celebrated work was the production of Thomas,⁵ but their reasons are by no means solid and satisfactory.⁶

6. The greatest part of these doctors followed Aristotle as their model, and ap-

¹ See Echard's Scriptores Ordinis Prædicatorum. tom. i. p. 194.

² Simon, Critique de la Biblioth. Eccles. de M. Du Pin, tome i. p. 841.

³ Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vat. tom. ii. p. 277.

⁴ See Launoi, Traditio Ecclesie Romanæ circa Sinogramam, p. 290.

⁵ See Nat. Alexander, Hist. Eccles. sæcul. xiii. p. 391; Echard and Quetif's Scriptores Ordinis Prædicatorum. sæcul. xiii. tom. i. p. 293, &c.; Tournon's Vie de St. Thome, p. 604.

¹ Schötgen, Hist. Flagellantium; Boileau, Hist. de Flagellans, chap. ix. p. 253. A drawing descriptive of this penance of the Flagellants is given by Martene, Voyage Littér. de deux Bénédictins, tome ii. p. 105. Compare Muratori's Antiq. Ital. Mediæ ævi, tom. vi. p. 469, &c.

plied his principles, both dialectical and philosophical, to the investigation and explication of Christian doctrines. In explaining metaphysically the more abstruse doctrines, they followed the opinions of the Realists. For this sect had far more followers through nearly all this century than the Nominalists; which may be attributed to the vast influence of Albertus and Thomas, who stood at the head of the Realists at this time. But although these most lucid, irrefragable, seraphic, and angelic doctors, as they were called, may have viewed themselves as sagacious and powerful defenders of revealed religion, yet they very often poured darkness rather than light upon their subjects. For not to mention their intolerable and often ridiculous phrasology or their disgusting barbarity of style, and to pass by their senseless eagerness for prying into subjects inscrutable to man, they failed in the very points in which true philosophers ought least of all to be found defective; for their definitions are obscure and inaccurate, and their divisions are unsuitable and illogical. And these faults, which necessarily produce confusion of thought and obscurity in reasoning, are chargeable on the great Thomas himself.

7. This propensity to examine religious subjects by the powers of reason and human sagacity greatly lessened the number of those who, in the manner of the ancients and without employing philosophy, were accustomed to demonstrate religious truths by the scriptures and by the authority of the fathers, and who were therefore called biblical divines. Certain pious men indeed,¹ and even the Roman pontiffs,² seriously admonished the theologians, and more especially those of Paris, to avoid the subtleties of philosophy, and to teach the doctrines of salvation according to the scriptures with simplicity and purity, but their admonitions were fruitless; for so great was the enthusiasm for metaphysics, dialectics, and philosophy, that no arguments or exhortations could control it. The scholastic doctors did not indeed wholly disregard the scriptures and tradition; but what they adduce from these sources showed plainly that they had not been carefully studied.³ At length they relinquished this study entirely to others, and reserved to themselves merely the province of disputing and philosophising. The outward circumstances of these doctors were not the least efficient cause of their pursuing such a course; for most of them were Dominican and Franciscan monks; and these sects held no property, possessed no libraries, and were moreover required to lead unsettled and vagrant lives. Of course, those who wished to make a figure as writers were compelled to rely wholly upon their own ingenuity.

8. The followers of the old divines deemed it the more necessary to resist strenuously these new dialectical theologians, in proportion as they instilled corrupt and dangerous sentiments into the youth in their schools. For they not only explained the mysteries of religion according to the principles of their dialectics, subjecting them to the empire of reason, but they also brought forward doctrines which were absolutely impious and manifestly hostile to religion; doctrines relating to God, to matter, the world, the origin of all things, and the nature of the human soul; and if any one taxed them with the fact they were accustomed to answer, that these doctrines were philosophically true and consonant with right reason, but that they readily admitted them to be theologically false. And hence, throughout this century, in all the universities and particularly at Paris and Oxford, you might see the ancient and biblical divines uttering decisions, opinions, and treatises in opposition to the dialectic theologians, and both publicly and privately accusing them of corrupting the religion of the scriptures.⁴ Even St. Thomas was judged by the Parisians to be unsound, or to deviate on many points from the simple truth.⁵ He indeed, though involved in various contests, escaped without harm; but others of less weight of character were required publicly to confess their errors while alive, or were severely censured after their death.

9. Still more dangerous to the scholastic divines were the mystics, and all those who

¹ See Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. iii. p. 2, 129, 180; Wood's Antiq. Oxon. tom. i. p. 91, 92, 94.

² See especially a sharp and memorable epistle of Gregory IX. to the Parisian masters; in Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. iii. p. 129, which concludes with these words: "Mandamus et districtè precipimus, quatenus sine fermento mundanæ scientiæ doceatis theologiam puritatem, non adulterantes verbum Dei philosophorum figmentis—sed contenti terminis a patribus institutis mentis auditorum vestrorum fructu celesti eloqui saginetis, ut hauriant de fontibus Salvatoris."

³ Faydit's Altération du Dogme Théologique par la Philos. d'Aristote, p. 289; Simon's Critique de la Biblioth. Ecclési. de M. Du Pin, tome i. p. 170, 187.

⁴ See Matth. Paris, Historia Major, p. 541; Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. iii. in many places, but especially p. 397, 430, 433, 472, &c.

⁵ See Launo, Hist. Gymnas. Navarreni, par III. lib. iii. c. cxvi. in his Opp. tom. iv. par. i. p. 485; Buleus, ubi supra, tom. iv. p. 204; Zornius, Opuscula Sacra, tom. i. p. 445; Simon, Lettres Choisies, tome ii. p. 266, &c.; Echar'd's Script. Ord. Prædic. tom. i. p. 485, &c.

maintained that piety was the only thing to be regarded, and that all discussions on religious subjects were to be discarded; for these were the most acceptable to the people, and had most influence with them. The accusations and prejudices of such opponents, the dialecticians judged it not advisable to repel by force, but to conciliate by prudent measures. They therefore extolled mystic theology with lavish praises, and even explained its principles in various treatises, combining it with the theology taught in the schools, notwithstanding the two systems were naturally at variance. The works of this character by Bonaventura, Albertus Magnus, Robert Capito, and Thomas Aquinas, are well known. Nor did they blush to publish comments on Dionysius himself, the coryphæus of the mystics, whom perhaps they at the same time viewed with secret contempt.¹

10. Therefore in this century both the scholastics and the mystics wrote treatises on the duties of a Christian life, and on the way in which the soul is to be purified from its corruptions; but, as may readily be supposed, their treatises are very different in character. What the mystics taught and recommended as being a life of piety may be learned from the annotations of George Pachymeres on Dionysius, written in Greek, and from the Spiritual Institutes or Compendium of mystic theology by Humbert de Romanis. The primary object of the scholastics was to explain the nature of virtues and vices, as is manifest from the numerous Summas [or systems] of the virtues and vices which appeared in this age. The virtues they divide into the moral (which are precisely those that Aristotle recommended to his disciples), and the theological, of which there are three—faith, hope, and love—according to the enumeration of St. Paul, 1 Corinth. xiii. 13. In explaining both they spend more time on questions and controversies than in giving direct and lucid instruction. In this department the pre-eminence is due to Thomas, who devotes the entire second part of his Summa to moral or practical theology, and on whom innumerable others wrote commentaries.

11. But great care is necessary in reading the writers on moral theology of this and the following centuries. For though they use the same terms which the inspired writers and we of the present day do, yet they assign to them very different imports. The justice, charity, sanctity, and faith of most of the doctors of this age, are not identical with the virtues which Christ and his apostles designate by these terms. According to the views of Christ, he is a holy or pious man who devotes his whole soul to God and to his law; but the writers of these times denominate him a holy and pious man who divests himself of his possessions and worldly goods in order to enrich the priest and to build churches and monasteries, and who does not deny or neglect to do anything which the pontiffs would have men believe or do. And it is lawful and right, if we may believe these writers, to treat with all possible severity and even to massacre a heretic—that is, one who will not be submissive to the will of the Roman pontiff. The justice therefore which was inculcated in that age was a very different thing from that which the Scriptures enjoin.

12. Among the Greeks, Nicetas Acominatus in his Treasury of the Orthodox Faith confronted all the sects of errorists; but it was in the manner of the Greeks—that is, by the testimonies and the authority of the fathers and ecclesiastical councils, rather than by the declarations of holy scripture and by sound arguments.—Among the Latins, Raymund of Pennafort attempted to confute the Jews and Saracens, not in the manner practised previously, by penalties and the sword, but by arguments addressed to the understanding.² And this led many others, who were no contemptible disputants and who were acquainted with the Hebrew and Arabic languages, to assail these nations in a similar manner, among whom Raymund Martini, the author of the Pugio Fidei, manifestly stands pre-eminent.³ Thomas also contended for the truth of Christianity in his Summa contra Gentes, which is no contemptible performance.⁴ And Alanus ab Insulis [Alain de

¹ Whether Mosheim has here stated the real motives of these men in extolling and expounding the principles of the mystics, those must judge who are familiar with their writings. Metaphysical theology and mystical will be found often associated in the minds of the devout in every age. And in that age, the mystics gave at least as good evidence of deep-toned piety or of intimate communion with God as any others; and such men as Bonaventura may easily be supposed to have felt not a little sympathy with them in their devout contemplations. Who does not know how much the writings of Thomas à Kempis (a mystic of the fourteenth century) have been admired, even by Protestants, down to the present times? Besides, those more devout scholastics give too much evidence of sincerity and integrity to admit, without strong proof, that they would deliberately and systematically commend and write books in defence of a religious system which in their hearts they viewed with contempt.—Mur.

² Echard and Quetif's Scriptores Ord. Prædic. tom. I. secul. xiii. p. 108, &c.

³ Bayle, Dictionnaire, article Martini, tom. II. p. 2077; Colomesius, Hispania Orientalis, p. 209.

⁴ Fabricius, Delectus Argumentorum et Scriptor. pro Veritate Religionis Christianæ, p. 270.

[Isle] did the same in his work Against the Jews and the Pagans. Those who engaged in other controversies were far inferior in merit to these, and aimed rather to render their adversaries odious than to lead them to embrace the truth.

13. The principal controversy of this century was that which had produced separation between the Greek and Latin churches; and in discussing and endeavouring to settle this division nearly the whole century was consumed in unsuccessful efforts. Gregory IX. employed the Franciscan monks, especially after the year 1232, in negotiations for peace with the Greeks, but their efforts were unavailing.¹ Afterwards in the year 1247, Innocent IV. sent John of Parma with other Franciscans to negotiate with the Greeks; and on the other side, the Greek patriarch came in person to Rome and was created legate of the apostolic see.² But still several causes prevented an adjustment of all difficulties. Under Urban IV. the business was managed more successfully. For Michael Palæologus, as soon as he had expelled the Latins out of Constantinople, in order to establish his empire and secure the friendship of the Roman pontiff, sent ambassadors to Rome declaring his readiness to conclude a peace. But Urban died before the difficult negotiations were brought to a conclusion.³ Under Gregory X. after various discussions in the second council of Lyons A.D. 1274, John Veccus, the patriarch of Constantinople, and some other Greek bishops agreeing to it, the Greeks publicly consented to the terms of compromise prescribed by the pontiff.⁴ But on a change in the state of public affairs, the fear of a war from the Latins being at an end, Andronicus, the son of Michael, in the council of Constantinople held in the palace of Blachernæ A.D. 1284, annulled this disgraceful compromise and sent its author Veccus into exile.⁵ After this the rancour and disputes became more violent than ever.

14. We pass over the private and minor controversies which arose here and there. The only one which remains and deserves notice is, the discussions in France and in other countries during this century respecting the Lord's Supper. Notwithstanding Innocent III. in the Lateran council of 1215, had placed transubstantiation among the public doctrines of the Latin church, yet many had doubts of the validity of this decree, and even maintained that other opinions were quite probable. Those who approved the Berengarian sentiment, that the bread and wine were only symbols of the body and blood of Christ, dared not publicly avow and defend their opinions.⁶ Yet there were many who deemed it sufficient to maintain what is called the real presence, though they might explain the mode of that presence differently from Innocent.⁷ Pre-eminent among these was John, surnamed Pungens-Asinum [the Ass-goader], a subtle doctor of Paris, who near the close of the century avowed his preference of consubstantiation before transubstantiation, and yet was not condemned by the doctors there for advancing such an opinion.⁸

¹ The records of the transaction are extant in Wadding's Annales Minorum, tom. ii. p. 279, 296, &c. and in Echart's Scriptores Ordinis Prædicatorum, tom. i. p. 103, 911, &c. See also Matthew Paris, Historia Major, p. 386, &c. [The union was prevented by the well-known principles of the Romish court which had all one aim, namely, to subject the whole world to themselves, or to make all nations tributary to the see of Rome, and thus to enrich themselves at the expense of others. At least the Greek patriarch Germanus, in his letter to the cardinals in the above-cited passage of Matthew Paris, says:—"Destroy the cause of the ancient hostility between the Latins and the Greeks—we have commenced the negotiation for peace, and have written to the Pope; let God purge your hearts of all high thoughts that exalt themselves against a fraternal union. The severing of our union proceeds from the tyranny of your oppression and the exactions of the Romish church, which from being a mother has become a stepmother, and is like a rapacious bird that drives away her own young, which tramples upon the lowly in proportion as they are the more prostrate. Therefore let Roman avarice, inveterate as it is, be subdued, and let us proceed to an examination of the truth. You, eager solely for earthly possessions collect together silver and gold from every quarter; and yet you say that you are the disciples of Him who said, 'Silver and gold have I none.' You make kingdom tributary to you, you increase your revenues by navigations, your deeds contradict the profession of your lips."—Schl.]

² See Baluze, Miscellaneæ, tom. vii. p. 270, 388, 393, 397, 497, 498; Wadding's Annales Minor. tom. iii. and iv. p. 37, &c.

³ Wadding, ubi supra, tom. iv. p. 181, 201, 223, 269, 303.

⁴ See Wadding, ubi supra, tom. iv. p. 343, 371, tom. v. p. 9, 29, 62; Colonia, Hist. Littér. de la Ville de Lyon, tome ii. p. 284.

⁵ Leo Allatius, De Perpetua Consensione Eccles. Orient. et Occident. lib. ii. cap. xv. xvi. p. 727, &c.; Spanheim, De Perpetua Dissensione Græcorum et Latinorum, in his Opp. tom. ii. p. 488, &c. and elsewhere.

⁶ Baluze, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iii. p. 373.

⁷ Allix, Præfatio ad F. Johannis Determinat. de Sacramento Altaris, Lond. 1686, 8vo.

⁸ His book was published by Allix [Lond. 1686, 8vo]. See Baluze, Vita Pontif. Avenion. tom. i. p. 56; D'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. iii. p. 58; Echart's Script. Domini, tom. i. p. 561. [According to Du Pin, Auteurs Ecclésiast. sæcul. xiv. cap. v. John of Paris, surnamed Pungens-Asinum, lived in the early part of the thirteenth century and was a different person from that John of Paris who opposed the papal doctrine of transubstantiation. Neither did this latter John escape censure from the divines of Paris; for in the year 1305 they silenced him, and forbade his either preaching or lecturing on pain of excommunication. He appealed to the Pope then at Bourdeaux, who appointed commissioners to try the case, but before the day of trial John died, on the 15th Jan. 1306. Similar to this are the statements of Cave (Hist. Liter.) and Fabricius. Bibl. Med. et Inf. Latin. lib. ix. p. 322.—Mur.]

CHAPTER IV.

HISTORY OF RITES AND CEREMONIES.

1. It would be endless to enumerate all the additions which the pontiff made publicly and the priests and monks privately to the exterior of religion, in order to render it more splendid and imposing. We shall therefore despatch the extensive subject in a few words. Those who directed public worship conceived, that the religion generally embraced in those times was not to be presented solely to the understanding, but also to the eyes and the senses of mankind, that it might make a deeper impression on their minds. Hence at stated times, and particularly on the festivals, they were accustomed to exhibit the divine works and beneficent acts and all the more striking facts in sacred history by signs and emblems, or rather by mimic representations.¹ These scenic representations, partly comic and partly tragic, though they might gratify the senses and produce some transient emotions in the soul, were still rather prejudicial than advantageous to the cause of religion, and they afforded matter for ridicule to the more discerning.

2. No one will think it strange that after the establishment of the doctrine of transubstantiation, the consecrated bread of the eucharist should have received divine honours. This having become an established custom, the various ceremonies by which that bread was honoured followed of course. Hence those splendid caskets in which God in the form of bread might reside as in his house, and be carried from place to place; hence lamps and other decorations were added to these reputed domiciles of a present deity; hence this bread was carried in splendid processions along the streets to the sick, and other rites of the like character were introduced. This superstition reached its zenith when the festival of the body of Christ, as it is called, was instituted. One Juliana, a nun who lived at Liege in the Netherlands, gave out she had been divinely instructed it was the pleasure of God that an annual festival should be kept in honour of the holy supper, or rather of the body of Christ as present in the holy supper. Few persons gave credit to her vision.² But

Robert, the bishop of Liege, in the year 1246 ordered this new festal day, though many were opposed to it, to be celebrated throughout his diocese. After the death of Juliana her friend Eve, another woman of Liege, ceased not from prosecuting the business, till at length Urban IV. in the year 1264 imposed that festival upon the whole church. Yet this pontiff died shortly after signing the decree; so that this festival was not universally observed by the Latin churches until Clement V. in the council of Vienne A.D. 1311, confirmed the edict of Urban.³ And this festival contributed to establish the people in the doctrine of transubstantiation more than the decree of the Lateran council under Innocent III.

3. At the close of the century Boniface VIII. added to the public ceremonies of the church the year of jubilee, which is still celebrated at Rome with great pomp and splendid preparations. In the year 1299 there arose among the people at Rome a rumour that those who should the next year visit the temple of St. Peter would obtain the pardon of all their sins, and that this privilege was annexed to every hundredth year. Boniface ordered inquiry to be made into the truth of this opinion; and he learned from many witnesses of good credit that, according to very ancient ecclesiastical law and usage, all those who devoutly visited St. Peter's church in the course of the years which terminate centuries thereby merited indulgences for a hundred years. The pontiff therefore, in an epistle sent throughout Christendom, decided that in every centennial year all who should confess and lament their sins, and devoutly visit the temple of St. Peter and St. Paul at Rome, should receive plenary abolition of their sins.⁴ The succes-

¹ See Eisen's Origo Prima Festi Corporis Christi ex vltio Sanctæ Virginis Julianæ divinitus oblatæ, Liege, 1619, 8vo; Dalle, De cultus Religiosi Objecto, p. 287, &c.; Acta Sanctorum, Aprilis, tom. i. p. 437, &c. and p. 903; and (one who should have been named first) Benedict XIV. the Roman pontiff, De Festis Christi et Mariæ, lib. i. cap. xli. in his Opp. tom. x. p. 360.

² Such is the statement of Cajetan, nephew of Boniface VIII. and cardinal of St. George, in his Relatio de Centesimo seu Jubilæo Anno, which is in all the Bibliothecas of the Fathers, and particularly in the Biblioth. Max. Patrum, tom. xxv. p. 267. Nor is there any reason why we should suppose that he misrepresents facts or that Boniface acted craftily and avariciously in this matter. [But when we consider the ambitious and avaricious character which Boniface manifested in innumerable ways, it is difficult to believe that he was so passive a being in this whole transaction, and that he had no other object in view than the furtherance of piety and the continuation of an ancient usage, which he found to be confirmed by the testimony of four aged persons, of whom one was a hundred and seven years old. The belief had long prevailed that Romish indulgences were more efficient than any others; and the pilgrims who travelled to Rome in order to obtain remission of sins there

¹ This extravagance in getting up religious shows originated, I suspect, with the Mendicant orders.

² This fanatical woman declared that as often as she addressed herself to God or to the saints in prayer, she saw the full moon with a small defect or breach in it, and that having long studied to find out the signification of this strange appearance, she was inwardly informed by the Spirit that the moon signified the church, and that the defect or breach was the want of an annual festival in honour of the holy sacrament.—Mack.

sors of Boniface adorned this institution with many new rites; and after finding by experience that it brought both honour and gain to the church of Rome they limited it to shorter periods, so that at the present time every twenty-fifth year is a jubilee.¹

CHAPTER V.

HISTORY OF HERESIES.

1. THE Greeks mention no new sects as originating among them in this century. The oriental sects of the Jacobites and Nestorians; who equally with the Greeks spurned the laws of the Roman church, were repeatedly solicited by pontifical legates of the orders of St. Francis and St. Dominic to put themselves under the dominion of the Roman pontiffs. Innocent IV. endeavoured to annex both those communities to his empire in the year 1246. And Nicolaus IV. offered terms of reconciliation to the Nestorians, and particularly to those inhabiting northern Asia, in the year

1278.² And some of the bishops of both those sects seemed not averse to the proposed terms. But after a short time, from various causes all hopes of such a reconciliation vanished.

2. During the whole of this century the Roman pontiffs were engaged in fierce and bloody conflicts with heretics; that is, with those who taught differently from what the Romish church prescribed to them, and brought under discussion the power and prerogatives of the pontiffs. For the sects of the Cathari, the Waldenses, the Petrobrusians, and many others, spreading themselves over nearly all Europe, and especially in Italy, France, Germany,³ and

² Raynald, Annales Eccles. tom. xiii. ad ann. 1247, sec. 32, &c. and tom. xv. ad ann. 1303, sec. 22, and 1304, sec. 23; Matth. Paris, Historia Major, p. 372.

³ In Germany they were called Stedingers from a district in ancient Friesland where they were most numerous, and Hælian heretics from a town in Swabia where they resided. The Stedingers were accused of magic and of Manichæism, but seem rather to have been Waldensians than Manichæans. Their chief difference was, that they refused to pay tithes to the bishops, particularly to the bishops of Bremen and Minden, and in general resolved to be free from the oppressive slavery of the clergy. These poor people in the year 1234 were nearly exterminated by an army of 40,000 crusaders. See Ritter's Hist. de Pago Steding et Stedingis Hæreticis, and Harzheim's Concilium German. tom. iii. p. 551, &c. The Hælian heretics may be best understood from the account of Albrecht of Stade in his Chronicon, ad ann. 1248. He thus describes them: "Strange and miserable heretics began to multiply in the church of God, who ringing the bells and calling the barons and freholders together at Halle in Swabia, thus preached in public that the pope was a heretic, and all the bishops and prelates simoniacs and heretics, and also the inferior prelates and the priests; because being defiled with vices and mortal sins they had not authority to bind and loose, and that they all seduced the people; that priests guilty of mortal sins could not administer the sacrament, that neither the pope nor the bishops could interdict any living man from the worship of God, and that those who prohibited it were heretics and seducers; that the Dominicans and Franciscans corrupted the church by preaching falsehood, and that all those monks and likewise the Cistercians led sinful and unrighteous lives. That there was no one who declared the truth and who observed good faith in action except themselves and their associates—that hitherto your preachers have buried the truth, and have preached falsehood, while we do the contrary. The indulgence (pardon) which we offer to you is not fictitious and fabricated by the apostolic (the pope) nor by the bishops, but comes solely from God and from our order. We dare not make mention of the pope, because he leads so wicked a life and is a man of so bad example.—Pray ye for the emperor Frederick and for Conrad—the pope has not the power of binding nor of loosing, because he does not lead an apostolical life."—See also Bernhold's Hist. de Conrado IV. Imperatore, Hildensem Hæreticorum aliquando Defensor, Altdorf. 1758.—Among the inquisitors in Germany, Conrad of Marburg rendered himself particularly famous. He was a Dominican and confessor of St. Elizabeth of Thuringia, whose biography he composed, and with much simplicity he united all the qualities requisite for so bloody and inhuman an office as that of an inquisitor. This abominable man, burning with hatred against heretics, raved against high and low, allowed no one a legal trial, but imprisoned the innocent till they would themselves confess guilt of which they were unconscious. See Albrecht's Chronicon, ad ann. 1233. The German archbishop counselled him to use greater moderation; but the delirious man continued his mad career, preaching a crusade against the heretics,

¹ The writers on the jubilee are enumerated by Fabricius, Bibliog. Antiq. p. 316, &c.; to his list others may be added, and among them especially Charles Chais, a recent author, whose Lettres Historiques et Dogmatiques sur les Jubiliés et les Indulgences were published at the Hague, 1751, 3 vols. 8vo. [He was minister of the French church at the Hague. The first volume of the Letters is devoted to the history of the Roman jubilee, traces their origin to the aversion of Boniface VIII. A.D. 1300, points out their resemblance to the Roman secular games, and gives a particular account of each jubilee from their origin in the year 1300 to the year 1750. The second and third volumes are devoted to the subject of Indulgences.—Mur.

Spain, collected congregations and threatened great danger to the Romish domination. New sects were added to the old ones, differing indeed widely in their opinions, but all agreeing in this, that the prevailing religion was false, and that the Roman pontiffs most unjustly arrogated to themselves dominion over Christians and their religious worship. And not a few noblemen listened, with favourable and even eager attention, to the doctrines maintained by these classes of persons out of the scriptures against the power, the wealth, and the vices of the pontiffs and of the whole clerical order. And hence new and extraordinary arms were requisite to overcome and subdue so numerous and powerful opponents.

3. Nowhere was there a greater number of heretics of every description than in Languedoc and the adjacent regions. For several persons, and especially Raymond VI. the earl of Toulouse, afforded them protection; and the bishops in those provinces were so negligent and remiss in their proceedings against heretics, that they were able to organise and increase their congregations without fear. On being apprised of these facts, Innocent III. sent extraordinary legates into these provinces near the beginning of the century, to correct the faults committed by the bishops, and to extirpate the heretics by all possible means. These legates were Raynier, a Cistercian monk, and Peter de Castronovo or Castelnau,¹ archdeacon of Maguelonne and subsequently too a Cistercian monk. To these were afterwards added others, the most noted of whom was Dominic, a Spaniard, the well-known founder of the order of preaching monks, who returning from Rome in the year 1206 connected himself with these papal legates, and by his preaching and in other ways very strenuously assailed the heretics. Those men acting by authority from the pontiff, and without consulting the bishops or asking their aid, hunted after heretics; and those whom they could not convert by arguments, they caused to be subjected to capital punishments. In common language they were called Inquisitors; and from them that terrible tribunal for heretics called the Inquisition took its rise.

4. As this new class of functionaries, the Inquisitors, performed effectually the duties assigned them, and purged the provinces in which they laboured of numerous heretics, similar papal legates were stationed in nearly all the cities whose inhabitants were suspected, notwithstanding the people opposed it, and often either expelled or massacred the Inquisitors. The council of Toulouse in which Romanus, cardinal of St. Angelo, presided as pontifical legate, A.D. 1229, proceeded still farther; for it ordered the establishment of a board of Inquisitors in each city, composed of one clergyman and three laymen.² But Gregory IX. altered the institution in the year 1233, and conferred on the preaching monks or Dominicans the inquisition for heresy in France, and by a formal bull freed the bishops from that duty.³ And upon this the bishop of Tournay, as papal legate, stationed Peter Cellani and William Arnald as the first Inquisitors of heretical pravity at Toulouse; and soon after he created similar Inquisitors in all the cities where the Dominicans had convents.⁴ From this period we are to date the commencement of the dreadful tribunal of the Inquisition, which in this and the following centuries subdued such hosts of heretics, either by forcing them back into the church, or by committing them to the temporal authorities to be burned. For the Dominicans erected, first at Toulouse and then at Carcassone and other places, permanent courts, before which were arraigned not only heretics and those suspected of heresy, but all who were accused of magic, soothsaying, Judaism, sorcery, and similar offences. And these courts were afterwards extended to other countries of Europe, though not everywhere with equal facility and success.⁵

¹ See Harduin's Concilium, tom. vii. p. 175.

² Guido's MS. Chronicle of the Roman pontiffs, in Echard's Script. Prædicatorum, tom. i. p. 88; Percin's Hist. Inquisitionis Tolosanae, subjoined to his Hist. Conventus Frat. Prædicatorum, Toulouse, 1693, 8vo; and Hist. Générale de Languedoc, tome iii. p. 394, 395.

³ Echard and Percin, ubi supra.

⁴ The account here given of the origin and early history of the Inquisition differs very much from what is stated in numberless books; yet it is supported by the most unexceptionable testimonies which cannot here be adduced. Learned men tell us that St. Dominic invented the court of the Inquisition and first instituted it at Toulouse, that he was himself the first Inquisitor who was ever appointed, that the year is uncertain; yet that it is beyond dispute that Innocent III. in the Lateran council, A.D. 1215, approved and confirmed this tribunal. See Fabricius, Lux Evangelii Tuti Orbis Exortione, p. 569; Limborch, Hist. Inquisitionis, lib. i. cap. x. p. 39, &c. and other writers who are mentioned by Fabricius. I believe that those who make such statements have their authorities for them, but those authorities are unquestionably not of the first order. Most of the modern writers follow Limborch, whose History of the Inquisition is an excellent work on the subject, and indeed may be considered the prin-till at last he was put to death by some noblemen near Marburg. See Harzheim's Cuncilia Germanæ, tom. iii. p. 543, &c.—Schl.

¹ Very many of the Romish writers denominate this Peter the first Inquisitor; but in what sense he was so will appear from what we are about to say. See concerning him the Acta Sanctorum, tom. i. Martii, p. 411, &c.

5. The method of proceeding in the courts of the Inquisition was at first simple, and not materially different from that in the ordinary courts.¹ But gradually the Dominicans, guided by experience, rendered it far more complex, and so shaped their proceedings that the mode of trying heretical causes (if the phrase is allowable) was wholly different from that practised in secular courts. For these simple monks, being wholly ignorant of judicial proceedings, and acquainted with no other tribunal than that which in the Romish church is called the penitentiary tribunal, regulated these new courts of the Inquisition as far as possible according to the plan of those religious proceedings. And hence arose that strange system of jurisprudence, bearing in many respects the most striking features of injustice and wrong. Whoever duly considers this history of their origin will be able to account for many things which are unsuitable, absurd, and contrary to justice, in the mode of proceeding against offenders in the courts of the Inquisition.²

principal work. Limborch is to be commended for his diligence and his fidelity. But he was very indifferently acquainted with the ecclesiastical history of the middle ages; nor did he derive his materials from the original sources but from second-hand writers, and he therefore fell into not a few mistakes. At least, what he tells us respecting the origin of the Inquisition is not true. Nor are the accounts of others much better. In particular, not one of the positions stated above is true. Many of the Dominicans who to this day preside in the courts of the Inquisition and highly extol its sanctity, yet deny that St. Dominic invented the Inquisition or that he was the first Inquisitor, nay, that he was an inquisitor at all; and they also deny that the tribunal of the Inquisition was instituted during the lifetime of St. Dominic. Nor are they rash in making these assertions. Yet the dispute whether St. Dominic was an inquisitor or not is a contest about a term rather than about a fact; for it turns wholly on the different acceptations of the term Inquisitor. At first an Inquisitor was a person sent forth under the authority of the Roman pontiff to subdue and extirpate heretics, but without any judicial powers. But the term afterwards changed its meaning, and was used to denote a Judge appointed by the Roman pontiff to try the causes of heretics and of those suspected of heresy, to pronounce sentence upon them, and to deliver over the pertinacious to the civil magistrates. In this latter sense Dominic most certainly was not an Inquisitor; nor were there any such Judges appointed by the pontiffs before the time of Gregory IX. But that Dominic was an Inquisitor in the former sense of the term admits of no doubt.

¹ The documents published by the Benedictines in their Hist. Générale de Linguetodoc, tome iii. p. 371, &c. show what was the first and simple method of proceeding in the Inquisition.

² A more definite account of the peculiar characteristics of the tribunal of the Inquisition [as it existed in the subsequent centuries.—Mur.] will not here be out of place. The persons arraigned before this tribunal, besides those mentioned in the text, were the abettors, encouragers, and protectors of heretics, the blasphemers, and such as resisted the officers of the Inquisition or interrupted them in the discharge of their duties. A person became suspected of heresy if he said anything that might offend others; if he misused the sacraments or other sacred things; if he treated the images with disrespect; if he possessed, read, or gave to others to read, books prohibited by the Inquisition; if he said mass or heard confessions without being in orders; if he attended even for once the preaching of heretics; if he did not appear before the Inquisition as soon as he was cited; if he showed any kindness to a heretic or aided him in making his escape. Abettors of heresy were those who harboured heretics or did not give them up, those who spoke to arrested heretics without permission, or even trafficked with heretics. When the Inquisition discovered a transgressor of their laws, either by common report or by their spies or by an informer, he was cited three times to appear before them, and if he did not appear he was forthwith condemned. It was safest to appear on the first citation, because the longer a man delayed the more guilty he would be; and the Inquisition had their spies and a thousand concealed ways for getting an absconding heretic into their power. When a supposed heretic was once in the hands of the Inquisition, no one dared to inquire after him or write to him or intercede for him. When everything belonging to the person seized was in their hands then the process began, and it was protracted in the most tedious manner. After many days or perhaps months, which the accused dragged out in a loathsome dungeon, the keeper of the prison asked him as it were accidentally if he wished to have a hearing. When he appeared before his Judges, they inquired, just as if they knew nothing about him, who he was and what he wanted. If he wished to be informed what offence he had committed, he was admonished to confess his faults himself. If he confessed nothing, time was given him for reflection and he was remanded to prison. If after a long time allowed him he still confessed nothing, he must swear to answer truly to all the questions put to him. If he would not swear, he was condemned without further process. If he swore to give answer he was questioned in regard to his whole life, without making known to him his offence. He was however promised a pardon if he would truly confess his offences, an artifice by which his Judges often learned more than they knew before against him. At last the charges against him were presented to him in writing, and counsel also was assigned him, who however only advised him to confess fully his faults. The accuser and informer against him were not made known to him, but the real charges against him were put into his hands. He was allowed time for his defence; but his accuser and the witnesses against him he could know only by conjecture. Sometimes he was so fortunate as to discover who they were, but rarely were they presented before him and confronted with him. If his answers did not satisfy the Judges, or if the allegations against him were not adequately proved, resort was had to torture, a transaction which well nigh exceeded the sufferings endured by the first Christians when persecuted by the pagans. The torture was by the rope, by water, and by fire. The rope was passed under the arms, which were tied behind the back of the accused. By this rope he was drawn up into the air with a pulley and there left to swing for a time, and then suddenly let fall to within half a foot of the ground, by the shock of which fall all his joints were dislocated. If he still confessed nothing, the torture by water was tried. After making him drink a great quantity of water he was laid upon a hollowed bench; across the middle of this bench a stick of timber passed which kept the body of the offender suspended, and caused him most intense pain in the back-bone. The most cruel torture was that by fire, in which his feet being smeared with grease, &c. were directed towards a hot fire, and the soles of them left to burn till he would confess. Each of these tortures was continued as long as in the judgment of the physician of the Inquisition the man was able to endure them. He might now confess what he would, but still the torture would be repeated, first to discover the object and motives of the acknowledged offence, and then to make him expose his accomplices. If when tortured he confessed nothing, many snares were laid to elicit from him unconsciously his offence. The conclusion was that the accused, when he seemed to have satisfied the Judges, was condemned according to the measure of his offence to death, or to perpetual imprisonment, or to the galleys, or to be scourged; and he was delivered over to the civil authorities, who were entreated to spare his life as the church never thirsted for blood; but yet they would experience persecution if they did not carry the decisions of the court into execution.

6. That this tribunal devised for subduing heretics might awaken more terror, the pontiffs prevailed on the emperors and sovereigns of Europe, especially on Frederick II. and Lewis IX. or Saint Lewis, king of France, to enact severe laws against heretics, requiring the magistrates both to punish with death, and particularly with burning at the stake, all those who should be adjudged obstinate heretics by the Inquisitors; and also to afford their special protection and support to the courts of the Inquisition. The laws which Frederick II. in particular enacted from time to time on this subject are well known; and nothing could be more efficient both to support the Inquisition against all its opposers and to exterminate those who might be odious to the Inquisitors, however high and honourable their characters.¹ And yet these severe laws could not prevent the inquisitorial judges, who were generally inhuman, insolent, superstitious, jealous, and indiscreet, from being mobbed and chased out of many places by the populace, and from being murdered in others. Such was the fate of many, and particularly of Conrad of Marburg, who was appointed by Gregory IX. the first Inquisitor of Germany.²

What an infernal device is the Inquisition! What innocent person could escape destruction if an Inquisitor was disposed to destroy him? A heretic, even if he had been acquitted by the Pope himself, might still be condemned to die by the Inquisition. An equivocal promise of pardon might be given to induce him to make confession, but the promise must not be fulfilled when the object of it was obtained. Even death did not free a person from the jurisdiction of the Inquisition, for a deceased heretic must be burnt in effigy.—Would not every feeling of humanity be outraged by following such horrid principles? The inquisitorial judges do not deny that by such proceedings many innocent persons unavoidably perish along with the guilty, but this does not trouble them. Better, say they, that a hundred innocent persons who are good Catholics should be cut off and go to paradise, than to let one heretic escape who might poison many souls and plunge them in endless perdition. See Cramer's Fortsetzung von Euseb. vol. v. p. 468—477.—Von Ein.

¹ The laws of Frederick are exhibited in the epistles of Peter de Vineis in Limborch's Hist. Inquisit. p. 48, and by Bzovius, Raynald, and many others. The law of St. Lewis was by the French jurists called Cuipiales, because it began with this word; and that it was enacted in the year 1229 is shown by the Benedictine monks in their Hist. Générale de Languedoc, tome iii. p. 378, 575. It may be found in Catel's Hist. des Comtes de Tholose, p. 340, &c. and in many other works. It is not a whit milder than the laws of Frederick II. For a great part of the sanctity of this sincere Lewis consisted in his flaming zeal against heretics, who in his opinion were not to be vanquished by reasoning and sound arguments, but to be forthwith exterminated. See Du Fresne's notes on Joinville's Vie de St. Louis, p. 11, 39.

² The life of this noted and ferocious man has been compiled by Schmlink, from documents both manuscript and printed, and is most worthy of being printed. In the mean time for an account of him see Wadding's Annales, tom. ii. p. 151, 355, &c. and Ecard's Scriptores Dominicani, tom. i. p. 487, &c. [See also some notice of him, p. 475, note 3, above.—Mur.

7. As the labours of the first Inquisitors did not at once produce all the results which Innocent III. anticipated, in the year 1207 he exhorted Philip Augustus, king of France, and his nobles to make war upon the heretics, promising them ample indulgences as their reward.³ And this exhortation he repeated in a much stronger and more urgent manner in the following year, A. D. 1208, when his legate and Inquisitor, Peter de Castronovo, was murdered by the patrons of the heretics.⁴ Soon after, the Cistercian monks, in his name, preached a crusade (or the cross according to the language of that age) against the heretics throughout France; and Raymond VI. the earl of Toulouse, in whose territories Peter had been murdered, being now excommunicated, took the cross himself in order to obtain release from that punishment. In the year 1209, a very large army of crusaders commenced their holy war against the heretics who bore the general name of Albigenses,⁵ and continued the war in the most cruel manner during several years with various success. The director of the war was one Arnald, a Cistercian abbot and the pontiff's legate; the commander-in-chief of the forces was Simon earl of Montfort.⁶ Raymond VI. the earl

³ See the Epistles of Innocent III. lib. x. ep. 49.

⁴ Epistles of Innocent III. lib. ix. ep. 26, 27, 28, 29. Acta Sanctorum, Martii, tom. i. p. 411, &c.

⁵ The name Albigenses had a twofold application, the one more extended, the other more limited. In the broader sense, all the heretics of every sort who at that time resided in Languedoc (Gallia Narbonensis) were called Albigenses. Peter Sarsensis, a writer of that age, in the dedication of his History of the Albigenses to Innocent III. (first published by Camusat, Troyes, 1615, 8vo), says expressly: "Tolosani, et aliarum civitatum et castrorum heretici, et defensores eorum, generaliter Albigenses vocantur." Afterwards, cap. ii. p. 3, he divides these Albigenses into various sects, and in p. 8 says that the Waldenses were the best among them: "Mali erant Valdenses, sed comparatione aliorum hereticorum, longe minus perversi." And thus in general all the French heretics were called Albigenses; not however from the city of Albi (Albiga), but from the fact that the greatest part of Languedoc was in that age called Albigesum, as is clearly shown by the Benedictine monks in their Hist. Générale de Languedoc, tome iii. p. 552, note 13. [With this Fuesli agrees, Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorie der mittlern Zeit, vol. i. p. 320.—Schl.] In the more limited sense, the Albigenses were those who in Italy were sometimes called Cathari, Publicani or Pauliciani, and Bulgari, and who approximated to the Manicheans in their sentiments. [That many such persons were mingled with the Albigenses in the broader sense is proved by Fuesli, ubi supra, p. 413, 432, &c.—Schl.] This appears from various documents, but most clearly from the Codex Inquisitionis Tolosanae, published by Limborch, in which the Albigenses are carefully distinguished from the other sects.

⁶ Simon was lord of Montfort not far from Paris, and earl of Leicester in England; and the unrighteous liberality of the pope in the council of the Lateran, A. D. 1215, made him duke of Narbonne, earl of Toulouse, and viscount of Beziers and Carcassonne, territories which were in part fiefs of the German empire and in part fiefs of the kings of France, and which the pope had no right thus to dispose of without the consent of the liege-lords. In Simon, fanaticism appears to have been closely united with selfishness. He was certainly of Toulouse, who at first fought against the heretics, became himself involved in the war in the year 1211.¹ For Simon coveted his territories and engaged in the war, not so much to advance religion and put down heresy, as to promote his own interests and to enlarge his dominions. And he obtained his object; for after numerous battles, sieges, and a great many deeds of valour but of extreme cruelty,² he received at the hands of Innocent III. in the Lateran council of 1215, not only the earldom of Toulouse but also the many a fanatic. He supposed he was doing God service while persecuting the heretics with fire and sword; and he was so zealous in performing the external duties of religion, that he often neglected his official duties for the sake of them. While besieging Toulouse, as he was attending mass word was brought him that the enemy had made a sally, and that his army was in imminent danger. He replied that he could not come till he had seen his Saviour. Another message arrived, that if he did not come his whole army would be thrown into disorder; and he replied again that he would not leave the altar till he had seen his Creator, even if he must be slain there for it. When the mass was ended, he went away to oppose the enemy but was killed by a stone. See Peter of Walcerney, cap. lxxxvi.—Schl.

¹ The papal legate accused Raymund for not treating the murderers of Peter de Chateaufort with due severity, and prescribed hard conditions for his reconciliation with the church. He must promise to be subject to the legate in everything, and especially in all matters relating to religion; and must give up to the legate seven fortresses for his security. He must also do public ecclesiastical penance, and suffer himself to be scourged with rods by the legate. And in proof of his sincerity, he must assume the cross and take the field against his own friends and vassals. But when he saw that Simon and the legate advanced against his territories, and aimed to get the castles of the heretics there into their hands, he separated himself from the crusading army in the year 1210, and sought in vain for aid from France, England, Germany, and Rome. His near friend and relative indeed, Peter, king of Aragon, took up arms in his behalf against Simon of Montfort; but he unfortunately was slain in the first battle, and Raymund was obliged to witness the misfortunes of his own country while he remained in Aragon an inactive spectator. At length, many lords and districts of country revolted from Simon and recalled their legitimate sovereign, who threw himself into the city of Toulouse, and was there besieged by Simon. Raymund appears to have been a warlike and energetic prince, and one who had no partiality for prelates. To the Cistercians also he was no friend; and he used to say, they could not possibly be good men, because they were so voluptuous. On the contrary, he had very high regard for the heretics who inhabited his territories, and he protected them, partly as subjects and partly as his personal friends.—Schl.

² The cruelties which were practised under the command of Simon are indescribable. It must be admitted however that the heretics sometimes returned like for like. At the capture of Minerbe, Simon found one hundred and forty Manicheans; all of whom were burned at the stake because they would not abjure their religion. At Beziers, 6,000 persons were slain; and at Toulouse, 20,000; and at Carcassonne the priests shouted for joy at the burning of so many miserable beings, whose only crime was that they did not believe what the church believed. Still more shocking is the account given by Peter of Walcerney, cap. xxxiv. that the crusaders captured a castle called Brom, in which were found one hundred persons; and that the papal general, Simon, ordered all their noses to be amputated and their eyes to be put out, except a single eye of one individual who might serve as guide to the rest, who were sent to Cabrières to terrify others. It is true, the monk informs us of similar cruelties by the other party. But retaliation in such a case is cruelty, and especially other territories he had subdued, as his reward for so nobly supporting the cause of God and the church. He was slain however in the siege of Toulouse, A.D. 1218. And his antagonist, Raymund, died in the year 1222.

8. After the death of the two generals, this lamentable war was prosecuted vigorously and with various success by their sons, Raymund VII. earl of Toulouse, and Amalric of Montfort. When the former of these, Raymund, seemed to get the advantage of the other, the Roman pontiff, Honorius III. persuaded Lewis VIII. the king of France, by great promises and favours to march in person at the head of a powerful army against the enemies of the church. He dying soon after, his successor, Lewis IX. called Saint Lewis, vigorously prosecuted the work begun by his father. Raymund therefore, being pressed on every side, made peace in the year 1229 on the hardest terms; for he ceded the greatest part of his territories to the king, besides some cessions to the Romish church. After this peace the heretics were entirely prostrate; for the tribunal of the Inquisition was established at Toulouse, and besides Saint Lewis, Raymund himself, formerly a patron of the heretics, became their unrelenting persecutor. He indeed renewed the war afterwards, against both the king and the Inquisitors who abused their power beyond measure; but it was attended with little or no success. At last, exhausted and broken down by a series of afflictions and troubles, he died without issue in the year 1249, being the last of the once very powerful earls of Toulouse. This crusade, of which religion was in part the cause and in part only the pretext, was of course exceedingly advantageous both to the kings of France and to the Roman pontiffs.³

In the assailing party and one which pretends to fight only for the cause of God and religion. Who can refrain from adopting the wish of the poet:

Périlse à jamais l'affreuse politique,

Qui prétend sur les cœurs un pouvoir despotique;

Qui veut le fer en main convertir les mortels,

Qui du sang hérétique arrose les autels,

Et suivant un faux zèle ou l'intérêt pour guides,

Ne sert un Dieu de Paix, que par des homicides.—Schl.

³ Many writers, both ancient and modern, have given us histories of this crusade against the earls of Toulouse and their associates who favoured the heretics, and against the heretics themselves. But among them I have not found one who was free from partiality. The Protestant writers, among whom Basnage (in his Hist. de l'Eglise, and in his Hist. des Eglises réformées) stands pre-eminent, all favour too much the Raymunds and the Albigenses. On the contrary, the Roman Catholic writers, of whom the most recent are Benoit, a Dominican monk (Hist. des Albigeois des Pseudois, et des Barbeta, Paris, 1691, 2 vols. 12mo), Langlois, a Jesuit (Hist. des Croisades contre les Albigeois, Rouen, 1703, 12mo); Perclin (Monumenta conventus Tolosanensis Ordinis Frat. Prædicatorum in quibus Historia hujus conventus distribuitur, et refertur totius Albigensium facti K K

9. All this severity of the pontiffs against the heretics and the numerous safeguards erected against the enemies of the church could not prevent new and very pernicious sects from starting up. Passing by the more obscure and short-lived among them, one not the least considerable was that of the Brethren and Sisters of the Free Spirit, which at this time secretly spread itself over Italy, France, and Germany, and by a great show of piety drew after it many persons of both sexes. Few decisions of councils against these people in this century can be found; but in the next century, the councils in every part of Germany and in other countries published decrees against them; and the Inquisitors seized and cruelly burned a large number of them. They derived their name from the words of Paul, Rom. viii. 2, 14, and they maintained that the true sons of God were brought into the most perfect freedom from the law.¹ The Germans and Belgians called them Beghardi and Beghardæ or Beguttæ, which were the common designations of all those who pretended to uncommon piety. Some called them by way of contempt Bicorni, that is Idiots. In France they were called Beghini and Beghinæ, and by the populace (I know not why) they were called Turlupins.²

narratio, Toulouse, 1693, fol.), these are all very unjust to the Raymonds and the Albigenes; and they cover over and conceal the horrid deeds of Simon de Montfort, and the ambitious designs of the kings of France to extend their power. The most full and accurate history of these wars against the heretics is that of the Benedictine monks, Claude le Vic and Joseph Vaissette, two very learned men, in that excellent work, Hist. Générale de Languedoc, Paris, 1730, &c. fol. nearly the whole of the third volume. Their only fault is that they sometimes omit what they ought not. [Sismondi has given full details of these unexampled severities in the sixth and seventh volumes of his Histoire des Français, which have been translated into English and published anonymously under the title of, History of the Crusades against the Albigenes in the 13th Century, Lond. 1826, 8vo. Among the Documents Inédites sur l'Histoire de France, published by the French government, is one on this subject edited by M. C. Fauriel, entitled Histoire de la Croisade contre les Hérétiques Albigeois, Paris, 1837, 4to. It is written by a contemporary poet in the Provençal dialect, but a French translation is annexed. It contains a dry chronicle of events from the year 1208 to June, 1219, and simply corroborates all that has since been written of the unparalleled cruelties of that crusade.—R.

¹ These statements are derived from documents of the most credible character, many of them not yet published, from the decrees and councils in France and Germany, the bulls of the popes, the decisions of the Inquisition, and others, of all which a great many have fallen into my hands. I have also extracts from certain books of these people, and particularly from a book on the nine spiritual rocks, which they highly recommended as being full of divine sentences. As these documents cannot here be exhibited, I will merely refer the reader to a long edict against them, by Henry I. archbishop of Cologne, in the Statuta Coloniensis, p. 58, ed. Colon. 1554, 4to. In perfect harmony with this are the decrees of Mentz, Aschaffenburg, Treves, Paderborn, Bezers, and others.

² Concerning the Turlupins, many have written much but none accurately. See Beausobre (Disc. sur les Adimites, par. ii. p. 384, &c.), who has committed Clothed in a singular manner they ran about the cities and the country, begging their bread with loud vociferations; for they maintained that labour prevented the elevation of the soul to God and devout contemplation. They were accompanied by women under the appellation of sisters, with whom they lived in the greatest familiarity; and for this reason the Germans called them Schwestriones [Sisterers], as appears from the enactments of councils. They distributed books containing their principles, held nocturnal assemblies in retired places, and dissuaded the people from attending public worship in the churches.

10. These brethren, who boasted of being free from the law and of having attained to the freedom of the Spirit, professed a rigid and austere species of mystic theology, based upon philosophical principles which were not far removed from the impiety of those called pantheists. For they held that all things emanated from God and would revert back into Him; that rational souls were parts of the Supreme Being, and that the whole universe was God; that a man, by turning his thoughts inward and withdrawing his attention from all sensible objects, may become united in an inexplicable manner with the Parent and First Cause of all things, and be one with Him; that persons thus immersed in the vortex of the Deity by long contemplation attain to perfect freedom, and become divested not only of all their lusts but of the instincts of nature. From these and similar principles they inferred that a person thus raised up to God, and absorbed as it were in the divine nature, is himself God and such a son of God as Christ was, and therefore is raised above all laws human and divine. And they maintained consequently that all external worship of God, prayer, fasting, baptism, the sacred supper, &c. are mere elements for children, which a man no longer needs when converted into God himself and detached from this visible universe.³

numerous errors, as he usually does on such subjects. The origin of the name I know not, but I am able to prove from substantial documents that the Turlupins, who were burned at Paris and in other parts of France, were no other than the Brethren of the Free Spirit, whom the pontiffs and councils condemned.

³ I will here subjoin some positions extracted from their more private books. I. Every good man is the only-begotten son of God, whom the Father hath begotten from eternity. For all that the sacred scriptures teach respecting a distinction of three persons in the divine nature, they maintained was not to be understood literally, but to be explained in conformity with their recondite system of doctrines. II. All created objects are nothing; I do not say that they are small and trivial, but that they are nothing. III. There is something in the human mind which is not created nor creatable, and that is, rationality. IV. God is neither

11. Among these people there were some upright and conscientious persons, who did not extend that liberty of the spirit which they said was possessed by persons united to God beyond an exemption from external worship and from ecclesiastical law. They made religion to consist exclusively in internal worship, despising that which is external; and they maintained that a perfect man ought to look with contempt on the rules of monastic discipline, and the other institutions which were regarded as sacred. Of this character were those who in the middle of the century persuaded many monks and nuns in Swabia to live without any rule, saying, that in this way they could serve God better in the liberty of the spirit.¹ Not a few persons of this description, being apprehended by the Inquisitors, expired cheerfully and calmly in the flames. But there were others of a worse character among them, and whose piety was as foolish as it was dangerous. These maintained that by persevering contemplation all the instincts of nature might be eradicated and excluded from the godlike soul, and a kind of holy or divine stupor be brought over the mind. Persons of these sentiments throwing off all clothing held their secret assemblies in a state of nudity, and in the same state slept in the same bed with the spiritual sisters and other women. For modesty and shame they said indicated a mind not yet sufficiently detached from the sentient and libidinous soul, nor brought back to the source from which it originated, that is, the divine nature; and those who still experience the carnal emotions of nature, or are excited and inflamed by the aspect or touch of bodies of a different sex, or who are unable to repress and subdue the occasional emotions of concupiscence, are still far, very far from God.² There were also among these people some who abused their doctrines to justify all iniquity; and who did not fear to teach that a godlike man, or one who is closely united to God, cannot sin do what he may. This senseless, impious dogma was explained by them in different ways. Some held that the motions and actions of the body had no connexion with the soul, which was elevated and blended with the divine nature. But others maintained the blasphemous sentiment, that the emotions and desires arising in the soul after its union with God were the acts and operations of God himself; and therefore, though apparently criminal and contrary to the law, they were really holy and good, because God is above all law.³

¹ Those who study to vindicate and defend the character of the heretics, and who think that all those who seceded from the Romish church in the middle ages were holy persons, conjecture that the things here stated are falsehoods, invented by the Inquisitors for the purpose of defaming pious men; but they are strictly true. This we may infer from the fact which the Inquisitors themselves admit, that the Beghards, though divested of all sense of shame, yet in general did not offend against chastity and modesty. This firmness of mind and unacceptability of emotion the Inquisitors attribute to the power of the devil. For they believed with the simple Jo. Nieder (Formicarium, lib. iii. cap. v. p. 340), that the devil can render men cold or extinguish the natural emotions; and that he so operated upon his friends as to render them utterly insensible, so that they might appear to common people more exalted and holy. "Credo" (says Nieder, who was a Dominican and an Inquisitor), "quosdam ex eis demoni operi affectos fuisse, ne moverentur ad naturales actus incontinentie. Facillimum enim eis demonibus infrigidare."

² That I may not seem chargeable with misrepresentation, I will cite the very words of a private book of the Brethren of the Free Spirit, entitled De Novem Rupibus:—"Moreover, the godlike man operates and begets the same that God operates and begets. For in God he worked and created heaven and earth. He is also the generator of the eternal Word. Nor can God do anything without this man. The godlike man should therefore make his will conformable to God's will, so that he should will all that God wills. If therefore God wills that I should sin, I ought by no means to will that I may not have sinned. This is true contrition. And if man have committed a thousand mortal sins, and the man is well regulated and united to God, he ought not to wish that he had not done those sins; and he ought to prefer suffering a thousand deaths, rather than to have omitted one of those mortal sins." Here is that sentiment with which the Inquisitors often tax this sect, that the sin of a man who is united to God is not sin because God works all in him. In the next century Henry Suso, a celebrated writer among the mystics and a Dominican monk, composed likewise a book De Novem Rupibus, which is extant among his works published by Surius. But this book of Suso is altogether different from that which was in so much estimation among the Beghards. The latter was much more ancient, and was in circulation among the Brethren of the Free Spirit in Germany before Suso was born. There has fallen into my hands an old manuscript book of the fifteenth century, composed in Alsace, containing various revelations and visions of that age. I find there a piece entitled Declaratio Religionis ejusdam, super Revelatione Cartusiano cuidam de Ecclesia per Gladium Reformationis, Leodii, anno 1453, facta; near the beginning of which there is the following passage relating to the book of the Beghards, De Novem Rupibus:—"Homo quidam devotissimus, licet laicus, librum De Novem Rupibus good, nor better, nor the best; whoever calls God good talks as foolishly as the man who calls a thing black while he knows it to be white. V. God still begets his only-begotten son, and begets the same son that he begets from eternity. For every operation of God is uniform and one, and he therefore engenders his son without any division. VI. What the scripture says of Christ is true of every godly man. And what is predicable of the divine nature is also predicable of every godly man. To these we shall add the following, taken not from their own books, but from the long rescript of John, bishop of Strasburg, against the Brethren of the Free Spirit or the Bechards, A.D. 1317, on the sabbath before the assumption of the Virgin Mary. VII. God is formally whatever exists. VIII. Every perfect man is Christ by nature. IX. A perfect man is free totally, nor is he required to obey the precepts which God gave to the church. X. Many things in the gospel are poetic and not [literally] true; and men ought to believe the conceptions which proceed from their souls when united to God rather than the gospel.

¹ See Crusius, Annales Suenicorum, par. iii. lib. ii. cap. 14, ad ann. 1216, p. 99. old ed. He extracts from Felix Faber, a writer of that age.

Lastly, among the Beghards as they were called, unprincipled and flagitious persons sometimes lurked, who did not hesitate by feigned piety to worm themselves into the confidence of the simple and unsuspecting, in order to gratify their own lusts.¹

12. To the sect now described undoubtedly belonged Amalric of Bena, the Parisian dialectician and theologian, whose bones were dug up and publicly burned in the year 1209, notwithstanding he had abjured his errors while alive, by command of Innocent III.; and many of whose followers endured at the stake the penalties of their unsound faith.² For though the barbarous writers of that age give different and confused statements of his opinions, and attribute some sentiments to him which he never held, yet it is certain he taught this much, that all things are but one, that is, God; that not only the forms of things but also their matter proceeded from God and would all revert back into God; and hence he derived that mistaken piety or religious system of these mystics, maintained that a man may become changed into the divine nature if he will, and proved that all external worship was vain and useless. His disciples were men of very distinguished piety and austerity, and many of them endured the flames with the greatest fortitude. One of his most distinguished followers was David Dinant, a Parisian doctor, who was accustomed to state the fundamental doctrine of his master in this manner—God is the original matter of all things. He composed a work called Quaternarii and some other books in a popular style and well calculated to captivate the common people, and saved his life by a timely flight.³ The bishops who assembled in council at Paris A.D. 1209, supposed that the philosophy of Aristotle gave rise to this impiety, and they therefore prohibited the reading and expounding of his metaphysical and other works.⁴

13. If what some tell us be true (which however I question), this Amalric and his followers gave credit to those predictions which were circulated as coming from Joachim, abbot of Flora in Calabria, respecting an approaching reformation and purification of the church by the sword, an impending age of the Holy Spirit to succeed the ages of the Father and the Son, and similar things with which the Franciscan Spirituals were carried away. This however is certain that some others did suffer themselves to be led by these predictions to found new sects, and to declare war against the reigning church. Wilhelmina, an infatuated and delirious Bohemian woman, who resided in the territory of Milan, took occasion from these predictions concerning an age of the Holy Spirit, of foolishly persuading first herself and then many others, that the Holy Spirit had assumed human nature in her person for the sake of saving a large part of mankind, for Christ she said had procured salvation by his blood for all real Christians, and the Holy Spirit by her would save the Jews, the Saracens, and false Christians; and for this end all the things which befel Christ when incarnate must also befall her, or rather the Holy Spirit incarnate in her. This infatuated woman died at Milan in the year 1281 with the highest reputation for sanctity, and after her death she was honoured, as well by her followers who were considerably numerous as by the ignorant populace, both publicly and privately with the highest veneration. But in the year 1300 the Inquisitors detected her sect, conscripta a Deo compulsus, ubi multa ad presens pertinentia continentur de ecclesie renovatione et pravaria gravi persecutione." According to the doctrine of this sect, the Nine Rocks were so many steps by which the man who desires to rise to God must be elevated to a union with Him.

¹ By whom, where, and when, this celebrated sect was first instituted is uncertain. I have before me Octoginta Novem Sententie Becharardorum, quos vidgus Schwestrones, ipsi vero se de Secta Liberi Spiritus et Voluntarii Pauperibus vocant, cum Confutatione; written by an Inquisitor at Worms at the close of this century. The seventy-ninth of these sayings (sententie) is this: "To say that the truth is in Rhetia, is to fall into the heresy of Donatus, who said that God was in Africa and not elsewhere." From these words it appears that Rhetia was the chief seat of the church of the Brethren of the Free Spirit, and that from this province they passed into Germany. Yet probably Rhetia was not the place where this sect originated; I apprehend rather that being expelled from Italy it took refuge in Rhetia, so that it was Italy which gave birth to this, as well as to many other parties which succeeded from the general church. And there is extant in Raynald's Annales Eccles. tom. xv. ad ann. 1311, sec. 66, p. 90, a long Epistle of the sovereign pontiff, Clement V. addressed to Raynerius de Casulis, bishop of Cremona, exhorting him to suppress and eradicate the sect of the Free Spirit, resident in certain parts of Italy, and particularly in the province of Spoleto and the regions adjacent.

² This did not escape the notice of those enemies of the Brethren of the Free Spirit or Bechards, the Inquisitors. Hence the sixty-eighth of the eighty-nine MS. sayings of the Bechards, with their confutation, is this: To say that all creatures are God is the heresy of Alexander (that Epicurean whom Plutarch mentions in his Symposium), who said, "Materiam primam et Deum et hominem, hoc est, mentes esse in substantia;" which afterwards one David de Dinant followed, who in our times fled from France on account of this heresy, and would have been duly punished if he had been caught.

³ See the Hereses pro quibus sacerdotes Parisii (A.D. 1209) igitur consumpti sunt, in Martene's Thesaurus Anecd. tom. iv. p. 163, &c.; Natalis Alexander, Hist. Eccles. sæcul. xiii. cap. iii. art. ii. p. 76, &c.; Gerh. du Bois, Hist. Eccles. Paris. tom. ii. p. 244, &c.; Bulæus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iii. p. 24, 48, 53; Thomassinus, De Erusionibus Mundi Stoica, p. 199, &c.

⁴ Launoi, De Variis Aristotelis Fortuna in Acad. Paris. p. 127, &c.

destroyed her splendid tomb, and committed her bones and with them the leaders of the party of both sexes to the flames.¹

14. Similar predictions were the foundation of the sect of the Apostles, a sect which made little change in the received religion, but aimed to revive the apostolical mode of life. Its founder, Gerhard Sagarellus of Parma, ordered his followers to travel up and down the world in the manner of the apostles, clad in white, with heads bare, beards and hair long, and attended by women whom they called sisters; to possess no property at all, but to live upon the voluntary gifts of the pious; and publicly to exhort the people to repent, but in their private meetings to announce the impending downfall of the utterly deformed Romish church, and the rise of a new, purer, and holier church, according to the prophecies of the abbot Joachim. This Gerhard being burned at the stake at Parma A.D. 1300, his successor, Dulcinus of Novara, a bold and energetic character and familiar with the Scriptures, preached much more boldly, that the Roman pontiff, Boniface VIII. and all the flagitious priests and monks would shortly be slain by the emperor Frederick III. son to Peter the king of Aragon, and that a new and most holy pontiff would be placed over the church. For in many of the predictions ascribed to the abbot Joachim it was announced that an emperor called Frederick III. would complete what the emperor Frederick II. had left unfinished. With this Dulcinus, who was both the general and the prophet of this sect of the apostles, and who had collected an armed force, Raynerius, bishop of Vercelli, waged fierce war in behalf of the pontiff for more than two years; and at length after several battles Dulcinus was taken alive and was executed with exquisite tortures at Vercelli, A.D. 1307, together with Margaretha, the sister whom he had chosen according to the practice of his sect. After the horrid death of Dulcinus the sect long existed in France, Germany, and other countries; nor could it be wholly extirpated till the times of Boniface IX. in the beginning of the fifteenth century.²

15. This Joachim, abbot of Flora, whose prophecies induced so many honest people to menace the Romish church with a reformation by the sword, as the phrase was, and the pontiffs with great disasters, and to proclaim open war against them, was himself brought under suspicion of heresy, not indeed on account of these predictions, but on account of a new explication of the doctrine of three persons in the Godhead. He wrote a book against Peter Lombard, the master of the Sentences, because the latter distinguished the divine essence from the three persons in the Godhead; for Joachim supposed that this distinction introduced a fourth subject into the divine Trinity, namely, this essence. But his ignorance of dialectics led him in this discussion to use less caution than the subject demanded. For he denied that there was in the sacred Trinity a something or an essence which was common to the three persons; from which position it seemed to follow that the union of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit is not a simple or natural union, but merely a moral union like that of several persons all having the same views and opinions. As this sentiment in the view of many appeared to approach very near to the doctrine of Arius, Innocent in the Lateran council of 1215 condemned not indeed the man but his opinions. Joachim however even to the present day has many patrons and advocates, especially among those Franciscans who are called Observants, some of whom maintain that his book was altered by his enemies, and others that his opinions were misunderstood.³

¹ The Milanese historians, Bernhard Corio and others, give an account of this woman. But their statements differ widely from those of Muratori (Antiq. Ital. Medii Ævi, tom. v. p. 95, &c.) derived from the record of the judicial proceedings. He also informs us that a learned man named Pucelli composed a history of Wilhelmina and her sect, which still exists in manuscript. [She pretended to be the daughter of Constantia, queen of Primsislaus, king of Bohemia; and that her birth was announced to her mother by the angel Raphael just as the birth of Christ was announced to Mary by the angel Gabriel. Her most noted followers were one Andrew and a nun named Mayfreda. As Christ appointed Peter his vicegerent and the head of his church on earth, so she appointed Mayfreda her vicegerent and placed her on a footing of equality with the Romish popes. She promised her followers to appear to them before the day of judgment. See Muratori, ubi supra.—Mur.]

² I have composed in the German language a particular history of this famous sect so imperfectly known in our age, in three books, which was published at Helmstadt, 1746, 4to. I could now add some things to that history. That the sect continued to exist in Germany and other countries down to the times of Boniface IX. we are informed by Coerner, in his Chronicle published in Eccard's Corpus Historicum Medii Ævi, tom. ii. p. 906. And the fact may be corroborated by many proofs. In the year 1402, an apostle named William was burned at Lubec. See Coerner, ubi supra, p. 1185. The Germans, who called all that affected uncommon piety and sought a reputation for sanctity by begging, Beghards, gave this appellation also to the Apostoli.

³ See Papebroch's Disquis. Histor. de Florenti Ordine, prophetiæ, doctrina B. Joachimi, in the Acta Sanctor. Mali, tom. vi. p. 456, &c. where is a life of Joachim written by Syllanæus, a Greek, and some other documents. Natalis Alexander, Hist. Eccles. sæc. xiii. Diss. ii. p. 331, &c.; Wadding's Annales Minorum, tom. iv. p. 6, &c.

CENTURY FOURTEENTH.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

1. SOME of the Latin kings, being admonished by the Roman pontiffs, thought several times of renewing the war against the Turks and Saracens and of rescuing Syria from their hands. In particular the pontiffs who resided at Avignon in France omitted no motive which they thought would induce the kings of France and England to engage in such a military enterprise. But from various causes their expectations were always disappointed. Clement V. urged this holy war with great energy in the years 1307 and 1308, and appropriated to it a vast sum of money.¹ John XXII. in the year 1319 fitted out a fleet of ten ships for transporting an army to Palestine;² and in order to raise the money necessary for so great an enterprise, in the years 1322 and 1323 he commissioned certain nuncios to offer everywhere great indulgences to the liberal who should contribute to it. But the emperor Lewis of Bavaria and others complained that he used the pretext of a crusade to gratify his own avarice and ambition.³ Nor does his character shield him from such a charge. Under Benedict XII. in the year 1330, Philip de Valois, king of France, collected a large army for such a holy expedition as it was called;⁴ but when he was about to embark, impending dangers from his neighbour, the king of England, induced him to abandon the enterprise. In the year 1345 Clement VI. at the request of the Venetians, persuaded a vast multitude by his indulgences to embark for Smyrna, over whom Guido, dauphin of Vienne, was appointed commander-in-chief. But in a short time their want of provisions obliged them all with their commander to return to Europe.⁵ Again in the year 1363 at the solicitation of Urban V. a great army was collected to sail to Palestine, of which John, king of France, was appointed commander. But he dying soon after, the army dispersed.⁶

2. The missionaries sent by the Roman pontiffs in the preceding century to the Chinese, the Tartars, and the adjacent countries, continued to gather numerous and large congregations among those nations. In the year 1307 Clement V. constituted John de Monte Corvino archbishop of Cambalu, that is, Peking; for it is now beyond a doubt that the celebrated city of Cathai, then called Cambalu, is the same with Peking the modern capital of China. The same pontiff sent seven new bishops, all of them Franciscans, into those regions.⁷ John XXII. appointed Nicolaus de Bentra to succeed John de Monte Corvino in the year 1333, and also sent letters to the emperor of the Tartars who was then the sovereign of China. Benedict XII. in the year 1338 sent new nuncios into China and Tartary, after being honoured with a solemn embassy from the Tartars which he received at Avignon.⁸ So long as the Tartar empire in China continued, not only the Latins but the Nestorians also had liberty to profess their religion freely all over northern Asia, and to propagate it far and wide.

3. Among the European princes, Jagello, duke of Lithuania and the adjacent terri-

¹ Fragmenta Historiæ Romanæ, in Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Mediæ ævi, iii. p. 368.

² Baluze, Vita Pontif. Avinion. tom. i. p. 366, 386, 371, 401, &c.

³ Wadding's Annales Ord. Min. tom. vi. ad ann. 1305, sec. xii. p. 69, and ad ann. 1307, p. 91, and p. 368, tom. vii. p. 53, 221, tom. viii. p. 235; Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vat. tom. iii. sec. ii. p. 521, &c. Add Echard's Scriptores Prædicator. tom. i. p. 537; Acta Sanctor. tom. i. Januarii, p. 984, &c. and Mosheim's Hist. Tartarorum Eccles.

⁸ Baluze, Vita Pontif. Avinion. tom. i. p. 242.

¹ Baluze, Vita Pontif. Avinion. tom. i. p. 14, 594, tom. ii. p. 55, 57, 374, 391, &c.; Matthæus, Analecta Vet. ævi, tom. ii. p. 577.

² Baluze, Vita Pontif. Avinion. tom. i. p. 122, tom. ii. p. 515.

³ Baluze, ubi supra, tom. i. p. 175, 786; Matthæus, Analect. Vet. ævi, tom. ii. p. 595, 598.

⁴ Baluze, ubi supra, tom. i. p. 200.

tories, was nearly the only one who still adhered to the idolatry of his ancestors. In the year 1386 he embraced the Christian rites, was baptized with the assumed name of Uladislau, and persuaded his subjects to do the same thing. For Lewis, king of Poland, dying in the year 1382, among the candidates for the crown Jagello offered his name, nor were the Poles averse from having so potent a prince for their king. But neither Hedwig, the youngest daughter of the deceased king and by a decree of the senate heiress of the kingdom, would consent to marry, nor would the Poles consent to obey a man who rejected Christianity. He must therefore change his religion.¹ The remains of the old religions which still existed in Prussia and Livonia were extirpated by the Teutonic knights and the crusaders with war and massacres. We are likewise informed that many Jews in one place and another made profession of Christianity. They were rendered docile by the exquisite punishments everywhere inflicted upon them, especially in France and Germany. For a rumour being spread, either truly or calumniously, that they had poisoned the public fountains, had murdered the infants of Christians and drunk their blood, had treated with extreme contumely what were called the hosts [the consecrated wafers of the eucharist], and had committed other crimes equally heinous, the most severe and cruel tortures which could be devised were decreed against that miserable race.

4. In Spain the Saracens still held the sovereignty of Granada, Andalusia, and Murcia; and against them the Christian kings of Castile, Aragon, and Navarre, waged perpetual war, though not always successfully. The kings of Morocco in Africa sent aid to the Saracens against the Christians. The Roman pontiffs roused and encouraged the Christians by subsidies and by their counsels and promises, to unite and drive the Saracens from Spain. The difficult enterprise proceeded but slowly; yet it became evident in this century that the time was approaching when the Christians would triumph and become sole masters of Spain.²

CHAPTER II.

ADVERSE EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

1. THE TURKS and the Tartars who had

¹ Raynald, Annales Eccles. ad ann. 1386, sec. iv.; Wadding's Annales Min. tom. ix. p. 71; Solignac, Hist. de Pologne, tome iii. p. 241, &c.

² Jo. de Ferreras, Hist. Hispanica, tom. iv. v. vi. in vast sway in Asia, and who assailed on the one hand the Greeks and on the other the Saracens and Mamelukes, wholly extirpated the Christian religion in many cities and provinces, and caused the religion of Mohammed to be inculcated on the people in its stead. The nation of the Tartars, in which such numbers once professed Christianity or at least tolerated it, after the commencement of this century universally submitted to the Koran. And this religion though somewhat corrupted was embraced by that most potent emperor of the Tartars Timur Beg, or as he is commonly called Tamerlane.³ Having subjugated the greatest part of Asia by his arms, and even conquered the Turkish sultan Bajazet, and moreover caused the terrors of his name to pervade Europe, his mere nod was sufficient to cause vast multitudes to abandon Christianity. But he also employed violence and the sword. For being persuaded, as the most credible historians of his life inform us, that it was the duty of every true disciple of Mohammed to make war upon Christians, and that those who should compel many of them to embrace the religion of the Koran might expect high rewards from God,⁴ he inflicted numberless evils on persevering Christians, cruelly butchering some and dooming others to perpetual slavery.⁵

2. The Christian religion was likewise overthrown in the parts of Asia inhabited by the Chinese, the Tartars, the Moguls, and other nations, whose history is yet imperfectly known. At least no mention has been found of any Latin Christians resident in those countries subsequent to the year 1370. Nor has it yet been ascertained what became of the Franciscan missionaries sent thither from Rome. But of the Nestorians living in China some traces can be found, though not very clear, as late as the sixteenth century.⁶ There can be little various passages; Fragmenta Hist. Rom. in Muratori's Antiq. Ital. Medii Ævi, tom. iii. p. 319, where however true and false are blended. Baluze, Miscellanea, tom. ii. p. 267.

³ The great Tamerlane, whose name struck terror even long after his death, wished to be regarded as belonging to the sect of the Sunnites, and to be an enemy of the Schittes. See Petit Croix, Hist. de Timur-Bec, tome ii. p. 151, tome iii. p. 228. But what his religion was is very doubtful, although he professed that of Mohammed. See Mosheim's Hist. Tartarorum Eccles. p. 124, &c.

⁴ Petit Croix, Hist. de Timur-Bec, tome ii. p. 329, tome iii. p. 9, 137, 243, 265, &c.

⁵ Examples are given in the Hist. de Timur-Bec (taken from the Persian writer Scherifeddin), tome ii. p. 376, 384, 386, tome iii. p. 243, tome iv. p. 111, 115, 117, ed. Delft, 1723, in 4 vols. 8vo; Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient. article Timur, p. 877.

⁶ Trigault, De Christiana Expeditione apud Sinas, lib. i. cap. xi. p. 116, &c.; Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vatic. tom. iii. par. i. p. 592, &c. and par. ii. p. 445, doubt that this fall of Christianity was a consequence of the wars of the Tartars with the Chinese and with other nations. For in the year 1369 the last Tartar emperor of the family of Genghis Kan was driven out of China and the Mim family was placed on the throne, who have excluded all foreigners from entering China.

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE STATE OF LITERATURE AND SCIENCE.

1. THE Greeks, though greatly oppressed with both external and internal troubles, did not suffer literature and science to become wholly prostrate, as is manifest from the number of learned men among them in this century. The liberal arts, antiquities, criticism, and grammar, were reputedly prosecuted by Nicephorus Gregoras,¹ Manuel Chrysoloras,² Maximus Planudes,³ and many others. History was prosecuted, though with different degrees of success, by Theodorus Metochita,⁴ John Cantacuzenus,⁵ Nicephorus Gregoras, and by several others of less note. An ecclesiastical history was composed by Nicephorus Callisti, which although it contains many fabulous and superstitious accounts, throws light on a number of subjects.⁶

536. &c.; Du Halde, Description de la Chine, tome i. p. 175.

¹ Nicephorus Gregoras or son of Gregory, was born at Heraclea in Pontus about A.D. 1295, studied under the best masters at Constantinople, became a teacher there, and acquired the title of the Philosopher. He was one of the ambassadors to the prince of the Serbians. In the year 1328, when the younger Andronicus dethroned his grandfather, Andronicus Palæologus, Nicephorus not only lost his patron, but suffered otherwise. Yet he continued a teacher and had eminent men for pupils. Theodorus Metochita made him overseer of a monastery. He engaged in the public controversies between Barlaam and Palamas, became a monk, and retired from court. He died soon after A.D. 1359. Besides some orations and smaller tracts, he wrote a valuable history of the Byzantine empire, from A.D. 1204, where Nicetas Acominatus ends, to the year 1359, in 39 books. The first 24 books, reaching to A.D. 1351, were published, Gr. and Lat. by Boivin, Paris, 1702, and Venise, 1729, 2 vols. fol.—Mur.

² Manuel Chrysoloras, one of the first and most active of the Greeks who promoted learning in the West, was born of noble parentage at Constantinople, about the middle of the fourteenth century, and for some time taught literature and science in his native city. About A.D. 1393 the Greek emperor, Manuel Palæologus, sent him twice as an ambassador to various European kingdoms to solicit aid against the Turks. After visiting the English and various other courts, he took up his residence in Italy, and taught Greek to several of the first scholars of that age in the West. He gave instruction at Florence, Milan, Venice, Pavia, and Rome. In the year 1409 the pope sent him to Constantinople to negotiate a union between the Greek and Latin churches. In the year 1413 he was sent to the emperor Sigismund, to settle arrangements for the general council of Constance in the following year. He attended that council and died shortly after, in the year 1416. Æneas Sylvius and Poggio give him very high commendations in their notices of his death. Among his pupils in the West were Leonard Aretinus, Francis Barbarus, Guarinus of Verona, Poggio, and Philæphus. His only work which has been published was his Erotemata Grammatica, which was the first good Greek grammar among the Europeans, and was that studied by Erasmus and Reuchlin.—Mur. [The reader will see some very interesting facts relative to the revival of Greek literature in Europe, in Hallam's Intro. to the Liter. of Europe, 1st edit. vol. i. p. 131, &c.—R.

³ Maximus Planudes was a learned Greek monk of Constantinople, well acquainted with the Latin language. In the year 1327 the Greek emperor sent him with others on an embassy to Venice. He suffered considerably for his attachment to the cause of the popes; but afterwards he changed sides and espoused that of the Greeks. He appears to have died soon after A.D. 1353. He translated from Latin into Greek the writings of Cicero, Cæsar, Ovid, Cato, and Boethius, with Augustine's fifteen books on the Trinity; he composed a life of Æsop, and compiled a Greek Anthology in seven books. He likewise wrote against the Latins, composed some orations, and many letters and smaller pieces.—Mur.

⁴ Theodorus Metochita was a learned Greek of the kindred of the emperor, and the favourite and prime minister of Andronicus Palæologus. In the latter part of the preceding century, the emperor sent him with John Glycas to conduct Maria, sister of the German emperor, who was espoused to the oldest son of the Greek emperor, to Constantinople. It was about the year 1314 he was made prime Logotheta, and took nearly the whole government of the empire on his shoulders. But about A.D. 1328, Andronicus senior being dethroned by his grandson, Andronicus junior Metochita of course fell into disgrace, and was made a state prisoner till his death A.D. 1333. He translated the third book of Glycas' Annals, which Meursius published in 1648 as an original work, entitled a Compendium of Roman History from Julius Cæsar to Constantine the Great. He wrote comments on Aristotle's eight books of Physics, besides some historical tracts never published. He was esteemed one of the most learned Greeks of his age.—Mur.

⁵ John Cantacuzenus was of the illustrious family of the Cantacuzeni on the father's side, and of that of the Palæologi on the side of his mother. His youth was devoted to literature and arms. He then became a statesman under the elder Andronicus. In the year 1320 he was found to be a partisan of the younger Andronicus, and fell under displeasure. But his friend supported him; and on the elevation of his friend to the throne Cantacuzenus was loaded with honours and offices. On the death of Andronicus junior A.D. 1341, Cantacuzenus was made regent of the empire and guardian of the prince, John Palæologus, then nine years old. But the empress-mother and others became jealous of him, and a civil war ensued. Cantacuzenus was victorious, and in 1347 concluded a peace, by which he and John Palæologus were to be joint emperors. Civil war again broke out; and in 1355 Cantacuzenus resigned the purple and voluntarily retired to Mount Athos, where he became a monk, and spent the remainder of his days in literary pursuits and monastic devotions. Here he wrote the history of the empire during the reigns of the two Andronici and himself, or from A.D. 1320 to 1357, published Gr. and Lat. with notes, Paris, 1645, 3 vols. fol. He also wrote three orations and some tracts against the Mohammedans, which are extant.—Mur.

⁶ Nicephorus Callisti, i.e. the son of Callistus, lived

2. Those Greeks who devoted themselves to philosophy for the most part followed Aristotle as their guide. No one among them, so far as I know, ventured upon philosophical speculations relying on his own ingenuity. In what manner they explained the precepts of the Stagyræ we may learn from the tracts of Theodorus Metochita. Yet Plato had likewise some followers, especially among the cultivators of mystic theology which had long been in high estimation among the Greeks. In the mathematics and astronomy Nicolaus Cabasilas was their most distinguished scholar.¹ The Stoic principles in regard to morals were recommended by Barlaam, and exhibited in his Ethics according to the Stoics.²

3. There was no country of the Latins in which efforts were not made, and successfully, for the advancement of learning and the improvement of the human mind. Hence academics and universities were erected in various places, as Cologne, Orleans, Perugia, Florence, and Pisa, in which all the liberal arts and sciences were taught, and were distributed as at this day into several faculties. In the universities, colleges were founded by the opulent and endowed with ample revenues, in which not only monks but young men of narrow circumstances were educated in the useful arts and sciences. Libraries were also collected, and men of learning were excited by honours and rewards to aspire after fame and distinction. But the advantages to the church and the state from the numerous teachers and learned men were not correspondent with the vast expense and care bestowed by the great on these institutions. Yet all who assumed the office of teachers in this age were not, as many have rashly supposed, stupid and despicable; while there was a gradual advance from lower to higher attainments.

4. The sovereign pontiff himself, Clement V. required the Hebrew and other Oriental languages to be taught in the public schools, that there might be men competent to enter into discussions with the Jews and the Saracens, and to preach divine truth in the countries of the East.³ Of course there were some persons in that age who were acquainted particularly with those languages. The Greek language, which previously very few had regarded at all, was now first taught by Leontius Pilatus, a Calabrian, the translator of Homer, and by a few others;⁴ and afterwards, with far greater applause and success, by Manuel Chrysoloras, a Constanat Constantinople, and was probably a priest or monk there about 1333. His personal history is little known. From Eusebius, Sozomen, Theodoret, Evagrius, and others, he compiled an Eccelesiastical History in twenty-three books, from the Christian era to A.D. 911. The style and arrangement are deemed good for that age, but it abounds in useless trash and fables. The first eighteen books, extending to A.D. 610, were published Greek and Latin, Paris, 1630, 2 vols. fol. He also wrote catalogues of the Greek emperors and of the Constantinopolitan patriarchs.—Mur. (See Fabricius Bibliæ Græcæ, vol. vi. p. 130, for a fuller account of this writer and his Eccelesiastical History. There is a brief notice of him and his work in Dowling's Introduct. to the Critical Study of Ecclæ. Hist. p. 91, &c. A homily by Nicophorus on Mary Magdalene may be seen in Bandini, Græcæ Ecclæ. Vet. Monum. Flor. 1762, vol. iii.—R.

¹ Nicolaus Cabasilas, nephew and successor to Nilus Cabasilas, archbishop of Thessalonica, was employed as a negotiator between the parties in the civil wars, A.D. 1346 and 1347. The time of his death is unknown. He was a learned man and a violent opposer of the Latins. His works are, an Exposition of the Greek Liturgy, on a life in Christ or the efficacy of the sacraments, an oration against usurers, an encomium on St. Theodora, a Commentary on Ptolemy's third book of constructions, some astrological diagrams, remarks on Ezekiel's vision of four beasts, and some tracts against the Latins. The last three were never published.—Mur.

² Canisius, Lectiones Antiquæ, tom. iv. p. 405. [Barlaam was a native of Calabria in Italy, became a monk of the order of St. Basil, lived at Constantinople, and was a very learned, ambitious, and factious man. Being born and educated among the Latins, he at first agreed with them against the Greeks. But changing sides, he became a most powerful clannish among the Greeks against the Latins. While an abbot at Constantinople he investigated the state of the monks of Mount Athos, and brought a complaint against the Hesychists there before the patriarch of Constantinople. George Palamas appeared as their advocate. The cause was tried before a council, A.D. 1337, and the monks were acquitted. (See below, ch. v. sec. 1, 2, of this century.) In the year 1339 Barlaam was the emperor's ambassador to the pope at Avignon, for negotiating a union of the two churches. In the year 1341 he withdrew from Constantinople on a change in the government, came to Italy, again espoused the cause of the Latins against the Greeks, and was made bishop of Geraci in Naples. He died about the year 1348. His works, besides his Ethics secundum Stoicos, are various letters, orations, and tracts, both for the Greeks against the Latins, and for the latter against the former, and six books on arithmetic. The last was printed Gr. and Lat. Paris, 1600, 4to. All the others in Latin are in Canisius, ubi supra, and in the Bibliæ. Mur. Patrum, tom. xxvi.—Mur.

³ Wood's Antiquit. Oxon. tom. i. p. 156, 159. [This bull of Clement is in the Corpus Juris Canon. Clementinus, lib. v. tit. i. cap. i. and bears date A.D. 1311. It required Hebrew, Arabic, and Chaldaic, to be taught, each by two competent instructors, wherever the papal court might be, and also in the universities of Paris, Oxford, Bologna, and Salamanca. The pope was to support the teachers in his court, the kings of France and England those at Paris and Oxford, the clergy of Italy those at Bologna, and the clergy of Spain those at Salamanca.—Mur.

⁴ See Hody, De Græcæ Illustribus, Lingua Græcæ, Literarumque humaniorum Instauratoribus, lib. i. p. 5, Lond. 1742, 8vo; Calogera, Opusculi Scientifici, tom. xxv. p. 258. [Leontius Pilatus came to Venice in the year 1360, on his way to the papal court at Avignon. Boccaccio met him, and persuaded him to go with him to Florence. Here he taught Greek with which he was well acquainted, to Boccaccio and to Petrarch, and for their use translated Homer's Iliad into Latin. His admiration of the Greeks led him in 1363 to go to Constantinople. But he found that people not such as his imagination had represented them. He therefore set sail for Italy the next year, and was killed by lightning on board the ship. See Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xxx. p. 164.—Mur.

tinopolitan,¹ who encouraged many to prosecute this study. The true and genuine excellence of Latin composition was revived by several distinguished men of genius in Italy; among whom the first place is due to Francis Petrarch, a great and superior man,² and the second place belongs to Dante Alighieri.³ These men felt it to be their duty in general to excite mankind to cultivate their minds, and to place a high value on all sorts of learning; and they found numbers disposed to listen to them, not only among the Italians but among the French and Germans.

5. Of the grammarians, historians, jurists both civil and canon, and physicians, it would be easy to make out a long list from the monuments of this age, but it would be unsuitable to our design. It is sufficient for the reader to know that among the vast number, there were few whose labours were of much service to mankind. The study of civil and canon law was pursued by an immense number, because this was the avenue to preferment in church and state; and who has not heard of Bartolus, Baldus, Andreas,⁴ and other jurists of this century, who gave reputation to the Italian universities? Yet the jurisprudence of this age offered nothing that could be alluring to an ingenious mind. It was rather a barren, thorny field, on which the light of history and polite learning never shone. Mathematics engaged the attention of many; but with the exception of Thomas Bradwardine, the acute bishop of Canterbury,⁵

¹ Hody, ubi supra, lib. i. p. 10; Calogera, Opuscoli Scientifici, tom. xxv. p. 248, &c. and especially Boerner, De Græcæ literaturæ Græcar. in Italia Instauratoribus, p. 1—35. [See also note 2, p. 486, above.—Mur.]

² See Thomas-in's Life of Petrarch, in Müschien's Vita Claror. Virorum, tom. iv. who in the preface enumerates the other biographers of Petrarch. [The Abbé de Sado's Mémoires pour servir à la Vie de François Petrarque, Amsterd. 1764, 3 vols. 4to. See also a paper by A. F. Tytler, Esq. in the Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, vol. v. Petrarch was born at Arezzo in Tuscany, A.D. 1304. When eight years old his father, being banished, carried him to Avignon in France. Here he was educated for the civil law. But he hated the pursuit, fell in love, and became a poet. He passed his life either in travelling about France and Italy, or in different retreats, particularly at Vaucluse near Carpentras, in the south of France. But he also spent considerable time at the courts and seats of different princes, noblemen, and prelates, in Italy and France, and was in high reputation as a scholar, a poet, a philosopher, and a theologian. Honours were heaped upon him; but that which he valued highest was to be publicly crowned with the poet's bay at Rome, A.D. 1341. He died at his own villa near Padua, A.D. 1374. His works are numerous short pieces, particularly letters and poems, with some moral and political writings, partly in Latin and partly in Italian. The whole were never collected, though a large part of them were, in one vol. fol. Basil, 1554, 1581, and Lyons, 1601. The best edition of his poems is said to be that of Venice, 1766, 2 vols. 4to.—Mur. [In the Mémoires de Littérature there is a Vie de Petrarque by the Baron de la Bastie, in vol. xv. p. 746—794, and vol. xvii. p. 390—491; and a Mémoire sur l'Origine de l'œuvre, by M. Menard, in vol. xxx. p. 756—776. But on that topic see Hallam's Middle Ages, vol. ii. p. 509, note. The most recent English work on this celebrated scholar is a life of him by the late Thomas Campbell, Lond. 1841, 2 vols. See also Hallam, Introd. to the Liter. of Europe, vol. i. p. 109.—R.]

³ The life of Dante, the celebrated poet, has been treated of by many, but especially by his annotator Benvenuto da Imola, from whom Muratori has given numerous extracts in his Antiquit. Ital. Medii Ævi, tom. i. p. 1036. [Dante was born at Florence, A.D. 1265, studied there and at Bologna and Padua. The Helles Lettres were his favourite pursuit. He married, became a soldier, and a statesman at Florence. But belonging to an unsuccessful faction he was banished from Tuscany in the year 1302, and after wandering in Italy and making some excursions to France and Germany, he settled at Ravenna where he died A.D. 1321. He has left us two considerable works. The first is a poem in Italian, entitled La Divina Comedia, or vision of Hell, Purgatory, and Heaven, as seen by himself, A.D. 1300, divided into three parts. It abounds in vivid descriptions, and has been extolled to the highest by the Italians. The other is shorter and in Latin, entitled De Monarchia. Its object is to evince, that the pontiffs have no right to control princes in civil affairs. The best edition of his collected works is that of Venice, 1757, 1758, 4 vols. 4to.—Mur. [See Hallam, Middle Ages, vol. ii. p. 503, and Introd. to Liter. of Europe. Rossetti has endeavoured to prove that Dante, throughout his Divina Comedia, was presenting an allegorical picture of the corruptions of the papal church, and sowing the seed which came to maturity in the Reformation of the sixteenth century. See Rossetti's Disquisitions on the Anti-Papal Spirit which produced the Reformation, &c. a translation from the Italian, by Miss C. Ward, Lond. 1834, 2 vols.—R.]

⁴ Bartolus was born at Sassoferrato in the duchy of Urbino, A.D. 1313. At the age of 13 he commenced the study of the civil law, first at Perugia and then at Bologna. He was made doctor at the age of twenty, and commenced teacher of law three years after at Pisa. He also taught at Padua and Bologna, and died A.D. 1356. His lectures and his legal opinions were highly esteemed, and his Glosses on the civil law for two centuries were of the highest authority. They were printed at Venice, A.D. 1615, in eleven vols. fol. He was more distinguished for acumen and nice discrimination than for extensive reading.—Baldus Ubaldis was nobly born at Perugia, A.D. 1324, and was first the pupil and then the rival of Bartolus. He taught both civil and canon law, and lectured at Perugia, Padua, and Pisa. He died at the last-mentioned place of the hydrophobia, A.D. 1400, aged 76. In readiness and metaphysical acumen he was thought superior to Bartolus, but not his equal in solidity of judgment. He wrote commentaries on the Decretals, five volumes of legal opinions, Glosses on nearly the whole Corpus Juris Civilis, besides various law tracts, all of which have been printed. These two were the greatest jurists of the age, so far as the civil law is concerned. Yet Andrew Horne, an Englishman of Gloucestershire, distinguished himself by his attempt to reform the English laws, by expunging from them everything which was not in accordance with the scriptures and natural justice. His work was written in French, and entitled A Mirror for the Judges, and was printed in French, Lond. 1642, 8vo, and in English, Lond. 1646, 8vo. As to his age, we only know that his book was written under Edward III. and before A.D. 1324, and that he defended the abbot of Waltham in a court, A.D. 1343. See Wharton's Append. to Cave's Hist. Liter.—John Andreas, the celebrated doctor of canon law, taught that science at Bologna for forty-five years, and died there A.D. 1348. His works are commentaries on the five books of Decretals, Glosses on the Liber Sextus Decret. and the Clementina, and tracts concerning feudalities, marriage, affinities, all of which have been published.—Mur.

⁵ Thomas Bradwardine was an Englishman, educated at Oxford, where he was a proctor in 1325 and afterwards doctor of divinity and lecturer on theology. He became confessor to Edward III. whom he attended in his French wars. In the year 1348 he was elected archbishop of Canterbury, but the king preferring few obtained much applause from these studies.

6. Of the immense swarm of philosophers who infested rather than adorned this age, Aristotle was the guide and the oracle, though imperfectly understood and divested of all his beauties. In so high estimation was the Peripatetic philosophy that kings and princes ordered the works of Aristotle to be translated into the languages of their people, that greater numbers might acquire wisdom. In particular, Charles V. king of France, has been commended for directing Nicholas Oresme to translate into French, among other writings of the ancients, the principal works of Aristotle.¹ Those however who professed to be philosophers were less solicitous to discover and support truth than to have the pleasure of wrangling; and they perplexed and obscured the pure and unadulterated doctrines of reason and religion by their vain subtleties, their useless questions, and their ridiculous distinctions. I need not mention their barbarous diction in which they supposed the principal strength of their art to consist, or their contempt for all elegant literature which they accounted their glory. The whole art and method of this wrangling tribe may be learned by reading the works of only John Scotus or Walter Burley; for they all followed one common track, though differing among themselves as to some opinions.

7. The old disputes between the Realists and the Nominalists which had been long dormant were again stirred up in the schools by William Occam, an English Franciscan monk of the more rigid cast, a pupil of the great Scotus and a doctor in the university of Paris; nor was it possible afterwards to bring these contentions to an end. Never was there fiercer war between the Greeks and Persians than between these two sects of philosophers, down to the time when Luther obliged the scholastic doctors to terminate their intestine conflicts. The Realists despised their antagonists as philosophers of a recent date, and branded them with the name of Moderns; while to their own doctrine they ascribed the highest antiquity. But in this they were undoubtedly mistaken. The Nominalists on the contrary regarded them as being visionaries, who mistook the creations of their own imaginations for real existences and solid substances. The Nominalists had, particularly at Paris, a number of acute, subtle, and eloquent doctors, among whom, besides Occam, the celebrated John Buridan, a Parisian doctor, stood pre-eminent;² but the Realists were the most numerous and were also strong in the countenance given them by the Roman pontiffs. For Occam having joined the order of Franciscans who were openly opposed to John XXII. this pontiff first, and afterwards his successors, left no means untried to put down the philosophy of the Nominalists which seemed to be opposed to the church.³ Hence in the year 1339, the university of Paris by a public edict condemned and prohibited the philosophy of Occam which was that of the Nominalists.⁴ But as men are prone to pursue what is forbidden, this decree only caused a still greater number than before to follow the system of the Nominalists.

8. Not a few of these philosophers added astrology, or the art of prognosticating the fortunes of men from the stars, to their philosophy. For this fallacious science was prosecuted in those times even to madness by all orders from the highest to the lowest.⁵ But these astrological philosophers had to be very cautious and circumspect, to avoid impeachment for magic and to escape the hands of the Inquisitors. Such another, Ufford was chosen. But Ufford dying before his consecration, Bradwardine was rechosen, and with the king's consent was ordained by the pope at Avignon. He however died very soon after his arrival at Lambeth, A.D. 1348. He was a profound reasoner, eminently pious, a strong Augustinian in theology, of plain unpolished manners, and particularly fond of mathematics. His great work is, The Cause of God and the Truth of Causes, against Pelagius, published by Saville, Lond. 1618, fol. He also wrote Gemmetrica Speculativa, and Arithmetica Speculativa, published together, Paris, 1512; also Tractatus Proportionum, published, Venice, 1505. See Wharton's Appendix to Cave's Hist. Liter. and Milner's Eccles. History, cent. xiv. ch. ii.—Mur. [See also Hallam's Introduct. to the Literature of Europe, vol. i. p. 156, 7.—R.]

¹ Launoi, Hist. Gymnasii Navarrensi, in his Opp. tom. iv. par. i. p. 504; Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iv. p. 379; Le Bœuf's Dissert. sur l'Hist. Ecclési. et Civile de Paris, tome iii. p. 456, 463, &c.

² A biography of this noted man was written by Robert Guaguin, as we are told by Launoi, Hist. Gymnasii Navarrensi, in his Opp. tom. iv. par. i. p. 722. Launoi also speaks of him in other places, as p. 296, 297, 330. See Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iv. p. 280, 307, 341, &c. [John Buridan was a native of Bethune in Artois, studied at Paris under Occam, and taught philosophy there with great applause. He wrote commentaries on Aristotle's logic, morals, and metaphysics, which are still extant. Some say that he was rector of the university of Paris, and that he afterwards went to Vienna, and there commenced that university; but these circumstances as well as the exact time when he lived are uncertain. To him is ascribed the noted metaphysical maxim, that a hungry ass placed between two equal bundles of hay would not be able to eat of either. See Bayle's Dictionnaire, art. Buridan.—Mur.]

³ Buleus, Miscellanea, tom. iv. p. 532.

⁴ Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iv. p. 257, tom. v. p. 708. D'Argentre, Collectio Judicior. de Novis Erroribus, tom. i. p. 337. On the contests of these sects in England, see Wood's Antiq. Oxon. tom. i. p. 169, &c. ⁵ See Imola, in Muratori's Antiq. Ital. Medii Ævi, tom. i. p. 1039; Le Bœuf's Dissertations sur l'Hist. de Paris, tome iii. p. 445, &c.

caution was neglected to his ruin by Cæcus Asculanus, a very noted Peripatetic philosopher, astrologer, mathematician, and physician first to the pontiff John XXII. and then to Charles Lackland, duke of Calabria. For, having by mechanical arts performed some things which appeared miraculous to the vulgar, and by his predictions which were reported to have proved true, given offence both to his patron and to others, he was looked upon as having intercourse with the devil, and was committed to the flames by the Inquisitors at Florence, A.D. 1327.¹ His Commentary on the Sphere of John de Sacrobusto is still extant, and is represented as affording proof of the extreme superstition of the author.²

9. A new and singular species of art was invented and elucidated in numerous treatises by Raymund Lully of Majorca, a man of a singular and very fertile genius, a compound of folly and reason, who after many journeys and various efforts for the advancement of the Christian cause, was put to death in the year 1315 at Bugia in Africa by the Mohammedans whom he attempted to convert to the Christian faith. The Franciscans, to whose third order he is said to have belonged, extol him to the skies, and have long endeavoured most earnestly to persuade the pontiffs to enrol him among the saints; but the Dominicans and others, on the contrary, endeavour to make him a heretic, a magician, a delirious alchemist, a compiler from the works of the Mohammedans; and some represent him as deranged and a fanatic. Of the pontiffs, some have pronounced him an innocent and pious man, and others a heretic and irreligious. Those who will read his works without prejudice will coincide with neither party. Lully would have been truly a great man, if the warmth and fertility of his imagination had been tempered and restrained by a sound judgment.³

¹ An apology for him was written by Applan, the Jesuit, which may be seen in Bernini's Storia di tutte l'Herésie, tom. iii. sæcul. xiv. c. iii. p. 210, &c. An account is also given of this unhappy philosopher and poet (for he was also a poet) by Crescembini, Commentary della Volgar Poëzia, vol. ii. par. ii. lib. iii. c. 14.

² Naudé, Apologie pour les Grands qui ont soupçonné de Magie, p. 270, &c.

³ See Salzinger's Preface to the works of Raymund Lully, which the elector Palatine, John William, caused to be collected and published at a great expense in five vols. folio, A.D. 1720; Wadding's Annales Min. tom. iv. p. 421, &c. tom. v. p. 157, 316, &c. tom. vi. p. 229, &c. On the famous Lullian Art, see Morhof's Polyhistor, lib. ii. cap. v. p. 352, &c. [* It consisted in collecting a number of general terms common to all the sciences, of which an alphabetical table was to be provided. Subjects and predicates taken from these were to be respectively inscribed in angular spaces upon circular papers. The essences, qualities, affections, and relations of things being thus mechanically brought together, the circular papers of subjects were fixed in a frame, and those of predicates were so placed upon

CHAPTER II.

HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS AND GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH.

1. THAT the governors of the church, as well the prelates as those of lower rank, were addicted to all those vices which are the most unbecoming in men in their stations, is testified most abundantly. As for the Greek and oriental clergy, many of whom lived under oppressive governments, I shall say nothing, although their blemishes are sufficiently manifest. But of the faults of the Latins silence would be the less proper, in proportion to the certainty that from this source the whole community was involved in the greatest calamities. All the honest and good men of that age ardently wished for a reformation of the church both in its head and members, as they themselves expressed it.⁴ But to so desirable an event them as to move freely, and in their resolutions to produce various combinations of subjects and predicates, whence would arise definitions, axioms, and propositions, varying endlessly." See Ruc's Cyclopædia, art. Lully Raymund; Brückner's Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. iv. p. 9, &c. The Life of Lully, written by a contemporary, is in the Acta Sanctor. Antwerp, tom. v. p. 633, &c. He is said to have been born A.D. 1236, to have been dissipated in his youth, and afterwards to have applied himself much to chemistry, as well as to metaphysics and theology. He died aged 79, A.D. 1315. As a chemist, Boerhaave thought him much in advance of his age, if the works ascribed to him are all genuine.—Mur.

⁴ Math. Flacius, Catalogus Testium Veritatis, lib. xiii. p. 1697; Lamoi, De Furia Fortuna Aristotelis, p. 217; Hottinger, Hist. Eccles. sæcul. xiv. p. 754. [See Raynald's Annal. Eccles. ad ann. 1311, sec. 56—65. tom. xv. p. 87—90. From a manuscript account of the transactions of the council of Vienna, A.D. 1311, found in the Vatican library, Raynald here quotes largely a document offered to the council by a prelate distinguished by his piety and learning, who stated that in most parts of France, Sundays and the principal festivals, instead of being days for public worship were the market days and the days for assize courts and public fairs. So that, instead of being distinguished by the honours paid to God, they were days for serving the devil. The churches were left empty, while the court-rooms and the taverns resounded with brolls, tumults, blasphemies, and perjuries, and nearly all the wickedness of Pagans. And the people grew up in almost total ignorance of religion; God was dishonoured, the devil reigned, souls perished, and religion was stricken to the ground. In some parts of the same kingdom, the rural archdeacons, archbishops, and deans, instead of inflicting ecclesiastical censures only for heinous sins, wantonly excommunicated whom they pleased, and sometimes 300 or 400 at once, for the slightest offences and even for no offence at all. In this way the people had become disgusted, had lost all reverence for ecclesiastical law, and were loud and open in their censures of the church and its officers. To remedy this evil, more care must be taken not to admit unfit persons to holy orders. In this the church had committed a great error; for numerous vile and contemptible persons, whose lives, knowledge, and morals, rendered them totally unfit, were admitted to holy orders, especially to the priesthood. And hence the whole sacred order was disgraced, the sacred ministry censured, and the church scandalized, while the people beheld in the church a licentious multitude of priests in the highest degree unworthy, whose hateful lives and pernicious ignorance gave rise to numberless scandals, and caused even the sacraments to be despised. In many places

there were still many obstacles. First, the power of the pontiffs was so confirmed by its long continuance, that it seemed to be immovably established. In the next place, extravagant superstition held the minds of most persons in abject slavery. And lastly, the ignorance and barbarism of the times quickly extinguished the sparks of truth which now and then glimmered forth. Yet the dominion of the Roman pontiffs, impregnable and durable as it seemed to be, was gradually undermined and weakened in this century, partly by the rash insolence of the pontiffs themselves, and partly by the occurrence of certain unexpected events.

2. The commencement of this important change must be referred to the contest between Boniface VIII. who governed the Latin church at the beginning of this century, and Philip the Fair, king of France. For this high-minded sovereign first taught the Europeans what the emperors had in the priests were more hateful and contemptible to the laity than even the Jews. The monks no longer confined themselves to their cloisters and their proper duties. Many lived two or three together in the little priories scattered over the country, where they were subject to no restraints, and had almost nothing but the name and garb of monks. And those who pretended to live in the cloisters, wholly neglected the observance of their rules and their exercises, travelled as traders and merchants, attended the fairs, and lived like laymen. Multitudes of persons from all parts of the world, whose lives and morals were detestable, hovered around the Romish court, petitioning for livings even before they became vacant, especially in those regions where the bishops ordained without much examination, and showed great deference to the pope. And these vile persons were so often gratified that the churches were dilapidated the gospel scandalized, and the church of God blasphemed. The prelates could neither furnish fit persons with livings nor the livings with fit persons, on account of the multitudes who thus obtained appointments at Rome. In one cathedral of only thirty prebends, there were then thirty-five persons entitled to those livings; and for twenty-three years the bishop had been able to appoint only two persons of his own choice. These obtrusive priests rarely became residents, or if they did, they were a scandal to the church. Thus the church of God was in fact left without pastors, and the people lived in ignorance and sin. For if the bishops trained here and there a fit person for the ministry, they could seldom introduce him to a living, so that he had at last to betake himself to some worldly calling, while the church livings were lavished upon non-residents and unworthy persons appointed at Rome. Pluralities had become so common that many persons held four or five benefices, and sometimes ten or twelve, in different and sometimes distant places, without serving any one of them. Thus a single individual sometimes obtained an income sufficient to support fifty or sixty well informed ministers and teachers; and the resources of the church were so wasted upon pluralists and non-residents, that the schools were left destitute of instructors, and the parishes without curates; and the bishops could not remove the evil. Children also were in great numbers put in possession of ecclesiastical dignities and livings, though utterly incapable of fulfilling the duties of the sacred office. And such was the corruption of the times, that if here and there the election of a curate was in the power of the people, they generally preferred one ignorant and vicious, a demagogue who flattered and indulged their vicious propensities. The prelates, alas! were too often blind leaders of the blind. Simony was common among them, and the clergy were in general profligate, ventri suo non Christo Dominum sercientes.—Mur.

vain attempted, that the Romish bishops could be vanquished and controlled. In a very haughty letter addressed to Philip, Boniface maintained that all kings and persons whatsoever, and the king of France as well as others, by divine command owed perfect obedience to the Roman pontiff, and this not merely in religious matters, but likewise in secular and human affairs. The king replied with great severity. The pontiff repeated his former assertions with greater arrogance, and published the celebrated bull, called Unam sanctam,¹ in which he asserted that Jesus Christ had granted a twofold power or sword to his church, a spiritual and a temporal, that the whole human race was subjected to the pontiff, and that all who dissented from this doctrine were heretics, and could not expect to be saved.² The king on the contrary in an assembly of his nobles, A.D. 1303, through the famous lawyer, William de Nogaret,³ publicly accused the pontiff of heresy, simony, dishonesty, and other enormities; and he urged the calling of a general council for deposing the guilty pontiff from his office. The pope, in return, excommunicated the king and all his adherents the same year.

3. Soon after receiving this sentence, Philip in an assembly of the states of his kingdom, again entered a formal complaint against the pontiff by men of the highest reputation and influence, and appealed to the decision of a future general council of the church. He then dispatched William de Nogaret, with some others into Italy, to rouse the people to insurrection, and to bring the pontiff prisoner to Lyons, where he intended the council should be held. Nogaret who was a resolute and energetic man, having drawn over to his interest the Colonna family who were at variance with the pontiff raised a small force, suddenly attacked Boniface who was living securely at Anagni, made him prisoner, wounded him, and among other severe indignities struck him on the head with his iron gauntlet. The people of Anagni indeed rescued the pontiff from the hands of his furious enemy; but he died shortly after at Rome in the month of October, from the violence of his rage and anguish of mind.¹

¹ The papal bulls are usually quoted by jurists and writers on canon law by the words with which they begin; thus, another bull by Boniface is styled Uniusvici laicos; that of Clement V. respecting the mendicant orders is called Exivi de paradiso; that of Clement VI. for the jubilee, and proclaiming for the first time the theory of indulgences, is called Unigenitus; that of Leo X. against Luther is styled Exsurge Domine, and so forth.—R.

² This bull is extant in the Corpus Juris Canon. Extravagant. Commun. lib. II. tit. [viii. cap. I.] De Majoritate et Obedientia. [In this bull the pontiff asserts that there is but one church of Christ under one head, as there was but one ark under the command of Noah, all out of which necessarily perish; that the sole head of the church on earth is Christ's vicergerent St. Peter and his successors, who are amenable to none but God; that both swords, the spiritual and the material, are in the power of the church; the latter to be wielded for the church, or by kings and soldiers at the nod and pleasure of the priesthood, and the former to be wielded by the church or the priesthood; and the temporal power is subjected to the spiritual, otherwise the church would be a double-headed monster; that whoever resists this order of things, resists the ordinance of God; and he concludes thus—We declare, determine, and decree, that it is absolutely necessary to salvation that every human being should be subject to the Roman pontiff.—Mur.

³ Of this celebrated lawyer, who was the most bold and determined enemy the pontiffs ever had before Luther, none have given a fuller account than the Benedictine monks, in their Hist. Générale de Langueudois, tome iii. p. 114, 117, &c. Philip made him chancellor of France for his heroic opposition to the pontiff.

4. Benedict XI. previously Nicolaus of Trevisa, the successor of Boniface, profiting by his example, restored the king of France and his kingdom to their former honours and privileges, without even being solicited; but he was unwilling to absolve from his crime Nogaret, who had so grievously offended against the pontifical dignity. This daring man therefore prosecuted strenuously the suit commenced against Boniface in the Romish court, and in the name of the king, demanded that a mark of infamy should be set upon the deceased pontiff. Benedict XI. died in the year 1304; and Philip, by his secret machinations, caused Bertrand de Got, a Frenchman and bishop of Bourdeaux, to be created pontiff at Rome on the 5th of June, A.D. 1305. For, the contest of the king against the pontiffs was not yet wholly settled, Nogaret not being absolved, and it might easily break out again. Besides, the king thirsted for revenge, and designed to extort from the court of Rome a condemnation of Boniface; he also meditated the destruction of the Templars and other things of great importance, which he could hardly expect from an Italian pontiff. He therefore wished to have a French pontiff whom he could control according to his pleasure, and who would be in a degree dependent on him. The new pontiff who took the name of Clement V. remained in France, as the king wished, and transferred the pontifical court to Avignon, where it continued for seventy years. This period the Italians call the Babylonian Captivity.²

5. It is certain that this residence of the pontiffs at Avignon was in no slight degree injurious to the authority of the Romish see. For the pontiffs being at a distance, the Gibelline faction in Italy, which was hostile to the pontiffs, assumed greater boldness than formerly, and not only invaded and laid waste the territories of St. Peter, but also assailed the pontifical authority by their publications. Hence a number of cities revolted from the popes, Rome itself became the parent and fomentor of tumults, cabals, and civil wars; and the laws and decrees sent thither from France were publicly treated with contempt, not merely by the nobles but even by the common citizens.³ A great part of Europe followed the example of Italy, and numberless instances show that the people of Europe attributed far less power to the fulminations and decrees issued from France, than to those issued from Rome. Various seditions therefore were raised in one place and another against the pontiffs, which they were unable to restrain and subdue, notwithstanding the Inquisitors were most active in the discharge of their functions.

6. As the French pontiffs could derive but little revenue from Italy which was rent into factions, seditious, and devastated, they were obliged to devise new modes of raising money. Therefore they not only sold indulgences to the people more frequently than formerly, to the great indignation of kings and princes, but they required enormous prices to be paid for their letters or bulls of every kind. In this affair John XXII. showed himself peculiarly adroit and shrewd; for though he did not first invent the regulations and fees of the apostolic chancery, yet the Romish writers admit that he enlarged them and reduced them to a more convenient form.⁴

¹ See the Acta inter Bonifacium VIII. Benedictum XI. Clementem V. et Philippum pulchrum, enlarged and corrected by Peter Puteanus [de Puy], as the title-page asserts; published 1618, 8vo, but without notice of the place of publication. [The compiler of the work was a Parisian divine named Simon Vigor. The first edition was published at Paris, 1613, 4to, and the third was in French, Paris, 1655, fol. entitled Histoire du Différend de Philippe le Bel et de Boniface VIII. produite par les Actes et Mémoires originaux.—Sch.] Balliet, Histoire des dèrnières du Boniface VIII. avec Philippe le Bel; Paris, 1718, 12mo; Jo. Rubens, in his Bonifacius, cap. xvi. p. 137, &c. The other writers are mentioned by Balliet, in his Preface, p. 9, &c. Add Baluze, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iv. p. 4, &c. [and Gifford's History of France, vol. i. p. 518, &c.—Mar.] On this memorable contest between Boniface and Philip, so pregnant with important results to the papacy, see the entire section 59 with its quotations, in Gieseler, Lehrbuch, &c. Cunningham's transl. vol. ii. p. 237—250, with the modern French historians, Sismondi and Michélet.—R.

² Concerning the French pontiffs, the writer to be especially consulted is Baluze, Vita Pontif. Avinion. in two volumes, Paris, 1693, 4to. The reader may also peruse, though it should be with caution, Longueval and his continuators, Hist. de l'Eglise Gallicane, tome xii. &c. This Jesuit and his successors in the work, are eloquent and laborious; but they often artfully conceal the abominable deeds of the pontiffs.

³ See Baluze, Vita Pontif. Avinion. tom. ii. p. 290, 261, 301, 309, 333, and various other places; Muratori, Antiq. Ital. tom. iii. p. 357, 401, 409, &c.; Giannone, Hist. de Naples, tome iii. p. 280, &c.

⁴ Ciampini, De Vicecomitatibus Ecclesie Roman. p.

He is also said to have imposed that species of tribute which under the title of annates is customarily paid to the pontiffs; but the first commencement of it was prior to this period.¹ Moreover, these French pontiffs, subverting the rights of election, assumed the power of conferring all sacred offices whether high or low, according to their own pleasure, by which means they raised immense sums of money. Hence under these pontiffs those most odious terms, reservation, provision, and expectative, rarely used before, were now everywhere heard, and they called forth the bitterest complaints from all the nations of Europe.² These complaints increased immeasurably when some of the pontiffs, as John XXII. Clement VI. Gregory XI. publicly announced that they had reserved all churches to themselves, and that they would provide for all without exception by virtue of the sovereign right which Christ had conferred on his vicars, or in the plenitude of their power.³ By these and other artifices for filling their treasury and amassing property, these indiscreet pontiffs increased the odium against the apostolic see, and thus weakened very considerably the papal empire, which began to decline from the time of Boniface.

7. Clement V. was governed all his life by the will and pleasure of Philip the Fair, king of France. William de Nogaret, the implacable foe of Boniface VIII. though excommunicated, resolutely prosecuted his own cause and that of king Philip against Boniface in the papal court, a transaction which I believe is without a parallel. Philip wished to have the body of Boniface disinterred and publicly burned. With great difficulty Clement averted this infamy by his entreaties and advice, but in everything else he had to obey the king. Accordingly he abrogated the laws enacted by Boniface, granted the king five years' tithes, absolved Nogaret from all crime after imposing on him a slight penance which he never performed, restored the inhabitants of Anagni to their former reputable and good standing, and held a general council at Vienne A.D. 1311, that Philip's pleasure might be gratified in the suppression of the Templars. In this council likewise various things were decided according to the pleasure of the king, whom Clement dared not offend, being terrified by the melancholy fate of Boniface.⁴

8. On the death of Clement A.D. 1314, there were violent contests among the cardinals respecting the election of a successor, the French demanding a French pontiff and the Italians an Italian. After two years the French gained the victory; and in 1316 James de Euse of Cahors, cardinal of Porto, was made head of the church and assumed the pontifical name of John XXII. He was not destitute of learning, but was crafty, insolent, weak, imprudent, and avaricious, as those who honour his memory do not altogether deny. He rendered himself notorious by many imprudent and unsuccessful enterprises, but especially by his unfortunate contest with the emperor, Lewis of Bavaria. There was a contest for the empire of Germany between Lewis of Bavaria and Frederick of Austria, each being chosen emperor by a part of the electors in the year 1314. John declared that the decision of this controversy belonged to him. But Lewis, having conquered his rival in battle and taken him prisoner in the year 1322, assumed the government of the empire without consulting the pontiff, and refused to submit a cause which had been decided by the sword to another trial before the pontiff. John was greatly offended at this, and in the year 1324 divested the emperor of all title to the imperial crown. Lewis in return accused the pontiff of corrupting the faith or of heresy, and appealed to the decision of a council. Exasperated by this and some other things, the pontiff in the year 1327 again divested the emperor of all his authority and power, and laid him under excommunication. In revenge for this injury the emperor in the year 1328 at Rome publicly declared John unworthy of the pontificate, and substituted in his place

39, &c.; Chais, Lettres sur les Jubilé, tome ii. p. 673, and others.

¹ Van Espen, Jus Eccles. Universale, tom. ii. p. 876; Bulaeus, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. iv. p. 911; Wood's Antiq. Oxon tom. i. p. 213; Berthier, Dissert. sur les Annates, in his Hist. de l'Eglise Gallicane, tome xii. p. 1, &c. [The Annates were the first year's revenues of a benefice, which every new incumbent was required to remit to the pontiff's treasury. By constantly advancing clergymen from poorer to richer benefices and prohibiting pluralities, these annates, it will be seen, might be made the source of immense income, when levied throughout Christendom upon all the numberless officers in the churches and monasteries. First Fruits exacted by Henry VIII. of England, were the annates of the bishoprics which the king took from the pope after the Reformation in that country.—Mar.]

² Bulaeus, Miscellanea, tom. ii. p. 479, 518; and his Vite Pontif. Avenion, tom. ii. p. 60, 63, 65, 74, 154, 156; Gallia Christiana, tom. i. Append. p. 13; Wood's Antiq. Oxon, tom. i. p. 148, 201, 202; Bulaeus, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. iv. p. 911, &c.

³ Bulaeus, Vite Pontif. Avenion, tom. ii. p. 873, tom. i. p. 285, 311, 681, &c.; Matthæus, Analecta Vet. Eri. tom. v. p. 349, &c.; Gallia Christiana, tom. i. p. 69, 1208; Hist. du Droit Ecclésiast. Français, tome ii. p. 129, &c.

⁴ Besides the common writers already cited, see Berthier's Discours sur le Pontificat de Clement V. in his Hist. de l'Eglise Gallicane, tome xii.; Colonia's Hist. Littér. de Lyon, tome i. p. 340; Gallia Christiana, tom. i. p. 1189, and tom. ii. p. 829

De Corbieri, a Franciscan monk and one of those who disagreed with the pontiff; and assuming the name of Nicolaus V. he crowned Lewis as emperor. But in the year 1330 this imperial pontiff voluntarily abdicated his office and surrendered himself into the hands of John, who kept him a prisoner at Avignon till his death. Thus John continued to reign in spite of the emperor, and the emperor in spite of the pontiff.¹

9. On the side of Lewis stood the whole mass of the Fratricelli, the Beghards of every description, and the Spirituals or more rigid among the Franciscans; and these being scattered over a large part of Europe and supported by the protection of Lewis, everywhere assailed John with reproaches and criminations, both orally and in books, and charged him with religious apostasy. The pontiff however was not greatly injured by these private attacks; but towards the close of his life he fell under the disapprobation and censure of nearly the whole church. For in the years 1331 and 1332 he taught in some public discourses that departed souls would indeed behold the man Christ, but would not see the face of God or the divine nature until their reunion with the body at the last day. With this doctrine Philip VI. the king of France, was highly displeased, the theologians of Paris condemned it in 1333, and both the friends and the foes of the pontiff were opposed to it. For it appeared to them that the pontiff detracted much from the blessedness of departed spirits. To an opposition so serious John, though naturally pertinacious, had to give way. He therefore first apologized for the doctrine; and afterwards when near the point of death A.D. 1334, he did not indeed abandon it, but he qualified it by saying that he believed souls in the intermediate state saw the divine essence, so far as the state and condition of the unembodied spirit would permit.² But this declaration did not satisfy his opponents. Hence after various disputes his successor, Benedict XII. terminated the controversy agreeably to the decision of the Parisian doctors, by declaring the true faith to be, that the souls of the blessed when separate from the body fully and perfectly behold the divine nature or God himself.³ Benedict could do this without impeaching his predecessor, because John when dying submitted his opinion to the judgment of the church, lest perhaps after death he should be classed among heretics.⁴

10. On the death of John A.D. 1334, new contests between the French and the Italians respecting the choice of a pontiff divided the college of cardinals. But near the close of the year, James Fournier, a Frenchman, cardinal of St. Prisca, was chosen and assumed the name of Benedict XII. Historians allow him the praise of being an upright and honest man, and void alike of avarice and the love of power.⁵ During his reign the controversy with the emperor Lewis was at rest. For although he did not restore him to church communion, being prevented as is reported by the king of France, yet he did not attempt anything against him. He saw the existing evils in the church, and some of them as far as he could he removed; in particular he laboured to reform by decrees and ordinances the sects of monks, both the mendicant and the opulent orders. But death removed him when he was contemplating more and greater changes, A.D. 1342. With the exception of his superstition, the common fault of the age, we shall find nothing to prevent our declaring this pontiff to be a man of a right spirit.

11. Of a different spirit was his successor Clement VI. who was likewise a French-

¹ This great contest is to be learned principally from the Records of it, published by Baluze, Vite Pontif. Avinion. tom. II. p. 512, &c.; by Martene, Thesaurus Anecdotor. tom. I. p. 641, &c.; by Herwart in his Ludovicus Imperator defensio contra Bzovium, Munich, 1618, 4to; and by Gewold in his Apologie pro Ludovico Bavaro, Ingolst. 1618, 4to, against the same Bzovius, who in his Annales had basely defamed the character of this emperor. Add Wadding, Annals Minorum, tom. vii. p. 77, 106, &c. Whoever considers attentively the history of this contest will perceive that Lewis of Bavaria took for his pattern Philip the Fair, king of France. As the latter brought the charge of heresy against Boniface, so did Lewis against John XXII. The French king employed Nogaret and others as accusers; Lewis employed [William] Occam, and the Franciscan monks. [Marsilius of Padua, John of Ghent, and Ulrich Haugvor, — Mur.] Each wished to have a general council called, by which the pontiff should be hurled from the chair of St. Peter. I omit to mention other parallels.

² See Baluze, Vite Pontif. Avinionens. tom. I. p. 175, 177, 182, 197, 221, 786, &c.; D'Achery, Spicilgium, tom. I. p. 769, ed. vet.; Leunoi, Hist. Gymnasii Navarr. p. I. cap. vii. in his Opp. tom. IV. par. I. p. 319; Baluze, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. IV. p. 235, 250; Wadding, Annals Minor. tom. vi. p. 371, tom. vii. p. 143; Echard, Scriptores Predicator. tom. I. p. 599, 608.

³ Baluze, Vite Pontif. Avinion. tom. I. p. 197, 216, 221, 224, 226, &c.

⁴ All this Pope's heretical fancies about the Beatific Vision were nothing in comparison with a vile and most enormous practical heresy which was found in his coffers after his death, viz. five-and-twenty millions of florins, of which there were eighteen in specie and the rest in plate, jewels, crowns, mitres, and other precious baubles, all which he had squeezed out of the people and the inferior clergy during his pontificate. See Fleury, Hist. Eccles. livr. xcv. sec. xxxix. — Mur.

⁵ See the Fragmenta Historie Romanæ, in Muratori's Antiq. Italic. tom. III. p. 275; Baluze, Vite Pontif. Avinion. tom. I. p. 205, 218, 240, &c.; Baluze, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. IV. p. 253, &c. [It was the jovial habits of this Pope which occasioned the saying, — "Bibamus Papaliter." Milman's Gibbon's Decl. and Fall, vol. XII. p. 69. — R.]

man named Peter Roger, and cardinal of St. Nereus and St. Achilles. Without stating all his censurable deeds, I observe that he trod in the steps of John XXII, by his provisions and reservations of churches, which was evidence of his base avarice; and further, that he conferred the most important spiritual offices on foreigners and Italians, which produced controversy between him and the kings of France and England; and lastly, that he exhibited the arrogance and pride of his heart, among other things, by renewing the war with Lewis the Bavarian. For in the year 1343 he hurled new thunders at the emperor; and finding these to be contemned by Lewis, in the year 1346 he devoted him again to execration, and persuaded the princes of Germany to elect Charles IV. son [grandson] to Henry VII. for their emperor. A civil war would now have broken out in Germany, had not the death of Lewis in 1347 prevented it. Clement followed him to the grave in 1352, famous for nothing but his zeal for exalting the majesty of the pontiffs, and for annexing Avignon, which he bought of Joanna queen of Naples, to the patrimony of St. Peter.¹

12. There were more moderation and probity in Innocent VI. or Stephen Albert, a Frenchman, previously bishop of Ostia, who governed the church ten years and died A.D. 1362. He favoured his own relatives too much; but in other respects he encouraged the pious and the well informed, held the monks to their duty, abstained from reserving churches, and did many things worthy of commendation. His successor, William Grimoard, abbot of St. Victor at Marseilles, who assumed the name of Urban V. was also free from great faults, if we except those which are almost inseparable from the office of a Pope. Overcome by the entreaties of the Romans he removed to Rome in the year 1367, but returned again to Avignon in 1370, in order to make peace between the king of England and the king of France, and died there the same year.²

13. He was succeeded by Peter Roger, a Frenchman of noble birth, under the pontifical name of Gregory XI. Inferior to his predecessors in virtue, he exceeded them in energy and audacity. Under him great and dangerous commotions disturbed Italy and the city of Rome. The Florentines especially waged fierce war with the Romish church, and were successful in it.³ To restore the tranquillity of Italy and recover the territories and cities taken from the patrimony of St. Peter, Gregory in the year 1376 transferred his residence from Avignon to Rome. One Catharine, a virgin of Sus, whom that credulous age took to be a prophetess divinely inspired, came to Avignon, and by her exhortations greatly contributed to this measure.⁴ But Gregory soon after repented of his removal, for by their long absence from Italy the authority of the pontiffs was so fallen there, that the Romans and the Florentines had no scruple to insult and abuse him in various ways. He therefore purposed to return to Avignon, but was prevented by death which removed him from earthly scenes in the year 1378.⁵

14. After the death of Gregory XI. the cardinals being assembled to provide for a successor, the Roman people fearing lest a Frenchman should be elected who would remove to Avignon, with furious clamours and threats demanded that an Italian should be placed at the head of the church without delay. The terrified cardinals proclaimed Bartholomew de Preguano, who was a Neapolitan by birth and archbishop of Bari, to be elected pontiff, and he assumed the name of Urban VI. This new pontiff, by his coarse manners, his injudicious severity, and his intolerable haughtiness, alienated the minds of all from him, but especially the cardinals. These therefore withdrew to Fondi, a city in the kingdom of Naples, and there created another pontiff, Robert, count of Geneva, who took the name of Clement VII. alleging that Urban was elected only in pretence in order to quiet the rage of the people of Rome. Which of these was the legitimate and true pontiff still remains uncertain, nor can it be fully ascertained from the records and documents which have been published in great abundance by both parties.⁶ Urban

³ See here especially the Epistola Coclucii Salutati, written in the name of the Florentines, par. l. p. 47—100, p. 148, 162, and the Preface to par. ii. p. 15. I use the new edition at Florence by Mohus.

⁴ See Longueval, Hist. de l'Eglise Gallicane, tome xiv. p. 159, 192.

⁵ He was the son of William earl of Beaufort and brother's son to Pope Clement VI. His last will which is in D'Achery's Spicilegium, tom. iii. p. 378, is worthy of notice, as he there very frankly acknowledges his faults. His biography is in Baluze, Vite Pontif. Avinion, tom. i. p. 426, &c.; and in Muratori's Scriptores Rer. Italic. tom. iii. par. ii. p. 645, &c.—Schl.

⁶ See the records and documents in Buleux, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. iv. p. 463, &c. in Wadding's Annales Minor. tom. ix. p. 12, &c. in Baluze's Vite Pontif. Avinion. tom. i. p. 442, 598, &c. and in the Acta

¹ Biographies of this pontiff may be found in Baluze, Vite Pontif. Avinion, tom. i. p. 143, &c. and in Muratori, Scriptores Rer. Italic. tom. iii. par. ii. p. 550, &c.—Schl.

² Of these Popes also there are several biographies; of Innocent VI. in Baluze, Vite Pontif. Avinion, tom. i. p. 321, &c.; and in Muratori, Scriptores Rer. Italic. tom. iii. par. ii. p. 589, &c.; and of Urban V. in Baluze, ubi supra, p. 363, &c.; and in Muratori, ubi supra, p. 612, &c.—Schl.

continued at Rome, Clement removed to Avignon in France. The cause of Clement was espoused by France, Spain, Scotland, Sicily, and Cyprus; the other countries of Europe acknowledged Urban for the true viceregent of Christ.

15. Thus the unity of the Latin church as existing under one head, came to an end at the death of Gregory XI. and that most unhappy disunion ensued which is usually denominated the great Schism of the West.¹ For, during fifty years the church had two or three heads, and the contemporary pontiffs assailed each other with excommunications, maledictions, and plots. The calamities and distress of those times are indescribable. For besides the perpetual contentions and wars between the pontifical factions, which were ruinous to great numbers, involving them in the loss of life or of property, nearly all sense of religion was in many places extinguished, and wickedness daily acquired greater impunity and boldness; the clergy, previously corrupt, now laid aside even the appearance of piety and godliness, while those who called themselves Christ's viceregents were at open war with each other; and the conscientious people, who believed no one could be saved without living in subjection to Christ's vicar, were thrown into the greatest perplexity and anxiety of mind.² Yet both the church and the state received very considerable advantages from these great calamities. For the sinews of the pontifical power were severed by these dissensions and could not afterwards be restored; and kings and princes who had before been in a sense the servants of the pontiffs, now became their judges and masters. Moreover, great numbers possessing some measure of discernment, despised and disregarded these pontiffs who could fight for empire; and committing themselves and their salvation into the hands of God, concluded that the church and religion might exist and be safe without any visible head.

16. On the death of Urban V. A.D. 1389, the Italian cardinals, his partisans, elected for his successor at Rome Peter Thomacelli, a Neapolitan, known among the pontiffs by the name of Boniface IX. And Clement VII. dying in the year 1394, the French cardinals appointed as his successor Peter de Luna, a Spaniard, who assumed the name of Benedict XIII. In the mean time kings, princes, bishops, and theologians, proposed and attempted various methods for extinguishing this schism. It was generally thought that the safest and best method was that of voluntary resignation (via cessionis), as they expressed it.³ But neither of the pontiffs could be induced to resign either by entreaties, threats, or promises. The French church greatly displeased by this obstinacy, in the year 1397 withdrew itself from the dominion and authority of both pontiffs in a council held at Paris. This decree being published in the year 1398, Benedict XIII. was detained as a prisoner by order of Charles VI. king of France, in his own palace at Avignon.⁴

17. The vices and faults of the great body of the monks were seen even by some of the Roman pontiffs, and especially by Clement XII. who looked upon them with abhorrence and laboured to cure and remove them; but the vast and difficult undertaking was unsuccessful. At the head of the monks and indeed of the whole church stood the Mendicants, particularly

Sanctor. tom. i. April. p. 728. &c. There are also some unpublished documents in my possession which throw much light on this controversy, yet do not decide it. [The whole question must be tried according to ecclesiastical law, and according to that both elections were undoubtedly liable to exceptions.—Schl.]

¹ For an account of this schism see Peter Puteanus (de Puy) Histoire du Schisme qui a été en l'Eglise depuis l'an 1378, jusqu'en l'an 1428. Paris, 1654, 4to, which as the preface informs us was compiled from documents in the archives of the king of France, and is worthy of credit. Neither is Maimbourg's Histoire du Grand Schisme d'Occident to be despised, though the writer is here and there manifestly partial. Many documents are contained in Bulsius, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iv. and v. and Martene's Thesaurus Anecdotor. tom. ii. p. 1074, &c. The common writers, as Nat. Alexander, Raynald, Bzovius, Spondanus, Du Pin, I omit to name as usual. [On the origin and progress of this schism and the attempts to reconcile it, see especially Gieseler, in sec. 101, 102, and 103, of his Lehrbuch, &c.; Cunningham's transl. vol. iii. p. 58—70, with his authorities.—R.]

² On the great evils of this schism there are direct remarks in the Hist. du Droit publique Ecclesi. Française, tome ii. p. 166, 193, 202, &c. [See also in Gieseler, ubi supra, vol. iii. p. 71, an important section (104) on the effects of this schism upon public sentiment in ecclesiastical matters.—R.]

³ In reality the university of Paris proposed three ways of terminating the schism, the voluntary resignation of both (via cessionis), an agreement between them (via compromissi), and reference to the decision of a general council (via deliberationis per concilium universale). Among all these, that by resignation was thought to be the easiest; but this supposed the pontiffs to be ingenuous and to make the good of the church their primary object, which was not the fact. In order to facilitate this project, the king and the nobles of France with the university of Paris used all their exertions, after the death of Clement, to prevent a new election at Avignon. But the cardinals were of a different mind. They went into conclave and elected Benedict XIII. yet previously binding themselves by a solemn oath that the person elected, on the return of tranquillity, should himself labour to bring about a resignation of both, if the majority of the cardinals should see it to be best. But neither Benedict nor his opposer Boniface would have anything to do with a resignation. The pleasure and the honour of being Pope outweighed all considerations of patriotism; and it was not till the next century that the church was so happy as to see this schism removed.—Schl.

⁴ Besides the common writers see Longueval, Hist. de l'Eglise Gallicane, tome xiv. and the Records themselves, in Bulsius, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iv. p. 829, &c.

the Dominicans and Franciscans, by whose counsels and pleasure everything of importance was transacted, both at the court of Rome and in the cabinets of princes. So high was the reputation of those brethren for sanctity and for influence with God, that the most distinguished persons of both sexes, some while in health and others when sick and in the near prospect of death, wished to be received into their orders, for the purpose of securing the favour of God. Many carefully inserted in their last wills that they would have their corpses wrapped in a sordid Dominican or Franciscan garment, and be buried among the Mendicants. For the amazing superstition and ignorance of the age led people to believe, that those would find Christ a gracious judge at the last day, who should appear before his tribunal associated with the Mendicant monks.

18. But this high reputation and vast influence of the Mendicants only inflamed still more the hatred which had long burned against them almost universally, in the higher and lower orders of the clergy, in the other monks and in the universities. Hence there was scarcely a country of Europe or a university in which one might not see bishops, priests, and theologians, eagerly contending against the Dominicans and Franciscans, who by means of the great privileges conferred on them by the pontiffs everywhere undermined the ancient discipline of the church, and assumed to themselves the direction of all religious matters. In England the university of Oxford firmly resisted the Dominicans;¹ and Richard of Armagh,² Henry Crump,

Norris, and others, assailed with great energy all the Mendicant orders.³ The most zealous of these, Richard of Armagh, went to the court of Innocent VI. in the year 1356, and there pleaded the cause of the church against them with amazing ardour, until his death in 1360.⁴ In France various persons, and among them those of the university of Paris, laboured in a more private way to overthrow the power of the Mendicants;⁵ but John de Polliac, a doctor of theology, publicly denied that the Dominicans and Franciscans had power to grant full absolution to persons confessing sins to them, or that the pontiffs were able to give them such power, so long as the canon called Omnis Utriusque Sexus remained in force; whence he inferred that those who would be sure of salvation must confess their sins to their parish priests, notwithstanding they had absolution from the monks. But all these adversaries effected little or nothing, for the pontiffs vigorously defended these their best friends and supporters against all attacks secret or open. The opinion of John de Polliac was condemned by a special decree of John XXII. in the year 1321.⁶

19. But among all the foes of the Mendicant orders no one has obtained greater fame, both good and ill, among posterity than John Wickliffe, an Englishman, doctor and professor of theology at Oxford, and afterwards rector of Lutterworth [in Leicestershire], a man of an acute mind, and for the age in which he lived of great learning. After the example of Richard of Armagh and many others of the best men in his country, he in the year 1360 first vigorously defended the rights of the University of Oxford against the sects which professed voluntary poverty, at the same time slightly censuring also the pontiffs who were their chief patrons; nor did any lover of his country consider him as criminal on this account. Afterwards when Simon Langham, archbishop of Canterbury, deprived him of the wardenship of Canter-

¹ See Wood's Antiq. Oxon. tom. i. p. 150, 154, 196, &c.

² Richard Fitz-Ralph or Richard Radulphus was a native of Ireland, professor of theology at Oxford, much esteemed by king Richard III. of England, created by him dean of Lichfield, and A.D. 1333 chancellor of Oxford. In the year 1347, Clement VI. by his pontifical right of provision constituted him archbishop of Armagh in Ireland. He strenuously opposed the Mendicants both before and after his elevation to the see of Armagh. While at Oxford he exposed their vain and proud poverty in his public lectures, and when a bishop he came out still more powerfully against them. In 1356 he came to London, and there in his preaching, published nine theses against them. They now accused him to the pope of heresy, and caused him to be cited to Avignon. He went there, and after three years' attendance, his cause not being yet decided, he was removed by death A.D. 1360. He has left us a number of sermons, a Summa adversus Errores Armenorum, and his defence against the Mendicants delivered at Avignon in 1357, besides several sermons and tracts never published. A little before his death, an Irish translation of the New Testament was found concealed in a wall of his church, which has been supposed to be his production.—Mur. [For a full account of this Irish forerunner of Wycliffe the reader is referred to Anderson's Sketches of the Native Irish, Edin. 1823, p. 13—18. The translation of the New Testament ascribed to him was found, according to Ussher, in the church of Armagh when under repair in the year 1530, but is not now extant.—R.

³ See Wood's Antiq. Oxon. tom. i. p. 181, 182, tom. ii. p. 61, 62; Baluze, Vita Pontif. Avenion. tom. i. p. 333, 350; Baluze, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iv. p. 336; Wadding's Annales Minor. tom. viii. p. 126.

⁴ See Simon's Lettres Choisies, tome i. p. 164, &c. I have before me in manuscript by Bartholomew de Brisacio (provincial of the Dominicans for Germany), Solutiones oppositæ Richardi, Armachani Archiepiscopi, propositionibus contra Mendicantes in curia Romana coram Pontifice et Cardinalibus Factis, A.D. 1360.

⁵ See Launoi, De Canone, Omnis Utriusque Sexus, in his Opp. tom. i. par. i. p. 271, 274, 287, &c.; Baluze, Vita Pontif. Avenion. tom. ii. p. 10, and Miscellanea, tom. i. p. 253; D'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. i. p. 112, &c.

⁶ It was published by Martene, Thesaur. Anecdotor. tom. i. p. 1308. Add Baluze, Vita Pontif. Avenion. tom. i. p. 132, 182, &c.

bury Hall in the University of Oxford A.D. 1367, and appointed a monk to succeed him, and the sovereign pontiff, Urban V. to whom he appealed, confirmed the decision of the archbishop, Wickliffe assailed with greater freedom, both in his writings and in his discourses, not only all the monks and their morals, but also the power of the pontiffs and some other things. From this he proceeded still farther, and in various treatises refuted a large part of the prevailing opinions on religious subjects, exhorted the people to read the sacred volume, translated the Scriptures into the English language [from the Vulgate] with his own hands, and expressed abhorrence of the prevailing grosser superstitions. It would be easy to show that neither the doctrines of Wickliffe were free from errors nor his life void of faults; and yet it is most certain that he advocated many things which were wise, true, and profitable.¹

20. The monks whom Wickliffe had especially offended, commenced a great religious process against him in the pontifical court of Gregory XI. who in the year 1377 commanded Simon Sudbury, archbishop of Canterbury, to try the cause in a council at London. From this imminent peril Wickliffe escaped unharmed, through the protection of the duke of Lancaster and other noblemen who were his friends. And as Gregory XI. died soon after, and the fatal schism in the Latin church ensued, one pontiff reigning at Rome and another at Avignon, this controversy remained long suspended. Upon a change in the state of affairs, William de Courtenay, archbishop of Canterbury, revived the controversy in 1385, and urged it on with great vehemence in two councils, the one held at London and the other at Oxford. The result was, that of the eighteen [twenty-four] opinions for which the monks accused him, nine were condemned as heresies and fifteen as errors; but Wickliffe returned in safety to Lutterworth, where he died in tranquillity, A.D. 1387. By what means he escaped this latter peril which was greater than the former, whether by the favour of the court or by denying and abjuring the opinions in controversy, does not appear.² He left a great number of followers both in England and out of it, who were denominated Wickliffites, and by a vulgar term of reproach

Biographia Evangelica, vol. i. p. 1, &c. and in Milner's History of the Church, cent. xiv. ch. iii.—Mur. The documents in relation to his trials are in Wilkins's Concilia, tom. iii. p. 116, &c. 156, &c. Add Buluar, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. iv. p. 450, &c.; Wood's Antiq. Oxon. tom. i. p. 183, &c. 186, &c. and in other places. [John Wickliffe or De Wickliffe, was born at the village of Wickliffe near Richmond in Yorkshire, about A.D. 1324, was sent early to Oxford where he was a commoner of Queen's College, and afterwards of Merton in which he became a fellow. Merton College about this time contained the following eminent men: Walter Burley, William Occam, Thomas Bradwardine, Simon Mepham, Simon Islip, and Geoffrey Chaucer. Wickliffe was a hard student, a profound scholar, a sarcastic writer, and a subtle disputant. Philosophy, metaphysics, and theology were his favourite studies. In the year 1360 he distinguished himself by becoming the advocate of the university against the Mendicant monks, who infringed the laws of the university and ordered the students away to their monasteries. Wickliffe, whose English style was excellent for that age, wrote various tracts in opposition to them, and disputed against them with great success. In 1361 he was made master of Balliol College, and four years after warden of Canterbury Hall. In 1367, Langham, archbishop of Canterbury, ejected him from the wardenship, and he appealed to the pope, who delayed his decision three years, during which Wickliffe was severely lashing the monks and clergy, and did not spare the pontiff. In 1370 cardinal Andronicus, the papal commissioner, decided the cause against Wickliffe. Soon after he obtained the rectory of Lutterworth in the diocese of Lincoln, through the favour of the duke of Lancaster, which he held till his death, and in which he was a most active and faithful pastor. In 1372 he took his degree of D.D. and now read lectures on theology at Oxford with great applause. He here attacked not only the monks, but also the pope and the clergy, and confuted the prevailing errors of the day, both as to the doctrines of Christianity and the constitution of the Christian church. In 1374 the king appointed him one of his ambassadors to the pope, to remonstrate against the papal reservation of churches. After this he inveighed still more boldly against the pope in his lectures, calling him, "Antichrist, the proud, worldly priest of Rome, and the most cursed of clippers and purse-cutters." He also inveighed against the prelates. In 1376 the monks drew up nineteen articles, extracted from his public lectures and sermons, which they sent to the pope. The principal of these were: "That there is one only universal church, consisting of the whole body of the predestinate. That the eucharist after consecration was not the real body of Christ, but only an emblem or sign of it. That the church of Rome was no more the head of the universal church than any other church; and that St. Peter had no greater authority given him than the rest of the apostles.—That the pope had no more jurisdiction in the exercise of the keys than any other priest.—That if the church misbehaved, it was not only lawful but meritorious to dispossess her of her temporalities.—That when a prince or temporal lord was convinced that the church made an ill use of her endowments, he was bound under pain of damnation to take them away.—That the gospel was sufficient to direct a Christian in the conduct of his life.—That neither the pope nor any other prelate ought to have prisons for punishing offenders against the discipline of the church."—On the second of May, 1377, the pope issued five bulls addressed to the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishop of London (who were directed to try the charges), to the king (who was desired to assist the bishops), and to the university of Oxford (ordering them to deliver up the accused). The king died before the bulls arrived, the university treated theirs with contempt, the prelates determined to proceed against him, and therefore summoned him to appear before them at London, within thirty days. During that interval parliament met and deliberated whether they might lawfully refuse to send treasure out of the kingdom when the pope required it to be sent. The resolution of this brought from Belgium into England, Lollards; and these were everywhere grievously persecuted by the Inquisitors and other instruments of the pontiffs. Hence the council of Constance, A.D. 1415, condemned the memory and the opinions of Wickliffe in a solemn decree; in consequence of which, in the year 1428 his bones were dug up and publicly burned.

¹ His dialogues have lately been reprinted, Frankfurt and Leipzig, 1753, 4to, from which may be learned not indeed all his opinions, but the general objects at which he aimed and the spirit of the man.

² A formal biography of this very eminent man was composed by John Lewis, The History of the Life and Sufferings of John Wickliffe, London, 1720, 8vo. He also published the New Testament, in an English translation by John Wickliffe from the Latin version called the Vulgate, London, 1731, fol. with a learned Preface, in which he treats of the life and sufferings of Wickliffe. [His life is also given in Gilpin's Lives of the Reformers, Lond. 1809, 2 vols. 8vo, in Middleton's

21. These numerous, talented, and influential adversaries, were utterly unable to bring the mendicant orders to give up their excessive pride and superstition, and to cease from deceiving the multitude with opinions injurious often to the divine character and to religion. The Franciscans especially in extolling the excellence of their institution, which they contended was the very gospel of Jesus Christ, and in eulogizing the founder of their order, whom they imprudently represented as another Christ, or as in all things like to Christ, exceeded all bounds of sobriety and reverence for the Saviour. Yet the Roman pontiffs patronized this madness by their letters and decrees, in which they declared the absurd fable of the Stigmata or five wounds impressed upon St. Francis by the Saviour himself on Mount Alverno, to be highly credible, nay unquestionably true.¹ They also suffered to go abroad without censure, and even approved and commended an impious piece stuffed with monstrous and absurd tales, entitled, The Book of the Conformities of St. Francis with Jesus Christ, which was published in 1385 by Bartholomew Albizi, a Franciscan of Pisa, with the applause of his order. This infamous book, in which the Son of God is put upon a level with a vile and miserable man, is an eternal monument of the impious arrogance and religious stupidity of the Franciscan order, doubt was referred by the king and parliament to Doctor Wickliffe, who answered that it was lawful, and undertook to prove it so by the principles of the law of Christ. He now appeared before his judges, attended by the duke of Lancaster, and the lord marshal, earl Percy. A vast concourse was assembled. Some altercations ensued between the bishops and the two noblemen, the assembly was in commotion, and Wickliffe was conducted off in safety by his patrons without having any trial. He was then summoned to appear at Lambeth. He did so, and presented a paper explanatory of the charges, which the bishops thought best to admit as satisfactory. The next year, 1378, the pope died, and the commission to the two English prelates to try the case of Wickliffe of course was at an end. Wickliffe, in his lectures, sermons, and writings, now embraced every opportunity of exposing the Romish court, and detecting the vices of the clergy and the monks. In 1381 he published sixteen Theses against transubstantiation, and in his lectures at Oxford expressly denied the doctrine of the real presence. The vice-chancellor and eleven doctors now condemned his doctrine. In 1378 William Courtney was translated from the see of London to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury; and now began another process against Wickliffe, whom he summoned to appear at London before commissioners appointed to try him. He was dissuaded by his friends from appearing; but the university sent a letter in his favour testifying fully to his learning, piety, and soundness in the faith. Notwithstanding this testimony and the arguments of his able counsellors, fourteen of his conclusions were pronounced heretical or erroneous. Soon after he left Oxford, in 1382, Wickliffe had a slight shock of the palsy, yet he continued to preach till 1384, when he was seized again in his pulpit at Lutterworth more violently, fell down, was carried home, and shortly after expired, aged sixty years. His works consist of a vast number of tracts on doctrinal and practical subjects in theology, against the prevailing errors and vices of the times, &c.—Mur. [The best life of Wickliffe is that by the Rev. Robert Vaughan, Lond. 1828 and 1831, 2 vols. 8vo. He was the first to compile an accurate list of the Reformer's writings, especially of those still remaining in manuscript. Of the latter, one has been recently printed from the Library of Trinity College, Dublin, entitled, The Last Age of the Church, Dublin, 1840. For an account of this tract, see Vaughan's Life and Opinions of John de Wickliffe, vol. 1, p. 241, &c.—R and of the extreme indiscretion of the pontiffs in extolling and recommending these friars.¹

¹ The fable of the Stigmata, impressed upon Francis by Jesus Christ is very well known; nor are the pontifical letters unknown by which belief in this fable is commanded, and which are published with great care, in particular by Wadding in his Annales Minorum, tom. viii. and ix. [The story of these Stigmata, as related by Bonaventura, the biographer of Francis, (De Vita S. Patris Francisci, cap. 13), is briefly this: that Francis two years before his death retired as was his custom to Mount Alverno, to keep a forty days' fast in the season of Quadragesima. While praying there, a seraph appeared flying in the heavens, and came near to him, having six wings, under which he saw distinctly the figure of Christ crucified. The seraph talked with him, but he would never retail the conversation. After the seraph departed he found on himself five wounds, one on each side of his feet and hands, and one on his side. On the insides of his hands, and on the upper sides of his feet, were hard, round, black substances, representing the heads of nails; and on the back of his hands, and on bottoms of his feet, projecting, acuminate substances, which bent round like clenched nails. In his side was a wound three fingers long. From all these, blood and a watery substance flowed occasionally, and he experienced continual and sometimes exquisite pain from them. When he descended from the mountain, with some hesitation he related the vision to a few trusty friends. His wounds he concealed as much as possible during his life. He languished two years and died. After his death more than fifty persons examined these wounds and found them real, among whom were some cardinals. Alexander IV. the Roman pontiff, in preaching before the brethren, when Bonaventura was present, declared that he had seen those wounds on Francis previously to his death.—Mur.] The Dominicans formerly opposed this fable openly; but being restrained by the bulls of the pontiffs, they now ridicule it only in private. The Franciscans on the contrary have not ceased to trumpet it. That St. Francis had these Stigmata, or appearances of the five wounds of Christ on his body, I do not doubt; for the fact is attested by witnesses sufficiently numerous and competent. But undoubtedly St. Francis himself, who was peculiarly superstitious, inflicted those wounds on his own person, in order to be like to Christ and to bear in his own body a perpetual memento of his sufferings. For it was customary in that age for those who wished to appear more holy and devout than common, to mark themselves with such Stigmata, so that they might always have before their eyes something like a picture of the death of Christ. The words of St. Paul, Gal. vi. 17 [I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus,] were understood in that ignorant age to have reference to such a custom. And from the Acta Sanctorum, and other monuments of this and the following century, a long catalogue of such branded saints might be drawn up. Nor is this superstition entirely done away in our own age. The Franciscan Friars, finding these marks upon the body of their deceased founder, and wishing to make him appear privileged above all men, invented this fable of Christ's miraculously transferring his wounds to St. Francis.

22. Not a whit wiser than these Franciscans who remained obedient to the pontiffs, were those other Franciscans who insisted on observing their rule perfectly, and who resisted the pontiffs that mitigated it; I refer to the Fratricelli, their Tertiarii or Beghards, and to the Spirituals who resided principally in France and embraced the opinions of Peter John Oliva. These Franciscans for a long time caused great disturbance both in church and state, and gave the pontiffs vast trouble and vexation. Near the beginning of the century, in the years 1306 and 1307, the less austere Franciscans in Italy raged violently against the more strict or the Fratricelli, who had withdrawn from the community.² Those of the latter who were able to escape the fury of their enemies fled, in the year 1307, into France, and connected themselves with the Spirituals or the followers of Peter John Oliva in Provence, who had likewise receded from the body. Soon after this the whole Franciscan order in France, Italy, and other countries, was divided into two parties; one of which being attached to the rigid poverty of St. Francis was called that of the Spirituals, the other which was disposed to have the rules of its founder mitigated, was called the Brethren of the Community. The latter was the largest and most powerful, and laboured to the utmost to suppress the former, which was yet weak and in its infancy. But the seceders chose to endure everything rather than abandon the injunctions of their founder, and return to the community. In the year 1310 the pontiff, Clement V. called the leaders of both parties to his court, and made great efforts to terminate the schism. But the business advanced very slowly in consequence of the inflexibility of the parties, and the great number of their mutual accusations. In the meanwhile the Spirituals of Tuscany, without waiting for the decision of the pontiff, chose for themselves a general with inferior officers; but the French, being nearer the pontiff, waited patiently for his determination.³

23. After various deliberations Clement V. in the general council of Vienne, A.D. 1312, published the celebrated law or bull called from its first words, Exivi de Paradiso,⁴ in which he endeavoured to end the discord by taking a middle course. For he made a number of concessions to the Spirituals, and in particular commanded the Franciscans to profess, as their rule prescribed, the greatest and most perfect poverty, renouncing all property either common or personal, and allowing only the simple use and that also limited, meagre, and poor, of the necessities of life. On the other hand he allowed the Franciscans, if they lived in places where it was very difficult to obtain subsistence by begging, to provide themselves with granaries and store-cellars, and to collect and lay up in them what they procured by begging; and the officers and overseers of the order were to judge when and where such granaries and cellars were necessary. Moreover, in order to satisfy the Brethren of the Community, he condemned some of the opinions of Peter de Oliva.⁵ This decision quieted the commotions in France, though with difficulty and only for a short time; but it had no effect to allay the heated passions of the Tuscan and Italian Spirituals, many of whom not feeling themselves safe in Italy, in the year 1313 emigrated to Sicily, where they were kindly received by Frederick the king and by the nobles and bishops.⁶

24. After the death of Clement V. the tumult in France, which had been stilled by his authority, broke out anew. For in the year 1314, one hundred and twenty of the Spirituals drove the brethren of the Community out of the monasteries of Narbonne and Beziers by force of arms, elected new presiding officers, and (what

¹ Concerning Albizi and his book, see Wadding's Annales Minorum, tom. ix. p. 158, &c.; Fabricius, Biblioth. Latina Medii Ævi, tom. i. p. 131; Schellhorn, Amenitates Literar. tom. iii. p. 160; Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome II. art. François; and Nouveau Diction. Hist. Crit. tome i. art. Albizi, 217. Extracts from this book, which is called the Alcoran of the Franciscans, were made by Erasmus Albertus, and have been often printed in Latin, French, and German; the second German edition was printed, Amsterdam, 1734, 2 vols. 8vo. The French and Latin editions are ornamented with elegant engravings. [The conformities between Christ and St. Francis are carried to forty in the book of Albizi, but they are multiplied to 4,000 by a Spanish monk of the order of Observants, in a book published at Madrid in the year 1651 under the following title, Prodigium Naturæ et Gratiæ Portentum. The conformities mentioned by Pedro de Alvi Astorga, the austere author of this most ridiculous book, are whimsical beyond expression. See the Bibliothèque des Sciences et des Beaux Arts, tome iv. p. 318.—Macl.

² Wadding's Annales Minorum, tom. vi. ad ann. 1307, p. 91.

³ Wadding, ubi supra, tom. vi. ad. ann. 1310, p. 172; Ecard's Corpus Histor. Medii Ævi, tom. i. p. 1480; Bulaeus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iv. p. 129; Ecard's Scriptores Prædicator. tom. i. p. 508, 509.

⁴ This law is extant in the Corpus Juris Canon. among the Clementina, [lib. v.] tit. xi. De Verbor. Significat. tom. ii. p. 1098, ed. Boehmer.

⁵ Wadding's Annales Minor. tom. vi. p. 194, 197, 199.

⁶ Wadding, ubi supra, p. 213, 214; Bulaeus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iv. p. 151, 165; Argente, Collectio Judicior. de Novis Error. tom. i. p. 392, &c.

greatly enhanced the difficulty of this already inveterate contest) cast off their former garments, and assumed such as were short, narrow, and ill-shaped. Many others from the other provinces joined with them, and the citizens of Narbonne, among whom Oliva was buried, undertook to defend this company. John XXII. being placed at the head of the church, attempted in the year 1317 to apply a remedy to the inveterate evil. In the first place, by a special law he ordered the extirpation of the Fratricelli and their Tertiarii, or the Beguins or Beghards, who were distinct from the Spirituals.¹ Soon after he admonished the king of Sicily to expel all the Spirituals residing in his dominions.² And lastly, he called the French Spirituals before him at Avignon, and exhorted them to return to their duty, and in particular to lay aside their short, strait habits, and their small hoods. Most of them complied; but the head of the company, brother Bernard Delitiosi with twenty-four others, boldly refused to submit to the requisition. For these men affirmed, that the rule of St. Francis was the same as the gospel of Jesus Christ, and therefore that the power of the pontiffs was not adequate to change it. Consequently the pontiffs sinned by allowing the Franciscans to have granaries and cellars; and they sinned by prohibiting such garments as St. Francis had prescribed. Against these pertinacious men John directed [the Inquisitors] to proceed as against heretics. And truly they were the worst of heretics, for they opposed the supremacy and power of the Roman pontiff. The head of the party, Brother Delitiosi, who was sometimes called Delli Consi, was confined in a prison where he ended his days. Four others were, by order of the Inquisitors, burned at the stake, at Marseilles, in the year 1318.³

25. These unhappy monks, and afterwards many more who were cut off in this lamentable contest, were punished merely for disregarding the authority of the pontiffs; for they believed that the rule of their founder, St. Francis, being dictated by God himself and really the gospel of Christ, was not subject to the power of the pontiffs. The controversy, considered in itself, was rather ridiculous than a serious matter, and had no connexion with true religion. It related merely to two points; first, the form of the garments to be worn by Franciscans, and secondly, their granaries and cellars. The Brethren of the community, that is, the laxer Franciscans were long, loose, and good habits, with ample hoods or coverings for their heads; but the Spirituals wore strait, short, sordid, and vile garments with small hoods, because such a dress they said was prescribed for the fraternity in the rule of St. Francis, which it was not lawful for any mortal to alter. In the next place, the Brethren of the community in the seasons of harvest and vintage, laid up corn in their granaries and wine in their cellars; but the Spirituals contended that this was inconsistent with genuine mendicity, or the profession made by poor Minorites. And hence John published in this very year a long epistle, in which he directs that both questions be left to the judgment and discretion of the superiors of the order.⁴

26. The effects of the epistle and of other decrees, were defeated by the unseasonable and impious severity of John XXII. which even his friends detested. For the Spirituals and their supporters, exasperated at the cruel death of their brethren, maintained that John XXII. had rendered himself unworthy of the pontifical office, and become a real antichrist by the slaughter of those holy men; they honoured the four brethren burned at Marseilles as martyrs, paying religious veneration to their bones and ashes; and they contended far more earnestly than before against the long garments, the large hoods, and the granaries and cellars. On the other hand, the Inquisitors by direction of the pontiff seized all the persons of this description on whom they could lay their hands, and committed them to the flames without mercy, immolating them to the pontifical indignation. From this time onward therefore not only in France, but also in Italy, Spain, and Germany, an immense number of the defenders of the rule of St. Francis, Fratricelli, Beghards, and Spirituals, were cruelly put to death.⁵

¹ This law is called Sancta Romana, &c. and is extant among the Extravagantes Johannis XXII. tit. vii. De Religiosis domibus; in the Corpus Juris Canon. tom. II. p. 1112.

² Wadding, ubi supra, p. 265, &c.

³ Baluze, Vite Pontif. Avinion. tom. I. p. 116, tom. II. p. 341, and Miscellanea, tom. I. p. 195, 272; Wadding, Annales Minor. tom. VI. p. 267, &c. 316, &c.; Martene, Thesaurus Anecd. tom. V. p. 175; Martin of Fulda, in Eccard's Corpus Histor. Mediæ Evi, tom. I. p. 1725, and Coerner, ibid. tom. II. p. 981: Hist. Générale de Languedoc, tome IV. p. 179, &c.; Argentre, Collectio Judicior. de Novis Error. tom. I. p. 294.

⁴ It is extant in the Corpus Juris Canon. Extravagant. Johannis XXII. [tit. xlv. cap. I. De Verbor. Signif. Add Wadding's Annales Minor. tom. VI. p. 273, and others.

⁵ I have in my hands, in addition to the other documents serving to elucidate the difficult history of this persecution, the Martyrology of the Spirituals and Fratricelli, which was exhibited to the Inquisition at Carrasone, A.D. 1454, and which contains the names of one hundred and thirteen persons of both sexes, who from the year 1318 to the time of Innocent VI. (A. D.

27. This bloody conflict continued to spread wider and wider, and had involved the whole Franciscan order, when in the year 1321 to the former points of controversy a new one was added respecting the poverty of Christ and his apostles. A Beguin or monk of the third order of St. Francis being apprehended this year at Narbonne, taught among other things that Christ and his apostles possessed nothing by way of property or dominion, either in common or individually. This opinion, John de Belna, an Inquisitor belonging to the order of Dominicans, pronounced to be an error; but Berengarius Taloni, a Franciscan, maintained it to be sound and consonant to the epistle of Nicolaus III. Exiit qui seminat, &c. The judgment of the former was approved by the Dominicans, while the decision of the latter was maintained by the Franciscans. The subject being brought before the pontiff, he endeavoured to quiet the new controversy by a discreet procedure; and therefore called to his counsel Ubertinus de Casalis, a Franciscan of great reputation and a patron of the Spirituals. He answered equivocally and by making distinctions. 'Yet the pope and the cardinals thought his sentence was calculated to end the controversy. The pontiff therefore ordered both the parties to acquiesce in his decision, and to be silent and observe moderation.'

28. But the impassioned minds of the Dominicans and Franciscans could not be brought to submit to this mandate. John therefore in the year 1322, permitted the controversy to be again renewed; when he laid the following question before the most celebrated divines and especially those of Paris for their decision: Whether those were heretics who affirmed that Jesus Christ and his apostles held no property, either in common or as individuals? The Franciscans, who this year held their convention at Perugia, having had previous notice of the business, unanimously decided that persons making such an assertion were no heretics, but held a doctrine which was true and holy and accordant with the decisions of the pontiffs; and they appointed a man of distinguished learning belonging to their order, Brother Bonagratia of Bergamo, who was also called Boncortese,² to repair to Avignon, and there defend this decision of the whole order against all opposers. John XXII. was exceedingly offended at this, and published an ordinance in the month of November, in which he espoused the opposite doctrine to that of the Franciscans, and pronounced those to be heretics who should pertinaciously maintain that Christ and his apostles possessed no property, either in common or individually, and had not the right of selling and giving away what they possessed. A little after he proceeded still farther, and in an ordinance drawn up in the month of December he exposed the vanity and futility of the arguments commonly drawn from a bull of Nicolaus III. proving a transfer of the dominion of the Franciscan possessions to the church of Rome, leaving only the simple use without any ownership to the brethren; for it was utterly impossible in regard to things which are consumed by the use of them, to separate the right of use from the right of property or dominion. He also solemnly renounced all property in the Franciscan effects reserved by the former pontiffs to the Romish church, with the exception of their churches and some other things; and dismissed the officers or purveyors who had hitherto received the revenues and administered the affairs of the order in the name of the Romish church, and repealed all the laws and constitutions of his predecessors on this subject.³

29. The pontifical ordinances destroyed the very citadel of the Franciscan order, or that boasted expropriation in which Francis placed the highest glory of his fraternity. Hence the Franciscans most resolutely opposed the pontiff; and in particular Brother Bonagratia, the legate of the order, publicly maintained in the court of the pontiff A. D. 1323, that the last ordinance of John was repugnant both to human and divine law, and he appealed the case.⁴ The pontiff on the other hand threw this bold defender of Franciscan poverty into prison; and by a new edict at the close of the year commanded that all persons should be ac-

² I notice this circumstance, because some valuable writers have made them two persons.

³ These constitutions are inserted in the Corpus Juris Canon. among the Extravagantes [Johannis XXII.] tit. xlv. de Verbor. Significat. cap. II. lib. I. p. 121, &c. On the subject itself the most important writer to be consulted is the contemporary author, Alvarus Pelagius, De Planctu Ecclesie, lib. II. c. 60, &c. p. 145, &c. and next to him, Wadding, Annales Minor. tom. vi. p. 94, &c. Both censure John. Bulcaus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. IV. p. 191, &c.

⁴ Wadding's Annales Minor. tom. vii. p. 2, 22, &c.; Pelagius, De Planctu Ecclesie, lib. II. p. 167; Thietmarius, Annales Hirsaug. tom. II. p. 157; De Niem, in Eccard's Corpus Histor. Mediæ ævæ, tom. I. p. 1491, &c.

[1352—1362.] expired in the flames their zeal for the poverty of St. Francis, in France and Italy. To these so many others might be added from the historians and documents printed and manuscript, that I suppose a catalogue of two thousand such martyrs might be made out. See the Coder Inquis. Tolosaæ, published by Limborch, p. 298, 302, 319, 327, &c.

¹ Wadding's Annales Minor. tom. vi. p. 361; Baluzo, Miscellanea, tom. I. p. 307; Du Bois, Hist. Eccles. Paris. p. 611, &c.

counted heretics and corrupters of religion, who should teach that Christ and his apostles possessed no property, either in common or as individuals.¹ And as this edict did not terrify the Franciscans, and many of them poured forth reproaches and maledictions against John, another bull still more violent was issued towards the close of the year 1324, in which the pontiff defended his former decrees, and pronounced the doctrine of an expropriation by Christ and his apostles to be pestiferous, erroneous, damnable, blasphemous, and opposed to the catholic faith; and ordered that all who professed it should be accounted heretics, contumacious, and rebels against the church.² The effect of this edict was that many who continued to assert that Christ and his apostles were such mendicants as Francis required his brethren to be, were seized and committed to the flames by the Dominican Inquisitors, the enemies of the Franciscans. And the history of France, Spain, Italy, and Germany, shows that in this and the following century the examples of this shocking cruelty were not a few.

30. John prosecuted this business strenuously in the subsequent years. As the whole controversy seemed to originate from the books of Peter John Oliva, in the year 1325 he declared the Postilla and the other writings of Oliva to be heretical.³ He next summoned to Avignon the more learned and eminent Franciscans whose tongues and pens he feared, and detained them at his court. And lastly, he employed his friends, the Dominicans, everywhere as sentinels, lest the Franciscans, who were full of indignation and wrath, should plot some mischief. The general of the order, Michael de Cæsenas, lived in Italy and did not disguise his hatred of the pontiff. Him therefore he summoned to Avignon in the year 1327, and deprived him of his office.⁴

This use of force tempered with policy only inflamed still more the minds of the Franciscans, who were contending for absolute poverty. And a fierce contest breaking out between John XXII. and the emperor Lewis of Bavaria, several of the leading Franciscans, among whom Marsilius of Padua and John of Jandunum or Genoa were pre-eminent, fled to the emperor and under his protection opposed most violently in their writings not only John himself but generally the power and authority of the Roman pontiffs.⁵ Their example was followed by Michael Cæsenas, by William Occam, a very acute and discriminating man, and by Brother Bonagratia, who in the year 1321 proceeded by sea from Avignon first into Italy to the emperor, and thence to Munich. These were succeeded by others in great numbers, among whom were B. reugarius, Francis de Esculo, and Henry de Halem, men eminent for erudition and talents.⁶ All these, in treatises not

¹ D'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. III. p. 85, &c.; Bellarminum Romanum, tom. vi. p. 167; Martene, Thesaur. Anecdotor., tom. II. p. 695, 704; Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris., tom. IV. p. 216. Particularly noted is the performance of Marsilius of Padua, a professor at Vienna, entitled, Defensor Pacis pro Ludovico Bavaro adversus Usurpatum Romani Pontificis Jurisdictionem, published with other works, and also separately, by Gouaruz, Frankfurt. 1592, 8vo.

² Wadding's Annals Minor., tom. vii. p. 81; Martene's Thesaur. Anecdotor., tom. II. p. 713, 757, &c.; Trithemius, Annales Hirsaug., tom. II. p. 167; Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris., tom. IV. p. 217; Eecard's Corpus Hist. Mediæ ævi, tom. II. p. 1014; Baluze, Miscellanea, tom. I. p. 293, 315, &c. Concerning these men the reader may consult the compilers of Catalogues and Bibliothèques of the Ecclesiastical Writers. [Michael Cæsenas, D.D. was a native of Italy, a Franciscan of the province of Bologna, and created general of the order A.D. 1316. He strenuously enforced the discipline of the order, presided in the chapter held at Perugia A.D. 1322, was summoned to Avignon in 1327, imprisoned, and the next year ordered to be tried for the decision in the chapter at Perugia. He appealed from the sentence, and fearing the consequences privately escaped from Avignon. The pope now excommunicated him and deposed him from the generalship of his order, appointing cardinal Bertrand to succeed him. Michael appealed to a council, joined the emperor Lewis, and strenuously resisted the pontiff. In the year 1329 Bertrand called a chapter of the Franciscans at Paris, which deposed Michael and elected Gerard to succeed him. He now openly accused the pope of heresy, and the latter anathematized him in 1330; and the year following the convention of his order at Perpignan declared him a heretic. He died A.D. 1343, retaining his rancour against the pope to the last. His works are several tracts, letters, and protestations against John XXII. commentaries on Ezekiel, and on the four books of Sentences, and some sermons. Marsilius Patavinus was born at Padua, studied law at Orleans, was one of the most distinguished philosophers and jurists of his age, and became a counsellor of Lewis of Bavaria. He composed his celebrated Defensor Pacis pro Ludovico, &c. A.D. 1324, in which he asserts the superiority of the emperors over the popes, even in the external affairs of the church; depicts the pride, ambition, and luxury of the court of Rome in vivid colours; and shows that the bishops of Rome have no more authority by divine right over the whole church than any other bishops. In 1327 John XXII. excommunicated him, and he died the year following. Besides his Defensor Pacis he left tracts on the power of the emperors in matrimonial causes, and on the trans-

¹ Wadding, ubi supra, tom. vii. p. 36, the continuator of De Nangis, in D'Achery's Spicilegium, tom. III. p. 83; Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris., tom. IV. p. 205; the Giulia Christiana of the Benedictines, tom. II. p. 1815, &c.

² This constitution as well as the two above mentioned is [in the Corpus Jur. Canon.] among the Extravagantes [Johann. XXII.] tit. xiv. De Verbor. Signif. [cap. v.] The last one is strenuously opposed, at great length, by Wadding, tom. vii. p. 36, which was not to be expected in a man so immoderately devoted to the pontiffs.

³ Wadding, ubi supra, tom. vii. p. 47; Eecard's Corpus Histor. Mediæ ævi, tom. I. p. 592, and 1491. [And indeed Oliva has in his Postilla on the Revelation, propositions which the pope must have accounted worthy of condemnation. He understood by the whore of Babylon the Romish church, by Antichrist the pope, by the angel flying through the midst of heaven with the everlasting gospel, St. Francis, and by an evangelical life, a life void of all property, common or personal, and in which a person has the mere use of things.—Schl.] more fluent than caustic, vindicated the rule of their founder and depreciated the power and majesty of the pontiffs. Occam, whose Dialogues and other writings were eagerly read, excelled the rest; and being handed down to posterity, inflicted a mortal wound on the pontifical supremacy.

⁴ See Wadding, ubi supra, tom. vii. p. 63, 74.

31. The emperor, Lewis of Bavaria, grateful to those his defenders, made the case of the Franciscans against John XXII. his own; and he not only espoused their cause, but likewise their opinion respecting the mendicity of Christ and the apostles. For among the pernicious errors for which he publicly accused John of heresy and removed him from the pontificate, the chief was his opinion respecting Christ's poverty or that he was not destitute of all property, than which as the emperor supposed there could be no worse heresy.¹ The emperor moreover afforded to all the Fratricelli, the Beghards, the Beguins, and the Spirituals, who were contending against the pontiff, a secure asylum in Germany against the Inquisitors. Hence during his reign Germany abounded in herds of Mendicants; and in nearly all the provinces and cities, houses were erected for Beghards and Beguins—that is, for persons professing what was called the third rule of St. Francis, and who placed the highest virtue of a Christian man in a voluntary destitution of all things or in mendicity.² On the contrary, the Dominicans who were the enemies of the Franciscans and the friends of the pontiff, the emperor treated with great severity, banishing them from many cities with disgrace.³

32. This great and, to the pontiffs, formidable controversy began to subside in the year 1329. For in this year the pope directed the convention of the Franciscan order to be held at Paris; and by means of cardinal Bertrand, who presided in the assembly and was assisted by the doctors of Paris, the pontiff so far soothed the majority of the brethren, that they ceased from supporting Michael Cæsenas and his followers, allowed another general to be chosen in his place, Gerard Odonis, acknowledged John to be the true and legitimate pontiff, and terminated the contest respecting the poverty of Christ in such a way as not to impeach the constitutions and decrees of Nicolaus III. and John XXII.⁴ But great numbers in Germany, Spain, and Italy, could not be persuaded to admit this pacification. After the death of John, Benedict XII. and Clement VI. endeavoured to heal the schism by mildness and clemency towards those Franciscans who had greater veneration for the rule of their founder than for the decrees of the pontiffs; nor were they wholly unsuccessful. For many returned to the fraternity from which they had receded, and among these were some of the most inveterate opposers of John, as Francis de Esculo and others.⁵ Those who would not return did not insult the pontiffs, but lived quietly in obedience to the laws of their founder; nor would they hold intercourse with the Fratricelli and their Tertiarii in Italy, Spain, and Germany, who openly contemned the authority of the pontiffs.⁶

33. The Germans whom the emperor Lewis protected resisted longer than the

fer of the empire.—John de Janduno or of Genoa was a doctor at Perugia and a distinguished theologian and philosopher, who was excommunicated at the same time with Marsilius. In the year 1338 he published his tract, Pro Superioritate Imperatoris in Temporalibus. He also wrote commentaries on various works of Aristotle.—William Occam was an Englishman, born [at Ockham] in Surrey, a disciple of Duns Scotus; was called Doctor Singularis [et Inimicibilis] and Venerabilis Inceptor, and belonged to the order of Franciscans. In the beginning of this century he occupied a theological chair in the university of Paris, dissented from his master Scotus, and became the head of the sect of Nominalists. He espoused the cause of Philip the Fair against the pontiff in a tract on the point in controversy. In 1322 he was made provincial of his order for England, attended the general chapter of Perugia the same year, and embraced strongly the decision of that convention respecting the poverty of Christ and his apostles. This doctrine he now openly preached everywhere, and particularly at Bologna. The next year the pope commanded him to be silent on pain of excommunication. He retired to France, and remained secure in silence till 1328, when he drew his pen in favour of Lewis against the pope, espoused the cause of Peter Corbarius, the anti-pope, wrote keenly against the ambition and tyranny of John XXII. and maintained that the emperor was subject to none but God in temporal things. He was therefore excommunicated by John in 1330, and fled to the emperor Lewis of Bavaria, who received him kindly, made him his privy counsellor, and he remained all the rest of his life at that court, strenuously and learnedly defending the emperor's cause against the pope. He said to the emperor: Tu me defendas gladio, et ego te defendam calamo. He died A.D. 1347, some say later. His works are numerous, partly philosophical, partly theological, and partly controversial.—Mur. [The most important of his theological works is his Questiones super IV. libros Sententiarum. He brought about, according to Gieseler, a great epoch in the history of scholastic philosophy, by reviving the already forgotten doctrines of the Nominalists; and Hampden calls him the second founder of the school of Nominalism. Of him and his works see Ritter, Geschichte der Christl. Philos. vol. iv. p. 574—604.—R.

¹ See the Processus Ludonici contra Johannem, A.D. 1328, die 12 Dec. datus, in Baluze, Miscellanea, tom. ii. p. 522, &c. and his Appellatio, ibid. p. 494, &c.

² I have in my possession many proofs of this fact which were never published.

³ Diefenbach, De Mortis Genere, quo Henricus VII. obiit, p. 145, and others; Eccard's Corpus Histor. Medii Aevi, tom. i. p. 2103; Bukeus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iv. p. 220, &c.

⁴ Wadding's Annales Minor. tom. vii. p. 94; D'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. iii. p. 91.

⁵ Argentre, Collectio Judicior. de Nonis Erroribus, tom. i. p. 343; Bukeus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iv. p. 281; Wadding's Annales Minor. tom. vii. p. 313.

⁶ Wadding, ubi supra, tom. vii. p. 116, 126; Argentre, ubi supra, tom. i. p. 343, &c.

others. But at his death A.D. 1348 the golden age of the Franciscan Spirituals, and of the Beghards or Tertiarii connected with them, expired in Germany. For his successor Charles IV. who had been created emperor by the influence of the pontiff in 1345, seconding the desires and wishes of the church, supported both by edicts and by arms the Inquisitors who were sent by the pontiff against his enemies, and allowed them to seize and put to death all they could lay hands on. They accordingly proceeded in the provinces of Magdeburg, Bremen, Thuringia, Saxony, and Hesse, to extirpate all the Beghards and Beguins, that is, the associates or Tertiarii of those Franciscans who maintained that Christ and his apostles had no property. On learning this Charles IV. then residing at Lucca in Italy, issued very severe mandates to all the princes in Germany in the year 1360, commanding them to expel and to aid the Inquisitors in extirpating as enemies to the church and to the Roman empire all Beghards and Beguins, or as the emperor interprets the name, the voluntary mendicants.¹ By another edict a little after, he gave the houses of the Beghards to the tribunal of the Inquisition, ordering them to be converted into prisons for heretics; but the houses of the Beguins he ordered to be sold and the proceeds to be distributed equally among the Inquisitors, the poor, and the magistrates of the towns.² The Beghards, being reduced to extremities by these mandates of the emperor and by the edicts of the pontiffs, fled into Switzerland, into the provinces along the Rhine, into Holland and Brabant, and also into Pomerania.³ But there also the laws and mandates of the emperor, the decrees of the pontiffs and the Inquisitors followed them. And thus under Charles IV. the greatest part of Germany, with the exception of Switzerland and the provinces adjacent to Switzerland, was purged of the rebellious Franciscans, both the perfect monks and the imperfect or Beghards.

34. But neither edicts nor Inquisitors could entirely extirpate the inveterate evil and discord. For the wish to observe perfectly the rule of St. Francis was so deeply rooted in the minds of many of the brethren, that there were persons everywhere who either directly resisted the general of the order, or obeyed him with feelings of reluctance. In order therefore to satisfy both parties, the more lax and the more rigid, various measures having been tried in vain, recurrence was had to a division of the order. Accordingly in the year 1368, the general of the order gave liberty to Paulutus Fulginas, the leader of the more rigid Franciscans in Italy, and his associates who were considerably numerous, to live detached from the rest of the brethren, to follow their own customs and regulations, and to observe the rule of their founder more religiously and sacredly. To this party gradually came over such as remained, here and there, of the Spirituals and of the followers of Oliva. And the number of the lovers of the severer discipline being increased and the party extending itself over many provinces, the pontiffs sanctioned the association by their authority. Thus the Franciscan order was split into two large sects which have continued down to the present time, the one called the Conventual Brethren, and the other the Brethren of the Observation or regular Observantines. The first name is given to those who have deviated most from the literal sense of the rule of their founder, and who adopt the interpretation of it by the pontiffs; the latter name was given by the council of Constance to those who choose to follow the words of the rule, rather than the interpretation given to it. But this reconciliation was rejected by the Fratricelli and their Beghards who have been so often mentioned, and who in this and the following century did not cease to disturb the church in the marquisate of Ancona and in other places.⁴

¹ In the German, Die wilgen Armen.

² I have in my possession this edict with other laws of Charles IV. relating to this subject, and also many of the pontifical constitutions and other documents which illustrate this affair, and which in my judgment are not unworthy of publication. Charles IV. in his edicts and laws accurately describes the persons whom he calls Beghards and Beguins; so that there can be no doubt we are to understand them to be Franciscan Tertiaries of the class that disagreed with the pontiffs. "They are" (says the emperor, in his edict dated at Lucca on the 15th of the Kalends of June A.D. 1366) "a pernicious sect, who pretend to a sacrilegious and heretical poverty and make vows or professions that they will possess nothing and ought not to possess anything, either individually or in common" (this is the poverty of the Franciscan Institute which John XXII. so strenuously opposed); "which they also exhibit externally by their vile garments." (Such was the practice of the Spirituals and of their associates.)

³ This I learn from Raynald, Annales Eccles. ad ann. 1372, sec. 34, p. 513, and from the writings of Felix Malleolus composed in the following century against the Beghards in Switzerland.

⁴ See Wadding's Annales Minorum, p. 59, 63, 78, &c. torn. viii. p. 209, 298, 326, 336, torn. ix.

⁵ Mosheim has given undue prominence to these uninteresting squabbles of the popes and the Franciscans by devoting so large a space (no less than twelve sections, 22—34) to them. But he was the first among modern writers to study minutely this portion of ecclesiastical history, and he found so much to correct in the popular accounts of these controversies, that he compiled the elaborate work already mentioned; which was not published till after his death by Martini under the title of De Beghards et Beguinibus Commentarius. Gieseler has followed nearly the same track; see sec. 110 of Cunningham's translation, vol. iii. p. 91, &c.—H.

35. In this century there were also new religious associations formed, of which however some were of short continuance and others acquired no great notoriety or fame. In the year 1367 John Colombinus, a nobleman of Siena, instituted the order of the Apostolic Clerks, who were afterwards called Jesuates because they pronounced so very frequently the name of Jesus. This order was confirmed by Urban V. in the year 1368, but it was abolished by Clement IX. in the seventeenth century or A.D. 1668. Its members followed the rule of St. Augustine; but they were not in holy orders and only gave themselves to prayer, to pious exercises, and relieving the poor, though themselves without property. They also prepared medicines and administered them gratis among the needy.¹ But these regulations had been nearly abandoned when Clement dissolved the order.

36. Not long after the commencement of the century, there arose at Antwerp the sect of the Cellite Brethren and Sisters, who were also called the Brethren and Sisters of Alexius, because they had St. Alexius for their patron saint. The name Cellites (Cellitæ) was derived from the cells in which they resided. As the priests in that age paid almost no attention to the sick and the dying, and wholly forsook and abandoned those infected by pestilential diseases, which were then very prevalent, certain pious persons at Antwerp formed themselves into an association for performing these pious offices. While the clergy therefore fled from the danger and hid themselves, these persons visited and comforted the sick, conversed and prayed with them when dying, attended to the burial of such as died with the plague, and accompanied their remains to the grave with funeral dirges. From the last of these offices they acquired among the people the common appellation of Lollhards.² The example of these good people was followed by many others; and hence in a short time, over the greater part of Germany put the student of ecclesiastical history upon a right course of thinking on this subject.

The term Lollhardus or Lullhardus, or as the ancient Germans wrote it, Lollert or Lullert, is compounded of the old German word lullen, lollen, or lallen, and the well-known termination hard, which is subjoined to so many German words. Lollen or lullen signifies to sing with a low voice. It is still used in this sense by the English who say, to lull asleep, that is, to sing any one into a slumber with a sweet and slender voice. See Junius, Etymologicum Anglicanum, published by Edward Lye, Oxon. 1743, fol. on the word Lollard. The word is also used in the same sense by the Flemings, the Swedes, and other nations, as their dictionaries will show. Among the Germans both the sigification and the sound have undergone some change. For they pronounce it lallen, and denote by it to utter indistinctly, to stammer. A Lollhard therefore is a singer, or one who sings much and often. But as the word beggen, which signified in general to beg earnestly for anything, was transferred to religious supplications or prayers addressed to God, and thus came to denote in its more limited sense, to pray earnestly to God; so also the verb lollen or lullen was transferred to sacred singing, and in its limited sense denoted, to sing sacred songs. In the vulgar language of the old Germans therefore, a Lollhard was a man who was continually praising God with sacred songs, or was singing hymns. The import of the word was most accurately apprehended and expressed by a writer of that age, named Hoeseuius, a canon of Liège, in his Gesta Pontificum Leodiensium, lib. i. cap. 31 (in Chapeville, Gesta Pontificum Turgernium et Leodiensium, tom. ii. p. 350, &c.), who says: In the same year (1309), certain strolling hypocrites, who were called Lollhards, or praisers of God (qui Lollhardi, sivi Deum laudantes vocabantur), deceived some women of quality in Hainault and Brabant. And because those who praised God generally did it in verse, hence in the style of the middle ages, to praise God was the same as to sing; and the persons who praised God were religious singers, who continually celebrated the divine majesty and goodness in sacred hymns. Moreover, as praying and singing were the most manifest external indications of piety, therefore all who affected more than ordinary piety and devotion and of course praised God and prayed to him more than others, were in the popular language called Lollhards. Thus this term acquired the same import with the term Beghard, or denoted a person distinguished for piety. And these two words are used as synonymous in the ancient writings of the eleventh and following centuries; so that the same persons are at one time called Beghards and at another Lollhards. This might unanswerably be evinced by numerous examples, and is sufficiently manifest from the writings of Felix Mallecolus alone against the Beghards. There were then as many species of Lollhards as there were of Beghards. Those whom the monks now call Lay Brothers were formerly called Lollhard Brothers; as is well observed by Schöbinger, on Joach. Vadianus, De Collegiis Monasterique Germaniæ Veteris, lib. i. p. 21. (in Goldast, Scriptores Rerum Alemannicarum, tom. iii.) The Brethren of the Free Spirit, of whom we have already spoken, were by some called Beghards and by others Lollhards. The disciples of Gerhard Groote or the priests of common life, were very often called the Lullhard brethren. The honest Walter who was burned at Cologne, and whom so many of the learned improperly regard as the founder of the sect of Lollhards, was by some called a Beghard, by others a Lollhard, and by others a Fatricellus. The Franciscan Tertiarii, who distinguished themselves above the common people by their prayers and other religious observances, are often designated by the term Lollhards. But especially the Cellite Brethren or the Alexians, whose piety was so conspicuous, as soon as they appeared in Belgium, near the beginning of this century, were designated by the common people with the familiar appellation of Lollhards. In this case however there was a special reason for the people to bestow on them this name. For they attended to their graves,

¹ Helyot, Hist. des Ordres, tome iii. p. 411, &c.; Pagi, Breviarium Pontif. tom. iv. p. 189, &c.; Bonanni and the other writers on the monastic orders.

² Concerning the name and the sect of the Lollhards there are many disquisitions and narrations, but no one has written on the subject so as to deserve commendation either for good faith or for diligence and accuracy. On this subject I make assertions with the more confidence, because I have made special investigations respecting the Lollhards, and have collected copious materials from printed and unprinted documents, from which a history of them might be compiled. Very many writers both of the Lutheran and other communities tell us that the Lollhards were a peculiar sect, dissenting on many points of religion from the Romish church; and that Walter Lollhard, who was burned at Cologne in this century, was the father of it. From what source so many learned men could derive these facts, I confess myself unable to comprehend. They refer indeed to the authority of John Trithemius; but he certainly has left us nothing of the kind in his writings. I will endeavour, with all the brevity I can, to and the Netherlands societies were formed of such Lollhards of both sexes, who were supported partly by their own labour, and partly by the munificence of those whom they served, or of other pious persons. By the magistrates and citizens of the places where they lived, these brethren and sisters were highly esteemed, on account of the kind offices they performed to the sick and distressed. But the priests, whose reputation they injured not a little, and the mendicant monks, whose resources they diminished, persecuted them violently, and accused them before the pontiffs of many faults and of very great errors; and in consequence of their exertions, the term Lollhard, which before implied no discredit, became a reproachful epithet, denoting one who conceals great vices and pernicious sentiments under the mask of those who died of the pestilence, singing in a low voice solemn funeral dirges, and were therefore public singers. Out of many testimonies I will adduce only some from Gramaye, a man well versed in the history of his country. In his Antiquité, lib. ii. cap. vi. p. 16, he says: The Alexians who employed themselves about funerals, had their rise at Autwerp; where soon after the year 1300 some honest and pious laymen associated together, and were called from their frugality and their unassuming and plain manner of life, Matemanni; and from their devotedness to funerals, Lollhards (a funero obsequiis, Lollhardi); from their cells, Cellite Brethren. In his Looniam, p. 18, b. which is in his Antiquit. Belgicæ, published splendidly in fol. Louvain, 1708, he says: The Alexians who took the charge of funerals as a business, began to appear. They were laymen who devoted themselves to works of mercy, and were then called Lollhards and Matemans. Their attention to the care of the sick, the delirious, and the dead, both in public and in private, was pleasing to all. This learned author tells that he transcribed a part of these facts from an ancient Flemish diary written in rhyme. Hence, in the Annals of Holland and Utrecht, in Matthæus, Analecta Veter. Eri. tom. i. p. 431, we read: Die Lollardjes die brochten de dooden by een, [i.e. the Lollhards who collected the dead bodies.—Mur.] which Matthæus thus explains: The managers of funerals and carriers of the dead, of whom there was a regular body, were vile, worthless fellows, who usually spoke in mournful tones as if bewailing the dead. And hence the name of a street at Utrecht in which most of them lived, was called (De Lollestract) the Lollard street. Compare also the same Analecta, &c. tom. ii. p. 345, 643. The same cause which changed the reputable appellation of Beghard into a term of reproach, effected a similar change in the name of Lollhard; namely, the fact that among those persons who would be thought superior to others in piety, and who spent their time in prayer, and praise, and religious exercises, base hypocrites were found who pretended to piety, in order to conceal their vicious conduct and their absurd religious tenets. Especially after the rise of the Alexians or Cellites, the term Lollhard became reproachful and base. For the priests and monks being very inimical to this honest sort of people, studiously propagated injurious suspicions respecting them, and represented these Lollhards who appeared so spotless and so benevolent, as in reality vile characters, infected with abominable principles and addicted to vices and crimes. Thus gradually the term Lollhard in its common application, came to designate one who conceals either heretical principles or vicious conduct under the mask of piety. It is therefore certain that this appellation was not anciently appropriated to any one sect, but was common to all sects and persons, in whom impiety towards God and the church was supposed to be concealed under an external appearance of the contrary.

piety. But the magistrates by their commendations and their testimony supported the Lollhards against their rivals, and procured for them various decrees of the pontiffs approving of their institution, exempting them from the jurisdiction of the Inquisition, and subjecting them only to the bishops. Yet even this did not enable them to live in safety. Therefore Charles, duke of Burgundy, in the year 1472, obtained a decree from Sixtus IV. by which the Cellite or Lollhards were admitted among the religious orders, and were withdrawn even from the jurisdiction of the bishops; and Julius II. in the year 1506 conferred on them still greater privileges. Many societies of their kind still exist at Cologne and in the cities of the Netherlands, though they have essentially departed from their ancient manner of life.¹

37. Among the Greek writers the following were the most distinguished. Nicephorus Callisti, whose Ecclesiastical History has already been mentioned;² Matthæus Blastares, who expounded and illustrated the ecclesiastical law of the Greek church;³ Barlaam, a strenuous defender of the cause of the Greeks against the Latins;⁴ Gregory Acindynus, who warmly opposed the sect of the Palamites of which notice will be taken hereafter;⁵ John Cantacuzenus, distinguished for the history he composed and for his confutation of the Mohammedan faith;⁶ Nicephorus Gregoras, who has left us a history of the Greek empire and some other

¹ Besides many others who cannot be here cited, see Gelenius, De admiranda sacra et civili Magnitudine urbis Colonie, lib. iii. syntagm. li. p. 531, &c. 598, 603, &c.; Gramaye, Antiq. Belgicæ; Sanders, Brabantia et Flandria illustrata; Miræus, Opera Diplomatica, in many passages, and many other writers of those times. I will add that those who were called Lollhards were also called by many in German, die Nollbrüder, from the obsolete word Nollen.

² See above, p. 486, note 6.—Mur.

³ Matthew Blastares was a Greek monk and jurist, who flourished about A.D. 1335. His Alphabeticon Canonum Syntagma, or Alphabetical synopsis of the matter contained in the sacred canons, was published, Gr. and Lat. in Beyerlidge's Pandectæ Canonum, Oxf. 1672, tom. ii. par. ii. p. 1. His tract on matrimonial causes and questions, is extant, Gr. and Lat. in Leunclavius, Jus Gr. Rom. lib. viii. p. 478. He also translated the fictitious donation of Constantine into Greek.—Mur.

⁴ See above, p. 487, note 2.—Mur.

⁵ Gregory Acindynus was a follower of Barlaam and assisted him in the council of Constantinople against Palamas and the Hesychists; and together with Barlaam was laid under censure by that council. Not ceasing to harass the Hesychists, he was arraigned by the patriarch A.D. 1341, and ordered to be still or he would be excommunicated. In 1347 he was actually excommunicated, and afterwards lived in obscurity. His Iambic poem on the heresy of Gregory Palamas is extant, Gr. and Lat. in Leo Allatius, Gr. Othod. tom. i. p. 756—770, and his two books, De Essentia et Operatione Dei, against Palamas and others, was published, Gr. and Lat. by Gretser, Ingolst. 1616. 4to.—Mur.

⁶ See above, p. 486, note 5.—Mur.

products of his genius;¹ Theophanes, bishop of Nice, who maintained the truth of Christianity against the Jews and other enemies of it; ² Nilus Cabasilas, Nilus Rhodius, and Nilus Damyla, all of whom zealously supported the cause of the Greeks against the Latins; ³ Philotheus, who has left various tracts calculated to excite pious emotions; ⁴ Gregory Palamas, of whom more will be said hereafter.⁵

¹ See above, p. 486, note 1.—Mur.

² Theophanes, archbishop of Nice, flourished A.D. 1347, and wrote Adversus Judæos, also Concordia Fidei et Noni Testamenti, proving Jesus to be the Messiah; besides some Epistles. A full analysis of the two first works is given by Possevin, Apparat. tom. ii. p. 470.—Mur.

³ Nilus Cabasilas was archbishop of Thessalonica under John Cantacuzenus about A.D. 1340. His tract De Causis divisionum in Ecclesia, and another De Primatu Papæ, have been repeatedly published, particularly by Salmassius, Gr. and Lat. with notes, subjoined to his work on the Primacy of the Pope, Leyden, 1645, 4to. He is reported to have written forty-nine books, De Processione Sp. s. adversus Latinos.—Nilus Rhodius was metropolitan of Rhodes, perhaps about A.D. 1360. He took sides with the Palamites against Barlaam, and wrote Enarratio Synoptica de Sanctis et Eternæis Synodis IX. which is extant in Justell's Biblioth. Juris Canon. tom. ii. p. 1155.—Nilus Damyla was a native of Italy, a monk in Crete, a violent opposer of the Latins, and flourished A.D. 1400. Only extracts from his works have been published.—Mur.

⁴ Philotheus was a Greek monk, prior of the Laura of Mount Athos, metropolitan of Heraclea A.D. 1351, patriarch of Constantinople A.D. 1355, and died in 1371, greatly distinguished for reputed piety and for eloquence. His Liturgia et Ordo instituendi Diaconum, and his Eulogy on the hierarchs, Basil. Gregory Theologus, and John Chrysostom, are given in a Latin translation in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xxvi. and the last, Greek and Latin, in Fronto le Duc's Actes. Patrum, tom. ii. His Oratio de Cruce and Oratio in tertian juniorum, Dominicorum, Græcæ and Latin, are in Gretser, De Cruce, tom. ii. He wrote on Christ's transfiguration, in defence of Palamas against Barlaam, also discourses against Barlaam, a confession of faith, homilies on the Gospels for the year and on all the saints, and some other things which are preserved in manuscript.—Mur.

⁵ Gregory Palamas, an Asiatic, educated at court, who renounced the world, gave up all his property, and became a monk. He spent ten years at Mount Athos, and ten more at Berthæa; and then went to Thessalonica to recover his health injured by his austerities. He now became the successful leader of the monks against Barlaam for a series of years, and was much at court and in councils. In 1347 he was imprisoned by a faction, but soon after was liberated by another faction, and nominated but not ordained patriarch. About the year 1354, by order of the emperor Cantacuzenus, he was consecrated archbishop of Thessalonica, but the magistrates there would not admit him to his see, and he retired to Lemnos, where he was supported by the emperor's bounty. His works are two orations on the Procession of the Holy Spirit against the Latins, a refutation of the statements of John Vecceus, Protopopæus, or two judicial pleas of the body and the soul, each against the other, two orations on the transfiguration of Christ, besides some pieces never published.

Besides those hitides mentioned, there were the following Greek writers in this century.

Hailon or Aiton, an Armenian prince, who served long in the wars of Palestine against the Saracens, and then about A.D. 1260 became a Promonastrensian monk in the island of Cyprus, and spent his life in retirement and devotion. About A.D. 1307, while resident at Poitiers in France, he dictated a history of the Tartars, their customs, and their wars, which Nicolaus Falconius translated from the French in which it was elated into barbarous Latin, entitled Itinerarium et Flos Historiarum Orientis, with an appendix entitled

Of the vast host of Latin writers we shall select only the most eminent. Among the scholastic doctors who united theology with philosophy, John Duns Scotus, the great antagonist of Thomas and a Franciscan monk, holds the first rank; and if deficient in candour and ingenuousness of mind, he certainly was second to none of his age in subtilty.⁶ After him the more distinguished Passagium Terræ Sanctæ. It was printed repeatedly; e.g. by Reineccius, Helmst. 1585; and in Italian, Venice, 1553.

Georgius Lecepenus, a monk who lived in Thessaly, was intimate with Gregory Palamas, and flourished about A.D. 1354. He wrote De Constructione Verborum, published in Gr. Venice and Florence, 1526, 8vo; also many epistles, and a number of grammatical works which exist in manuscript.

Callistus, a monk of Mount Athos, sent to court by his monastery, and made patriarch of Constantinople by Cantacuzenus A.D. 1354, retired after two years, again resumed the chair, and died on an embassy to the Servian princess Elizabeth. To him is ascribed a homily on the exaltation of the cross, in Gretser De Cruce, tom. ii. p. 1347, and some others which exist in manuscript.

Demetrius Cydonius, a native of Constantinople, and one of the principal counsellors and courtiers of the emperor Cantacuzenus. He retired with that emperor to a monastery; and afterwards leaving Greece, studied theology and the Latin writers at Milan, and then selling his property, spent his life in a monastery in Crete. He has left a tract on the execrable doctrines of Gregory Palamas, another on the Procession of the Holy Spirit, two orations on public political affairs, an oration on contempt of death, and an epistle to Barlaam against the procession of the Spirit from the Son; all of which have been printed, as also his Greek translation of Richard's confutation of the Alcoran. He also translated into Greek St. Thomas's Summa Theologicæ, and some other of St. Thomas's works, as well as some of St. Auselm of Canterbury, which exist in manuscript.

John the Wise, surnamed Cyparisiota, of an uncertain age, but supposed to have flourished about A.D. 1360. His Expositio materiæ eorum, quæ de Deo a theologis dicuntur, is extant in a Latin translation, Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xxi. and two of his discourses, Gr. and Lat. in Combès's Auctarium novæ man.

Manuel Caleca, a Greek who is reported to have become a Dominican monk, and who lived about A.D. 1360. His four books against the Greeks in regard to the Procession of the Holy Spirit, in a Latin translation, are in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xxvi. and his two tracts, one against the Palamites and the other De Principiis Fidei Christianæ, Gr. and Lat. are in Combès's Auctarium.

Isaac Argyrus, a Greek monk who flourished about A.D. 1373, whose Comptatus was published, Gr. and Lat. by Christmann, Heidelb. 1611, 4to, and by Petavius, De Doctrina Temporum, tom. iii. p. 359.

Emanuel II. Palæologus, created Cæsar A.D. 1384, and emperor A.D. 1391–1425. His works were published, Gr. and Lat. by Leunclavius, Basil, 1578, 8vo; comprising one hundred precepts for the education of a prince, seven addresses to his son on virtues and vices and on learning, two prolix morning prayers, and several other tracts.

Joseph, called Al-haher Biltabib, a native of Alexandria in Egypt and curate of the catholic church of the Holy Virgin A.D. 1350, and ordained a presbyter A.D. 1358. He translated paraphrastically nearly all the canons received by the Greek church into Arabic. The whole work in manuscript is in the Bodleian library. The canons of the four first general councils, Arabic and Latin, were printed in Beveridge's Pindeclæ Canonum, Oxf. 1671, tom. ii. p. 681.—Mur.

⁶ The works of Scotus were first published accurately in the 17th century by Wadding, a very laborious man Lyons, 1639, in twelve volumes. See Wood's Antiq. Oxon. tom. i. p. 86, &c. but especially Wadding's Annuales Minor. tom. vi p. 40, 107; Bulæus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iv. p. 70, &c. [John Duns Scotus was in this class were Durand of St. Porcain who attacked the received doctrine respecting the co-operation of God in human actions,¹ Antonius Andreas,² Hervaeus Natalis,³ Francis Mayron,⁴ Thomas Bradwardine, an acute and ingenious man,⁵ Peter Aureolus,⁶ John Bacon,⁷ William Occam,⁸

probably born about A.D. 1265, but whether in England, Scotland, or Ireland, is uncertain. He studied first in a Franciscan monastery in Newcastle, and then at Merton College, Oxford, where he became a fellow and A.D. 1301 a professor of theology. He greatly distinguished himself as a disputant and was learned in philosophy, mathematics, civil and canon law, and theology. His lectures on the Sentences of Lombard were greatly admired, and very fully attended by the 30,000 students then said to be at Oxford. They are since printed with notes and fill six folio volumes. In the year 1301 the general of his order commanded him to remove to Paris and there defend his doctrine of the immaculate conception of Mary, which he did with great success and applause. In 1308 his general sent him from Paris to Cologne to found a university there, and to defend his doctrine of Mary's sinless birth. He died soon after his arrival, November 8, 1308, aged 43 years. His works embrace, besides his commentaries on Lombard's Sentences, commentaries on some works of Aristotle, and numerous tracts, theological, metaphysical, and philosophical.—Mur. [For an account of him and his works see Fabricius, Biblia. Lat. Med. Aevi, vol. iv. p. 407, &c. and for a full view of his philosophy see Ritter, Geschichte der Christ. Philos., vol. iv. p. 354—472. He was called Doctor Subtilis; his great opponent Thomas Aquinas being styled Doctor Angelicus.—R.

¹ See Launoi's tract, entitled Syllabus Rationum, quibus Durandi causa defenditur, in his Opp. tom. i.; Gallia Christiana, tom. ii. p. 723. [Durand of St. Porcain was born in the village of St. Porcain in Auvergne, France, was a Dominican monk and a distinguished theologian at Paris, called Doctor Resolutissimus. In 1323 he went to Italy, became master of the pontifical palace, bishop of Meaux in 1326, and bishop of Le Puy in 1327, and died A.D. 1333. He wrote commentaries on the four books of Sentences, often printed, De Origine Jurisdictionum seu de Ecclesiastica Jurisdictione, and a tract De Legibus.—Mur. [See Fabricius, Biblia. Lat. Med. Aevi, vol. ii. p. 204, 205. For further information respecting him, his works, and system, see Ritter, ubi supra, vol. iv. p. 547—574.—R.

² Antonius Andreas was a Spaniard of Aragon, a disciple of John Duns Scotus, a Franciscan monk, flourished A.D. 1308, and died, it is said, A.D. 1320. His works are commentaries on the Sentences, and on the works of Gilbert Porretanus, Aristotle, and Boethius, with some law tracts.—Mur.

³ Hervaeus Natalis, a native of Brittany, a student and doctor at Paris, a Dominican monk, and, A.D. 1318, general of the order. He flourished A.D. 1312, and died A.D. 1323. He wrote commentaries on the Sentences, printed, Paris, 1617, fol. Quodlibeta Majora et Minora, tracts on the power of the popes, against the Franciscans, and on various theological, philosophical, and practical subjects, a commentary on St. Paul's Epistles, and a treatise on Logic.—Mur.

⁴ Francis Mayron was born in Provence, studied under Duns Scotus at Paris, where he became a noted doctor. He was a Franciscan monk, and died at Placentia A.D. 1325. His commentaries on the Sentences, Quodlibeta varia, de formalitatibus liber, de primo principio, de expositione nominum, et de univocatione entis, were published at Venice, 1520, fol. and his sermons, and various theological tracts, Basil, 1498. He also wrote commentaries on the Ten Commandments, on Augustine's Civitas Dei, and on some books of Aristotle.—Mur.

⁵ See Simon, Lettres Choisies, tome iv. p. 232, and his Critique de la Biblioth. Ecclésiast. de M. Du Pin, tome i. p. 360, and Soucié's notes on this passage, p. 703; Nouveau Dictionnaire Hist. Critique, tome ii. p. 500, &c. [also p. 488, above, and note 5, there.—Mur.

⁶ Peter Aureolus was a Frenchman, born at Verberie on the Oise, a Dominican monk and theologian, became a public teacher in the university of Paris A.D.

Walter Burley,⁹ Peter de Alliaco,¹⁰ Thomas of Strasburg,¹¹ and Gregory de Rimini.¹² Among the mystics, John Tauler and John Ruysbroeck excelled the others in wisdom

1318, and lectured on the Sentences, became archbishop of Aix in Provence A.D. 1341, and died after A.D. 1345. He wrote commentaries on the four Books of Sentences, Quodlibeta varia, Brachium Bibliorum or Epitome of the Scriptures, a tract on the immaculate conception of Mary besides other tracts and sermons.—Mur.

⁷ John Bacon or Baconthorp, an Englishman, born at the obscure village of Baconthorp in Norfolk. He early became a Carmelite monk, was sent to Oxford and then to Paris to study, became celebrated as a jurist and a theologian, returned to England and was soon after made provincial of his order for England A.D. 1329. Four years after he was called to Rome to give his opinion on some difficult matrimonial questions, and died at London A.D. 1346. He wrote commentaries on the Sentences, a Compendium of the law of Christ, Quodlibeta, on the rule of the Carmelites, and a historical defence of it, which have been published, also commentaries on the whole Bible, and on Augustine's Civitas Dei, a tract against the Jews, sermons, &c. never published.—Mur.

⁸ See the note in p. 501, above.—Mur.

⁹ Walter Burley, an English secular priest, or as some say a Franciscan monk, called Doctor Plenus et Præpicus. He was of Merton College, Oxford, and afterwards studied at Paris. In both he heard Duns Scotus, but on his return to Oxford he disented from Scotus. He was preceptor to king Edward III. and flourished A.D. 1337, being then 62 years old. He wrote commentaries on the Sentences, and a great number of philosophical works, comments on Aristotle and others, lives of the philosophers, tracts on philosophical questions, &c. Only a part of his works have been printed.—Mur.

¹⁰ Peter de Ailly or de Alliaco, born of poor parentage at Compeigne on the Oise, 48 miles N.E. of Paris, A.D. 1310; after a good previous education he was admitted a bursar in the College of Navarre, Paris, 1372, began to lecture on the Sentences and to preach in public in 1375, was created D.D. 1380, and head of the College of Navarre in 1384, pleaded the cause of the immaculate conception of Mary before the pope at Avignon in 1387, became chancellor of the university and confessor to the king in 1389, treasurer of the royal chapel and royal envoy to the pope in 1394, was appointed bishop of La Puy in 1395 and of Cambray in 1396, attended the council of Pisa in 1409, was made cardinal in 1411 and papal legate to Germany in 1414; at the close of which year he repaired to the council of Constance, presided in the third session, and was very active during the three years of the sitting of that council, and often preached in it to the fathers. He died at Cambray A.D. 1425 and was called the Eagle of France and the Maul of Errorists. He was strenuous for condemning John Huss, and also for restraining the ambition of the popes, and for reforming the church and preserving its liberties. His writings are very numerous and various, comprising commentaries on the Sentences of Lombard, on the study of the Scriptures, on the power of the popes, pious meditations, sermons, expositions of Scripture, the mode of electing popes, the authority of cardinals, the reformation of the church, the connexion of astrology with theology, on the calendar, comments on Aristotle, &c. many of which have been published.—Mur.

¹¹ Thomas of Strasburg was a German, born at Strasburg, an Augustinian eremite, a theologian of Paris, was made prior general of his order in 1345, and died at Vienna, A.D. 1357. He wrote commentaries on the four Books of Sentences, and has left us the constitution of his order and some other tracts.—Mur.

¹² Of all these [scholastic doctors] there is an account given in the Hist. de l'Eglise Gallienne, tome xiv. p. 11, 12, &c. [Gregory de Rimini was an Italian, born at Rimini, an Augustinian eremite, a Parisian doctor of theology, general of his order A.D. 1357, and died the year after at Vienna. He wrote on the first two books of the Sentences, commentaries on the epistles of Paul and on the epistle of James, a tract on usury, and some others.—Mur.

and integrity though they were not free from all errors.¹ Of Raymund Lully we have already spoken². Nicolaus Lyranus obtained great reputation by his concise exposition of the whole Bible.³ Raynerius Pisanus is known for his Summa Theologie.⁴

¹ John Tauler was a German Dominican monk, and a popular preacher at Cologne and Strasburg. He died at the latter place A.D. 1360. Luther and Melancthon frequently quoted his writings, particularly his sermons. He left in German Postills or sermons for all the Sundays and festivals of the year (highly commended by Luther), Imitation of Christ in his Poverty, Marrow of the Soul or Perfection in all the Virtues, Spiritual Contemplations on the Life and Sufferings of Christ, the Noble Little Book or the Way to become in earnest, hearty, spiritual, and devout (the preceding were published, Francf. 1601 and 1703, 4to); also, the Soul-enlightening Mirror, with plates, 1713, 8vo. The other works ascribed to him are letters, hymns, prayers, dialogues and other tracts, several of which are not his.—John Ruysbroeck was born at Ruysbroeck in Brabant, A.D. 1293, was presbyter of the great church at Brussels, became a regular canon of St. Augustine, and established and presided over the convent of Grinthal two miles from Brussels, A.D. 1360, and died A.D. 1381, aged 88. He was at the head of the mystics and was called the Second Dionysius Areopagita. His writings were all in Dutch, but Surinus translated most of them into Latin, in which form they were published, Cologne, 1552, fol. 1669, 4to, and 1692, fol. These are a Summary of the Spiritual Life, the Mirror of Salvation, Remarks on the Tabernacle of Moses and its Furniture, on the Principal Virtues, on Faith and the Judgment, on the Four Temptations, on the Seven Guards of the Spiritual School, on the Seven Degrees of Love, on Spiritual Nuptials, the Perfections of the Sons of God, the Kingdom of the Friends of God, on True Contemplation, Twelve Useful Epistles, two Spiritual Cantions, Samuel or Deep Contemplation, a Short Prayer. Several of the Protestants have commended his writings for their pious spirit. John Gerson accused him of heresy after his death, but Surinus defends him. He was severe upon the vicious monks and clergy. See the Unparthische Kirchengeschichte, Jena, 1735, vol. i. p. 1329, 1331.—Mur.

² See p. 490, above.—Mur.

³ Nicolaus Lyranus or de Lyra, was born at Lire in Normandy, and as some say of Jewish parentage. He became a Franciscan monk about A.D. 1292, was master in theology at Paris, A.D. 1320, expounded the Scriptures there in the Franciscan convent, and died A.D. 1340. His great work is, Postille Perpetue sive Brevia Commentaria in universa Biblia, which he commenced A.D. 1293, and completed A.D. 1330. After several incorrect editions in six vols. fol. it was published at Lyons, 1590, Douay, 1617, and Antwerp, 1634, in the Biblia Glossata, and Paris, 1660, in the Biblia Maxima. His other works are, Postille Minores sive Enarrationes in Epistolas, et Lectiones Dominicalem totius Anni, Venice, 1588, 8vo; Tractatus de Ideam Ministrante et Sacripiente S. Altaris Sacramentum, Disputatio contra Perfidium Judeorum, Tractatus contra Judeorum quendam, and Contemplatio de Vita et Gestis S. Francisci. His exposition of the Scriptures far exceeded all others of that age, and contributed so much to advance the knowledge of the Bible that some have attributed the Reformation in no small degree to it; it was said,—

Si Lyra non lyrasset, Lutherus non saltasset;

i.e. Lyra's lyre awakened Luther's dance.—Mur. [His title was Doctor Planus et Utilis. For further information respecting him and his works see Fabricius, Biblia. Lat. Med. Aet., vol. v. p. 348, &c.; Wettius, Biblia. Hebr. vol. i. Num. 1697, p. 912, &c. and vol. iii. p. 834, &c.—R.

⁴ Rayner was a native of Pisa, a Dominican monk, and an eminent theologian and jurist. He lived in the former part of this century, but the precise time is not ascertained. His Panthologia or Summa Universae Theologie, alphabetically arranged, has been repeatedly printed, though greatly interpolated and altered.—Mur.

and Astesanus for his Summa Casuum Conscientie.⁵

⁵ Astesanus or Astensis, a Franciscan monk, born at Asti in the north of Italy, who died about A.D. 1330. His eight books entitled Summa de Casibus Conscientie, were printed at Venice, 1519, fol.

Besides those already mentioned, the following Latin writers lived in this century, according to Henry Wharton's continuation of Cave's Historia Literaria—

Andrew, an English Dominican monk of Newcastle, and doctor of theology, A.D. 1301. He wrote a Commentary on the first book of the Sentences, Paris, 1514, fol. and a Commentary on Boethius, De Consolatione Philosophiae.

William of Nangis, a French Benedictine monk of St. Denys, Paris, who flourished A.D. 1301. He wrote a Chronology from the Creation to A.D. 1301, which others continued to A.D. 1368 (Y'Achery's Splidegium, tom. xi. p. 405); Chronicle of the Kings of France to A.D. 1301 (in Pithæus's Scriptores Francici), and History of St. Lewis, King of France, and of his sons, Philip and Robert, also in Pithæus, ubi supra.

William Mandagot, a French cardinal whom Boniface VIII. employed to compile the Liber Sententiarum Decretalium. He also wrote a tract on the election of new prelates, printed, Cologne, 1573, 8vo.

Henry Stero, a German Benedictine monk, who wrote about A.D. 1301 Annals of Germany, from A.D. 1152 to 1273 (in the Scriptores Germanici, and in Canisius's Lectioes Antiq. tom. i.), also History of Rudolph of Hapsburg, Adolphus of Nassau, and Albert of Austria, from A.D. 1266 to 1300 (extant in Freher's Scriptores Germanici.)

Dioms Mugellanus, an Italian jurist and professor at Bologna, A.D. 1301. He wrote several comments and tracts on different portions and subjects of the canon law.

Jacobus de Benedictis, an Italian Franciscan, A.D. 1301, renowned for courting contempt and abuse as the means of sanctification. He composed many uncouth religious poems in Italian, published, Venice, 1617, 4to.

John of Fribourg in the Brisgau, a Dominican and bishop of Osnaburg in Hungary, distinguished A.D. 1302 for his eloquence in preaching. He wrote Summa Prædicatorum (Rostling, 1187), and Summa Major seu Confessoriorum (Lyons, 1518), and some other things.

Ptolemy of Lucca, disciple of Thomas Aquinas, a Dominican, confessor to the pope, and A.D. 1318 bishop of Torcello in the Venetian territory. He wrote Annals, Civil and Ecclesiastical, from A.D. 1060 to 1302, and a Chronicle of the Popes and Emperors (both printed, Lyons, 1619, and the Annals in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xxv.) His Hist. Eccles. was never published.

Eberardus, a German Benedictine monk and archdeacon of Ratisbon. He wrote about A.D. 1305 Annals of the Dukes of Austria, Bavaria, and Swabia from A.D. 1273 to 1305, extant in Canisius, Lect. Antiq. tom. i.

Clement V. pope A.D. 1305—1314, author of the Clementine or Liber Septimus Decretalium, and of numerous epistles and bulls.

Thomas Joyce or Jorsius, D.D. a Dominican monk of London, who taught theology at Paris and London, was provincial of his order, confessor to the king, became a cardinal in 1305, was sent legate to the emperor of Germany in 1311, and died on the way to Lyons. He wrote Commentaries on Genesis, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Daniel, the Books of Maccabees, Lamentations, the canonical Epistles, the Apocalypse, and on Boethius, and on Aristotle's Logic, all of which are printed as the works of Thomas Aquinas. His work on twenty-seven Psalms and Explanations of Ovid's Metamorphoses have been published. Many others are in manuscript.

William of Paris, a Dominican monk, created general censor of the faith in France by the pope A.D. 1305, and commissioner to try the cause of the Templars, A.D. 1308. He was probably the author of the Dialogues on the Eight Sacraments published as the work of William of Auvergne, Paris, 1587.

Phillip of Elchstadt, D.D. a native of Alsace, abbot of a Cistercian monastery at Paris, sent to Rome by the emperor of Austria A.D. 1305, and then made bishop of Elchstadt where he died A.D. 1322. At the request of Anna, queen of Hungary, he wrote the life of St. Walpurgis, in Canisius, Lect. Antiq. tom. iv.

Siffrid, a presbyter of Meissen in Saxony, A.D. 1307. He wrote a Chronicle from the creation to A.D. 1307, a large part of which is in Pistorius, Script. Germ.

Nicolaus Trivet, an English Dominican monk, born in Norfolk, studied at London, Oxford, and Paris, and was a prior of his order in London where he died A.D. 1326, nearly 70 years old. He wrote Annals of England from A.D. 1135 to 1307 (in D'Achery's Spicilegium, tom. viii.), and commentaries on Augustine's Civitas Dei, published, Toulouse, 1489, and Venice, 1489.

Malachy, an Irish Franciscan monk and theologian of Oxford, A.D. 1310, and chaplain to the king. He wrote De Veneno Peccatorum Mortalium deque Remediis ipsorum, published, Paris, 1518.

William Durant, nephew to Durandus Speculator, bishop of Mende in France, by whom he was educated. He was distinguished as a theologian and jurist, and was made canon, archdeacon, and A.D. 1296 bishop of Mende. In the year 1311 he wrote his famous tract De Mudo celebrandi Generalis Concilii, ed. Paris, 1635, 4to, and 1671, 8vo. He expelled the Jews from his diocese in 1312 and died in 1338.

Marinus Sanutus or Sanudo, surnamed Tursellus, a Venetian patrician. He first constructed a church organ called in Italian Torsella, whence his surname. He was a great traveller, and visited Cyprus, Armenia, Alexandria, Rhodes, Palestine, and was at various European courts. He wrote between A.D. 1306 and 1322 Secreta Fidei Crucis super Terra Sancta Recuperatione et Conservazione, in three parts; in the first he proposes means for subduing the Saracens, in the second, the manner in which the Christian crusaders should conduct the enterprise, and in the third, the way to preserve Palestine when conquered, and also gives the history and geography of that country. This work, with twenty-two epistles of Marinus, nearly fills the second volume of Bongarsius, Gesta Dei per Francos, Hanov. 1611, fol.

Alexander de St. Elpidio, D.D. an Italian and Augustinian monk, general of his order from 1312 to 1325, when he was made archbishop of Ravenna. He wrote by order of the pope a tract De Jurisdictione Imperii et Auctoritate Summi Pontificis, published, Rimini, 1624.

Vitalis a Furno, a Frenchman, a Franciscan, cardinal A.D. 1312, died at Avignon, A.D. 1327. He opposed the Spirituals, and wrote mystical expositions of the Proverbs, the Gospels, the Apocalypse, and various portions of the whole Bible.

Hugo Pratenis or de Prato Florido, born near Florence, a Dominican and a celebrated preacher. He died A.D. 1322, and left sermons for the Sundays and others for the holy days through the year, also a Lent sermon.

Porcetus Salvaticus, a Carthusian monk of noble Italian birth, supposed to have lived about A.D. 1315. He wrote a confutation of the Jews, borrowing much from Raymond Martini's Pugio Fidei, Paris, 1520, fol.

Ubertinus de Cassalis, an Italian Franciscan, leader of the Spirituals from A.D. 1312 to 1317, then became a Benedictine in Brabant, and at last it is said a Carthusian. In the year 1321 he gave to the pope his famous Veroratio circa Questionem de Paupertate Christi et Apostolorum, namely, that to say Christ possessed any property in the common and worldly manner was heretical; but not so, to say he held possessions in the usual spiritual manner. It is extant in Wadding's Annals Minor, tom. iii. ad ann. 1321, and still better in Baluze, Miscellanea, tom. i. p. 292, 307.

John of Naples, a Dominican divine, doctor of theology at Paris, and a zealous follower of Thomas Aquinas, A.D. 1315. His Questiones varie Philosophice et Theologicæ, were printed at Naples, 1618, fol.

John XXII. pope A.D. 1316 to 1334, has left us more than 400 epistles and bulls, besides his Extravagantes, which are in the Corpus Juris Canonici.

Albert of Padua, an Augustinian hermit, teacher of theology, and preacher at Paris, where he died A.D. 1328. He has left many printed sermons, and extensive MS. commentaries on the Scriptures.

James of Lausanne, a French Dominican monk, theologian of Paris, A.D. 1317, provincial of his order for France, and bishop of Lausanne, a voluminous and diffuse writer. His twelve books of Morals and various sermons have been printed. His commentaries on the Scriptures remain in manuscript.

Bertrand de Turre, a French Franciscan monk, archbishop of Salerno 1319, a cardinal 1320, general of his order by papal appointment in 1323, died 1324. Several of his sermons were printed, but others, as well as his commentaries on the Sentences of Lombard, slumber in manuscript.

Thomas Morus or de la Moor, an English knight of the household of king Edward II. under whom he served in his Scotch wars. He flourished about A.D. 1320, and wrote a history of the reign of Edward II. from A.D. 1307 to 1326. He composed it in French and had it translated into Latin by Walter Baker. It is printed among the Scriptores Anglici, Lond. 1674, fol.

Albertinus Mussatus, an Italian historian and poet of Padua, who died A.D. 1320. He wrote De Gestis Henrici VII. Germanorum Imperatoris, and several poems, printed at Venice, 1635, fol.

John Bassolis, a Scotch Franciscan and disciple of Duns Scotus. He lectured on the Sentences at Rheims A.D. 1313, and at Mechlin A.D. 1322. His commentaries or lectures on the four books of Sentences and some miscellaneous pieces were printed, Paris, 1517, fol.

Bernard Guido, a French Dominican monk, born near Limoges, 1261, became a monk 1280, was successively prior of Albi 1294, of Carcassone 1297, of Castres 1299, and of Limoges 1303, was appointed inquisitor against the Albigenses 1305, represented his order at the papal court 1312, was papal legate to Italy 1316, bishop of Tui 1323, and of Lodève 1324, and died 1331. He wrote a concise history of the establishment of the Grandmontensians and some others (in Labbe's Biblioth. Nov. Manus. tom. ii.); Gesta Conitum Tholosanorum (Toulouse, 1623, fol.) Lives of various saints, lives of popes, &c. never printed.

Peter Bertrand, a distinguished French jurist, counsellor, bishop, and cardinal, who died A.D. 1349. He composed a tract, De Jurisdictione Ecclesiastica (defending the rights of the Gallic church against Peter de Cunctis, ed. Paris, 1495, 4to), and another, De Origine et Usu Jurisdictionum. Both are in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xvi.

Peter of Duisberg, a priest and a Teutonic knight. He composed, A.D. 1326, his Chronicon Prussie, or history of the Teutonic order from its foundation A.D. 1190 to 1326, continued by another hand to A.D. 1435, edited with notes and dissertations by Hartknoch, Jona, 1679, 4to.

Gerhard Odonis, a French Franciscan, general of his order in 1329, died in 1349. He wrote commentaries on Aristotle's Ethics, and the Officium de Stigmatibus S. Francis, still used by that fraternity.

John Canon or Canonius, an English Franciscan theologian, who studied at Oxford and Paris under Scotus, and lectured at Oxford till his death. He flourished A.D. 1293, and wrote commentaries on the Sentences, Lectura Magistralis, Questiones Disputate, and on Aristotle's eight books of physics, all printed at Venice, 1492 and 1510.

Petrus Paludanus, a French Dominican theologian and preacher, became a licentiate at Paris 1314, was made titular patriarch of Jerusalem about A.D. 1330, and died in 1342. He wrote commentaries on the four books of Sentences, of which those on the third and fourth books were printed at Paris, 1530, 2 vols. folio; also sermons, a treatise on ecclesiastical power, and another on the right of the Franciscans to hold property, besides several works never published.

Guido de Perpiniano, D.D. a Spanish Carmelite, studied at Paris, became general of his order 1318, bishop of Majorca 1321 and afterwards of Perpignan. He wrote Summa de Hierarchibus Omnibus et eorum Confutationibus (ed. Paris, 1528, fol. and Cologne, 1631), a Harmony and Commentary on the four Gospels (ed. Cologne, 1631), besides a Commentary on the Decretum of Gratian, yet in manuscript.

Adamus Goddardus or Waddham, D.D. an English Franciscan of Norwich, professor at Oxford, died 1358. His commentary on the sentences was published, Paris, 1512.

Walter Hemmingford, an English regular Augustinian canon of Gilsbun near Clives in Yorkshire, where he died A.D. 1358. He wrote History of the reigns of the Kings of England from A.D. 1066 to 1313, among the Historia Anglica Scriptores Quinque, Oxon. 1687, folio.

Ludolphus Saxo, of Saxon origin, a Dominican and then a Carthusian, a pious man and good writer, flourished A.D. 1240. His life of Christ has been often printed, e.g. Paris, 1589, and also his Commentary on the Psalms of David, in which he follows the spiritual sense; ed. Lyons. 1540.

Monaldus, a Dalmatian of Justinianople, a Franciscan and archbishop of Benevento, died about A.D. 1332. His Summa Casuum Conscientie, called Aurea and Monaldina, was published, Lyons, 1516, 8vo.

Bartholomew of St. Concordia, a Dominican monk of Pisa, died 1347. His Summa Casuum Conscientie (written in 1318), and his Summe Quadragesimales, were both printed Lyons, 1519, 8vo.

Thos. Walleis, a Welchman, Dominican, and theologian of Oxford, often confounded with Thos. Jorsius, an Englishman and cardinal who died in 1311. He maintained before the papal court at Avignon A.D. 1332, that deceased saints are admitted to the immediate vision of God, and accused John XXII. of heresy on this subject. His Articuli Hæreticales and Libellus De Theoria Predicantiæ, have been published.

Richard Buriensis, born at St. Edmund-bury, Suffolk, educated at Oxford, tutor to Edward III. bishop of Durham A.D. 1333, chancellor of England 1334, lord treasurer 1336, died 1345, aged 59. He founded a library at Oxford, and wrote A.D. 1344, Philobiblion, seu Liber de Amore Librorum et Bibliothecarum Institutione, frequently printed, e.g. Oxon, 1599, 4to.

Benedict XII. pope A.D. 1334–1342, has left us many epistles and bulls.

Simon Fidatus de Cassia, an Italian Augustinian monk, abbot at Florence A.D. 1335, till his death in 1348. Distinguished for sanctity, and as a preacher, he wrote Enarrationes Evangelicæ Veritatis seu de Gestis Domini Salvatoris, ed. Cologne, 1540, fol. a tract De B. Virgine, another De Speculo Crucis, and several epistles.

Gulielmus de Baldensel, a knight of Jerusalem, composed A.D. 1337 his Hodegemonon, or Journal of his travels in the Holy Land, published by Canisius, Lectio. Antiq. tom. v. par. ii. p. 96.

Arnaldus Cesconius, archbishop of Tarragona, A.D. 1337, wrote Epistole Duæ de Sarracenis ab Hispania pellendis, extant in Baluze, Miscell. tom. ii.

Richard Hampolus, D.D. an Augustinian hermit of Yorkshire, who died A.D. 1349. He wrote a tract on Repentance, and brief expositions of the Psalter, the canticles of the Old Testament included in the public offices, on the 20th Psalm, on the Lord's prayer, the Apostles' and the Athanasian creeds, some parts of Solomon's Songs, the Lamentations, some chapters of Job, &c. which are in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xxvi.

Robert Holkat of Northampton, a Dominican, and professor of theology at Oxford, died A.D. 1359. He wrote a commentary on the Sentences (ed. Lyons, 1497, fol. 1510, 4to), Moralitates pulchre Historiarum (ed. Paris, 1510, 8vo), 213 Lectures on the Book of the Wisdom of Solomon (ed. Venice, 1509, 1586, fol.) Lectures on the Canticles and Seven Chapters of Ecclesiastes (ed. Venice, 1509), Commentaries on the Book of Proverbs (ed. Paris, 1515), a tract on the Immutability of Sin, and Conferences on the Sentences, &c. (ed. Lyons, 1479, fol. 1518). Several other of his works are still in manuscript.

Philip de Monte Calerio, a Franciscan, first at Toulouse and then at Padua; flourished A.D. 1340. His Conciones Dominicale totius anni (abridged), and Quadragesimale, Conciones de Eucharistia, and Sermones de Sanctis, were published, Lyons, 1515.

Henry de Urfmaria or De Trimarina, a German Augustinian hermit, and doctor of theology at Paris, flourished A.D. 1340, and was distinguished for his piety and his liberality. He wrote additions to the Books of Sentences, on a Fourfold Instinct, and several sermons, published, Cologne, 1513, Paris, 1514.

Lupoldus Babenbergius, a noble German, a jurist, professor of civil and canon law, and bishop of Bamberg A.D. 1340. His tracts, De Zelo Petrum Regum Gallicæ et Germaniæ Principum, and De Juribus Regni et Imperii, were published, Paris, 1540, Cologne, 1564, 8vo, &c. often.

Alvarus Pelagius or Pelagius Alvarus, a Spanish Franciscan, who studied at Bologna, Pisa, and Paris A.D. 1304, was papal penitentiary in 1332, and afterwards a bishop in Portugal. He wrote De Placitis Ecclesiæ, (ed. Venice, 1560), Summa Theologia, (ed. Una, 1474), and other works never printed.

Bartholomew of Urbino, an Italian Augustinian hermit, and bishop of Urbino, died A.D. 1350. He collected flowers of Augustine and of Ambrose, which he published, each under the title of Milkloquium. Both were printed at Lyons, the former in 1555 and the latter in 1556.

John Honsenius, a canon, and teacher at Liege, A.D. 1348. He continued Egidius' History of the bishops of Liege, from A.D. 1247 to 1348.

John Becan, a canon of the church of Utrecht, A.D. 1350. He wrote a chronicle of the church and bishops of Utrecht, and of the counts of Holland, from St. Willibrord to A.D. 1348, which was continued by William Hedam, dean of Hilaricum, to A.D. 1524, both printed, Utrecht, 1643, fol.

Albericus de Rosate, an Italian doctor of canon law, A.D. 1350. He wrote Dictionarium Juris Civilis et Canonici, ed. Venice, 1573, 1601, commentaries on the Liber sextus Decretalium, De Testibus, and other tracts.

Roger of Conway or Connovius, D.D. an English Franciscan, educated at Oxford, and provincial of his order for England. In the dispute between the mendicants and the regular clergy, respecting the right to hear confessions A.D. 1350, Roger appeared in behalf of his order in a work, De Confessionibus per Regulares audiendis, published by Goldast, Monarch. tom. ii.

Petrus de Columbario, cardinal bishop of Ostia, sent by the pope to anoint and crown the emperor Charles IV. at Rome; of which mission he wrote the history, entitled Historia Itineris Romani, in Labbé's Biblioth. Nov. Mann. tom. i. p. 354.

Nicolaus Eymericus, a Spanish Dominican, Inquisitor general for Aragon, 1356, chaplain and supreme judge at Avignon in 1371, died in 1399. His Directorium Inquisitorum, with the notes of Francis Pegna, was published, Venice, 1595, fol. Rome, 1578 and 1587.

Ranulph Higden or Ilkeden, or of Chester, an English Benedictine monk of Chester, who died A.D. 1363, having been a monk 64 years. He compiled a universal history from the creation to A.D. 1357, entitled Polychronicon. This history John de Trevisa translated into English, A.D. 1387, and that translation, with some amendment of the style, was printed by William Caxton, Lond. 1492, fol.

Aphonsus Vargas, a Spanish Augustinian hermit, a doctor of Paris, bishop of Badajoz and archbishop of Seville, where he died A.D. 1359. His commentary on the first book of the Sentences was printed, Venice, 1490, and his Questiones in Aristotelis libros tres de Anima, Venice, 1566.

Thomas Stubbs or Stobrus, D.D. an English Dominican monk of York, who flourished A.D. 1360, and died after 1373. He wrote the lives or a chronicle of the archbishops of York, from St. Paulinus, the first archbishop, to the year 1373, published among the Scriptores Decem Angliæ, Lond. 1652, fol.

John Calderinus, a famous canonist of Bologna, A.D. 1360, who wrote several works on canon law, published in the 16th century.

Peter Berchorius, a Benedictine monk, born at Pöfchers, and abbot at Paris, where he died A.D. 1362. He wrote Dictionarium seu Repertorium morale Biblicum, (containing numerous biblical words and phrases, alphabetically arranged and explained, for the use of practical religion), Recltorium Morale Utriusque Testamenti, (containing tropological and allegorical expositions of nearly the whole bible); and Inductorium Morale. The three works have been frequently printed, e.g. Cologne, 1620, 3 vols. fol.

Bartholomew de Glanvilla, an English Franciscan, who studied at Oxford, Paris, and Rome, flourished A.D. 1360, and wrote Opus de Proprietatibus Rerum seu Allegoriarum ac Tropologiarum in Utriusque Testamentum (on the figurative language of the bible), published with some other pieces frequently, e.g. Paris, 1574, 4to.

Nicolaus Oresmius or Orem, the coryphæus of the Parisian doctors in his time, tutor to the dauphin, rector of the gymnasium of Navarre, dean of Rouen in 1361, and bishop of Lisieux in 1377. He died about A.D. 1384. In the year 1363 he preached a sermon before the pope and cardinals, in which he boldly attacked their vices (ed. by Flaccus Illyricus, Catalogus Testium Veritatis, p. 612). He wrote De Mutatione Monete, de Sphæra, and translated the Scriptures into French, and also Aristotle's Ethics, some works of Cicero, and some of Petrarch.

Hainricus, a German monk of Rebdorf about A.D. 1362, wrote Annals of Germany from A.D. 1295 to 1363, published by Freber, Histor. German. Francf. 1600, tom. i.

Saint Brigitta, a Swedish lady who had visions from her childhood. She persuaded her husband to become a monk, while she became a nun in Spain and established the new order of St. Saviour. She had many visions and revelations. These led her to Rome, to Palestine, Sicily, &c. She died A.D. 1373, and was canonized A.D. 1391. She wrote Revelaciones, a Rule for her order, dictated by Christ himself, several discourses and orations, besides additional revelations, all printed frequently, e.g. Cologne, 1628, 2 vols. fol.

St. Catharina, an Italian lady, who early became a Dominican nun, was famed for her visions and revelations, by which she guided even popes and cardinals whom she addressed with freedom. She died A.D. 1380, aged 33, and was canonized A.D. 1461. She wrote Dialogues on Providence (ed. Venice, 1611, 8vo), 364 epistles (printed in Italian, Venice, 1506, fol. and in French, Paris, 1644, 4to), several orations, translated into Latin, published, Ingolst. 1583, and Divina Doctrina Datus per Personam Aeterni Patris Intellectui Loquentis, translated into Latin by Raymond de Vineis, and published, Cologne, 1553, fol.

Philip Ribotus, a Spanish Carmelite monk, who flourished A.D. 1368, was provincial of his order for Catalonia, and died A.D. 1391. He wrote Speculum Carmelitarum, in which he describes the establishment, progress, privileges, and history of his order, printed Antw. 1680, fol. He also wrote sermons and epistles.

Philip de Ledits, a Dutch jurist, counsellor to the count of Holland, vicar to the bishop of Utrecht, died 1386, wrote Tractatus de Reipublice cura et sorte Principum, printed, Leyden, 1516, fol.

Gerhard Magnus or Groot in his native language, born at Davenport, studied theology at Paris, was a canon of Utrecht and Aix-la-Chapelle, became a regular canon, and established several houses of that order. He died A.D. 1370, aged 41. His three tracts, Protestatio de Fœderica Predicatione, Conclusio et promissa, and De Studio Sacrorum Librorum, are usually published with the works of Thomas à Kempis.

Philothæus Achillanus, a fictitious name assumed by some pious counsellor of Charles V. king of France, A.D. 1370, who wrote against the ambition and tyranny of the pope a work entitled, Somnium Viridæ or De Potestate Regis et Sacerdotis, in form of a dialogue between a clergyman and a soldier, printed in Goldast's Monarchia, tom. i. p. 54.

Gallus, a German Cistercian, abbot of a monastery near Prague, A.D. 1370. He wrote a prolux work for the edification of his monks, entitled Malagranatum, printed 1481, 4to, and 1487, fol.

Bartholomew Albizi or Albicus, a native of Pisa, and a Franciscan monk, who flourished A.D. 1372, and died very aged, A.D. 1401. His book, entitled The Conformities of St. Francis with the Life of our Lord Jesus Christ, was presented to the general convention of the Franciscans at Assisi, A.D. 1399, and approved by a unanimous vote; and the author was rewarded with the entire wardrobe of St. Francis. The work was printed at Bologna, 1590, fol. He also wrote The Conformities of the Blessed Virgin with our Lord Jesus Christ, on her life and praises, printed, Venice, 1596, f. 1. Likewise Sermones Quadragesimales, Milan, 1488, 4to. Bonaventura Badarius, an Italian of Padua, who studied at Paris, became an Augustinian eremite, general of his order in 1377, a cardinal in 1378, was often a papal legate, and was murdered at Rome A.D. 1386, or somewhat later. He wrote Speculum Beate Mariæ, printed, Augsburg, 1476, 4 vols.; also commentaries on the four books of Sentences, Meditations on the life of Christ, &c.

Matthew called Florilegus, a Benedictine monk of Westminster, A.D. 1377, who wrote Historiarum Flores, or Annals from the Creation to A.D. 1307, taken from Matthew Paris, printed, Lond. 1567, fol.

Albertus de Argentina or of Strasburg, where he was a doctor of divinity and perhaps a presbyter, and the bishop's legate to the pope. He wrote a Chronicle from A.D. 1270 to 1378, published (imperfect at Basil) entire by Ursinus, among the Scriptores Germanici, Francf. 1585 and 1670, tom. ii. p. 97; also the Life of Berthold, Bishop of Strasburg, from A.D. 1318 to 1353, printed with his Chronicle.

William Thorn, an English Benedictine monk of Canterbury, A.D. 1380. He wrote a Chronicle of the abbots of Canterbury from St. Augustine to A.D. 1397, printed with the Scriptores Decem Historie Anglicane, Lond. 1652, fol.

Michael Ancranus, a Carmelite of Bologna, who studied at Paris, was general of his order from A.D. 1381 to 1386, and died at Bologna A.D. 1416. He wrote a tolerable commentary on the Psalms, often printed, e.g. Lyons, 1673, also Commentaries on the Sentences, and some other works.

Raymund Jordan, a regular Augustinian canon in the diocese of Bourges, who concealed himself under the name of Idiotus. He flourished A.D. 1381, and wrote seven books of contemplations (devotional), and several ascetic tracts, published, Paris, 1654, 4to.

John Tambacus, a German Dominican monk and abbot of Strasburg, and then rector of the school at Prague, master of the palace to the pope A.D. 1386, died at the age of 80, the year unknown. He wrote Speculum Patientie, or De Consolatione Theologie, printed Paris, 1493, &c. often.

Marsilius ab Ingen, doctor at Paris, a canon at Cologne, and founder and first rector of the gymnasium of Heidelberg, flourished A.D. 1384, and died in 1394. He wrote commentaries on the Sentences, printed at Strasburg, A.D. 1501.

John de Burgo, D.D. chancellor of the university of Cambridge, flourished A.D. 1343. He wrote Pandita Oculi, a book of instructions for clergywomen in their functions; printed, Paris, 1510, and elsewhere repeatedly.

Peter Herentalius or De Herentallis, a canon and prior of a Premonstratensian convent in Brabant, flourished A.D. 1390. He compiled a Catena on the Psalms, printed, Rouen, 1504, 4to, and elsewhere repeatedly, also a prolux commentary on the four gospels, never printed.

Radulphus de Rivo, of Breda in Brabant, dean of Tanguis, flourished A.D. 1390, and died at Rome A.D. 1401. He wrote De Canonum Obseruantia (in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xxvi.) and Historia de Rebus Gestis Trium Pontificum Leodiensium (from A.D. 1317 to 1386), in Chapeville's Rerum Leodiensium Historia, Liege, 1616, 4to, tom. iii.

Gerhard of Zutphen, a regular clerk of St. Jerome, and distinguished for his piety, died A.D. 1398, aged 31, leaving two ascetic tracts, De Reformatione Interiori, and De Spiritualem Ascensionibus, in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xxvi.

William Wolford or Wilford, an English Franciscan, appointed by the council of London, A.D. 1396, to answer Wickliffe's Trilogus, which he did in his Libry ad Thomam Archiep. Cantuariensem adversus Articulus xviii. ex Wickliffe Trilogio excerptos; extant in the Fasciculus Rerum Expetend. Cologne, 1535, fol. p. 96. Several other tracts of his exist in manuscript.

John Bromyard of Hertfordshire, an English Dominican, theologian, and jurist, a doctor at Oxford, and professor of theology at Cambridge. He strenuously opposed Wickliffe in the council of London A.D. 1342, flourished A.D. 1390, and died about A.D. 1419. His Sermones Prædicatorum treatise of nearly every subject in ecclesiastical discipline in alphabetic order, printed, Venice, 1546, 4to. Several other works of his exist in manuscript.

Henry Knighton, an English canon regular of Leicester, who flourished A.D. 1395. His Chronicon de Rebus Anglie, from A.D. 986 to 1395 (the second, third, and fourth books, from A.D. 1066 to 1377, are copied from Higden's Polychronicon), and his History of the Deposition of King Henry II. A.D. 1399, are extant among the Scriptores Decem Historie Anglicane, Lond. 1652.

Antonius de Butrio, a famous Italian jurist of Bologna and Ferrara, who flourished A.D. 1398, and died at Bologna A.D. 1408. He wrote commentaries on the five books of the Decretals (ed. Venice, 1578, vii. vol. fol.) and several other works on canon and civil law.

Nicolas de Gorham of Hertfordshire, studied at Merton College, Oxford, became a Dominican, went to Paris, was eminent for both learning and piety, and was provincial of his order for France. He probably lived about A.D. 1400. He wrote commentaries on all the books of the New Testament, and sermons for the whole year, all printed by John Kerberg, Antw. 1617, 1620, in two vols. fol.

Jacobus Magni, a Spanish Augustinian eremite of Toledo, distinguished for his knowledge of the scriptures and of the ancient theologians, confessor to Charles VII. king of France; he refused the archbishopric of Bourdeaux. He flourished about A.D. 1400. His Sophologium seu Opus de Sermones et Inquisitione Divine Sapientie was printed, Lyons, 1498, 8vo.

CHAPTER III.

HISTORY OF RELIGION AND THEOLOGY.

1. ALL who acquaint themselves with the history of these times must acknowledge the corrupt state of religion, both as theoretically taught in the schools and as practically inculcated on the people. Almost no part of the Christian doctrine retained its native form and comeliness. And hence the Waldenses and all those who desired a reformation in religion and who separated from the Roman pontiff, though nowhere safe from the fury of the Inquisitors and the monks, yet could not by any means be suppressed. Many of these people, after witnessing the destruction of an immense number of their brethren at the stake and by other forms of execution, fled from Italy, France, and Germany, into Bohemia and the neighbouring countries, and afterwards became amalgamated with the Hussites and other dissentients from the Romish community.

2. At the head of the expositors of the Bible stands Nicolaus De Lyra, who explained the books of both the Old Testament and the New far better than was usual in that age; yet he succeeded better on the Old Testament than on the New, because he was familiar with Hebrew but not with Greek.¹ The others who undertook this office were servile imitators of their predecessors. For they either collected flowers from the ancient doctors, or neglecting the literal import of the Scriptures drew from them by forced interpretations occult spiritual meanings. Those who desire to become acquainted with this exegetical art may consult the Moral Mirror of the whole Scriptures by Vitalis a Furno, or the Psalter spiritualized by Ludolphus Saxo. The philosophic divines who commented on the Scriptures often proposed and scientifically resolved questions of the most profound erudition, according to the views of that age.

¹ Franciscus Ximenes of Catalonia, bishop of Perpignan, and titular patriarch of Jerusalem, A.D. 1400. He wrote several works of mystic divinity which have been published.

Franciscus Zabarella, an Italian of Padua, LL.D. a man of great respectability. He rejected two bishoprics and one rich abbacy, but was made cardinal A.D. 1411, presided through the council of Constance, and died at its close, A.D. 1417. He wrote comments on the Decretals, and several other works on canon law, and a tract De Schismatibus Authoritate Imperatoris Tollendis, which the Index Expurgatorius prohibits being read till it is expurgated.—Mur.

² Simon, Hist. des Principaux Commentateurs du N.T. p. 477; and Critique de la Biblioth. Ecclési. de M. du Pin, tome i. p. 352; Wadding's Annales Minor. tom. v. p. 264, &c. [For his character as a biblical expositor see Conybeare's Bampton Lectures for 1834, p. 210, &c.; and Davidson's Hermeneutics, p. 175, &c.—R.]

3. In explaining and inculcating the doctrines of religion, most of the Greeks and Latins followed the principles of the Peripatetic philosophy. And the Greeks, by their intercourse with the Latins, seem to have acquired some knowledge of the modes of teaching adopted in the schools of the Latins. The Greeks at the present day read in their own language³ Thomas Aquinas and other distinguished scholastics, whom Demetrius Cydonius and others of this century had translated from Latin into Greek. The Latins who adopted this mode of theologizing were immensely numerous; the most distinguished of them for acumen were John Scotus, Durand of St. Porcain, William Occam, and a few others. Here and there an individual also applied the light of Scripture and of tradition to the explanation of divine truth, but these were overpowered and nearly silenced by the immense throng of the dialecticians.

4. Yet there were not wanting pious and good men not only among the mystics but others likewise, who censured this bold manner of philosophizing on religious subjects, and who endeavoured to draw the attention of students in theology to the Holy Scriptures, and to the writings of the ancient fathers. Hence there were fierce disputes everywhere, but especially in the more distinguished universities, as those of Paris and Oxford, between the biblical theologians and the philosophical. The biblical party, though greatly inferior in numbers, sometimes gained the victory. For the philosophical divines, the most eminent of whom were mendicant monks, Dominicans, and Franciscans, by philosophizing indiscreetly not unfrequently so distorted and misrepresented the principal doctrines of revealed religion, as to subvert them and to advance opinions manifestly impious and absurd. The consequence was that some had to abjure their errors, others sought their safety by flight, the books of some were publicly burned, and others were thrown into prison.³ But as soon as the storm subsided, most of them now rendered more cautious returned to their former views, and oppressed their adversaries by various arts, depriving them of their influence, their profits, and their number of pupils.

³ Simon, Créance de l'Eglise Orientale sur la Transsubstantiation, p. 166.

⁴ See Buleaux, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. iv. in many passages. In the year 1340 various opinions of the scholastic tribe respecting the Trinity and other subjects were condemned: p. 266, A.D. 1347, Jo. de Mercuria and Nic. de Ultricia had to abjure their opinions, p. 298, 308; A.D. 1348, one Simon was convicted of very great errors, p. 322; A.D. 1354, Guido, an Augustinian, shared the same fate, p. 329; and likewise A.D. 1362, one Lewis, p. 374, and Jo. de Calore, p. 377; and A.D. 1366, Dionys. Soulechat, p. 38. The same scenes took place at Oxford. [The student would do well to read, though with caution, the third of Hampden's Bampton Lectures on the influence of scholasticism in the treatment of the Trinitarian controversies.—R.]

5. Moreover, the scholastic doctors or the philosophical divines had great controversies among themselves on various subjects. Abundant matter for these contests was supplied by that very acute English Franciscan John Duns Scotus, who being envious of the Dominicans attacked certain doctrines of Thomas Aquinas, contending that they were untrue. The Dominicans united to defend the brother of their order, who was the oracle of the schools; and on the other hand, the Franciscans gathered around Scotus as a doctor descended from heaven. Thus the two most powerful orders, the Dominicans and Franciscans, were again pitted against each other; and those famous sects of the Scotists and Thomists were produced, which still divide the schools of the Latins. These schools disagree respecting the nature of divine co-operation, the measure of divine grace necessary to a man's salvation, the unity of form in man [or personal identity], and many other subjects which cannot be here enumerated. But nothing procured Scotus greater glory than his defence and demonstration, in opposition to the Dominicans, of what is called the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary.¹

6. In nearly every country of Europe lived and taught a great multitude of those called mystics. Some of them were good men and lovers of piety, who laboured to withdraw the minds of people from ceremonies and to guide them to real virtue and the love of God. Such were (though not all equally wise) John Tauler, John Ruysbroek, Henry Suso, and Gerhard of Zutphen,² who must be acknowledged to have left us a considerable number of writings, suited to awaken pious emotions and to draw forth the soul towards God; though they all laboured under some infirmity of judgment, and were inclined to indulge their imaginations too far. But there were other mystics everywhere active, who were really beside themselves and actual fanatics; who dreamed of an unintelligible extinction of all the powers and faculties of the soul, and a transition of the mind into the divine nature; and who led away their adherents into a senseless kind of piety which bordered on licentiousness. So great was the extravagance of these people, that the more sober mystics themselves detested their doctrine and warned their followers against it.³

7. Concerning those who gave particular attention to moral theology, it is not necessary to say much, since their merit is nearly the same as that of those already mentioned. Yet two things may be noticed as illustrative of the state of this branch of theology. First, in this century a greater number than before collected and discussed what are called cases of conscience. The most noted of this class were Astesanus, an Italian, Monaldus, and Bartholomew of St. Concordia. This species of writing accorded well with the education given in the schools, which taught men not so much what to believe and how to live, as to question, to dispute, and to wrangle. Secondly, those who treated of the duties men owe to themselves and others, and who exhorted to the practice of them, were accustomed to derive arguments and illustrations from the brutes. For they first explained the prominent characteristics of some animal, and then applied them to the life and conduct of men. Of this description are John Nieder's Formicarius, Thomas of Brabant's treatise De Apibus, Hugo of S. Victor's Bestiarium, Thomas Walleis' De Natura Bestiarum cum Moralizatione, and some others.⁴

8. In most of the defenders of Christianity we find nothing perspicuous, elegant, and praiseworthy. Yet Thomas Bradwardine, in his Book De Providentia, advances many ingenious and pertinent arguments in confirmation of the truth of religion in general. The Eye-salve of Faith against

¹ John Ruysbroek inveighs strongly against them, in his works published by Surius, p. 50, 378; and De Vera Contemplat. cap. xviii. p. 608.

² John Nieder belonged to the following century. He was a German of Suabia, a Dominican, a prior of Basle, an Inquisitor, and rector of the gymnasium of Vienna. He flourished A.D. 1431, and died A.D. 1438. His works are, Consolatorium timoratum Conscientie (ed. Rome, 1604, 8vo); Formicarius, seu Diabologicæ ad Fidem Christianam exemplo conditionum Formicæ Incitationis (ed. Douay, 1604, 8vo); Preceptorium (on the ten commandments, ed. Douay, 1614, 8vo); Alphabetum Divini Amoris, De Modo bene Vivendi (ed. Rome, 1604, 8vo); De Reformatione Religionum (Antwerp, 1611, 8vo); De Contractibus, Meritorum, and Sermons for the year. For Thomas of Brabant or Cantipratensis, see above p. 466, note 1. He flourished about the middle of the preceding century. Hugo of S. Victor lived in the 12th century. See p. 412, note 1. His work, De Bestiis, is in his Opp. tom. ii. p. 418 (ed. Rouen, 1648, fol.). Thomas Walleis is noticed among the writers of this century, above, p. 512.—Mur.

¹ See Wadding's Annales Minor. tom. vi. p. 52, &c. [The doctrine of the immaculate conception of Mary was that she herself was miraculously conceived and born out of the course of nature, so as not to be a partaker of original sin.—Mur.]

² Concerning these the reader may consult Poiret's Biblioth. Mysticorum [p. 109, 111, 146.—Schl.], and Arnold's History and Description of Mystic Theology [written in German, p. 395, 404, 414, 421]. Of Tauler and Suso, Ehard treats particularly, Scriptores Prædicatorum, tom. i. p. 653, 677. See also the Acta Sanctorum. Januar. tom. ii. p. 654.

the Heretics (Collyrium Fidei contra Hæreticos), by Alvarus Pelagius, does not equal the magnitude of the subject, though it shows him to be an honest and well-disposed man. The Jews were assailed by Porchetus Salvaticus in his Victory of the Faith, transcribed in great measure from Raymond Martini, and also Nicolaus Lyra. But they were both excelled by Theophanes, a Greek, in whose Books against the Jews and in his Agreement between the Old Testament and the New, are many things which are not contemptible.

9. The contests between the Greeks and the Latins seemed at times to approach to an adjustment. For the Greeks, finding themselves to need the aid of the Latins in repelling the continually increasing power of the Turks, at times made a pretence of willingness to subject themselves to the demands of the Latins. In the year 1339 Andronicus Junior sent Barlaam into the West to negotiate a peace in his name. In the year 1349 other Greek envoys came to Clement VI. to negotiate a treaty. In 1356 a similar Greek embassy was sent to Innocent VI. at Avignon. In the year 1367 the Grecian patriarch came in person to Rome to press the business; and in the year 1369 the emperor, John Palæologus, came himself into Italy, published a confession of faith accordant with the views of the pontiff, and laboured to conciliate the friendship of the Latins. But the majority of the Greeks could never be persuaded to be silent and to submit themselves to the Romans, though some from interested motives manifested a disposition to yield to the terms imposed on them. Hence this century was spent amidst strifes and vain negotiations for peace.¹

10. In the year 1384 a violent contest arose at Paris between the university and the Dominican fraternity. John de Montesono, a native of Aragon, a Dominican and professor of theology, by direction and in the name of his order, publicly denied that the Virgin Mary was conceived without sin or stain, and maintained that such as believed in her immaculate conception sinned against religion and the faith. The commotions which arose from this transaction would doubtless have subsided, if John had not renewed his asseverations in stronger and bolder language in a public discussion A.D. 1387. The consequence was, that first the college of theologians and then the whole university, condemned both this and some other opinions of Montesono. For the university of Paris, influenced especially by the arguments of John Duns Scotus, had almost from the beginning of the century publicly adopted the doctrine of the sinless conception of the Holy Virgin.² The Dominicans with Montesono appealed from the decision of the university to Clement VII. resident at Avignon; for they maintained that St. Thomas himself was condemned in the person of his fellow-Dominican. But before the pontiff had passed sentence the accused fled from the court of Avignon, and revolted to the party of the rival pontiff, Urban VI. who resided at Rome; and he was therefore excommunicated in his absence. Whether the pontiff approved the judgment of the university of Paris is uncertain. The Dominicans deny it, and maintain that Montesono was excluded from the church merely on account of his flight;³ though there are many who assert that his sentiments were also condemned. As the Dominicans would not abide by the decision of the university respecting their companion, they were in the year 1389 excluded from the university, and were not restored to their former standing till the year 1404.⁴

CHAPTER IV.

HISTORY OF RITES AND CEREMONIES.

1. THE alterations and enlargements of the sacred rites will be dispatched in a few words, because the subject affords matter far too extensive to be compressed into the narrow space here allotted to it. The first thing worthy of notice is that Clement VI. in the year 1350, in compliance with the request of the citizens of Rome, reduced the period of the Jubilee to fifty years, which Boniface VIII. had directed to be kept only every hundredth year.⁵ He could give a plausible reason to such as might ask one. For the Jews it is well known kept every fiftieth year as a sacred jubilee; and the Roman pontiffs were always willing to copy after them in whatever related to the hierarchy and to magnificence. But Urban VI. Sixtus VII. and others, who subse-

¹ See Wadding, ubi supra, tom. vi. p. 52, &c.

² See Ecard's Scriptores Predicatorum, tom. i. p. 691.

³ Baluzæ, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. iv. p. 599, 618, 638; Baluzæ, Vita Pontif. Avinion. tom. i. p. 521, tom. ii. p. 992, &c.; Argentre, Collectio Judicior. de Nonis Errorib. tom. i. p. 61; Longueval, Hist. de l'Eglise Gallicane, tome xiv. p. 247, &c.

⁴ Baluzæ, Vita Pontif. Avinion. tom. i. p. 247, 287, 312, 387; Muratori, Antiq. Ital. tom. iii. p. 344, 481, &c. [Clement alleged that few persons lived so long as a hundred years, and of course quite too many Christians had to forego the great privilege of this full indulgence.—Von Ein.]

⁵ Canisius, Lectiones Antiquæ, tom. iv. p. 369; Leo Allatius, De Perpetua Consensione Eccles. Orient. et Occident. lib. ii. cap. xvi. xvii. p. 784, &c.; Wadding's Annales Minor. tom. viii. p. 29, 40, 107, 201, 289, 303, 312; Baluzæ, Vita Pontif. Avinion. tom. i. p. 348, 380, 388, 403, 407, 410, 772.

quently assigned a much shorter period for the recurrence of this salutary and gainful year, would have found more difficulty in satisfying the demand for sufficient reasons for such inconstancy.¹

2. Innocent V. commanded Christians to observe festal days in memory of the spear which pierced the Saviour's side, of the nails which fastened him to the cross, and of the crown of thorns which he wore at his death.² This was indeed absurd, yet it may in some measure be overlooked considering the ignorance of the times. But no honest and well-informed man can readily excuse the conduct of Benedict XII. in giving his sanction to the senseless fable of the Franciscans, respecting the impressing of the marks of the wounds of Christ upon the body of their chief and founder by the almighty power of God, by ordaining a festival to commemorate the event. John XXII. besides sanctioning many other superstitious things, ordered Christians to annex to their prayers the words in which Gabriel saluted the Virgin Mary.

CHAPTER V.

HISTORY OF HERESIES.

1. THE Hesychasts, or as they may be called in Latin the Quietists, gave the Greeks much employment. Barlaam, a native of Calabria, a monk of the order of St. Basil and afterwards bishop of Geraci in Calabria, travelling over Greece to inspect the conduct of the monks, found not a few things among them which were reprehensible; but in none of them more than in the Hesychasts at Mount Athos in Thessaly, who were mystics or more perfect monks, who sought for tranquillity of mind and the extinction of all the passions by means of contemplation. For these Quietists, in accordance with the prescription of their early teachers, who said there was a divine light hid in the soul, seated themselves daily in some retired corner, and fixed their eyes steadfastly for a considerable time upon the middle of their belly or navel; and in that situation they boasted that a sort of divine light beamed forth upon them from the mind itself, which diffused through their souls wonderful delight.³ When asked what kind of light this was, they answered that it was the glory of God; and they appealed for illustration to the light which appeared at the transfiguration of Christ. Barlaam, who was ignorant of the customs of mystics, regarded this as absurd and fanatical; and to the monks who followed this practice he applied the names of Massalians and Euchites, and also the new name of Ὁμολογῆσαι, Navel-souls. On the other hand Gregory Palamas, archbishop of Thessalonica, defended the cause of the monks against Barlaam.⁴

2. To put an end to this contest a council was held at Constantinople A.D. 1314, in which the emperor Andronicus junior and the patriarch presided. Here the monks

¹ Manifestly the pontiffs could offer no adequate reason for their limitations of the period, yet they could frame some excuse. The real cause, which they wisely conceal, was their own emolument. But a centennial jubilee, how few popes could it make happy! Even one of fifty years few could live to see. Gregory XI. therefore thought of shortening the period still more, notwithstanding the anathema pronounced by his predecessors against such as should make innovations upon it. He wished to limit the jubilee to every thirty-third year, but death frustrated his purpose. Urban VI. intended to execute this design, but he also died before he had accomplished it. Boniface IX. first attained the object. The concurrence of people however was not great at this jubilee, because the adherents of his rival pope would not go to Rome. But he devised a remedy. He first instituted the secondary jubilee, and also sent out hawkers of indulgences everywhere, offering his indulgences cheap to those who were unable to come to Rome. The regular jubilee was fixed to every 33d year, on the ostensible ground that Christ in making atonement for the human race lived thirty-three years on the earth. But the period of thirty-three years was still a long time. Paul II. therefore ordered that the festival should be kept every twenty-five years. Yet the benefit of his alteration he was compelled by death to resign to his successor, Sixtus IV. A more frequent recurrence of the jubilee no one has ventured to ordain. See Cramer's Fortsetzung der Bosuet, &c. vol. v. p. 426, &c. — Von Ein.

² See Seelen's Dis. de Feste Lanceæ et Clavorum Christi; Baluze, Vita Pontificis Avenion. tom. i. p. 328, and his Miscellanea, tom. i. p. 417.

³ There is no reason to be surprised at this account or to question its correctness. For among the precepts or rules of all those in the East who teach men how to withdraw the mind from the body and to unite it with God, or inculcate what the Latins call a contemplative and mystic life, whether they are Christians or Mohammedans or Pagans, there is this precept, viz. that the eyes must be steadily fixed every day for some hours upon some particular object; and that whoever does this will be rapt into a kind of ecstasy, and being thus united to God will see wonderful things, and will enjoy pleasures which words cannot express. See what Kaempfer states concerning the monks and mystics of Siam, in his Historia Japonia, tom. i. p. 30; and the account of those of India by Bernier, Voyages, tomeii. p. 127. Indeed I can easily believe that those who continue long in such a posture of the body, will see and perceive what no sane and sober person can see and feel. For they must necessarily fall into a disordered and bewildered state of mind; and the images represented by the imagination in this unnatural state will form strange combinations. And this will be the more certain effect, because the same injunction which requires the eyes to be long fixed immovably on one object forbids those people who wish to behold God all use of their reason during the time. I have said that those in the eastern countries who seek such intercourse with God enjoin upon themselves this singular suspension of intellect and reason; but I might add that very many of the Latins of the mystic class observe the same, and enjoin the observance of it on their disciples. And hence it is that persons of this description sometimes relate to us so many visions, destitute of all rationality and truth. But this is not the place to enlarge on these prodigies.

⁴ Concerning both of these famous men, Barlaam and Gregory Palamas, see, besides others, Fabricius, Biblioth. Græca, tom. x. p. 247, &c. and 454, &c. See notices above, p. 487, note 2, and p. 508, note 5. — Mur.

with Palamas at their head were victorious; Barlaam was condemned, and leaving Greece he returned to Italy. Not long after another monk, Gregory Acindynus, renewed the controversy, for he denied what Palamas had maintained, namely, that God dwells in an eternal light distinct from his essence, and that this was the light seen by the disciples on Mount Tabor. The dispute was now no longer concerning the monks [or the Hesychasts], but concerning the Taboritic light and the nature of God. This Gregory [Acindynus] was also condemned as a follower of Barlaam in another council at Constantinople. There were several subsequent councils on this subject, among which was the distinguished one held in 1351, in which the Barlaamites and their friends were so severely censured that they gradually became silent, and left Palamas victorious. It was the opinion of Palamas, who came off conqueror in this combat, that God is surrounded by an eternal light which is distinct from his nature or essence, and which he called God's ἐνέργεια or operation, and that it was this light which he permitted the three disciples to behold on Mount Tabor. Hence he concluded that the divine operation is really distinct from his substance, and he added that no one can become a partaker of the divine essence or substance itself; but it is possible for finite natures to become partakers of this divine light or operation. Those called Barlaamites on the contrary denied these positions, and maintained that the divine operations or attributes do not differ from the divine essence; and that there is no difference in fact, but only in our modes of conceiving them or in our thoughts, among all the things which are said to be in God.¹

3. In the Latin church those papal ministers and judges, the Inquisitors, most industriously hunted out everywhere the remains of the sects which opposed the Romish religion, namely, the Waldenses, the Cathari, the Apostoli, and many others. Hence innumerable examples occur in the monuments of those times, of persons who were burned or otherwise cruelly put to death by them. But none of these opposers of the church gave more trouble to the Inquisitors and the bishops than the Brethren and Sisters of the Free Spirit, who in Germany and the Low Countries went by the common name of Beghardi and Beghinæ, and in other countries were called by other names. For this class of people professing a sublime and austere kind of piety, and calling off men's attention from all external and sensible objects to an internal worship of God, easily gained the confidence of the honest, simple, and devout, and everywhere brought over multitudes to their views. And hence it was that so many persons of this character perished in the flames of persecution in Italy, France, and Germany, during this century.

4. In no part of Germany was this sect more numerous than in the cities on the Rhine, and especially in Cologne. Therefore Henry I. archbishop of Cologne, published a severe ordinance against them, A.D. 1306;² and his example was followed by the prelates of Mentz, Treves, Worms, and Strasburg.³ And as there were clever and subtle men among this class of people, the very acute John Duns Scotus was sent to Cologne in the year 1308, to dispute against them and confute them.⁴ In the year 1310 Margaret Porretta, a celebrated leader of this sect, was burned at Paris with one of the brethren. She had undertaken to demonstrate in a book she published, that the soul, when absorbed in the love of God is free from all laws, and may gratify every natural propensity without guilt.⁵ Influenced by these and numerous other examples, the sovereign pontiff, Clement V. in the general council of Vienne, A.D. 1311, published a special decree against the Beghardi and Beghinæ of Germany; in which he states the opinions held by this party, imperfectly indeed, yet so far as to render it clear they were mystics and Brethren and Sisters of the Free Spirit.⁶ Clement published another decree in the

¹ See Cantacuzenus, Historia, lib. ii. c. 39, &c. p. 263, &c. and the notes there of Gregory [James] Pontanus; Nic. Gregoras, Historia Byzantina, lib. xi. c. 10, p. 277, and in various other passages. But these two writers differ in many particulars. Many documents relating to this controversy remain unpublished. See Montfaucon's Biblioth. Coisliniana, p. 150, 174, 404. Nor have we as yet a well-digested and accurate history of this controversy. Till we have the following may be consulted, Leo Allatius, De Perpetua Consecratione Orient. et Occident. Ecclesie, lib. ii. cap. xxii. p. 824; Canisius, Lectiones Antiquæ, tom. iv. p. 361; Petavius, Dogmat. Theol. tom. i. lib. i. c. 12, p. 76; Steph. de Aldimura, Panoplia contra Schisma Græcor. p. 381, &c. and others. [Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. vol. xxxiv. p. 431, &c.—Mur.]

² See the Statuta Colonienſis, Colon. 1554, 4to, p. 58. [Harzheim, Concilia German. tom. iv. p. 99.—Schl.]

³ Johannis, Scriptores Rerum Moguntinar. tom. iii. p. 289; Martene's Theſaurus Anecd. tom. iv. p. 250, &c. [Harzheim, Concil. German. tom. iv. p. 139, 200, 234, 235, 407, 436, 438, 482, &c.—Schl.] same council, in which he suppressed the Beghinae of a far different class, namely, those who had previously been approved and who lived every where in established houses.¹ For the Brethren and Sisters of the Free Spirit had crept into most of the convents of the Beguinae, and inculcated their mysterious and sublime views on those women who being captivated with these novelties, prated absurdly and impiously about the mysteries and the true worship of God.²

⁴ Wadding's Annales Minor. tom. vi. p. 108, &c. ⁵ D'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. iii. p. 63; Bale, De Scripturis Britannicis, cent. iv. No. 88, p. 367, Basil. 1557, fol.

⁶ It is extant in the Corpus Juris Canon. among the Clementine, lib. v. tit. iii. De Hæreticis, cap. iii. p. 1083.

5. The Brethren of the Free Spirit, oppressed by so many decrees and ordinances, endeavoured to descend from upper to lower Germany, and they actually migrated to several provinces of the latter. Westphalia alone they were not able to disquiet. For Henry, the archbishop of Cologne, assembled a council in 1322, and warned the bishops in his province of the impending danger; and they, by their great vigilance, prevented the entrance of any of these people into Westphalia.³ About the same time too, Walter, an eloquent man and distinguished for his writings, the leader and champion of the Beghardi (as they were called) living on the Rhine, having come from Mentz to Cologne, was there seized and burned.⁴ The death of this man was a great loss to the Brethren of the Free Spirit, yet it by no means effected their ruin. For it appears from numerous testimonies that this class of people held clandestine meetings for a long time at Cologne, and in other provinces of Germany; and that there were men among them distinguished for their learning and weight of character, among whom, besides others, was the celebrated Henry Aycard or Eccard, a Saxon Dominican, and provincial of his order for Saxony, an acute man, who taught theology at Paris with applause.⁵ John XXII. in the year 1330, sought to remedy this evil by a new and severe ordinance, in which the errors of the sect of the Free Spirit were more distinctly and precisely stated than in the ordinance of Clement;⁶ but he could not by any means extirpate it. Both the inquisitors and the bishops over the greater part of Europe fought against it to the very end of the century.

6. From the ordinance of Clement or of the council of Vienne against the Beguins, or those females who associated in regular houses for united prayer and labour, originated that great persecution which continued down to the time of the reformation by Luther, and which proved ruinous to both Beguins and Beghards in several countries. For although the pontiff, at the close of that ordinance, had allowed pious females to lead a life of celibacy whether under a vow or not, and had forbidden only the toleration of such females as were corrupted with the opinions of the Brethren of the Free Spirit, yet the enemies of the Beguins and Beghards, who were very numerous among the mechanics especially the weavers, and among the priests and monks, took occasion from that ordinance of Clement to expel the Beguins from their houses, to seize and carry off their goods, and to offer them many other insults and injuries. Nor were the Beghards treated with more indulgence. John XXII. first gave relief to the Beguins in the year 1324 by a special ordinance, in which he explained that

¹ In the Corpus Juris (anon. Clementinae, l. i. tit. xl. De Religiosis Donibus, cap. i. p. 1075, ed. Boehmer.

² Hence in the German monuments of this age, we may often notice a distinction made between the reputable and approved Beguine, and the Beguine of the sublime or free spirit, the former of whom adhered to the public religion, and the latter were corrupted by mystical opinions.

³ Schatten's Annales Paderbornenses, tom. ii. p. 249.

⁴ Trithemius, Annales Hirsaugens. tom. ii. p. 155; Schatten's Annales Paderborn. tom. ii. p. 350. This was the celebrated Walter, who so many ecclesiastical historians tell us he was the founder of the sect of Lollhards, and a distinguished witness for the truth. These and other conclusions the learned writers deduce from the language of Trithemius; Lohareus (thus it reads in my copy; but I believe the true reading to be Lollhardus, which term Trithemius often uses in the manner common in his age, while treating of the sects which dissented from the church) autem fuit Waltherus, natione Hollandicus, Latini sermonis parvam habebat notitiam. From these words I say those learned men infer that the name of the man was Walter, and his surname Lohard; and hence they infer farther, that the sect of the Lollhards derived its name from him as its founder. But it is clear from this and other passages of Trithemius, that Lohardus was not his surname but an epithet of reproach, which was applied to all heretics who concealed the poison of error under the cloak of piety. This same Walter is called by Trithemius, a little before, Fratricellorum princeps. Yet the name Fratricellor he uses in a broader sense, or to include various sects. This Walter was a man devoted to mystic views, and a principal teacher among the Brethren of the Free Spirit along the Rhine.

⁵ See Echard's Scriptores Prædicator. tom. i. p. 507; Raynald's Annales Eccles. tom. xv. ad ann. 1329, sec. 70, p. 389, [and Harzheim's Concilia German. tom. iv. in the Digressio ad Saecul. xiv. p. 635, &c. where we find the bull of pope John XXII. which he sent to the archbishop of Cologne, and in which the 26 articles which Eccard taught but afterwards had to retract, are stated and are, almost word for word, the same as those propositions quoted in the history of the preceding century, (part ii. ch. v. sec. 11, p. 481, above), from the book De Novem Rupibus.—Schl.

⁶ This new constitution of John XXII. has never been published entire. Its first words were, In agro Domini, and its inscription was, Contra singularia, dubia, suspecta et temeraria, quæ Beghardii et Beghinae prædicant et observant. A summary of it is given in Coerner's Chronicon, Eccard's Corpus Histor. Medii Ævi, tom. ii. p. 1035, 1036. It is also mentioned by Langius, Chronicon Criticæ, in Pistorius' Scriptores Rerum German. tom. i. p. 1206.

of Clement, and commanded their houses and goods to be left to them unmolested. And other pontiffs afterwards extended to them relief. Moreover the Beguins themselves, in order to escape more easily the machinations and violence of their enemies, embraced in many places the third rule of St. Francis and of the Augustinians. But all these guards could not prevent them from suffering great injury, both as to character and property, from this time onward; and in many places they were oppressed both by the magistrates and by the monks and clergy, who were greedy of their property.¹

7. Some years before the middle of the century, while Germany, France, and other countries of Europe were afflicted with various calamities, the Flagellants, a sect which had long been forgotten especially in Germany, again appeared, and roaming through various countries produced excitement among the people. But these new Flagellants who were of every order, sex, and age, were worse than the old ones. For they not only supposed that the compassion of God might be excited by self-inflicted pains, but also circulated other doctrines opposed to religion; for example, that flagellation was of equal efficacy with baptism and the other sacraments, that by it might be obtained from God the forgiveness of all sins without the merits of Christ, that the old law of Christ was soon to be abolished, and a new law (of baptism with blood by flagellation), was to be substituted in its place, and other doctrines, some worse and some not so bad. Clement VII. therefore anathematised these flagellants, and the Inquisitors burned some of them in one place and another. But they were as difficult to be suppressed as the other sects of errorists.²

8. Directly the opposite of this doleful sect was the merry one of the Dancers, which originated in the year 1373 at Aix-la-Chapelle, and thence spread through the district of Liege, Hainault, and other parts of Belgium. Persons of both sexes, both publicly and in private houses, suddenly broke into a dance, and holding each other by the hand danced with great violence till they fell down nearly suffocated. Amidst those violent movements they said they were favoured with wonderful visions. These also wandered about like the Flagellants, and lived by begging; they esteemed the public worship of the church and of the priesthood of little value, and held secret assemblies. This appears to have been a singular species of disease; but the ignorant priests of that age supposed that those people were possessed by some evil spirit, and at Liege they endeavoured to cast him out of their bodies by hymns and incense. And it is reported that the evil spirit was dislodged by these means.³

9. The Knights Templars established near 200 years before this in Palestine, were far worse than all the heretics, and were the enemies and deriders of all religion, if the crimes and enormities charged upon them were real. Their accuser before the pontiff, Clement V. was no less than the king of France, Philip the Fair, an avaricious prince extremely vindictive and fiery. The pontiff had to yield to the wishes of the king, although at first he made some resistance. Therefore in the year 1307 and afterwards, all the Knights dispersed over the whole of Europe, while apprehending no such thing, were seized on a day appointed; many who refused to confess the crimes and enormities charged upon them were put to death; others who being compelled by tortures and allured by promises confessed their crimes, were dismissed. The whole order in the year 1311 was extinguished by the council of Vienne. Their very ample possessions were in part transferred to other orders, especially to the Knights of St. John now of Malta, and were in part confiscated by the reigning sovereigns.

10. The Knights Templars, if we may believe their judges, were a society of men who ridiculed God and Christ and everything sacred, and trampled upon all law and decency. Candidates for admission to the order were required to renounce Christ and to spit upon his image; and when initiated they paid divine honours to a gilded head of wood or to a cat, were required to practise sodomy, committed to the flames such children as happened to be the fruit of their commerce with women, and committed other crimes too horrid to be mentioned or even thought of. That there were impious and flagitious men in this, as well as in all the other religious [or monastic] orders, no one will deny. But that this whole order was so abominably corrupt, is so far from being proved by the records of the trial which are now publicly extant, that the contrary rather is manifest from them. And if to this we add that the accusations are evidently contradictory; and that many of these unhappy people most firmly attested their own innocence, and that of their order amidst the severest tortures, and even with their dying breath, it will appear most probable that king Philip set on foot this bloody tragedy to gratify his hatred against the order, and particularly against its general who had offended him, as well as to satisfy his avarice.¹

¹ I have made very extensive collections respecting this long and eventful conflict of the Beguins. The most copious of all the printed histories of it and especially of the conflict at Basle, and of that most bitter enemy of the Beguins, John Mülbeg, a priest of Basle, is that of Christian Wurstenen or Urstadius, in his Chronicle of Basle written in German, lib. iv. c. ix. p. 201, &c. Basle, 1580, fol. The writings of Mülbeg, so famous in the following century for his assaults on the Beguins, are before me in manuscript, and are preserved in many old libraries.

² See Baluze, Vita Pontif. Avenion. tom. i. p. 160, 316, 319, and Miscellanea, tom. i. p. 50.; Mathæus, Analecta Veteris Ævi, tom. i. p. 50, tom. iii. p. 241, tom. iv. p. 145; Gyges, Flores Temp. p. 139.

³ See Baluze, Vita Pontif. Avenion. tom. i. p. 485; Mathæus, Analecta Veteris Ævi, tom. i. p. 51, where the Chronicon Belgicum, ad ann. 1374, obscurely says, 'These people fell down if unexorcised, but the sign of the cross restored them.' These Dancing Brothers and Sisters were very much like the French Convulsionists [or Prophets] who in our age have produced so much disturbance.

¹ We have Peter du Puy's (or Puteanus) Histoire de la Condamnation des Templiers, with the records of the trial annexed, which with his other writings relating to the history of France, was published at Paris, 1654, 4to. A second edition of the work appeared at Paris, 1685, 8vo, and a third at Brussels, 1713, 2 vols. 8vo.—The fourth and most ample was printed at Brussels, 1751, 4to, to which a great number of documents of different kinds were added. Any one by candidly examining the records and documents annexed to this book will clearly perceive that injustice was done to the Templars. There is also Nicolaus Gürtler's Historia Templariorum, Amsterdam, 1703, 8vo; and the reader may likewise consult Baluze, Vitæ Pontif. Avenion. tom. i. p. 8, 11, 12, &c.; Du Bois, Histoire de l'Eglise de Paris, tom. ii. p. 510. The principal cause of king Philip's implacable hatred of the Templars was that in his war with Boniface VIII. these knights sided with the pontiff, and furnished him with money to carry on the war. This was an offence which Philip could never overlook. More cannot be added in the present work. [The Abbé Baruel, in his History of Jacobinism, vol. ii. chap. xii. judges less favourably of the Templars.—Mur.] [The most recent work on this subject is Willeke, Geschichte des Tempelherrenordens, 2 vols. Leip. 1826, 27, 8vo.—R.]

CENTURY FIFTEENTH.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

1. THE new members added to the kingdom of Christ were altogether unworthy the name of Christians, unless we apply the appellation to all who make any kind of profession of Christianity. Ferdinand the Catholic, king of Spain, by the conquest of Granada in 1492, entirely subverted the dominion of the Moors or Saracens in Spain. Not long after he ordered an immense multitude of Jews into banishment, and to escape this evil a great number of them made an insincere profession of Christianity.¹ It is generally known that to this present time Spain and Portugal are full of Jews who pretend to be Christians. The Saracens who remained in vast numbers, were at first solicited by exhortations and discourses to embrace the Christian religion. But as few would yield to these efforts, the great Ximenes, archbishop of Toledo and prime minister of the kingdom, deemed it necessary to employ civil penalties. But even this severity induced only a small part of the nation to renounce Mohammed.²

2. The light of Christianity was also carried among the inhabitants of Samogitia and the neighbouring provinces, but with very little success.³ Near the end of the century the Portuguese navigators penetrated to India and Ethiopia, and soon after A.D. 1492, Christopher Columbus opened a passage to America and discovered the islands of Hispaniola, Cuba, Jamaica, and some others.⁴ Amerigo Vespucci, a citizen of Florence, now reached the [American] continent.⁵ These modern Argonauts thought it their duty to impart the light of Christian truth to the inhabitants of these regions previously unknown to the Europeans. The first attempt of the kind was made by the Portuguese among the Africans of the kingdom of Congo, whose king with all his subjects in the year 1491, received the Romish religion without hesitation.⁶ But all good and considerate men to deserve commendation. We have in Von der Hardt's Acta Concil. Constant. tom. iii. p. 9, &c. [a curious paper entitled] "Pauli Volatimini de Cracovia, Academiæ Cracoviensis, rectoris, legati regis ad concilium, Demonstratio, Crucifervis de Prussia opposita; Infidelis Armis et Bello non esse ad Christianam fidem Converterendos, nec eorum bona Invenienda, in Constant. concil. 1415, die 6 Julii proposita." In the first chapter of this paper is a confutation of the opinion, that since the advent of Christ the unbelieving have no rights, no honours, and no legitimate dominion over their lands. The second chapter treats of the devices and pretexts of the Teutonic order for subjecting to themselves various countries, under the plea of religion. And the writer says: "The pagans have now ceased to invade us; but these twice a year invade the territories of the infidels, whom they call Relasas (giants). The most powerful of the pagan princes have received baptism through the ministry of the Poles, and a great multitude are still receiving it; yet the Crossbearers invade still the new converts lest the object of their inroads should fail."—Schl. [Ranke, Hist. of the Reformation, vol. i. p. 245, Mrs. Austin's transl. tells us that "in Lithuania [or Samogitia, now Wilna in Russia] the ancient worship of the serpent endured through the whole of the 15th and 16th centuries, and was even invested with a political significance. Æneas Silvius, De Statu Europæ, cap. xx.; Alexander Guagninus, in Resp. Poloniae, Elz. p. 276." This last reference ought probably to be to Guagnini's Compendium Rerum Polonicarum.—R.

⁴ See Charlevoix, Hist. de l'Isle de St. Domingo, tome i. p. 64, &c.

⁵ See Bandini's Life of Americus Vesputius, written in Italian but translated into German. [See also Washington Irvine's Life and Voyages of Columbus, App. no. 10, vol. ii. p. 246, &c. where it is shown that Amerigo Vespucci was not the first discoverer of the American continent.—Mur.

⁶ Labat's Relation de l'Ethiopie Occidentale, tome ii. p. 366; Lahtau's Hist. des Découvertes et conquêtes des Portugais dans le Nouveau Monde, tome i. p. 77. &c.

¹ Jo. de Fereras, Hist. Générale d'Espagne, tome viii. p. 123, &c. p. 132, et alibi.

² Flechier, Hist. du Cardinal Ximenes, p. 89, &c.; Mich. Geddes, History of the Expulsion of the Moriscos, in his Miscellaneous Tracts, vol. i. p. 8, &c.—Prescott's History of Ferdinand and Isabella, respecting the Jews in vol. i. chap. vii. vol. ii. chap. xvii.; respecting the Moors in vol. i. chap. viii. vol. ii. chap. vi. of the 2d edition, London, 1839.—Mur. [See also McCrele's Reformation in Spain, p. 70—73, and particularly p. 89—105; and what is still more striking, see a brief notice of the persecutions of the Moors in Valencia by Charles V. in 1524, to compel them to become Christians, in Ranke's Hist. of the Reformation, Mrs. Austin's translation, vol. iii. p. 120.—R.

³ Hottinger's Hist. Eccles. sæc. xv. p. 856. [In these countries the Teutonic Knights distinguished themselves by their zeal to convert pagans; but their zeal was neither so pure nor so disinterested as it should be must necessarily smile or rather be grieved at an abandonment of long-established errors so sudden as this. Afterwards when the sovereign pontiff Alexander VI. divided America between the Spaniards and the Portuguese, he strongly exhorted both nations not to suffer the inhabitants of the islands and the continent to continue longer in ignorance of the true religion.¹ And many of the Franciscans and Dominicans were sent to those countries to convert the natives to Christ. With what degree of zeal and success they performed the service is very generally known.²

CHAPTER II.

ADVERSE EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

1. In the countries of the East, Christianity daily suffered a diminution of its influence and extent by the inroads of the Mohammedans, Turks and Tartars, both of whom had embraced the Koran. In Asiatic Tartary, among the Moguls, the inhabitants of Tangut, and the adjacent nations, the ground which had long been occupied by the religion of Christ was now the seat of the vilest superstitions. Nor were even the vestiges of Christianity anywhere visible in those vast countries, except in China, where some feeble remains of the Nestorians glimmered faintly amid the thick surrounding darkness. For it appears that so late as this century, the Nestorian patriarch in Chaldea sent certain men to Cathay and China, to preside as bishops over the churches existing or rather lying concealed in the more remote provinces of that country.³ Yet even this little handful of Christians must have become wholly extinct in the course of the century.

2. The lamentable overthrow of the Greek empire brought incalculable evils upon the Christians in a large part of both Asia and Europe. For after the Turks under Mahomet II. (a great prince, religion only excepted) had captured Constantinople in the year 1453, the glory of the Greek church was at an end; nor had the Christians any protection against the daily oppressions and wrongs of their victors, or any means of resisting the torrent of ignorance and barbarism which rushed in upon them. One part of the city of Constantinople the Turks took by storm, but another part of it surrendered upon terms of capitulation.⁴ Hence in the former all public profession of Christianity was at once suppressed; but in the latter during the whole century, the Christians retained all their temples and freely worshipped in them according to their usages. This liberty however was taken away in the time of Selim I. and Christian worship was confined within very narrow limits.⁵ The outward form and organization of the Christian church was indeed left untouched by the Turks, but in everything else the Greek church was gradually so weakened, that from this time onward it gradually lost all its vigour and efficiency under them. The Roman pontiff Pius II. addressed a letter to Mahomet II. exhorting him to embrace Christianity, but his communication was equally destitute of piety and of prudence.

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE STATE OF LITERATURE AND SCIENCE.

1. The tyranny of the Mohammedans almost silenced the Grecian and Oriental muses. Among the Latins on the contrary, literature and the liberal arts regained under most favourable auspices their long lost lustre and glory. Some of the pontiffs themselves encouraged them, among whom

¹ See the bull in the Bullarium Romanum, tom. i. p. 466.

² See Mamachus, Origines et Antiquit. Christianae, tom. ii. p. 326, &c. where the gradual introduction of Christianity into America is described. Wadding's Annales Minor. tom. xv. p. 1, 10, &c.

³ This is from the letters of Theoph. Sigfr. Bayer, which he addressed to me.

⁴ In this account Moshelm has followed the Turkish writers. And indeed their account is much more probable than that of the Latin and Greek historians, who suppose that the whole city was taken by force and not by capitulation. The Turkish relation diminishes the glory of their conquest, and therefore probably would not have been adopted had it not been true.—Mac.

⁵ Cantemir, Hist. de l'Empire Ottoman, tome 1. p. 11, 46, 54, 55.

⁶ Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome III. p. 1872. [Article Mahomet II. The letter is the 396th of the printed letters of Pius II. and occasioned a debate between the French Protestants and French Catholics as to its piety and discretion. The pope promised to confirm the dominion of the Sultan over the Greek empire, and assured him of the respect and esteem of the Christian world, by which he would become the greatest prince on earth, if he would only be baptized and make a profession of Christianity.—Mur.

Nicolaus V. stood prominent.¹ Many of the kings and princes also aided literary men by their protection and extraordinary munificence; among whom the illustrious family of Medici in Italy,² Alphonsus VI. king of Naples, and the other Neapolitan sovereigns of the house of Aragon,³ acquired permanent fame by their liberality and attachment to learning. Hence universities were erected in Germany, France, and Italy; libraries were collected at great expense, and young men were excited to study by proffered rewards and honours. To all these means was added the incomparable advantage resulting from the art of printing, first with wooden blocks and then with metal types, which was invented at Mentz about the year 1440 by John Gutenberg.

¹ Gibbon has done justice to the character and claims of this pope, as an encourager of learning and a patron of learned men, by which "he sharpened those weapons which were soon pointed against the Roman church," Decl. and Fall. vol. xii. p. 131—2. See Georgius, Vita Nicolai Quinti, Rom. 1742, 4to, and Hallam's Intro. to the Hist. of Liter. 1st edit. vol. i. p. 196, &c. There are also some interesting notices of this enlightened pope in Shepherd's Life of Poggio Bracciolini, 4to, p. 381, and especially chap. x. p. 405, &c.—R.

² A treatise expressly on the great merits of the house of Medici, in regard to all the liberal arts and sciences, is given us by Joseph Bianchini de Prato, Dei Gran Duchi di Toscana della reale Casa de Medici, Protettori delle Lettere et delle Belle Arti, Ragionamenti Historici, Venice, 1741, fol. [In addition to the several Italian works on the literary merits of this princely family, the English reader may consult Roscoe's well-known Lives of Lorenzo de Medici and of Leo X.—R.]

³ See Giannone, Hist. de Naples, tome iii. p. 530, 628, &c.; Anton. Panormit. Dicta et Facta Memorabilia Alphonsi I. second ed. by Menschen, Vita Eruditor. Viror. tom. ii. p. 1, &c.

⁴ Maittaire's Annales Typographici; Marchand's Histoire de l'Imprimerie, Hague, 1740, 4to, &c. [Schöepflin's Indicium Typographicum, Strasb. 1760, 4to; Meerman's Origines Typographicæ, Hague, 1763, 2 vols. 4to; Breitkopf, über die Geschichte der Buchdruckerkunst, Lips. 1779, 4to. There has been much debate where and by whom printing was first executed. Haerlem, Mentz, and Strasburg, each claim the honour of being the first seat of the art; and Laurence Coster, John Gensfleisch or Gutenberg, and John Faust, besides others, have been honoured as inventors of the art. The probability is that Coster first printed at Haerlem with carved wooden blocks (much in the Chinese manner), on or before the year 1430; that Gutenberg invented forged metal types at Strasburg, A.D. 1436 or later; and that afterwards forming a partnership with Faust and others at Mentz, Faust invented the cast types, one Peter Schoeffer having devised the iron matrices and punches to facilitate the casting of the types, and the company began to print in 1450, and in 1459 printed Durand's Rationale Dignior. Officior. at Mentz. See Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. vol. xxx. p. 175, and Rees's Cyclopæd. art. Printing.—Mur. [A luminous and correct summary of this controversy may be seen in Hallam's Intro. to the Hist. of Liter. vol. i. p. 206, &c. Some additional facts have been recently furnished by M. Léon de Laborde in his Debut de l'Imprimerie à Mayence et à Hambourg, Paris, 1840, 4to, in which he brings to light several printed letters of indulgence, with blanks for the insertion of the purchasers' names, which were issued by pope Nicolas V. in 1454. In pagell. of the preface, the reader will find a pretty full catalogue of the best works on the origin of this invaluable art. See also his Debut de l'Imprimerie à Strasburg, Paris, 1840, 8vo, in which he refers the first attempts of Gutenberg in that city to the year 1436.—R.]

For in consequence of this art, the works of the best Greek and Latin authors, which before had lain concealed in the libraries of the monks, were now put into the hands of the people; and while they awakened in very many a laudable desire of emulating their excellencies, they purified the taste of innumerable individuals of a literary turn.⁴

2. The fall of the Greek empire likewise contributed much to the promotion of learning in the West. For the most learned men of that nation, after the capture of Constantinople, emigrated to Italy; and thence a part of them were dispersed into the other countries of Europe. These men faithfully taught the Greek language and Grecian learning everywhere for their own support; and they diffused a taste for literature and science over nearly the whole Latin world. Hence there was no considerable city or university in which some one or more of the Greeks were not employed in this century as teachers of the liberal arts.⁵ But they were nowhere more numerous than in Italy, where they were encouraged and honoured by the munificence and the ardent zeal for useful learning of the Medicean family, and by several Italian cities; and hence those who thirsted for knowledge in other countries were accustomed to repair to that country for study.⁶

3. The greater part of the learned men in Italy, which was the chief seat of learning, were engaged in publishing, correcting, and elucidating the Greek and Latin authors, in forming both a prose and poetic style after their model, and in illustrating antiquities. And in these departments many attained such eminence that it is very difficult to come up to their standard. Nor were the other languages and sciences neglected. In the university of Paris a public teacher of the Greek and Hebrew languages was now established.⁷ In Spain and Italy there were many who were eminent for their knowledge of Hebrew and oriental literature.⁸ Germany was renowned for John Reuchlin or Capuio, John Trithemius, and others, eminent

⁵ Maius, Vita Reuchlini, p. 11, 13, 19, 24, 152, 153, 165, &c.; Barth on Statius, tom. ii. p. 1008; Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. v. p. 691.

⁶ Happily illustrative of these facts is Humphrey Hody's book, De Græcis Illustribus Literarum Instauratoribus, edited by Jebb, Lond. 1742, 8vo. Very interesting and accurate is Boerner, De Doctis Hominiibus Græcis Literarum Græcarum in Italia Instauratoribus, Lips. 1750, 8vo; Battier, Oratio de Instauratoribus Græcar. Literarum, in the Museum Helveticum, tom. iv. p. 163, &c.

⁷ Simon, Crit. de la Biblio. Ecclési. par M. Du Pin, tome i. p. 502, 512, &c.; Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. v. p. 852, &c.

⁸ Colomesius, Italia Orientalis, p. 4, &c. and Hispania Orientalis, p. 212.

both in those languages and in other branches of knowledge.¹ Latin poetry was revived, especially by Anthony Panormitanus who had many followers.² The principal collector of ancient monuments, coins, gems, and inscriptions, among the Italians, was Cyriacus of Ancona, whose example prompted others to do the same.³

4. It is not necessary to speak particularly of the other branches of learning, but the state of philosophy deserves a brief notice. Before the Greeks came to Italy Aristotle alone was in repute with all; he was extolled so immoderately that many were not ashamed to compare him absurdly with the precursor of Jesus Christ.⁴ But about the time of the council of Florence some of the Greeks, and especially the celebrated Gemistius Pletho, recommended to certain great men of Italy, instead of the contentious philosophy of the Peripatetics, what they called the divine and mild wisdom of Plato. And these Italians, being charmed with it, took pains to have a number of noble youths imbued with it. The most distinguished among them was Cosmo de Medicis, who after hearing Pletho formed the design of establishing a Platonic school at Florence.⁵ For this purpose he caused Marsilius Ficinus, the son of his physician, to be carefully educated and instructed, in order to translate the works of Plato from the Greek into Latin. He therefore first published a Latin version of Hermes Trismegistus, and then of Plotinus, and finally of Plato. This same Cosmo prompted other learned men, as Ambrose of Camalduli, Leonardo Bruno, Poggio, and others, to engage in similar labours, that is, to translate Greek authors into Latin. In consequence of these efforts there soon appeared two schools of philosophy in Italy, which for a long time contended zealously with each other, whether Plato or Aristotle ought to hold the pre-eminence in philosophy.⁶

5. A middle course between the two parties was taken by certain eminent men among both the Greeks and Latins, such as John Francis Picus, Bessarion, Hermolaus Barbarus, and others, who indeed honoured Plato as a kind of oracle in philosophy, yet did not wish to see Aristotle trodden under foot and despised, but rather contemplated a union of the two. Both in their manner of teaching and in their doctrines or principles, these teachers followed the later Platonic school which originated with Ammonius.⁷ This kind of philosophy was for a long time held in high estimation, and was especially prized by the mystic theologians; but the scholastic and disputatious divines were better pleased with the Peripatetic school. Yet these Platonists were not truly wise, for they were not only infected with anile superstition, but they abandoned themselves wholly to the guidance of a wanton imagination.

6. These Platonists however were not so bad as their opponents, the Aristotelians, who had the upper hand in Italy and instructed the youth in all the universities. For these, and especially the followers of Averroes, by maintaining (according to the opinion of Averroes) that all men have one common soul, cunningly subverted the foundations of all religion, both natural and revealed, and approximated very near to the impious tenets of the pantheists, who hold that the universe, as consisting of infinite matter and infinite power of thought, is the deity. The most noted among this class was Peter Pomponatius, a philosopher of Mantua, a crafty and arrogant man, who has left us many writings prejudicial to religion;⁸ yet nearly all the professors of philosophy in the Italian universities coincided with him in sentiment. When pressed by the Inquisitors, these philosophers craftily discriminated between philosophical truth and

¹ Simon, Lettres Choisies, tome i. p. 262, tome iv. p. 131, &c. p. 140, and in other passages.

² Bayle, Dictionnaire, art. Panormita. tome iii. p. 2162. [His name was Antonius Beccatellus of Palermo, or Panormitanus. Mosheim has overrated him as the reviver of Latin poetry. This honour belongs rather to Petrarch in the preceding century, and among the Latin poets of the fifteenth century Politian must be preferred to Beccatellus, who was his contemporary.—H.]

³ See the Itinerarium of Cyriacus Anconitanus, published from a manuscript with a preface, notes, and the epistles of this first antiquary, by Mchus, Florence, 1742, 8vo.—Add Leonard Aretin's Epistola, tom. ii. lib. ix. p. 149, recent edition, Florence. [On all these interesting topics the reader should again refer to Hallam's Intro. to the Liter. of Eur. vol. i. chap. iii.—R.]

⁴ See Heumann's Acta Philosophorum, in German, tom. iii. p. 345.

⁵ On this subject see Sleveking, Geschichte d. Platonischen Akademie zu Florenz. Götting. 1812.—R.]

⁶ Bovin, in the Hist. de l'Acad. des Inscript. et des

Belles Lettres, tome iv. p. 381; Launol, De Varia Fortuna Aristotelis, p. 225; Leo, Allatius, De Georgis, p. 391; La Croze, Entretiens sur Diversa Scripta, p. 384, &c. Joseph Bianchini, in his preface to his Dei Gran Duché di Toscana, &c. quoted in a previous note. Brucker's Hist. Critica Philos. tom. iv. p. 62, &c. [It was not only the respective merits of these two philosophers which was debated in this controversy; the principal question was, which of their systems was most conformable to the doctrines of Christianity, and here the Platonic most certainly deserved the preference, as was abundantly proved by Pletho and others. It is well known that many of the opinions of Aristotle lead directly to atheism.—Macl. [On the character of Pletho and on this controversy, see also Hallam, ubi supra, vol. i. p. 203.—R.]

⁷ See Bessarion's Letter, in the Hist. de l'Acad. des Inscript. et des Bell. Lett. tome v. p. 456; Thomasius, De Syncretismo Peripatetico, in his Orationes, p. 340. [See Tenneman's Manual of the Hist. of Phil. Johnson's transl. p. 273, &c.—R.]

⁸ See Brucker's Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. iv. p. 158, &c.

theological; and said their doctrines were only philosophically true, that is, accordant with sound reason; but they would not deny that they ought, when viewed theologically, to be accounted false. On this impudent subterfuge, Leo X. in the Lateran council held in the following century, at length laid restrictions.

7. In France and Germany the philosophical sects of Realists and Nominalists had everywhere fierce contests with each other, in which they employed not only ratiocination and argument, but also accusations, penal laws, and the force of arms. There was scarcely a university which was undisturbed by this war. In most places however the Realists were more powerful than the Nominalists, or the Terminists as they were also called.¹ In the university of Paris, so long as John Gerson and his immediate pupils lived, the Nominalists were in high authority; but when these were dead, A.D. 1473, Lewis XI. the king of France, at the instigation of the bishop of Avranches who was his confessor, prohibited the doctrine of the Nominalists by a severe edict, and ordered all books composed by men of that sect to be seized and locked up from the public.² But he mitigated his decree in the year 1474, and allowed some books of the Nominalists to be let out of prison.³ And in the year 1481 he restored all the books of the Nominalists to liberty, and reinstated the sect in its former privileges and honours in the university.

CHAPTER II.

HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS AND GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH.

1. No teacher or writer of any eminence in this century can be named who does not plainly and greatly lament the miserable state of the Christian church, and anticipate its ruin unless God should interpose for its rescue. The vices and faults both of the prelates and of the other clerical orders were so manifest, that no one dared to censure such complaints. And even prelates of the highest rank, who spent their lives in idleness and vice of every kind, were obliged to bear with a placid countenance, and even to commend those bold orators who publicly maintained that there was nothing sound in either the head or the members of the church, and who called for the amputation of the infected parts. And indeed he only was accounted an honest and useful man who, fearlessly and vehemently, declaimed against the court of Rome, the pontiff, and all his adherents.⁴

2. At the commencement of the century, the Latin church had two heads or pontiffs, Boniface IX. at Rome, and Benedict XIII. resident at Avignon. On the death of Boniface the cardinals of his party elected, A.D. 1404, Cosmat de Meliorati, who took the name of Innocent VII.⁵ And he dying after two years, or A.D. 1406, his place was filled by Angelo Corrari, a Venetian, who assumed the name of Gregory XII. Both of them promised under oath that they would voluntarily resign the pontificate if the interests of the church should require it, and they both violated their promise. Benedict XIII. being besieged at Avignon by the king of France, A.D. 1408, fled into Catalonia, his native province, and thence removed to Perpignan. Hence eight or nine cardinals of his party, finding themselves deserted by their pontiff, joined the cardinals of the party of Gregory XII. and in conjunction with them, in order to put

⁵ Flacius, in his valuable Catalogus Testium Veritatis, has collected many such testimonies. Still more may be found in Peter de Alliaco's tract De Reformatione Ecclesie, and in the tract of Matthew of Cracovia, bishop of Worms, De Squaloribus Romane Curie, both of which tracts were published by Weissenburg, at Basil, 1551; likewise in the same Weissenburg's Antilogia Romana, Basil, 1555, 8vo; in Wolf's Lectiones Memorabiles, tom. i. and especially in the Monumenta Medii Aevi, by Walch, where we have, tom. i. fascic. 1. p. 1, the tracts De Squaloribus Curie Romane, and p. 101, the Gravamina Nationis German. adversus Curiam Romanam, Joanni Cardinali S. Angeli, Nicolai V. Pontificis Rom. Legato, exhibitæ; and p. 156, Junterburg's tract, De Negligentia Prælatorum, besides many of the speeches made in the council of Constance, which are in the second fasciculus, and are of a similar import. Even at the council of Constance itself, which assembled to reform the church and in which so many testimonies were exhibited of its corrupt state, there were present a great number of buffoons, prostitutes, and public girls (joculatores, meretrices, and virgines publicæ). See the Diarium Bili Hasslicæ, in Ludwig's Reliquia Manuscripta, tom. vi. p. 127.—Schl. [and Von der Hardt's Concilium Constantiense, vol. v. par. ii. p. 50, Geb. Dacherius closes his enumeration of the persons present at the council, taken by order of the Elector of Saxony, with this notice—"Mulieres communes quas reperi in domibus, et ultra et non minus, exceptis aliis, pcc."—R.

⁶ Besides the common writers see especially in regard to Innocent VII. Aretinus, Epistolæ, lib. i. ep. iv. v. p. 6, 19, 21, lib. ii. ep. ii. p. 30, and Callucius Salutatus, Epistolæ, lib. ii. ep. i. p. 1, or p. 18, ed. Florence; in regard to Gregory, the same Aretinus, Epistolæ, lib. ii. ep. iii. p. 32, ep. vii. p. 39, 41, 51, lib. ii. ep. xvii. p. 54, 56, 59; Lami, Deliciae Eruditior. tom. x. p. 494.

¹ See Brückler, ubi supra, tom. v. p. 904; Salabert's Philosophia Nominalium Vindicata, cap. i.; Baluze, Miscellanea, tom. iv. p. 531, &c.; Argentre, Collectio Documentorum de Nonis Erroribus, tom. i. p. 220, &c.

² Naude, Additions à l'Hist. de Louis XI. p. 203; Bulæus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. v. p. 678, 705, 708, &c.; Launoï, Hist. Gymnasii Navarr. in his Opp. tom. iv. par. i. p. 201, 378.

³ Bulæus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. v. p. 710.

⁴ The documents are published by Salabert, Philosophia Nominal. Vindicata, cap. i. p. 104. Add Bulæus, ubi supra, tom. v. p. 739, 747.

an end to the protracted schism, appointed a council of the whole church to be held at Pisa, on the 25th of March, A.D. 1409. But this council, which was designed to heal the wounds of the divided church, unexpectedly inflicted a new wound. On the fifth of June it passed a heavy sentence on each of the pontiffs; for it declared both of them to be heretical, perjured, obstinate, and unworthy of any honours, and excommunicated them from the church. And in their place, on the 26th of June the council created Peter de Candia sovereign pontiff, who assumed the name of Alexander V.¹ But the two pontiffs spurned the decrees of this council, and continued still to perform their functions. Benedict held a council at Perpignan, and Gregory assembled another at Austria [Cividad di Frioul].² near Aquileia; but fearing the resentments of the Venetians, he went first to Cajeta, where he threw himself upon the protection of Ladislaus, king of Naples, and then fled A.D. 1412 to Rimini.

3. The church was thus divided between three pontiffs, who fiercely assailed each other with reciprocal excommunications, reproaches, and maledictions. Alexander V. who was elected in the council of Pisa, died at Bologna A.D. 1410.³ The sixteen cardinals who were present in the city immediately filled his place with Balthasar Cossa, a Neapolitan, who took the name of John XXIII. a man destitute of principle and of piety.⁴ From this war of the pontiffs vast evils arose, which affected both the church and the state. Hence the emperor Sigismund, the king of France, and other kings and princes of Europe, spared no pains or expense to restore harmony and bring the church again under one head. The pontiffs could not be persuaded at all to prefer the peace of the church before their own glory, so that no course remained but to assemble a general council of the whole church to take cognizance of this great controversy. Such a council, John XXIII. being prevailed on by the entreaties of Sigismund and hoping that it would favour his cause, appointed to be held at Constance A.D. 1414. In this council were present the pontiff John, the emperor Sigismund, many princes of Germany, and the ambassadors of the other kings and princes of Europe and of the republics.⁵

4. The principal object of this great council was to extinguish the discord between the pontiffs, and this they successfully accomplished. For having established by two solemn decrees in the fourth and fifth sessions, that a pontiff is subject to a council of the whole church, and having most carefully vindicated the authority of councils,⁶ they on the 29th of May, A.D.

¹ See Lenfant's Hist. du Concile de Pise, Amsterd. 1724, 4to; Pagl, Breviarium Pontific. Romanor. tom. iv. p. 350; Bossuet, Defensio Decretis Cleri Gallicani de Potestate Eccles. tom. ii. p. 17, &c. and elsewhere.—[The Italian Romanists generally hold that this council was not an œcumenical one; and the French as generally hold or at least held the opposite view, that it was a general council and the pope elected by it the true pope. That the French clergy of the present day do not entertain these views and have no sympathy with the well-known school of Bossuet on this and on kindred questions, seems more than probable from what the Rev. Dr. Wadsworth has related in his Diary in France, Lond. 1845. According to him there is now no party in the national church of France in favour of the once boasted "Gallican liberties," for which so keen a contest was waged by the French ecclesiastics of the 17th century against the ultramontane party.—R.]

² Lenfant (Hist. du Concile de Pise, tome i. p. 295) says, the place of this council was Cividad di Frioul and Udine, towns two miles apart in the diocese of Aquileia, in the Venetian states.—Mur.

³ Alexander committed two faults which very much injured his cause. He published a bull for the advantage of the Mendicants in regard to hearing confessions, which was so offensive to the secular clergy and particularly to the university of Paris, that under the countenance of the king they set themselves against it; and his successor, John XXII. found it necessary to repeal it. In the next place, by the advice of the cardinal legate of Bologna, Balthasar of Cossa, he ventured to go to Rome, which prepared the way for Lewis, king of Naples, to gain the victory over his enemy, king Ladislaus. Under him likewise a cardinal was allowed to hold many benefices, three or four deaneries, as many presbyterships, besides several bishoprics.—Schl.

⁴ History represents him as a great villain, and in the council of Constance he was accused, among other crimes, of procuring the death of his predecessor with poison. His persecution of Ladislaus, whom he very unreasonably excommunicated, and offended still more by proclaiming a crusade against him, obliged him to court the friendship of the emperor Sigismund, who by a master-piece of policy induced him to call the council of Constance.—Schl.

⁵ The Acts of this celebrated council were published in six volumes, fol. by Von der Hardt, Frankfurt, 1700, an elaborate work yet imperfect; for very many Acts are wanting in it, while many Acts are inserted which might have been omitted. Lenfant composed an elegant history of this council in French, which was printed, 2d ed. Amsterd. 1728, 4to [also in English, 2 vols. 4to.—Mur.] A Supplement to it, composed however with little judgment, was added by Bourgeois du Chastenot, an advocate of Paris, entitled Nouvelle Histoire du Concile de Constance, ou l'on fait voir combien la France a contribué à l'Extinction du Schisme, Paris, 1718, 4to. [The student should also read carefully the admirable summary of the proceedings of this council and the relative extracts from the original sources, in sec. 130 of Gieseler's Lehrbuch, &c. Cunningham's transl. vol. iii. p. 167, &c.—R.]

⁶ Concerning these two celebrated decrees which are extremely hateful to the pontiffs, see Natalis Alexander's Hist. Eccles. sæc. xv. diss. iv.; Bossuet's Defensio Sententiae Cleri Gallicani de Potestate Eccles. tom. ii. p. 2, 23, &c. and Lenfant's Diss. Historique et Apologétique pour Jean Gerson et Concile de Constance, annexed to his History of that council. [The second decree of the 6th of April repeats the most essential parts of the first, or that of the 30th of March, and is as follows: "Hæc sancta synodus Constantiensis generale concilium faciens, pro extirpatione ipsius schismatis, et unione et reformatione ecclesie Dei in capite et in membris, &c. ordinat, definit, decernit, et declarat, ut sequitur. Et primo declarat, quod ipsa in Spiritu Sancto legitime congregata, concilium generale faciens, et ecclesiam catholicam representans, potestatem a Christo immediate habet, cui quilibet cujuscunque status vel dignitatis etiam si papalis, existat, obedire

1415, removed John XXIII. from the pontificate on account of various offences and crimes;¹ for he had pledged himself to the council to resign the pontificate and yet had withdrawn himself by flight. Gregory XII. voluntarily resigned his pontificate on the 4th of July in the same year, through Charles de Malatesta. And Benedict XIII. on the 26th of July, 1417, was deprived of his rank as pontiff by a solemn decree of the council. After these transactions, on the 11th of November, A.D. 1417, Otto de Colonna was elected pontiff by the unanimous suffrages of the cardinals, and assumed the name of Martin V. Benedict XIII. who resided at Perpignan resisted indeed, and claimed the rights and the dignity of a pontiff till his death A.D. 1423; and after the death of this obstinate man, under the auspices of Alphonsus, king of Sicily, Ægidius Mugnos, a Spaniard, was appointed by only two cardinals to succeed him. He assumed the name of Clement VIII. and wished to be regarded as the legitimate pontiff; but in the year 1429 he was persuaded to resign the government of the church entirely to Martin V.

5. The acts passed in this council for the suppression and extirpation of heretics are not equally commendable, and some of them are wholly inexcusable. Before the meeting of the council great religious commotions had arisen in several countries, and especially in Bohemia. At Prague lived and taught with much applause John Huss, an eloquent and learned man, who performed the duties of a professor of theology in the university, and those of a minister of the Gospel in the church. He preached vehemently against the vices of the clergy of all ranks; and numerous others did so in that age, nor did any good man disapprove of it. He likewise endeavoured, after the year 1408, to detach the university from the interests of Gregory XII. whom Bohemia acknowledged as pontiff. This gave great offence to the archbishop of Prague and to the rest of the clergy who adhered to the interests of Gregory. Hence arose great hostility between Huss and the archbishop, which the former sustained and increased by his discourses against the Romish court and the vices of the clergy.

6. To these first causes of hatred against Huss, which might easily have been surmounted, others were added of greater magnitude. First, he took the side of the Realists in philosophy, and therefore in accordance with the habits of the age goaded and pressed the Nominalists to the utmost of his power; yet their number was very considerable in the university of Prague, and their influence was not small.² Afterwards in the year 1408, it was by his influence that in the controversy between the Germans and Bohemians, respecting the number of votes [each was to have in the university], the decision was in favour of the Bohemians. By the laws of the university it was ordained that in the academic discussions the Bohemians should have three votes, and the other three nations but one. The university was then divided into four nations, three of which, the Bavarian, Polish, and Saxon, were comprehended under the general name of the German nation. The usage had been that the Germans, who far exceeded the Bohemians in numbers, gave three votes and the Bohemians but one. Huss therefore either from partiality to his country or from his hatred to the Nominalists, whom the greatest part of the Germans preferred before the Realists, obtained, by means of the vast influence at court which his eloquence gave him, a decree that the Germans should be deprived of the privilege of three votes and should content themselves with one.³ This result of a long contest so offended the Germans that a great multitude of them with the rector of the university, John Hoffman, at their tenetur in his que pertinent ad fidem et extirpationem dicti schismatis, et reformationem dicte ecclesie in capite et in membris. Item declarat, quod quicumque cujuscumque conditionis, status, dignitatis, etiam si papalis, qui mandatis, statutis seu ordinationibus, aut preceptis hujus sacre synodi et cujuscumque alterius concilii generalis legitime congregati, super premissis, seu ad ea pertinentibus, factis, vel faciendis, obedire contumaciter contempserit, nisi resipuerit, condigne penitentia subleciatur, et debito puniatur, etiam ad alia juris subsidia (si opus fuerit) recurrendo."

The decree then goes on to forbid Pope John from dissolving or removing the council to any other place without its consent, or from withdrawing any of his officers and servants from attending on the council so long as it shall remain at Constance. It further declares null and void all censures, deprivations of office, &c. passed, or that might be passed by the said pope, upon any persons whatever to the prejudice of the council. See Harduin, Concilia, tom. viii. p. 258, 259.

—Mur.

¹ The crimes of this pope are laid down in certain articles in Von der Hardt's Acta Concilii Constant. tom. iv. p. 196, among which are the following: Simony, extortion, poisoning, adultery, incest, the sale of ecclesiastical offices and bulls, &c.—Schl. [See the articles at large in Harduin, Concilia, tom. viii. p. 313, &c. and the judgment of the council upon them, ibid. p. 376.]

—Mur.

² There is a letter of the Nominalists to Lewis VI. king of France, in Baluze's Miscellanea, tom. iv. p. 534, which says:—"Legimus Nominales expulsos de Bohemia eo tempore, quo hæretici voluerunt Bohemicum regnum suis hæresibus inficere. Quum dicti hæretici non possent disputando superare, impetraverunt ab Alaiselao (Wenceslao) principe Bohemie, ut gubernarentur studia Pragensia ritu Parisiensium. Quo edicto coacti sunt supradicti Nominales Pragæ civitatem relinquere, et se transtulerunt ad Lipzicam civitatem, et ibidem Universitatem crexerunt solemnissimam."

³ According to some statements, by the royal ordinance of Jan. 18, 1409, "three votes were given to the Bohemians instead of one, and to the Germans three," as had hitherto been." See Gieseler's Text-book by Cunningham. vo' iii. p. 344. note 7.—Mur

head, left the university of Prague and retired to Leipsic, where Frederick the Wise, the elector of Saxony [or rather Frederick the Warlike, margrave of Meissen],¹ founded a university on their account in the year 1409. This event contributed much to increase the odium against Huss and to work his ruin. The Germans being ejected from Prague, Huss inveighed more freely than before against the vices of the clergy, and also publicly preached and recommended the opinions and the books of John Wickliffe, the Englishman. Being accused before John XXIII. in the year 1410, he was excommunicated by the pontiff. But he despised this thunder, and both orally and afterwards in various writings continued to chastise the corruptions of the Romish church and of the whole clerical order, with the applause of great numbers.²

7. He was a good man and a lover of real piety, though perhaps sometimes over ardent and not sufficiently prudent. Being summoned to the council of Constance and being protected by a safe conduct from the emperor Sigismund, he went thither for the purpose of demonstrating his innocence, and of proving the falsehood of the charge that he had apostatized from the Roman church. And certainly he had not departed in things of any moment from the religion of his time, but had only inveighed severely against the pontiffs, the court of Rome, the bishops and clergy, and the monks, which was a common practice at that day and was daily done in the council of Constance itself. Yet his enemies, who were numerous both in Bohemia and in the council, managed the procedure against him so artfully and successfully, that in violation of the public faith he was cast into prison; and when he would not at the command of the council confess guilt, he was adjudged a heretic and burned alive on the 6th day of July, A.D. 1415. Full of faith and the love of God he sustained this punishment with admirable constancy.³ The same unnions or in his life and conduct. Hence they concluded that he was unrighteously oppressed by his enemies. And the conclusion of these excellent men is most just; for it is not difficult to show whence arose the readiness of the Fathers assembled at Constance to inflict the punishment of a heretic on this good man, who by no means merited it. I. By his discourses and his writings Huss had produced very great commotion in Bohemia, and had excited vast odium against the whole sacred order, among the people. And the bishops, the priests, and the monks, could readily see that if this man should return to his country, and should go on to write and to teach, they must lose their honours, influence, and emoluments. And therefore they strove to the utmost, and spared neither money nor pains nor labour with his judges, to persuade them to destroy so dangerous an enemy. Byzantius, in his Diarium Hussitum, p. 135 (in Ludwig's Reliquie, tom. vi.) says:—"Clerus perversus præcipue in regno Boemie et marchionatu Moravie condemnationem ipsius (Hussi), contributionem pecuniarum et modis aliis diversis procuravit, et ad ipsius consensum interitum." And in page 150 he says: "Clerus perversus regni Bohemie et marchionatus Moravie, et præcipue Episcopi, Abbates, Canonici, plebani et religiosi, ipsius fideles ac salutiferas admonitiones, adhortationes, ipsorum pompam, symoniam, avaritiam, fornicationem vitæque detestandæ abominatorem detegentes, ferre non valendo, pecuniarum contributiones ad ipsius extinctionem faciendæ procurarunt." II. In the council itself there were many individuals of influence and power who thought themselves greatly injured by Huss, and who were willing to avenge those injuries by the death of the good man. Huss, being a Realist, had rendered himself extremely odious to the Nominalists. And unfortunately for him, his principal judges were Nominalists, and especially the oracle of the council, John Gerson, was the great champion of the Nominalists and an enemy of Huss. These rejoiced to have, in the person of Huss, a man on whom they could take revenge more sweet than life itself. The Nominalists in their letter to Lewis, king of France (in Baluze, Miscellanea, tom. iv. p. 534), do not disguise the fact that Huss fell by the hand and efforts of their sect. "Suscevit Deus doctores Catholicos, Petrum de Allynco, Johannem de Gersonno, et alios quamplures doctissimos viros Nominales, qui convocati ad concilium Constantiense, ad quod citati fuerant hæretici, et nominatim Hieronymus et Johannes, — dictos hæreticos per quadraginta dies disputando superaverunt." That it was really so, the history of the council of Constance shows. The hostility at that time between the Realists and the Nominalists was deadly. Each sect on every occasion that offered, accused the other of heresy and impiety and inflicted punishment accordingly. The Nominalists at Constance condemned Huss a Realist; and on the other hand, the Realists condemned John de Wesalia a Nominalist, in the year 1479. See the Examen Magistræ ac Theologicæ Mag. Joh. de Wesalii, in Ortulius Grævius, Fasciculus Rerum Expendarum et Fugendarum. Colon. 1535, p. 163. I will transcribe from this Examen a memorable passage, illustrative of the deadly feud between the Nominalists and the Realists, p. 166, b.:—"Quis nisi ipse diabolus seminavit illam zizaniam inter philosophos et inter theologos, ut tanta sit dissensio, etiam animorum, inter diversa opinantes? Adeo ut si universalia quisquam realia negaverit, existimetur in Spiritum Sanctum peccavisse, immo summo et maximo peccato plenus creditur contra Deum, contra religionem, contra justitiam, contra omnem politiam graviter deliquisse. Unde hæc cæcitas mentis, nisi a diabolo, qui phantasias nostras illudit." III. These in other respects excellent and devout men, Huss and Jerome, burned with hatred against the Germans. This hatred they publicly confessed at Prague, it accompanied them to Constance, and they did not disguise it before the council. Theod. de Niem, Insectia in Joh. XXIII. (in Hardt's Acta Concilii Constant. tom. II. p. 450):—"Improbabat etiam in publico Alemanni dicendo, quod essent presumptuosi et vellet ubique per orbem dominari. Sicque factum fuisset sæpe in Boemia, ubi volentes etiam dominari Alemanni, violentè exinde repulsi et male tractati fuissent." On the other hand, the Germans, mindful of the injuries they had received at Prague, conceived the most violent hatred against these men. Yet the influence of the Germans was very great in the council. And who can doubt that they exerted that influence against their happy fate was borne with the same pious fortitude and constancy by Jerome of Prague, the companion of John Huss, who had come to Constance to support and aid his friend. He at first through fear of death yielded to the mandates of the council, and renounced those opinions which the council had condemned in him; but being retained still in prison he resumed courage, again avowed those opinions, and was therefore committed to the flames on the 30th of May, A.D. 1416.¹ adversaries? IV. Finally, the very rector of the university of Prague, John Hoffman, who together with the German nation had been driven from Prague by Huss, and who was his principal enemy, was made bishop of Misula 1413, and held a high place among the representatives of the German church in this council; and undoubtedly he was an unlucky star to Huss in it.

¹ Mosheim says that Fredericus Sapiens, Saxonie Septemvir, established the university of Leipsic in the year 1409. This was certainly a slip of memory in the venerable old man. It was not Frederick the Wise but Frederick the Warlike who established the university of Leipsic; and when he instituted it he was only Margrave of Meissen and Landgrave of Thuringia, not Elector, to which dignity he did not attain till the death of Albrecht III. duke of Wittenburg, without issue, A.D. 1423.—Schl. [Historians differ much in their accounts of the number of Germans who retired from the university of Prague upon this occasion. Æneas Sylvius reckons 5,000, Trithemius and others 2,000, Dubravius 24,000, Lupacius 44,000, Lauda, a contemporary writer, 36,000.—Macl.

² See Byzantius, Diarium Belli Hussitici, in Ludwig's Reliquie Manuscriptorum, tom. vi. p. 127, &c.

³ Learned men have searched for the causes of so cruel a sentence being passed upon John Huss and his companions, nor do they find them either in his opi-

Although these were the real causes of the condemnation of Huss, yet it must be confessed there appeared one mark of a heretic in him, for which in the judgment of that age he might with some colour of justice be condemned. I refer to his inflexible obstinacy, which the Romish church usually regards, even in those who err very little, as the most grievous heresy. Huss was commanded by this council, which was supposed to represent the whole church, to confess his faults and to abjure his errors. He most pertinaciously refused to do this unless first convinced of error. Thus he resisted the Catholic church; he wished the church to show a reason for the sentence passed upon him, and he not obscurely signified that the church might be in an error. This indeed was a great crime and intolerable heresy. For a true son of the church ought to subject his own judgment and pleasure without reserve to the will of his mother, and to believe firmly that she could not possibly err. The Romish church indeed had for many ages followed Pliny's principle: Epist. lib. x. ep. xvii. p. 495, where he says:—"Perseverantes, ducti jussi. Neque enim dubitabam, qualemque esset quod faterentur, pervicaciam certe et inflexibilem obstinationem debere puniri." [For the Life of Huss see Gilpin's Lives of the Reformers, vol. i.; Middleton's Biographia Evangelica, vol. i. p. 22, &c.—Mur.] The student should read with care sec. 149 of Gieseler's Lehrbuch, &c. Cunningham's transl. vol. iii. p. 341, &c. which presents a concise view of these transactions. See also The Reformers before the Reformation, by Emile de Bonnechose, translated from the French by C. Mackenzie, Edin. 1844, 2 vols. This interesting work treats exclusively of Huss and Jerome and the council of Constance, and will amply repay a perusal. The evangelical author followed it up by publishing a French version from the Latin of Huss's Letters, amounting to above seventy, which has also been translated into English by Mr. Mackenzie, entitled, Letters of John Huss, written during his Exile and Imprisonment, with Luther's Preface, Edin. 1846. But the most satisfactory source of information respecting this venerable martyr and his companion in suffering must ever be, his own writings with the contemporary documents, as they have been carefully collected in that valuable work.—Historia et Monumenta Jo. Huss atque Hier. Pragensis, &c. Nurem. 1558, and again, with considerable additions, in 1715, 2 vols. fol.—H.

¹ For the history of Jerome of Prague, see Gilpin's Lives of the Reformers, vol. i. and Middleton's Biographia Evangelica, vol. i. p. 47, &c.—Mur. [The name of this celebrated martyr was Jerome Faulstich; for information respecting him see the works referred to in the preceding note.—H.

² The forty-five articles extracted from Wickliffe's writings and condemned by the council, may be seen in all the collections of councils; e.g. Harduin's Concilia, tom. viii. p. 229, &c.—Mur. [They are also to be found with several other documents relative to Huss, in a very curious and valuable collection of public papers, showing the necessity of a reformation in the church, and demanding such a reform, prior to the time of Luther. It is entitled, Fasciculus Herum Ex-

8. Before Huss and Jerome were condemned by the council, John Wickliffe, who was considered and not unjustly as their teacher, was pronounced infamous and condemned by a decree of these fathers. For on the 4th day of May A.D. 1415, the council declared a number of opinions extracted from his writings to be abominable, and ordered all his books to be destroyed and his bones to be burned.² Not long after, on the 14th of June they passed the famous decree that the sacred supper should be administered to the laity in the element of bread alone, forbidding communion in both the elements. For in the preceding year 1414, Jacobellus de Misa, curate of the parish of St. Michael at Prague, by the instigation of a Parisian doctor, Peter of Dresden, had begun to celebrate the communion in both elements at Prague, and a number of other parishes had followed his example.³ The subject being brought before the council by one of the Bohemian bishops, they deemed this heresy deserving of rebuke. By this decree of the council of Constance, the communion of the laity in one element obtained the force and authority of a law in the Romish church.

9. In the same year the council included in the list of execrable errors or heresies, the opinion of John Petit, a Parisian theologian, of the lawfulness even in any private person of killing a tyrant; but they did not name the author of the opinion because he was supported by very powerful patrons. John, duke of Burgundy, employed assassins in the year 1407 to murder Lewis, the duke of Orleans. A great contest ensued, and Petit, an eloquent and ingenious man, pleaded the cause of the duke of Burgundy at Paris; and in order to justify his conduct, he maintained that it is no sin to destroy a tyrant without a trial of his cause, by force or fraud or in any other manner, and even if the persons doing it are bound to him by an oath or covenant.

petendarum et fugiendarum, &c. and was published at Cologne in 1535, fol. by Ortilius Gratius. But a greatly enlarged edition, containing a number of pieces never before printed, was published at London in 1690 by the Rev. Edward Brown, in two volumes, fol.—H.

³ Byzinius, Diarium Belli Hussit. p. 124. [Peter of Dresden had studied at Prague, and had been driven thence with the other Germans. He was afterwards expelled from Saxony, on account of his embracing and disseminating Waldensian doctrines, and now returned again to Prague. He acted the part of a schoolmaster there, and was the friend of Huss and Jerome. The proper name of Jacobellus was Jacobus, the first being a nickname. The opposition made to his administering the communion in both elements, only rendered him more zealous; so that his party increased and had numerous adherents, not only at Prague but throughout Bohemia. Yet he was more fortunate than Huss and Jerome, and lived till A.D. 1429. His writings are in Von der Haardt's Acta Concilii Constant. tom. iii.—Mur.

By a tyrant however Petit did not understand the sovereign of a nation, but a powerful citizen who abuses his resources to the ruin of his king and country.¹ The university of Paris passed a stern and severe sentence upon the author of so dangerous an opinion. The council after several consultations passed sentence, without naming the author of the opinion. But the new pontiff, Martin V. through fear of the house of Burgundy, would not ratify even this mild sentence of the council.²

10. After these and some other transactions, the council proceeded avowedly to the subject of reforming the pontiffs and the whole sacred order, or a reformation of the church in its head and members, as the language of that age was. For all Europe saw the need of such a reformation, and most ardently wished for it. Nor did the council deny that it was chiefly for this important object they had been called together. But the cardinals and principal men of the Romish court, for whose interest especially it was that the disorders of the church should remain untouched, craftily urged and brought the majority to believe, that a business of such magnitude could not be managed advantageously without first electing a new pontiff. But the new head of the church, Martin V. abused his power to elude the design of reforming the church, and manifested by his commands and edicts that he did not wish the church to be purged and restored to a sound state. Therefore on the 22d of April A.D. 1418, the council after deliberating three years and six months broke up, leaving their business unfinished, and assigned the reformation of the church, which all men devoutly prayed for, to a council to be called at the end of five years.

11. Martin V. being admonished on the subject, after a long delay appointed this other council to be held at Pavia, and afterwards removed it to Siena and lastly to Basil. But in the very commencement of it, on the 21st of Feb. 1431 he died, and was succeeded in the month of March by Gabriel Condolmerus, a Venetian and bishop of Siena, who took the name of Eugene IV. He sanctioned all that Martin had decreed respecting the council to be held at Basil; and thence on the 23d of July, 1431, it commenced under the presidency of cardinal Julian, as representative of the pontiff. Two objects especially were assigned to this celebrated council; first, a union between the Greeks and the Latins, and secondly, the reformation of the church both in its head and its members, according to the resolution adopted in the council of Constance. And that the head, that is, the sovereign pontiffs and likewise all the members of the church, that is, the bishops, priests, and monks, had become very corrupt, no one hesitated to admit. But when these fathers by the form of the council,³ by their method of proceeding, and by their first decrees, showed that they intended to perform in earnest what they were bidden to do, Eugene IV. being afraid of these reformers of a corrupt church, twice attempted to dissolve the council. This the fathers most firmly resisted, and they showed by the decrees of the council of Constance and by other arguments, that the council was superior in authority to a pontiff. This first contest between the pontiff and the council was brought to a close in the month of November A.D. 1433; for the pontiff silently gave up the point, and in the month of December by letters sent from Rome approved of the proceedings of the council.¹

³ By the "form of the council," Mosheim undoubtedly means the division of the cardinals, archbishops, bishops, abbots, &c. into four equal classes, without any regard to the nation or province by which they were sent. This prudent arrangement prevented the cabals and intrigues of the Italians, whose bishops were much more numerous than those of other nations, and who by their number might have had it in their power to retard or defeat the laudable purpose the council had in view, had things been otherwise ordered.—Macl. [The organization of this council and its mode of doing business were these. The members of the council were distributed into four equal bodies, each consisting of about the same number of high dignitaries and low, and each completely organized with its president, secretaries, and other officers. Each of the four was especially charged with the investigation of a particular class of subjects, such as articles of faith, peace, reformation, or miscellaneous affairs. These bodies met separately in their respective halls at the same hour, thrice a week; but they never discussed any subject on the first day of its coming before them. Their first care was to appoint three of the most competent members in each body, to unite in a grand committee of overtures for all the four bodies. One-third of this committee was changed every month, and others chosen by their respective bodies. All business was first to pass the committee of overtures, and if they saw fit, they sent it to the body which had charge of such subjects. That body discussed it fully, and then sent their decision together with the reasons for it to each of the other bodies, or if they were not agreed, they sent the opinions both of the majority and the minority with their respective arguments. The other bodies now discussed the subject, and passed their judgment upon it. When the question had been thus discussed in all the four bodies, if three of them were found to be agreed respecting it, the subject was at last brought before the whole council for a general discussion and a final decision. See Mansi, Concilia, tom. xxix. p. 377; also Natalis Alexander, Hist. Eccles. sæc. 15, 16, diss. viii. art. ii. sect. 4, tom. xviii. p. 457, &c.—Mur.

¹ This is manifest from the oration of Petit which Lefant has subjoined to his Hist. du Concile de Pise, tome II. p. 303, &c. See Lyserus, Dissert. qui memoriam Joh. Burgundi et Doctrinam Joh. Paris de Cede Perduellum vindicat. Wittebm. 1735, 4to.

² See Buleus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. v. p. 113, &c. and many other passages; Argentre, Collectio Judicior. de Novis Erroribus, tom. I. par. II. p. 184, &c.; the Opera of Jo. Gerson, published by Du Pin, tom. v.; Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome iii. p. 2268, &c. [article Petit.] and nearly all the historians of France: [e.g. Gifford's Hist. of France, vol. ii. p. 377—Mur.

12. After this, the council prosecuted with energy the business which they had entered upon. The legates of the Roman pontiff were now admitted into the council, but not till they had promised under oath to obey the decrees of the council, and particularly the decrees of the council of Constance, asserting the dominion and jurisdiction of councils over the pontiffs. These decrees of Constance, so odious to the pontiffs, were renewed in a public meeting of the fathers on the 26th of June, 1434, and the 9th of June, 1435. Annats as they were called were abolished, the pontifical legates in vain opposing it. On the 25th of March, 1436, a profession of faith was read which pontiffs must assent to on the day of their election, the number of cardinals was reduced to twenty-four, and expectatives, reservations, and provisions were abolished. As they were proceeding to other things very unacceptable to the pontiff, Eugene concluded that this very audacious and troublesome council must either be removed to Italy, or be curbed by another council in opposition to it. Therefore, when these fathers decreed, May 7, 1437, that on account of the Greeks the council should be held either at Basil or Avignon or in some city of Savoy, the pontiff on the contrary by his legates decided that the council should be held in Italy. Neither party would revoke its decision. Hence a violent conflict from this time onward existed between the pontiff and the council. On the 26th of July, 1437, the council ordered the pontiff to appear before them at Basil, and give account of his conduct. The pontiff on the other hand dissolved the council, and appointed another at Ferrara. But the fathers, with the approbation of the emperor, the king of France, and other princes, continued their deliberations at Basil, and on the 28th of September of the same year pronounced the pontiff contumacious for not obeying the council.

13. On the 10th of January of the next year, A.D. 1438, Eugene IV. in person opened the council which he had summoned to meet at Ferrara, and in the second session of it excommunicated the fathers assembled at Basil. The chief business of this council was to negotiate a union between the Greeks and Latins. The Greek emperor John Palæologus, the patriarch of Constantinople Joseph, and the principal theologians and bishops of the nation came personally to Italy, in order to facilitate the success of this important negotiation. For the Greeks, now reduced to extremities by the Turks, indulged the hope that if their disagreements with the Roman pontiffs were removed, the Latins would afford them succour. The business proceeded tardily and with little success at Ferrara, but afterwards with better success at Florence. For Eugene, in the beginning of the year 1439, on account of the pestilence at Ferrara, had ordered the council to remove to Florence. The fathers at Basil, provoked by these and other acts of Eugene, proceeded on the 25th of June, 1439, to deprive him of the pontificate; but this bold procedure did not meet the approbation of the kings and princes of Europe. Eugene, by a very severe bull, on the 4th of September anathematized the Basilian fathers and rescinded all their acts. Despising these thunders, on the 17th of September 1439, they elected a new pontiff, Amadeus, duke of Savoy, who then led a retired life at Ripailles on the Leman Lake. He assumed the name of Felix V.

14. Thus the lamentable schism, which had been extinguished after so much labour and toil at Constance, returned with new and greater misfortunes. For there were not only two pontiffs mutually condemning each other, but likewise two opposing councils, of Basil and of Florence. The greater part of the church indeed adhered to Eugene; but most of the universities, and particularly the first among them, that of Paris, as well as some kingdoms and provinces, chose to follow Felix V. The council of Basil continued to deliberate and to pass laws and decrees till the year 1443, notwithstanding all the opposition of Eugene and his adherents. And although the council separated in the year 1443, yet they publicly declared that the council was not at an end, but would assemble again at a proper time either at Basil, or Lyons, or Lausanne. The council of Florence under Eugene was chiefly occupied in settling the disputes between the Latins and the Greeks. This great business was committed to select individuals of both parties. The most distinguished of the Greeks was Bessarion, a very learned man, who was afterwards a cardinal in the Romish church. This man, being gained by the favours bestowed on him by the pontiff, exerted his influence, and the pontiff employed rewards, threats, and promises, to induce the other Greeks to accede to the proposed terms of accommodation, and to acknowledge that the Holy Spirit proceeded also from the Son, that departed souls undergo a purgation by fire before they are admitted to the vision of God, that unleavened bread may be used in the sacred supper, and lastly, what was the most important of all, that the Roman pontiff is the head and the judge of the church universal. One of the Greeks, Mark of Ephesus, could not be persuaded by entreaties or by bribes to give his assent. After all, this peace, which was extorted by various artifices, was not stable. For the Greeks on their return to Constantinople stated to their fellow-citizens, that everything had been carried at Florence by artifice and fraud, and they resumed their hostility. The council of Florence closed its deliberations on the 26th of April A.D. 1442.¹ There were also negotiations in this council for bringing the Armenians and the Jacobites, but especially the Abyssinians, into union with the Romish church, which were attended with the same result as those respecting the Greeks.

¹ A history of this great council, which is so worthy of everlasting remembrance, is wanting. One was contemplated by Baluze. See the Hist. de l'Acad. des Inscriptions et des Belles Lettres, tome vi. p. 644. After him by Lenfant also. But neither of them fulfilled his promise. Its acts were collected by Von der Hardt with vast labour, at the expense of Rudolph Augustus, Duke of Brunswick, out of various archives and libraries and put into many volumes, and they are said still to exist in the Wolfenbuttle library and to be most worthy of publication. Till they appear, the more brief Acta Concilii may be consulted, which were published in various places and among others, Paris, 1512, 8vo (which is the edition I have used in this history), also Ænonus Sylvius, De Concilio Basiliensi; Richer's Hist. Concilior. Generalium, lib. iii. c. 1.; Cansius, Lectiones Antiquæ, tom. iv. p. 447, and others. [We have indeed Lenfant's Hist. de la Guerre des Humains et du Concile de Bâle, in two volumes, 4to, Amsterdam, 1713. But the larger work expected from him has not appeared. It is also known that the entire acts of this council still lie concealed in various libraries: e.g. in that of the College of Navarre at Paris. See Schöppin's Comment. Hist. et Crit. p. 541. Imperfect Acts may be found in Harduin's Concilia, tom. viii. p. 1103, &c. and in Mansi, Supplem. Concil. tom. iv. p. 159, &c. tom. v. p. 192, and tom. vi. p. 573. Extracts from these Acts are given in Semler's Selecta Hist. Eccl. Capita, tom. iii. æsc. xv. p. 101—140.—Schl. (See references to additional and more recent works on this council, in Gieseler, Lehrbuch, &c. Cunningham's transl. vol. iii. p. 184, &c. He gives a pretty full account of its proceedings and reforms, and of the circumstances which enabled the popes to defeat its good intentions and retain the church in bondage to their authority. Some further insight into its proceedings may be gleaned from Shepherd's Life of Poggio Bracciolini, Liverp. 1802, 4to.—R.

¹ A history of this council and of its base artifices was composed by a Greek, Sylvester Egiropulus, and was published with a Latin version, apparatus, and notes, by Robert Creighton, an Englishman, at the Hague, 1660, fol. In opposition to this, Leo Allatius wrote his Exercitationes in Creightoni Apparatum, Versionem, et Notas ad Historiam Concilii Florentini scriptam a Sguropulo, Rome, 1674, 4to. See also his De Perpetua Consensione Ecclesie Orientalis et Occidentalis, lib. iii. cap. i. p. 875, &c. And compare Mabillon's Museum Italicum, tom. i. p. 243; Spanheim, De Perpetua Disensione Eccles. Orient. et Occident. Opp. tom. ii. p. 491, &c.; Hermann's Hist. Concertat. de Pense Azymo, par. ii. c. v. p. 124, &c. [The acts of the council are in Harduin's Concilii, tom. ix. p. 533, &c.; and in Mansi's Concilia, tom. v. p. 197, &c. The most essential things in these acts are concisely stated in Selmer's Selecta Hist. Eccles. Capita, tom. iii. sæcul. xv. p. 140—163.—Schl

15. The author of this new pontifical schism, Eugene IV. died in the month of February, 1447, and was succeeded in the month of March by Nicolaus V. who was previously Thomas de Sarzano, bishop of Bologna, a man of learning and a great patron of learning, and likewise a man of moderation and disposed for peace.² Under him, by means of the persevering labours and efforts of the kings and princes of Europe, especially of the king of France, tranquillity was restored to the Latin church. For Felix V. on the 9th of April, 1449, resigned the supremacy of the church, and retired to his former quiet at Ripailles; and the fathers of Basil assembled on the 16th of April at Lausanne ratified the abdication of Felix, and by a solemn decree directed the whole church to obey Nicolaus only. On the 18th of June Nicolaus promulgated this pacification, and at the same time confirmed by his sanction the acts and decrees of the council of Basil. This Nicolaus was particularly distinguished for his love of literature and the arts, which he laudably exerted himself to advance and encourage in Italy, especially by means of Greeks who came from Constantinople.³ He died on the 24th of March, 1455, principally from grief occasioned by the capture of Constantinople by the Turks.

16. His successor, Alphonsus Borgia, a Spaniard, whose pontifical name was Calixtus III. performed nothing great or splendid, except showing himself very zealous in urging Christian princes to war against the Turks. He died in the year 1458. Much more celebrated was his successor, Æneas Sylvius Piccolomini, bishop of Siena, who ascended the papal throne A.D. 1458 and took the name of Pius II. a man of superior genius, and renowned both for his achievements and for his various writings and publications. Yet posterity would have accounted him a much greater man if he had not been guilty of gross inconsistency. For after strenuously maintaining the rights of councils against the pontiffs, and boldly defending the cause of the council of Basil against Eugene IV. upon being made pontiff he apostatized from himself; and on the 18th January, 1460, denied that a council is superior to a pontiff, and severely prohibited appeals to councils; and in the year 1461 obtained from Lewis XI. king of France, the abrogation of the pragmatic sanction, which was favourable to councils;¹ and finally, April 26th, 1463, he publicly disapproved of all that he had himself written in favour of the council of Basil, and decreed that Pius II. was to be heard and obeyed, but that Æneas Sylvius was to be condemned. After making this declaration he died in the month of July A.D. 1464.²

² Peace-loving as this pope may have been, he did what the official usages of those times required, and issued a bull to all the faithful in the year 1447 (Harduin, tom. ix. p. 1313), in which he calls Felix iniquitatis alumnum, transfers the duchy of Savoy to the French king, exhorts that monarch or his dauphin to a crusade against his rival pontiff, and denies forgiveness and eternal salvation to all who co-operate with him. Notwithstanding this, he created this same Felix in the year 1449, bishop of Sabina, cardinal and viceroy of the apostolic see in Savoy, and confirmed all the judicial sentences and acts of grace passed by him; nay, he revoked all that he had angrily written or spoken against Felix and the council of Basil.—Schl.

³ See Georgius, Vita Nicolai V. ad Fidem Veterum Monumentorum, to which is annexed, Disquisitio de Nicolai V. erga Literas et Literatos Viros Patrocinio, Rome, 1742, 4to.

17. Paul II. previously Peter Barbo, a Venetian, who was raised to the chair of St. Peter in 1464 and died in 1471, performed some acts not unworthy of commendation, at least according to the views of this century; but he also did many things which were scarcely if at all excusable; among which his fixing the recurrence of the jubilee to every 25th year is one of the smallest. Hence his reputation with posterity is equivocal.³ The two subsequent pontiffs, Sixtus IV. previously Francis d'Albeſcola, who died in 1484, and Innocent VIII. previously John Baptist Cibo, a Genoese, who died A.D. 1492, were of moderate characters, distinguished neither for great virtues nor for great faults. Each being anxious for the safety of Italy and all Europe on account of the power of the Turks, made preparations to withstand them, and very earnestly urged the kings of Europe to make war upon them. But each met with obstacles which disappointed his most ardent wishes. Their other achievements were of no great importance.⁴

18. The last in the series of pontiffs of this century was Alexander VI. a Spaniard, whose true name was Roderic Borgia. He may not improperly be called the Nero of the pontiffs. For so many and so great villainies, crimes, and enormities are recorded of him, that it must be certain he was destitute not only of all religion but even of all decency and shame. Among the things charged upon him, though some may be false and others overstated by his enemies, yet so many remain which are placed beyond all dispute, as are sufficient to render the memory of Alexander execrable in the view of all who have even a moderate share of virtue. A large part of his crimes, however, originated from his excessive partiality for his children. For he had four sons by a concubine, among whom was the notorious Caesar Borgia, infamous for his enormous vices, and likewise one daughter named Lucretia; and he was in-

¹ Lewis IX. or St. Lewis, A.D. 1268, published the first Pragmatic Sanction for securing the liberties of the Gallican church against the pontiffs, in six articles. But the Pragmatic Sanction here referred to was enacted by Charles VII. with the concurrence of the greater prelates and nobles of his kingdom assembled at Bourges, A.D. 1438, and during the session of the council of Basil. The king reported 38 decrees of that council, and proposed to adopt the substance of them in 23 articles, which were readily agreed to. The 38 decrees of the council, as reported by the king, are in Harduin's Concilium, tom. viii. p. 1945. The 23 articles were afterwards prohibited to be published, or to be kept anywhere, by authority of the pope. This Pragmatic Sanction, Pius II. prevailed on Lewis XI. to abrogate entirely. But the parliament of Paris refused to register his decree; and the king soon found he had been duped by the pope, and therefore allowed the Pragmatic Sanction to stand. It was accordingly observed in France till the year 1517, when Julius II. persuaded Francis I. to substitute in its place the Concordate, which was approved by the council of the Lateran then sitting. This Concordate, which may be seen at large in Harduin, Concilium, vol. ix. p. 1867, &c. was a sort of compromise between the pontiff and the Gallican church, in which the latter yielded up a part of their rights as secured by the Pragmatic Sanction, and had the rest secured to them. The parliament of Paris however resolutely refused to register it; and when at length compelled to do it, they declared that it was solely by command of the king that they disapproved of it and remonstrated against it. The Pragmatic Sanction of 1438 secured in France the freedom of election to bishoprics and abbacies, the installation by the ordinaries, the abolition of reservations, annats, &c. The Concordate invested the king with the right of nominating bishops and abbots, yet under restrictions, and the pope was to confirm the election. Expectatives and reservations were prohibited. Appealed causes were to be tried where they originated. No mention was made of annats. In other respects the provisions of the Pragmatic Sanction were followed in the Concordate. Such has ever since been for substance the ecclesiastical law of France. See Burnet's History of the Reformation, vol. iii. par. i. p. 3, &c.; and the other authorities referred to in Cent. xvi. Sec. I. ch. 1. sec. 7, note 1, page 560, below.—Mur.

² Besides the common writers see the Nouveau Dictionnaire Hist. et Crit. tome II. p. 26. art. Ence Sylvius.

³ Paul II. has obtained in our times a great and learned patron in the celebrated Angelo Maria, cardinal Quirinus, distinguished for his numerous writings and achievements. He has written, Pauli II. Vita ex codice Angelice Bibliothecæ desumpta, præmissis ipsius principis adversus Plinium aliosque obreclatoris. Rome, 1740, 4to. [Platina, who wrote a history of the popes, was put out of office and twice imprisoned by this pope, and these personal collisions may have affected his impartiality. Yet Paul does not seem to have been a very estimable character: take him all in all. He had little regard for learning, was fond of innovations, partial to his friends, persecuted the Hussites, deposed the king of Bohemia, violated sworn compacts, encouraged carnivals, &c.—Mur.]

⁴ Sixtus IV. carried nepotism [bestowment of honours and riches on his nephews and other relatives] to the highest pitch, and thus provoked the hatred of the family of Pazzo in Venice against that of the Medici; which was the source of oppression, robbery, assassinations, and destructive insurrections, commencing at Florence and involving all Italy in a bloody war, in which the pope himself engaged for the benefit of his nephews, and both laid Florence under an interdict, and himself besieged it. See Muratori, ad ann. 1478.—Innocent VIII. had lived so shamefully before he mounted the Romish throne, that he had sixteen illegitimate children to make provision for. Yet on the papal throne he played the zealot against the Germans, whom he accused of magic in his bull, Summus desiderantes affectibus, &c. and also against the Hussites, whom he well nigh exterminated.—Schl.

tent solely on bringing forward and enriching these, without regarding honesty, reason, or religion.¹ Alexander died in the year 1503 of poison, which he and his son Cæsar had intended for others.²

19. That most of the monastic orders were herds of ignorant, lazy, dishonest, and debauched people, is evinced by numerous documents and by the testimony of all the best historians. The opulent monks, such as the Benedictines of every sort and the Augustinians, abused their wealth for the gratification of their lusts; and by the great licentiousness of their lives in opposition to their rules, rendered themselves extremely odious.³ Some good and honest men, particularly in France and Germany, perceiving this, formed the purpose of reforming them.⁴ Among the Germans, besides others who were solicitous to effect a reformation in particular monasteries, were Nicolaus de Mæzen, abbot of Moelk in Austria, and Nicolaus Dünkelspühl, a professor at Vienna, who with great earnestness attempted a reformation of the Benedictines throughout Germany; and they in fact produced some show of order and decency in many convents of Swabia, Franconia, and Bavaria.⁵ In France many persons formed designs for the reformation of the Benedictine order, among whom Guido Juvenalis, a man of erudition, acquired distinction by his writings.⁶ But a still greater number, both in France and elsewhere, resisted these reformers and did them all the injury they could.

20. The mendicant monks, particularly the Dominicans and Franciscans, gave as much offence by their arrogance, their quarrelsome temper, their invasion of the rights of others, their propagation of superstition,⁷ and their vain and futile disputes about religion, as the opulent monks did by their luxury, their laziness, their hatred of learning and science, and their other vices. Hence the old contests of the bishops and priests with the mendicants, and the complaints of the theologians in most of the universities and provinces, respecting the errors of these monks, and their dangerous opinions on religious subjects, were almost never at rest, and were very frequently brought before the pontifical court. Different pontiffs of this century stood differently affected towards these fraternities, and hence these conflicts assumed various aspects at different times.⁸ This hatred against the mendicants was not a little increased by the persecution of the Beghards, which was hot throughout this century. For the Beghards and Lollhards, being cruelly harassed by their enemies, the priests and others, frequently took refuge in the third order of the Franciscans, Dominicans, and Augustinians, hoping to find security under the protection of these powerful fraternities. Nor were their hopes entirely frustrated. But their persecutors now attacked also their protectors, that is, the mendicants, and often caused the latter

¹ The life of this most abominable tyrant has been written by Alexander Gordon, an Englishman [a Scotchman, 1729, fol.—Mur.], which appeared in a French translation, Amsterd. 1732, 2 vols. 8vo, but with far more moderation by the learned and ingenious author of the Hist. du Droit Public Ecclés. François, to which work are annexed Lives of Alexander VI. and Leo X. Lond. 1737, 8vo, and 1751, 4to. [The reader should also consult, especially, Burchard's Diarium, in Ecard's Corpus Hist. Mediæ Evæ, tom. ii. p. 2017, &c.—Schl.] Summary biographies of these monsters, Alexander and his son Cæsar, may be seen in most of the biographical dictionaries. Debauchery, incest, murder, profligacy, faithlessness, &c. are charged upon them.—Mur.

² All the historians of the highest credibility affirm this; but Voltaire not long since attempted to show that Alexander died a natural death in his Annales de l'Empire, tome ii. [The common and the probable statement is, that Alexander and his son, in order to get the wealth of certain cardinals, determined to poison them, and therefore invited them to dine. Before the arrival of the guests they, by mistake of the servant, drank the poisoned cup themselves. Alexander died almost immediately, but Cæsar recovered in great measure and lived to perpetrate other crimes.—Mur.] [Ranke, the most accurate and trustworthy of inquirers, supports the view that Alexander "died of the poison he had destined for another."—Popes of Rome, Mrs. Austin's transl. vol. i. p. 52.—H.]

³ See Sengling's Tuitions Ordinis S. Benedicti, or Oration delivered in the council of Basil, A.D. 1433, against the vices of the Benedictines, in Pezius, Biblioth. Ascetica, tom. viii. p. 517, &c.

⁴ See Leibnitz's Prefatio ad tom. ii. Scriptor. Brunsvigens. p. 40.

⁵ See, respecting these men, Kropf, in the Bibliotheca Mellicensis, seu de Vitis et Scriptis Benedict. Mellicen. p. 143, &c. 163, &c. also p. 203, 206. [Here also may be mentioned John Burch, a regular Augustinian canon and provost of the cloister of Novum Opus near Halle in Saxony, who undertook by command of the famous cardinal and papal legate in Germany, Nicolaus de Cusa, the reformation of the Saxon monasteries, and wrote a history of the matter, De

Reformationibus et Visitationibus Diversorum utriusque sexus Monasteriorum, an extract from which is in Leibnitz's Scriptores Rerum Brunsvigens. tom. ii. p. 476, &c. and the work entire, p. 806, &c. Extracts from it are given by Seidler, Selecta Eccl. Hist. Capita, tom. iii. sæcul. xv. p. 42, &c.—Schl.

⁶ See Liron's Singularités Historiq. et Littér. tome iii. p. 49, &c. [In the fifth volume of the Hist. de Langue-dor, we are informed that in the year 1411 the French parliament sent commissioners into the province of Langue-dor, to inquire into the shameful conduct of the Benedictines there; and that the archbishops of Narbonne and Toulouse in vain assembled a synod to excommunicate these commissioners.—Schl.] great trouble, involving them in painful contests.

⁷ The Franciscans, for example, preached in the city of Lubeck that whoever died clad in the Franciscan garb would certainly be saved; and that St. Francis every year descended from heaven in order to deliver his followers from purgatory, just as Christ descended into hell to bring up thence the souls of the patriarchs. See Ecard's Corpus Scriptor. Mediæ Evæ, tom. ii. p. 1101.—Schl.

⁸ See Launoï, De Canone, Omnis utriusque sexus, in his Opp. tom. i. par. i. p. 287, &c.; Bulaus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. v. p. 189, 196, 204, 522, 558, 601, 617, 752; and Wood's Antiq. Oxon. vol. i. p. 210, 212, 224, &c.

21. The rebellious and more rigid Franciscans who had revolted from the pontiff and the Romish church, that is, the Fratricelli as they were commonly called, with their Tertiaries or Beghards, continued openly at war with the pontiffs. Their principal seat was Italy, and particularly the Picenum or the marquisate of Ancona and the neighbouring regions, for here the president of the sect resided. Nicolaus V. violently persecuted them about the middle of the century, employing against them the Franciscan monks, soldiers, and judges, and in 1449 he committed many of them to the flames for their persevering obstinacy.¹ Succeeding pontiffs continued the persecution, and none of them more fiercely and resolutely than Paul II. who however is said to have punished their audacity more by imprisonment and exile than by fire and fagot.² Yet the Fratricelli, whose great appearance of piety procured them supporters of much eminence, frequently repelled force by force; they also slew some of the inquisitors, and among others Angelo, a Camaldulensian.³ And this sect, which made conformity with Christ to consist in mendicancy, produced no less commotions in Bohemia and in the adjoining Silesia.⁴ Even the king of Bohemia himself favoured them, for which Paul II. excommunicated him.⁵ In France the inquisitors condemned to the flames all they could lay hands on;⁶ for in the parts about Toulouse many of these people lay concealed. Some also migrated to England and Ireland.⁷ This party continued to exist amidst numerous troubles and calamities till the time of the reformation in Germany, when those who remained espoused the cause of Luther.

22. Of the religious fraternities which were founded in this century, none is more worthy of notice or was more useful to the Christian cause than that of the Brethren and Clerks of the Common Life living under the rule of St. Augustine. This sect indeed was instituted in the preceding century by the pious, learned, and good Gerhard Groote or Magnus of Davenport;⁸ but it was first approved in this century at the council of Constance, and was propagated throughout Holland, Lower Germany, and other provinces. The sect was divided into the literary Brethren or the Clerks and the unlearned Brethren, who lived in different houses but in the bonds of the greatest friendship. The Clerks devoted themselves to transcribing books, the cultivation of polite learning, and the instruction of youth; and they erected schools wherever they went. The [unlearned] Brethren laboured with their hands, and pursued various mechanic trades. Neither were under the restraint of religious vows; but still they ate at a common table, and had a general community of goods. The Sisters lived in nearly the same manner, and the time which was not employed in prayer and reading they devoted to the education of female children, and to such labours as were suitable for their sex. The schools of these Clerks of the Common Life were very celebrated in this century, and in them were trained nearly all the restorers of polite learning in Germany and Holland; and among others the great Erasmus of Rotterdam, Alexander Hegius, John Murnelius, and others.¹⁰ On the rise of the Jesuits, these schools, previously so very useful, ceased to flourish, and at this day only a few of them exist. These Brethren were often designated by the appellations of Beghards and Lollhards, which were common to so many sects; and they were much hated by those priests and monks who were unfriendly to learning and the fine arts.¹¹

23. Of the Greeks who acquired reputation as writers, the most worthy of notice

⁸ The life of this famous Dutchman, Gerhard Groote, was written by Thomas à Kempis and is published in the works of Kempis, being the first of the lives of eleven of his contemporaries.

¹⁰ This order is treated of by Miræus in his Chronicon, ad an. 1384, by Helyot in his Hist. des Ordres Monastiques, tome iii. and by others. But I have here added some things from documents never printed. For I possess some papers and records which give a clearer account of the institution and history of the Clerks of the Common Life than are to be found in the printed works.

¹¹ In the records of this century we frequently read that the Lollhards, and sometimes that the Beghards, opened schools at Davenport, Brunswick, Königsberg, Munster, and various other places. These Lollhards were Clerks of the Common Life, who being good, industrious, and useful schoolmasters, were often invited and sent for by the magistrates of cities for the sake of the public good. [See section 112, "Of the Freer Spiritual Associations," in Gieseler's Lehrbuch, &c. Cunningham's transl. vol. iii. p. 98, &c. He concurs in Mosheim's derivation of Lollard, see p. 506, above.—H.

¹ See the preceding century, pages 504, 505, above.

² Sarius, De Antiqua Picenorum Civitate Capronotana (in Calogera's Raccolta di Opuscoli Scientifici, tom. xxxix. p. 39, 81, 97), where are some extracts from the manuscript dialogue of Jac. de Marchia, against the Fratricelli.

³ Quirini, Vita Pauli II. p. 78, &c.; Targionius, Preface to the Claror. Venetorum Epistole ad Magliabechium, tom. i. p. xlii. &c. where there is notice of the writings of Nicolaus Palmerius and others against the Fratricelli, in the reign of Paul II. which have never been published.

⁴ See the Acta Sanctior. tom. ii. Mali, p. 356, &c.

⁵ Schelhorn's Acta ad Histor. Eccles. pert. par. i. p. 66, 283, &c.

⁶ Quirini, Vita Pauli II. p. 73.

⁷ I have in MS. the Acta Inquisitionis contra Jo. Gradulichi de Castellione et Franc. de Archata Fratricellos, who were burned in France, A.D. 1454.

⁸ Wood's Antiq. Oxon. tom. i. p. 232, &c.

were the following; Simeon of Thessalonica, several of whose tracts, besides a book against Heresies and some writings against the Latins have been published.¹ Joseph Bryennius, who wrote on the Trinity and against the Latins.² Macarius Macres, who likewise greatly hated the Latins.³ George Phranza, noted for his History which is printed among the Byzantine writers.⁴ Marcus of Ephesus, the strenuous opposer of the council of Florence.⁵ Bessarion, a cardinal, the distinguished supporter of the moderate Platonic school, renowned for his genius and erudition, but odious to the Greeks, because he favoured the cause of the Latins and planned the union of the two nations to the detriment of the Greeks.⁶ George

Scholarius, also called Gennadius, contended more learnedly and more lucidly than the rest of his countrymen against the Latins, and especially against the council of Florence.⁷ George Gemistius Pletho a learned man, who awakened in many of the Italians an ardour for Platonic philosophy and for all the Grecian learning.⁸ Gregory Trapezuntius, who translated some of the best Greek authors into Latin, and also wrote some tracts in favour of the Latins against the Greeks.⁹ George Codinus, who has

¹ Fabricius, Biblioth. Græc. tom. xiv. 49; Simon, Critique de la Biblio. Ecclési. par M. Du Pin, tome i. p. 400. [Simeon, Archbishop of Thessalonica, died A.D. 1429, while Thessalonica was besieged the second time by the Turks. His principal works are a large treatise on the church, its ceremonies, ministers, &c. a dialogue against all heresies, and Answers to eighty-five Questions of Gabriel, metropolitan of Pentapolis. Extracts and imperfect copies of parts of these were published by Allatius, Morin, and Goar; and his whole works much better, at Jassi in Moldavia, 1683, small folio. He was one of the greatest men among the Greeks of his age.—Mur.

² Joseph Bryennius was a Constantinopolitan monk, and a distinguished preacher. He flourished A.D. 1420, and died between 1431 and 1438. His works were printed, Leips. 1768, in two vols. 8vo, and consist of various Discourses and Dialogues against the Latins. Those on the Trinity respect the procession of the Holy Spirit.—Mur.

³ Macarius Macres was a monk of Mount Athos, prior of a monastery at Constantinople, and proto-synellus. His hostility to the Latins exposed him to vexations. The emperor, John Palæologus, sent him on an embassy to Rome, and he died on his return, A.D. 1431. He wrote a tract on the procession of the Holy Spirit, mentioned by Leo Allatius, De Consensu, &c. lib. ii. c. 18, sec. 10.—Mur.

⁴ George Phranza was nobly born, A.D. 1401, was admitted to court, A.D. 1418, and filled various offices, civil, military, and diplomatic, till the capture of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453, when he was made a prisoner. Recovering his liberty, he fought and served his country in the Morea, till that was conquered by the Turks in 1466. He now retired to Italy, and thence to Corcyra, where he became a monk, assumed the name of Gregory, and spent his life in writing the history of his country. He died A.D. 1477. His history of Byzantine affairs from A.D. 1260 to 1476 is brief till he comes to his own times, and then full and minute. With some abridgment and in a Latin translation, it was published by Pontanus, Ingolst. 1604, 4to, subjoined to Theophilus Simocatta.—Mur.

⁵ Simon, Critique de la Biblio. Ecclési. par M. Du Pin, tome i. p. 431. [Marcus Eugenius was a learned schoolmaster at Constantinople, bishop of Ephesus, A.D. 1436, and imperial ambassador to the council of Ferrara, A.D. 1437. There he strenuously opposed the doctrines of the Latins, and was the only one of the Greeks who persevered in rejecting the terms of the union between the two churches. For this conduct the emperor was displeased with him, and the pope demanded his punishment; but the nation applauded him, and he lived in honour, employing the rest of his life in exposing the corrupt proceedings at Ferrara, and confuting the dogmas of the Latin church. His works, consisting of letters and tracts, are partly contained in the Acts of the council of Ferrara, partly in Leo Allatius De Consensu, &c. in the Orthodoxographia, and partly in manuscript.—Mur.

⁶ Concerning this celebrated man and others here

mentioned, see Boerner and Humphrey Hody, in their books De Græcis Litæar. Instaurat. also Fabricius, Biblioth. Græc. [Bessarion was a native of Trebizond, a monk of the order of St. Basil, bishop of Nice A.D. 1436, and imperial envoy to the council of Ferrara in 1438. Here he learnedly defended the doctrines of the Greek church for a time, but at length gave up to the Latins and was the principal cause of the union agreed on. Returning to Constantinople his popularity declined, and he was obliged to refuse the patriarchate offered him by the emperor. He now retired to Italy, was made bp. of Tusculum and a cardinal, papal legate at Bologna, patron of the Dominican and Franciscan orders, was near being made pope in 1455, and again in 1471. He laboured to rouse the Europeans to war against the Turks in 1458, was frequently papal legate, and died on his return from France A.D. 1472, aged 77. His works consist of orations, epistles, and tracts, chiefly in relation to the controversies between the Greeks and Latins (most of which are in the Concilia), and a defence of the Platonic Philosophy, a correction of Plato De Legibus, and a translation of Aristotle's Metaphysics, which were published, Venice, 1503, 1506. His private library which was very valuable he gave to the city of Venice.—Mur.

⁷ Simon, Cyberce de l'Eglise Orientale sur la Transubstant. p. 87, and Critique de la Biblio. Ecclési. par M. Du Pin, tome i. p. 1638, &c. [This George Scholarius was one of the Greek envoys at the council of Ferrara in 1438, where he delivered three orations in favour of union with the Latins, extant in Harduin's Concilia, tom. ix. p. 446. Some other speeches and tracts of a similar tenor are ascribed to him. But afterwards he changed sides and wrote against the council of Ferrara published, Gr. [Rome, 1618] 4to. When the Turks captured Constantinople A.D. 1453, he was made patriarch by the Sultan, assumed the name of Gennadius, reigned five years, and then retired to a monastery. As patriarch he was treated with attention by the Sultan Mahomet, and delivered before him an apologetic discourse, which was translated into Turkish and has been frequently printed in Greek, Turkish, and Latin. This work, with a dialogue on the Way of Salvation, a tract on Predestination, and an oration on the Trinity, may be found in Latin in the Biblioth. Putrum, tom. xxvi. But the learned have not all agreed that Gennadius the patriarch and George Scholarius were the same person, and some have made two Georges instead of one.—Mur.

⁸ George Gemistius surnamed Pletho, was born at Constantinople, but spent most of his life in the Peloponnese. He was an acute and learned Platonist, and a decided opponent of the Latins. He was employed by the Greeks in the council of Ferrara to unravel the subtleties of the Latin metaphysicians, was preceptor in philosophy to Cardinal Bessarion and to the Medici of Florence, and lived it is said to the age of one hundred years. His works are, De Differentia Philosophiæ Aristotelis et Platonis, de Virtutibus, Scholia in Zoroastri Oracula, on portions of the history of Greece, and two tracts on the procession of the Holy Spirit.—Mur.

⁹ George Trapezuntius, whose parents were from Trebizond, was born in Crete A.D. 1396. After obtaining a good education among the Greeks, he removed to Italy where he spent his life as a teacher and writer. Pope Eugene employed him as a Greek secretary; and after the death of Eugene, Alphonso, king of Naples, was his patron. In 1465 he made a voyage to Crete and Constantinople. He returned, sunk into idleness, and died at the age of 90 at Rome A.D. 1486. He wrote on the Procession of the Holy Spirit, in favour of the Latins, the Martyrdom of Andrew of Chios A.D. 1465, on the eight parts of speech, a concise logic, a comparison of Plato and Aristotle, on rhetoric, on the deceptions of Astrology, expositions of some of Cicero's orations, and Latin translations of the works of Cyril, Chrysostom, Gregory Nyssen, Basil, also of Eusebius's Præparat. Evang. Aristotle's Rhetoric, and Ptolemy's Almagest.—Mur.

left us various contributions to the Byzantine history.¹

¹ George Codinus, surnamed Curopalates, was a Greek whose age and history are little known. He probably lived and wrote soon after the capture of Constantinople A.D. 1453. He wrote on the offices and officers of the court and church of Constantinople (Paris, 1648, fol. by Goar), on the antiquities of Constantinople, a description of Constantinople, on its statues and curiosities, on its edifices, on the church of St. Sophia in that city, and a history of the Constantinopolitan emperors from Constantine the Great to Constantine Palæologus, and the capture of the city by the Turks. All these, except the first, were published by Lambecius, 1655, fol.

The following Greek writers are passed over by Mosheim:—

Joseph, archbishop of Ephesus and patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 1416–1439. He was long adverse from a union with the Latins, but at length yielded the point, went to the council of Florence, argued for a union, signed the articles of it on a sick bed, repented of it, and died eight days after signing the instrument. He has left us two epistles addressed to the council of Basil, and an address to a synod at Constantinople when about to go to Italy and Florence.

John Cananus wrote a history of the siege of Constantinople by the Turks, in the year 1422 (at which time he flourished), extant, Gr. and Lat. subjoined to the history of George Acropolita, Paris, 1651, fol.

Demetrius Chrysoloras, an eminent philosopher and astronomer A.D. 1430, much esteemed by the emperor, Emmanuel Palæologus. He wrote an oration and two dialogues against the Latins which are in the Vatican Library.

Esaias of Cyprus, a Greek who espoused the cause of the Latins about A.D. 1430 in a long epistle, extant, Gr. and Lat. in Leo Allatius, De Consensu, &c. lib. ii. cap. xviii. sec. xvi. and in the Græca Orthod. tom. i. p. 396.

John Anagnosta of Thessalonica, who witnessed the siege and capture of that city in 1430 and again in 1432, of which he wrote a narrative and a monody, published by Leo Allatius, Symmetica, par. ii. p. 317, &c.

Andreas de Petra, born and educated among the Greeks, and by them made a bishop; he afterwards joined the Latins, and as papal legate argued against his countrymen in the council of Basil A.D. 1432, and in that of Ferrara 1438. Both his speeches are in Bzovius's Annales Eccles. ad ann. 1432, sec. 37 and 1438, sec. 8.

John Eugenius, monophylax of the patriarchal church of Constantinople, and brother to Marcus of Ephesus, whom he accompanied to the council of Ferrara A.D. 1438. He wrote against that council, and Leo Allatius has given extracts from the work, De Purgatorio, p. 61, 220, 241, 265.

Isidorus Ruthensis or of Russia, born at Thessalonica, a Basilian monk, abbot of St. Demetrius at Constantinople, sent to the council of Basil in 1435, returned, and was made metropolitan of Kiof and primate of all Russia, attended the council of Florence 1438, there opposed the Latins, then changed sides and signed the articles of union, remained in Italy, was made a cardinal in 1439, soon after went to Russia where he was arrested and imprisoned for betraying the cause of the Greeks, escaped with difficulty and fled, was by the pope made titular patriarch of Constantinople and papal legate in the east, witnessed the capture of that city in 1453, escaped to Italy, became dean of the college of cardinals and died at Rome A.D. 1463. He wrote an epistle describing the siege and capture of Constantinople, which was published in Reusner's Epistola Turcica, lib. iv. p. 104.

Silvester Sguropolus, or as he writes it, Syropulus, a deacon, dicaphylax, and one of the select council of the patriarch at Constantinople. He attended his pa-

24. The Latin writers form a host almost innumerable. We shall name only the principal of those who attempted by their pens to subserve the cause of religion. The greatest of these by the acknowledgment of them all was John Gerson, chancellor of the university of Paris, a man of vast triarch to the council of Ferrara in 1433, was concerned in all that related to the Greeks, and decidedly and perseveringly opposed the union, but was compelled by authority to subscribe its articles. On his return he found himself odious to the people for having yielded so far, resigned his office, and wrote a history of the transactions at Ferrara, which was published, Gr. and Lat. by R. Creighton (afterwards bishop of Bath and Wells), at the Hague, 1660, fol. [See note i, p. 533.—R.]

Joseph, bishop of Modon in Greece A.D. 1435. He wrote an apology for the council of Florence against Marcus of Ephesus, extant, Gr. and Lat. in Harduin's Concilia, tom. ix. p. 549, &c.

John, the Jacobite patriarch of Alexandria A.D. 1440. He wrote an adulatory epistle to Pope Eugene IV. a Latin version of which is in Harduin's Concilia, tom. ix. p. 1018, &c.

Nicodemus, an Ethiopian and abbot of the Ethiopian monks resident at Jerusalem A.D. 1440, wrote a similar epistle to the pope, which we have in Latin in Harduin's Concilia, tom. ix. p. 1031, &c.

Gregory Melissenus called Mammas, a monk, penitentiary of the church of Constantinople, and confessor to the emperor. He attended the council of Ferrara, was at first violent against the Latins, but being bribed he turned about and urged the union. In 1440 he was made patriarch of Constantinople, but a few years after found it expedient to resign that dignity. He wrote an Apology for the council of Florence against Marcus of Ephesus, extant, Gr. and Lat. in Harduin's Concilia, tom. ix. p. 601, &c. also an epistle to the emperor Alexius Comnenus on the procession of the Holy Spirit, printed, Gr. and Lat. in Leo Allatius, Græc. Orthod. tom. i. p. 419.

John Argyropulus of Constantinople. When that city was taken in 1453 he retired to Italy. Cosimo de Medicis made him preceptor to his son Peter and his nephew Laurence. After residing some time at Florence the plague caused him to remove to Rome, where he lectured on Aristotle. He died near the close of the century. He was very learned, very vain, very rich, and a very great eater. Besides translations and expositions of the works of Aristotle often printed, he wrote on the procession of the Holy Spirit and the council of Florence, extant, Gr. and Lat. in Leo Allatius, Græc. Orthod. tom. i. p. 400.

Matthæus Camariota, a distinguished philosopher and rhetorician of Constantinople, who witnessed the capture of that city in 1453 and described the scene in a long epistle, a considerable part of which, Gr. and Lat. is in Crucius, Turcogræcia, lib. i. p. 76. Many other writings of his exist in manuscript.

Ducas, nephew to Michael Ducas, of Constantinople. On the capture of that city 1453, he retired to Lesbos and entered the service of the tributary Christian prince, for whom he performed several embassies to the Turkish sovereigns till the capture of Lesbos in 1562. He wrote Historia Byzantina, from A.D. 1341 to 1462, preceded by a brief chronicle from the creation, published, Gr. and Lat. Paris, 1649, fol.

George or Gregory Hermonymus or Charitonymus, a native of Sparta, who on the capture of Constantinople 1453, fled to France and taught Greek in the university of Paris. In 1476 Pope Sixtus IV. sent him as his legate into England. He translated into Latin Gennadius's tract, De Vita Salutis Hominum, the life of Mohammed, and some other things, and wrote a demonstration that Christ is the Son of God and himself God, printed, Gr. and Lat. Augsb. 1608, 8vo.

Laonicus Chalcocondylas or Chalcondylas, a native of Athens, flourished A.D. 1468, and wrote a History of the Turks from A.D. 1300 to 1463, published, Gr. and Lat. Geneva, 1615, fol. and Paris, 1650, fol.

Manuel, a native of Greece, pupil of Matthæus Camariota and orator of the great church of Constantinople, A.D. 1500. He wrote a confutation of Friar influence, the oracle of the council of Constance, and still in high estimation with such of the French as would maintain their liberties against the Roman pontiffs.¹ He wrote and did much which was very useful to purify the religion, excite the piety, and cure the disorders of the church; but in several things he saw but imperfectly what would comport with the true principles of Christianity. Nicolaus de Clemangis [of Clamenge], a lover of truth and right, who eloquently deplored the calamities of his day and the miserable state of the Christian world.² Alphonsus Tostatus of Avila, who loaded the sacred Scripture with a ponderous commentary, and wrote some other things in which there is a mixture of good and bad.³ Ambrose of Camalduli has acquired great fame by his accurate knowledge of the Greek language and literature, and by his various efforts for establishing harmony between the Greeks and the Latins.⁴ Nicolaus of Cusa, a man of various learning and no contemptible genius, but not possessed of a sound and vigorous judgment, as appears from his Conjectures concerning the Last Day.⁵ John Nieder distinguished himself by various writings which indicate the state of those times, and by his travels and achievements.⁶ John Capistranus was esteemed great by the Romish court, because he contended vigorously for the supremacy of the pontiffs against all sorts of opposers.⁷ John Wesselius and

Francis, the Dominican, respecting the procession of the Holy Spirit, unleavened bread, purgatory, the primacy of the pope, &c. published, Gr. and Lat. by Le Moine, Varia Sacra, p. 270.—Mur.

¹ Du Pin, Gersonianus, prefixed to his edition of Gerson's Works, Antwerp, 1706, 5 vols. fol. and inserted by Launoi, in his Hist. Gymnasii Navarrensi, par. iii. lib. ii. cap. i. in his Opp. tom. iv. par. i. p. 514; Von der Hardt, Acta Concilii Constant. tom. i. par. iv. p. 26, &c. [John Charlier de Gerson was born A.D. 1363, at Gerson in the diocese of Rheims, educated in the college of Navarre at Paris, succeeded to the chancellorship of the university about A.D. 1395, was active in condemning John Petit and his doctrine in 1407, and subsequently laboured much to heal the divisions and correct the abuses of the church of Rome. He was at the councils of Rheims, Pisa, and Constance. When the last of these councils broke up in 1418, he could not safely return to Paris where the duke of Burgundy was in power, and he travelled through Germany and Switzerland, and settled at Lyons where he died in 1423. He composed no large work, but left a vast number of tracts, speeches, sermons, letters, and poems, which are dogmatical, polemical, exegetical, mystic, opinions on questions of public interest at that day, projects for reforming abuses, &c. The most valuable are said to be those occasioned by the council of Constance.—Mur. [See respecting this remarkable man the chapters in Bonnehoe's Reformers before the Reformation, entitled Wycliffe and Gerson, vol. i. p. 48, &c. and France and Gerson, vol. ii. p. 264, &c.—R.]

² See Launoi's Hist. Gymnasii Navarr. par. iii. lib. ii. cap. iii. p. 555, &c.; Longueval's Hist. de l'Eglise Gallicane, tome xiv. p. 435. His works, though not entire, were published with a glossary by Lydius, Leyden, 1613, 4to. [Nicolaus de Clemangis was born at Clamenge near Chalons, was educated in the college of Navarre, and became rector of the university of Paris in 1393. He so distinguished himself for the elegance of his Latin epistles that Benedict XIII. called him to Avignon, and made him his private secretary. But in 1408 being suspected of composing the papal bull which laid France under an interdict, he endured violent persecution. He retired into the Alpine country; and though afterwards proved innocent and invited back to France, he chose to spend his days in retirement. He died about A.D. 1440, an honest and pious man. His works, besides about 150 letters, consist of nearly a dozen tracts and poems, the most important of which are, De Corrupto Ecclesiæ Statu, Deploratio Calamitatis Ecclesiæ, per Schisma Nefandissimum in heroic verse, De Fructu Freni, De Nonis Festiuitatibus non Instituentis, De Antichristo, De Studio Theologie, &c.—Mur. [Several of these pieces are printed by Von der Hardt, in his Acta Concilii Constant. who also gives an account of his life in vol. i. par. ii. p. 71, &c.—R.]

³ Alphonsus Tostatus, a voluminous Spanish writer, who studied at Salamanca, attended the council of Basil in 1434, became bishop of Avila, and was advanced to the highest offices in the kingdom. He died in 1454, aged some say 40 years, others say 45 years. He was a man of immense reading, excellent memory, respectable judgment, and famed for his ascetic piety. His works, repeatedly printed and first under cardinal Ximenes, fill 27 volumes, folio. Of these, 24 are commentaries on the whole Bible.—Mur. [It is singular that writers on Biblical Criticism have given no account of the labours of this voluminous commentator, whose expository writings fill twenty-four folio volumes, and who was styled by his contemporaries—Stupor Mundi.—R.]

⁴ Ambrosius Camaldulensis was born at Portico not far from Florence, became a Camaldulensian monk at the age of 14, acquired a thorough knowledge of Greek under Emmanuel Chrysoloras, was made general of his order about the year 1440, was repeatedly nominated a cardinal, served the popes faithfully and with great ability in the councils of Basil, Ferrara, and Florence, and became almoner to the pope. He died in his monastery at an advanced age, in high repute for sanctity. His life was written at great length by Augustine of Florence, in an Appendix to his Historia Camaldulensium. Besides numerous translations from the Greek fathers and many letters, he has left a Hodoeporicon or journal of his travels to inspect the monasteries of his order, and some of the public documents for uniting the Greek and Latin churches.—Mur.

⁵ Bayle, Response aux Questions d'un Provincial, tome ii. chap. 117, 118, p. 517, &c. His works are published in one vol. [three volumes.—Mur.] fol. Basil, 1565. [Nicolaus Cusanus was born of indigent parents at Cusa in the diocese of Treves, A.D. 1403, educated by Count de Manderscheidt, made doctor of theology and of canon law, was dean of Coblenz, and archdeacon of Liege. In the council of Basil he at first opposed the papal pretensions, and wrote on the subject, entitled De Catholica Concordantia. But he afterwards changed sides, became bishop of Brixen, fell out with the emperor Sigismund, was made a cardinal, and repeatedly papal legate. He died A.D. 1464, aged 63. He was very learned, understood Greek and Hebrew, and excelled in philosophy and mathematics. His works were printed, Paris, 1514, and Basil, 1650, in three vols. fol. The first volume is chiefly on theology, the second on controversial subjects, and the third on mathematics, astronomy, &c.—Mur. [See also Gerdes, Historia Reformat. vol. iii. p. 6, &c. for a notice of this eminent scholar and precursor of the Reformation.—R.]

⁶ See p. 515, note 4.—Mur.

⁷ See Lenfant's Hist. de la Guerre des Hussites, tome ii. p. 254, &c.; Wadding's Annals Minorum, tom. ix. p. 67. [John Capistranus was born in the village of Capistro in Abruzzo, Italy, A.D. 1385; became a Franciscan monk of the regular observance, was repeatedly Cisalpine general of his order, was an inquisitor and papal legate, and as such preached up and enjoined crusades against the Fratricelli in Italy, the Hussites in Bohemia, and the Turks in Hungary, with dreadful effect. He died in 1456 aged 71. His writings are chiefly on different points of canon law, and are contained mostly in the Tractatus Juris.—Mur.]

Jerome Savonarola are to be ranked among the wisest and best men of that age.¹ The former was of Groningen, and for his great perspicuity was called the Light of the World. The doctrines which Luther afterwards taught more clearly he advanced to some extent, and he candidly exposed and censured the defects of the Romish religion.

¹ Malus, Vita Reuchlini. [John Wessel, called also Basilius, and Hermann Gesvort, Goesvort or Gansvort, was born at Groningen, A.D. 1400 or rather 1419. He studied long in the school of the Clerks of the Common Life at Zwoll, and then at Cologne, became very learned, understood Latin, Greek and Hebrew, was a Platonist and a Nominalist, and a contemner of the reigning scholastic theology. He was very pious, studied the scriptures much and in the original languages, and based his faith on them, in utter disregard for human authorities, doctors, traditions, popes, councils, or fathers. He was invited to Heidelberg, but not allowed to teach theology there, because he had not taken the degree of D.D. nor would they give him that degree because he was not in orders. He returned to Cologne, went to Louvain, and thence to Paris, where he resided many years, and acquired great reputation as a learned, independent, honest, and truly Christian man. He once visited Rome, was never persecuted, and died A.D. 1489, aged some say 89, and others 70. His works are several theological tracts, chiefly on what he deemed the erroneous views in theology then prevailing. They are—on the Providence of God, why Christ became incarnate, and on the greatness of his sufferings, on Penance or the clerical power of blinding and loosing, on the Communion of saints, on the Treasury of Merits in the Church, on Fraternities, on Purgatory, on Papal Indulgences, several epistles, on the Eucharist and the Mass, on Indulgences, on Prayer. These were published, Wittemb. 1522, and Basil, 1523, folio, and 1525, 4to, under the title of Paragoge Rerum Theologicarum, with a preface by Martin Luther; also at Amsterdam, 1617, 4to. In his preface Luther says: "Wessel appeared (who was called Basil), a Friesland of Groningen, a man of admirable talents, of great and rare genius, who was manifestly taught of God, as Isaiah prophesied that Christians should be; for he cannot be supposed to have followed men even as I have not. If I had previously read Wessel, my enemies might have thought Luther derived all his views from Wessel, so perfectly accordant are the two in spirit. And it increases my joy and confidence, and I now have no doubt of the correctness of my doctrines, since with such uniform agreement and nearly in the same words, though at a different period, in another clime and country, and with other results, he so harmonizes with me throughout." See Seckendorf's Hist. Lutheran, lib. i. sec. 54, & cxxiii. p. 226, &c.; Bayle, Dictionnaire, art. Wessel.—[John Wessel is too often confounded with his contemporary and friend John de Voesalia or of Wessel, a doctor of theology, and a celebrated preacher at Erfurt and Worms, who held nearly the same sentiments with Wessel, and was at length condemned by an assembly at Meitz, A.D. 1479, and cast into prison, where he soon after died. His theological opinions were condemned; yet a catholic who witnessed the whole trial says, he advanced nothing but what might be defended, except in regard to the procession of the Holy Spirit, in which he agreed with the Greeks. His condemnation is attributed by this writer to his being a Nominalist, while his judges all but one were Realists. See Bayle, Dictionnaire, art. Wesalia, Jean de; and Schroech's Kirchengesch. vol. xxiii. p. 295, &c.—Mur. [Of this forerunner of Luther, see Gerdes, Historia Reform. vol. i. p. 43, vol. iii. p. 10, &c.; Brandt's History of the Reformation in the Low Countries, Lond. 1730—23, folio, vol. i. p. 32; Gieseler's Lehrbuch, &c. Cunningham's transl. vol. iii. p. 388, &c. But the fullest account of Wessel and his theological views which is extant, is that given by Ullmann of Heidelberg, in the second volume of his valuable work, Reformatoren vor der Reformation, second edition, Hamb. 1842.—Of John de Voesalia, see Gieseler, ubi supra, p. 383, where the reader will

The latter was a Dominican of Ferrara, and a pious, eloquent, and learned man. Having probed the Romish ulcers too freely, he suffered for his rashness, being burned at the stake in 1498 at Florence. He died with serenity and constancy.²

And the references necessary for ascertaining his sentiments, and the proceedings at his trial and condemnation.—Z.

² Buddeus, Parerga Historico-Theolog. p. 279. The life of Savonarola written by J. F. Picus, was published with notes, documents, and letters, by Quetif, Paris, 1674, 2 vols. 8vo. In the same year Quetif published at Paris the spiritual and ascetic Epistles of Savonarola, translated from Italian into Latin. See also Echar'd's Scriptores Ord. Prædicator. tom. i. p. 84, &c. [Jerome Savonarola was born at Ferrara, Oct. 12, 1452, religiously educated, and early distinguished for genius and learning. His father intended him for his own profession, that of physic, but he disliked it; and unknown to his parents became a Dominican monk, A.D. 1474. For a time he taught philosophy and metaphysics, and then was made a preacher and confessor. He soon laid aside the hearing of confessions and devoted himself wholly to preaching, in which he was remarkably interesting and successful. In 1489 he went to Florence, where his preaching produced quite a reformation of morals. He attacked vice, infidelity, and false religion with the utmost freedom, sparing no age or sex and no condition of men, monks, priests, popes, princes, or common citizens. His influence was almost boundless. But Florence was split into political factions, and Savonarola did not avoid the danger. He was ardent, eloquent, and so enthusiastic as almost to believe, and actually to represent what he taught, as being communicated to him by revelation. The adverse faction accused him to the pope, who summoned him to Rome. Savonarola would not go, and was ordered to cease preaching. A Franciscan inquisitor was sent to confront him. The people protected him. But at length, vacillating about putting his cause to the test of a fire ordeal, he in a measure lost his popularity. His enemies seized him by force, put him to the rack, and extorted from him some concessions which they interpreted as confessions of guilt, and then strangled him, burned his body, and threw the ashes into the river. Thus he died, May 23, 1498. His character has been assailed and defended most elaborately, and by numerous persons, both Catholics and Protestants. His writings were almost all in Italian. They consist of more than 300 sermons, about 50 tracts and treatises, and a considerable number of letters, all displaying genius and piety, and some of them superior intellect. See especially Picus and Buddeus, ubi supra; C. F. Ammon's Geschichte der Homiletik, vol. i. p. 169—198; Gotting, 1804, 8vo; Bayle's Dictionnaire, art. Savonarole; and Schroech's Kirchengesch. vol. xxiii. p. 543, &c.—Mur. [The English reader has now access to a full and tolerably impartial account of this extraordinary man in a recent anonymous work, entitled, The Life and Times of Girolamo Savonarola, Lond. 1845, which supersedes the necessity of referring here to the occasional notices of him which are contained in our modern literature, or to the biographies of him which have appeared in Germany. I would make only one exception; the student should by all means read the brief but valuable notice of Savonarola in M'Crie's History of the Reformation in Italy, p. 27—36, with the extracts from his sermons, translated into English, which are given in the appendix, p. 449, &c. Potter, a Belgian Romanist, in his Vie de Scipion de Ricci, vol. ii. p. 257, thus alludes to the difference of opinion respecting Savonarola existing in the Roman church: "Voilà un moine condamné par l'inquisition comme hérétique, et brûlé par ordre d'un des papes les plus infâmes qui aient occupé la chaire de St. Pierre, tacitement canonisé par un autre pape [Benedict XIV.] adoré par une sainte [St. Catherine de Ricci], et par un évêque vertueux [Scipio de Ricci], et vilipendé par d'autres moines." Potter gives in the appendix to this volume several original places respecting this "saint hérétique," which had been copied by De Ricci, when sojourning in 1799 in the Dominican convent of St.

Alphonsus Spina composed a book against the Jews and Saracens, which he called Fortalitium Fidei .¹ Conspicuous in the long list of those called scholastics, were John Capreolus,² John de Turrecremata,³ Antoninus of Florence,⁴ Dionysius of Ryckel,⁵

Mark in Florence, where the visitor still reads this inscription over the rooms formerly occupied by the martyr: "Has collibus Ven. P. F. Hieronymus Savonarola, vir apostolicus, inhabitavit." Audin, in his Histoire de Leon X. Paris, 1844, states that a short time ago a bookseller in Florence possessed some unpublished poems of Savonarola which he was anxious to print, but was prevented by the censors of that city; so that public sentiment even in Florence is still divided respecting him. The Roman Index of Clement VIII. contains the titles of his sermons which are prohibited from being read "donec emendati prodeant."—R.

¹ Alphonsus Spina was a Spanish Jew converted to Christianity, who became a Franciscan monk, rector of the university of Salamanca, an inquisitor, and at last a bishop. He flourished about A.D. 1450. His book defends the Romish religion against the arguments then used by Jews, Saracens, heretics, and infidels. It is a weak performance, first published anonymously, Nuremberg, 1494, 4to, then at Lyons, A.D. 1511.—Mur.

² John Capreolus was a French Dominican monk of Langueadoc, professor of theology at Toulouse, flourished A.D. 1415, and is said to have attended the council of Basil, 1431. He wrote commentaries on Lombard's Four Books of Sentences, published, Venice, 1484, 1514, 1538, fol.—Mur.

³ John de Turrecremata, a Spaniard, born at Torquemada, A.D. 1338, a Dominican monk, sent to the university of Paris, where he studied and taught many years. From about the year 1431, he served the popes, first as master of the palace, then (1437) as legato to the council of Basil, and afterwards to that of Florence; then as a cardinal and legate in France, and on various other embassies. From 1450 till his death in 1468, he held various bishoprics in Spain and Italy. He wrote commentaries on the Decretum of Gratian, on Paul's Epistles, on the Psalms, various tracts on scholastic theology, and disputed points of canon law and church government, against the Mohammedans, with a series of sermons and a number of ascetic pieces. His works were first printed, Augsburg, 1472, in eight vols. folin.—Mur.

⁴ His true name was Antonius, but on account of his diminutive stature he acquired that of Antoninus. He was born at Florence in 1389, early studied canon law, became a Dominican monk at sixteen, afterwards presided over several different monasteries, was made vicar-general of his order, and in 1446 archbishop of Florence. He was repeatedly envoy of his city to the court of Rome, and died May 2, 1459, aged 70, greatly esteemed for his piety and erudition. He was canonized A.D. 1523. His piety was generally admitted, but his judgment as a writer has been questioned, and his works are said to be stuffed with silly stories collected from all quarters. He wrote Summa Historialis , or a universal history from the creation to his own times, Lyons, 1586, 3 vols. fol.; Summa Theologica , Strasburg, 1496, 4 vols. fol.; Summa Confessionalis , Lyons, 1564, 8vo; notes on the donation of Constantine the Great, several law tracts, and one on the virtues.—Mur.

⁵ Dionysius a Ryckel, or de Leeuw, or Carthusianus. He was born at Ryckel, a village in the diocese of Liege, educated at Cologne, and became a Carthusian monk at the age of twenty-one, and died March 12th, 1471, aged 69, or as some say 77. He was a most voluminous writer, chiefly as an expositor and a practical theologian. His commentary on the whole Bible was printed, Cologne, 1533, in 7 vols. folio; his commentary on the Four Books of Sentences, Cologne, 1535, 4 vols. folio; his commentary on Dionysius Areopagita, thid. 1536, fol. He also wrote De Fide Catholica , on a Christian life, a treatise on the four last things—death, judgment, heaven, and hell; another on a particular judgment of souls, expositions of some works of Cassian and of the Clavis of John Scholasticus, seven tracts on practical religion, printed at Louvain, 1577, and a work against the Alcoran and the Mohammedans, with tracts

Henry Gorcomius,⁶ Gabriel Biel,⁷ Stephen Brulifer,⁸ and others. Among the most respectable Mystics were Vincent Ferrerius,⁹ Henry Harphius,¹⁰ Laurence Justinian,¹¹ Bernardin of Sienna,¹² and more famous than all the rest, Thomas à Kempis, the reputed author of the well-known treatise on the Imitation of Christ.¹³ on war with the Turks, holding a general council, and the vices of superstition, printed, Cologne, 1533, 8vo.—Mur.

⁶ Henry Gorcomius was a native of Goreum in Holland, became distinguished as a theologian and philosopher, was vice-chancellor of the university of Cologne, and died in 1495. He wrote De Superstitionis quibusdam Causis seu Cereemoniis Ecclesiasticis, De Celebratæ Fætorum, Conclusiones et Concordantie Bibliorum ac Canonum in Libris Magistri Sententiarum , a Commentary on Aristotle, De Cælo, and De Mundo, Questiones Metaphysicæ de Ente et Essentia .—Mur.

⁷ Gabriel Biel, D.D. a native of Spiro, one of the first professors of theology and philosophy at Tübingen, founded A.D. 1477. He died in 1495, leaving a commentary on the Four Books of Sentences, Brixen, 1574, 3 vols. 4to, an Exposition of the Canon of the Mass, a series of Sermons, De Summa Objectionum Pontificis, Historia Dominice Passionis, De Monetarium Palsate et Utilitate , and an Epitome of the work of William Occam on the Sentences.—Mur.

⁸ Stephen Brulifer, born at St. Malo, a Franciscan, a doctor of Paris, a Scotist, professor of theology at Meutz and Metz, flourished A.D. 1480, and died after A.D. 1500. He wrote on Lombard's Sentences, on the Trinity, Sermons on the Poverty of Christ, and some other tracts, all published, Paris, 1499 and 1500, 8vo.—Mur.

⁹ Vincent Ferrerius was a Spanish Dominican of Valencia, renowned as a preacher, who travelled over Spain, France, and Italy, doing wonders and converting multitudes from vice and error (if we may believe the Romanists), was made confessor and master of the palace to Pope Benedict XIII. He was very metaphysical, poor in thought and low in language, yet was esteemed a great saint, and was canonized in 1455. He died A.D. 1419. He wrote De Vita Spirituali, Tractatus Consolatorius , and several epistles (published, Valencia, 1591), and a volume of sermons with several small pieces annexed, often published.—Mur.

¹⁰ Henry Harphius was a Franciscan, born in the village of Le Herp in Brabant, a theologian, provincial of his order, and guardian of the convent of Mechlin. He flourished A.D. 1468 and died in 1478. He wrote De Theologia Mystica tum Speculativa tum Affectiva , Cologne, 1611, 4to, Speculum Aureum in Præcepta Decalogi, Speculum Perfectionis , and many Sermons. He wrote generally in Dutch, others translated him into Latin.—Mur.

¹¹ Laurentius Justinian was of patrician birth at Venice, a regular canon of St. Augustine for thirty years, then bishop of Venice A.D. 1431, promoted to the rank of a patriarch A.D. 1450, and died Jan. 8, 1465, aged 74, and was canonized A.D. 1524. He was a man of sincere piety, very zealous in religion, and very liberal to the poor. His works, consisting of sermons, letters, and a number of tracts on metaphysical divinity and practical religion, were printed, Basil, 1560, fol. Lyons, 1568, fol. and Venice, 1606, fol.—Mur.

¹² Bernardino Senensis or of Sienna was nobly born at Mesano in the territory of Florence, Sept. 8th, 1380, religiously educated in monkish austerities, yet instructed by distinguished masters, became a Franciscan monk in 1404, commenced preaching and became very famous, was sent legate of his order to Palestine, travelled extensively there, returned and travelled over Italy, a most renowned preacher. He flourished A.D. 1426, repeatedly refused bishoprics, and died A.D. 1444, aged 64, and was canonized in 1450. His works are chiefly sermons, but embrace a few mystic tracts and a commentary on the Apocalypse. He appears to have been devout and possessed of considerable genius. His works were printed, Paris, 1636, in 5 vols. fol.—Mur.

¹³ Langlet de Kresnoy promised to show that this celebrated book, concerning the author of which there has been so much literary war, was first written in French

by one John Gersen or Gerson, and translated into Latin by Thomas à Kempis. See Granet in Launoiana, par. II. Opp. tom. iv. par. ii. p. 414, 415. A history of the disputes concerning this book was drawn up by Vincent Thullier in the Opera Posthumus of Mabillon and Ruinart, tom. iii. p. 54, &c. [His real name was Thomas Hammerlein (or rather Hermerken), in Latin Malcolus. He was born at Kempis or Campis in the diocese of Cologne, A.D. 1380, was sent to the school established by Gerhard Groot at Deventer at the age of 13, and seven years after to the Augustinian convent at Mount St. Agnes near Zwoll, where he assumed the habit of a monk A.D. 1406, and was afterwards proctor and superior of the convent. He died A.D. 1471, aged 92. He was a very religious man. His writings are all on practical and experimental religion, and consist of numerous sermons, several letters, religious biography and tracts, collected and printed often in folio, quarto, and octavo, e.g. Colegi, 1728, 4to. The four books De Contemptu Mundi (or De Institutione Christi from the subject of the first book) have been translated into English, German, French, Italian, Spanish, Bohemian, Hungarian, Greek, Arabic, and Turkish, and passed through innumerable editions. The general opinion is that Kempis was the author. Yet there are substantial reasons for doubt and uncertainty. See Wharton's Appendix to Cave's Hist. Liter. and Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. vol. xxiv. p. 312, &c.—Mur. [The question respecting the authorship of this well-known work is also concisely discussed in Gieseler's Lehrbuch, &c. Cunningham's transl. vol. iii. p. 321, note 12, and references given to the latest works in France and Germany on different sides in this controversy. A few additional facts may be seen in the article Kempis in the Biographie Universelle, tome xxii. p. 286. For a full account of Thos. à Kempis, and of his views and influence as a precursor of the Reformation, see Ullmann's Reformatoren vor der Reformation, 2d edit. vol. ii. p. 125, &c.—R.

The following Latin writers are omitted in the preceding list by Mosheim:—

John Huss, born at Hussinetz in Bohemia, educated at Prague, where he graduated A.B. in 1393, A.M. in 1395, became preacher in the Bethlehem church in 1400, read the works of Wickliffe, began to attack the prevailing views of religion in 1408, was silenced by Sabino Lupus, the archbishop of Prague, and accused before the pope who summoned him to Rome. He sent his proctor who was not heard, and Huss was condemned as an obstinate heretic. In 1413, being driven from the city of Prague, he preached in the vicinity till the tumult in the city subsided. In 1414 he set out for the council of Constance protected by a safe conduct from the emperor, but was seized, imprisoned, condemned, and burned at the stake, May 29, 1416. His works contain numerous theological, polemical, and devotional tracts, many letters and sermons, a Harmony of the Gospels, commentaries on some of the Epistles and Psalms, and on the Apocalypse, and were printed, Nuremberg, 1558, 2 vols. fol. [reprinted with many important additions at Nuremberg in 1715, in 2 vols. folio.—R.

Paulus Anglicus, an English doctor of canon law, A.D. 1404, wrote Aureum Speculum, or a Dialogue between Peter and Paul on the abuses of clerical power, extant in Goldast. Monarchia, tom. ii. p. 1527.

John Latteburius, an English Franciscan monk, educated at Oxford. He wrote A.D. 1406, Moralia super Threnos Jeremie, printed A.D. 1482, fol.

Richard Ullertone (Ulverstone), of Lancashire, and a professor of theology at Oxford, A.D. 1408. His Petition for a Reformation of the Church exists in manuscript at Cambridge, England. The preface and considerable extracts are published by Wharton, Appendix to Cave's Hist. Liter. Some other works of his exist in manuscript.

Theodorice de Niem or Nienius, a German, scrivener to the pope A.D. 1372, bishop of Verdun and of Cambrai, flourished A.D. 1408. He wrote a history of the papal schism in his own times, printed, Strasburg, 1608 and 1629, 8vo; also the Life of Pope John XIII. and some other pieces respecting the state of his times.

Thomas Notter called Waldonsis because born at Walken in Essex, an English Carmelite monk of London, who was educated at Oxford, confessor to Henry IV. and his envoy to the council of Pisa, provincial prior of his order in 1414, a strenuous opposer of the Wickliffites, sent by the king to the council of Constance in 1415, and to the court of Poland in 1419. He attended Henry V. in his French war A.D. 1423, and Henry VI. in 1430, and died at Rouen Nov. 3d, 1430. He wrote much; the only work of his printed is his Doctrinale Antiquitatum Fidei Ecclesie Catholice, a very prolix work against the followers of Wickliffe and Huss, Venice, 1751, fol. and elsewhere.

Petrus Ancharanus, a celebrated canonist of Bologna A.D. 1410, who has left three large works on canon law, frequently printed.

Bostonus Burienensis, a Benedictine monk of St. Edmundsbury, England, A.D. 1410. He visited all the monasteries in England to make out a complete catalogue of all the works of the ecclesiastical writers. This manuscript catalogue was in the hands of archbishop Ussher, Thomas Gale, &c.

John Grossius or Grossus, a French Carmelite monk of Toulouse, elected general of his order in 1411, attended the council of Pisa, and died in 1424 at an advanced age. He wrote Triduum Ordinis Carmelitani, describing the origin, progress and distinguished men of his order, published with other similar works, Antwerp, 1680, 4 vols. fol.

Hieronymus S. Fide, a converted Spanish Jew, physician to Benedict XIII. A.D. 1412. He wrote De Refellendis Judeorum Erroribus, and Adversus Talmuth Judeorum, published France, 1692, 8vo, and in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xxvi. p. 528.

Hermann do Lerbeke, a German Dominican monk of Minden, who wrote a History or Chronicon of the counts of Schaumburg from A.D. 1006 to 1414, published by Meibomius, France, 1620, 8vo.

Paulus Carthagena, a S. Maria, a converted Spanish Jew, bishop of Carthage and of Burgos, high chancellor of Castile and Leon, and patriarch of Aquileia, died A.D. 1435. He wrote additions to Lyra's commentary on the Scriptures, Scrutinium Scripturarum, and Questiones xii. de Nomine Tetragrammati.

Gobelinus Persona, born in Westphalia A.D. 1358, travelled over Italy, and resided some time at the Roman court, and in 1389 became rector of Trinity chapel at Padua, retired to Bielefeld and was made dean. He flourished A.D. 1418 and died about 1428. Between the years 1404 and 1418 he composed his Cosmadrachmum or chronicle of the world, from the creation to A.D. 1418, published with notes and an appendix, by Meibomius, France, 1599, fol.

Leonard Bruns Arctinus, born at Arezzo, Tuscany, and one of the best Latin and Greek scholars of his age, epistolary secretary to the popes from A.D. 1404, retired to Florence to literary ease, and there died in 1443, aged 74. He wrote Contra Hypocritas, History of Florence, De Bello Italico adversus Gothos (which is a mere plagiarism from Procopius), De Bello Panico (taken from Polybius and intended to supply the loss of Livy's second Decade), Epistolarum libri viii., a tract on Morals, Translation of Aristotle's Ethics, a history of his own times (or of the papal schism), and several other things. His Latin is very fine.

John Francis Poggio Bracciolinus [Bracciolinus.—R.] born near Arezzo, Tuscany A.D. 1380, a fine Latin and Greek scholar, secretary to eight successive popes, from A.D. 1415 to 1455, then counsellor at Florence till his death in 1459. He wrote numerous small works, descriptive, facetious (or rather obscene), funeral orations, letters, &c. besides a History of Florence. He was active in the council of Constance, and quarrelled with Laurentius Valla, yet he promoted literature. His works are published, Strasburg, 1511 and 1513, and Basil, 1538, fol. [Of this eminent scholar, an elaborate life, though certainly much more prolix than the subject warranted, was published by the Rev. William Shepherd, a Unitarian minister at Liverpool, 1802, 4to.—R.

Nicolaus Diinckelspöthe, a Swabian, rector of the gymnasium of Vienna A.D. 1420, and its representative in the council of Basil A.D. 1431. He wrote sermons on the Decalogue, on the Lord's Prayer, on Penitence, on the Beatitudes, on the Seven Mortal Sins, a Confessional, and on the Five Senses, printed, Strasburg, 1516, fol.

Theodorice Engelhusius, a canon of the church of Hildesheim A.D. 1420. He wrote Chronicon Chroniconum, or a universal history, civil and ecclesiastical, from the creation to A.D. 1420, published by Maderus, Helmst. 1671.

William Lindwood, LL.D. a learned English jurist, educated at Cambridge and Oxford, dean of the Archie-to Chicheley, archbishop of Canterbury, lord privy seal to Henry V. and his ambassador in 1422 to Spain and Portugal, bishop of St. David's in 1432, and died 1446. He wrote Provinciale seu Constitutiones Anglie, being the constitutions of fourteen archbishops of Canterbury from Stephen Langton to Henry Chicheley, with notes and comments, Oxford, 1679, fol.

John de Imola, a learned commentator on canon law who died at Bologna A.D. 1436. His comments were published, Venice, 1575, 2 vols. fol.

Julianus Casarius, LL.D. professor of law in several Italian universities, then filled various offices in the court of Rome, and became a cardinal A.D. 1426. He was papal legate in the Hussite war, in which he was unsuccessful, and then legate to the council of Basil in 1431, presided there, refused to dissolve the council at the command of the pope; but in 1438 he again sided with the pope, attended the council of Florence, was sent legate to the king of Poland in 1444, advised him to violate his treaty with the Turks, and was himself slain leading the troops to battle. He died aged 46. His two letters to Pope Eugene IV. written from Basil, with a long oration he delivered there, have been printed.

Nicolaus Tudeschus called Panormitanus, a Benedictine monk of Sicily, an abbot, and archbishop of Palermo, a very able canonist, who taught in Italy and filled offices at Rome. In 1431 the king of Aragon sent him to the council of Basil, where he defended the supremacy of councils with great ability. He was made a cardinal in 1440, and died in 1445. Except his defence of the rights of councils, his works are all upon canon law. They were repeatedly published: e.g. Venice, 1617, 9 vols. fol.

Raymundus Sabunde, a learned Spaniard, rector of the gymnasium of Toulouse. He wrote (A.D. 1434—1436) Theologia Naturalis de Homine et Creaturis, seu Theaurus Divinarum Considerationum, often printed, e.g. Venice, 1581, 8vo.

Petrus Jeremie, a Dominican monk and a celebrated preacher, born at Palermo, lived at Bologna, and died there A.D. 1452. His sermons with expositions of the Lord's Prayer, the decalogue, and tracts on faith and Christ's sufferings, were printed, Haguenau, 1514.

Nicolaus Auximanus Picens, an Italian Franciscan monk, vicar of his order in Palestine, a pious man and not destitute of learning, A.D. 1430. He wrote Summa Casuum Conscientie, Supplementum ad Summam Pisanellam, and Interrogatorium Confessorum, besides some things never printed.

Agidius Carolus, born at Cambrai, fellow and professor of theology in the college of Navarre, Paris, dean of Cambrai in 1431, opposer of the Hussites in the council of Basil, 1433. He died very aged, Nov. 23, 1473. His Scripta Fragmentorum and his Scriptula Fragmentorum (two collections of tracts defending the Romish religion) were printed, Brussels, 1478, 2 vols. folio. His long argument at Basil against the Hussites is in Harduin's Concilia, tom. viii. p. 1759, &c.

Catharina Bononiensis, an Italian Franciscan abbess at Bologna, who thought she had many divine revelations. She flourished A.D. 1438, and died March 9th, 1463. Her Liber de Revelationibus sibi factis was printed, Venice, 1583.

John de Lydgate, an English Benedictine monk and teacher of youth at St. Edmundsbury. He was the imitator of Chaucer and accounted a good poet, born A.D. 1380, and lived till after 1460.

Thomas Walsingham, an English Benedictine monk of St. Albans, where he was preceptor A.D. 1440. He wrote two Histories of England, the more concise from A.D. 1273 to 1422, the larger, entitled Hypodigma Normannie, relates the history of Normandy from A.D. 1066 to 1417. Both are esteemed and were printed, Lond. 1574, fol. He also continued the Polychronicon of Ranulph Higden from 1357 to 1417.

John de Anania, a celebrated canonist of Bologna, who died A.D. 1455, leaving several large works on canon law which have been printed.

Laurentius Valla, of patrician rank, born at Rome, A.D. 1417, doctor of theology and canon of St. John de Lateran, a finished scholar but extremely sarcastic, and a severe critic upon authors. He made himself many enemies, among whom was Poggio, with whom he had long and severe quarrels. In 1443 he left Rome and went to Naples, where Alphonsus V. patronised him. The Inquisitors would have burned him at the stake, had not that king protected him. He was at length permitted to return to Rome and teach there till his death, A.D. 1465. He wrote Elegantia Lingue Latine, three works in controversy with Poggio, on Logic, on the spurious donation of Constantine the Great, Annotations on the New Testament, on Man's Supreme Good, and a tract on Free-will. These works with other tracts were printed at Basil, 1540, fol. He also wrote the history of Ferdinand of Aragon and Castile, from A.D. 1410 to 1415, besides notes on Salust, Livy, Quintilian, and translations of the Iliad, Herodotus, Thucydides, &c.

Plavius Blondus, or Blondus Flavius, born in Italy A.D. 1358, a good classical scholar, secretary to various popes, died June 4th, 1463, aged 75. He wrote much, but so hastily that his works are of little value. They are Historiarum Decades III., or a general history of the Western empire, from A.D. 410 to 1440, Roma Instaurata (a description of Rome in his day), Italia Illustrata (description of Italy in the middle ages), De Venetorum Origine et Genu (from A.D. 456 to 1291), Roma Triumphans (a description of the Roman republic in its best days); all these were printed, Basil, 1559, folio.

Meffrethus, a presbyter of the church of Melissen, A.D. 1443, who wrote Hortum Regina (sermons for the year), printed Nuremberg, 1487, fol. Basil, 1488, two vols. fol.

Reginaldus Pavo (in English, Peacock), born in Wales, educated at Oxford, bishop of St. Asaph, A.D. 1444, and of Chichester, A.D. 1450, accused of heresy and compelled to retract in 1457, and died not long after. He laboured much to convince and convert the Wickliffites, Hussites, Lollhards, and Waldenses, but disapproved all persecution. He acknowledged the corruptions of the church, held the Scriptures to be the only rule of faith, yet allowed a place for natural religion, denied the infallibility of popes and councils, yet admitted their right to legislate on points left undecided in the scriptures. He wrote in English two books on the faith, published with abridgment, Lond. 1688, 4to; also a prolix work against the assaults of the clergy, the Wickliffites and others, written in 1449, and still preserved in the public library at Cambridge. See Wharton's Appendix to Cave's Hist. Liter. [and Lewis's Life of Reynold Peock, being a sequel to the Life of Wiclif, 1744, and Oxford, 1820, 8vo.—R.]

Leonard de Utino, Belluensis or Miensis, an Italian Dominican, rector of a gymnasium at Bologna, chaplain to Eugene IV. provincial of his order for Lombardy, flourished A.D. 1444. He has left us two series of sermons, which are elaborate, learned, and ingenious, but infected with the bad taste of the times. (See Ammons's Gesch. der Homiletik. Gotting. 1804, p. 91, &c.) also a treatise De Locis Communibus Prædicatorum, and another, De Legibus.

Petrus de Pilichdorf, a German professor of theology about A.D. 1444, who wrote Contra Sectam Waldensium, in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xxv.

Mapheus Vegius, an Italian poet and man of letters, datary to Martin V. and a canon of Rome, died 1458. He wrote De Perseverantia in Religione, De Educatione Liberorum, Disputatio Terre, Solis, et Auræ, de Præstantia, Dialogus de Miseria et Felicitate, Veritas Invidia et Exultans, a poetical life of St. Anthony the monk, on the Four Last Things, Paraphrases on the seven penitential Psalms. The preceding are in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xxvi. also De Significatione Verborum in Jure Civili, and a thirteenth book of Virgil's Æneid.

Matthæus Palmerius, a poet, orator, and historian of Florence, A.D. 1449, condemned to the flames for some expressions savouring of Arianism in his Italian poem respecting the angels. He wrote a Chyroticon from the creation to A.D. 1449, usually printed with those of Eusebius and Prosper.

John Capgrave, an English Augustinian monk of Canterbury, D.D. at Oxford, and provincial of his order, A.D. 1450. He died in 1464, or as others say 1484, was an eminent theologian, and a severe reprover of the dissolute clergy. He wrote a Catalogue or Legend of all the English Saints, printed, London, 1516, fol. and many other works yet in manuscript.

Antonius de Rosellis, a Tuscan, professor of civil and canon law at Pavia, papal legate to the council of Basil, and privy counsellor to the emperor Frederick III. died at an advanced age, at Pavia, 1467. In his famous work entitled Monarchia, he proves from scripture, the fathers, reason, and both civil and canon law, that the pope is not supreme in temporal things, and that he has no more power than any other bishop. He wrote some other law tracts.

John Canale, D.D. an Italian Franciscan, much esteemed by the duke of Ferrara, A.D. 1450. He was a good scholar and divine, and wrote several tracts on practical religion, printed, Venice, 1494, fol.

Gulielmus Vorllongus, a French Dominican, called to Rome by Pius II. to defend his order against the Franciscans relative to the blood of Christ, where he died A.D. 1464, leaving a commentary on the Four Books of Sentences (printed, Lyons, 1481, &c.), and a Collection of passages from the Sentences which are opposed to Scotus.

Nicolaus de Orbellis or Dorbellus, a Franciscan professor of theology and scholastic philosophy at Poitiers, A.D. 1456, a strenuous defender of the opinions of Scotus in a series of works on the Sentences, logic, commentaries on Aristotle, &c.

Gulielmus Houppeland, a French theologian, arch-priest of Paris, and dean of the theological faculty there, died Aug. 2, 1492. His book, De Immortalitate Animæ et Statu ejus post mortem, full of quotations from the ancients, was printed, Paris, 1499, 8vo.

Jacobus de Paradiso, a Carthusian monk, and doctor at Erfurth, A.D. 1457, wrote a number of tracts on ecclesiastical and religious subjects. [He is also sometimes called Jacobus Juterburg or Do Jüterbock, and sometimes merely Jacobus Cisterciensis or Cathusianus. As a forerunner of Luther, he deserved a fuller notice than this meagre sentence. See Ullmann's Reformatoren vor der Reformation, vol. i. p. 230, &c. His principal work is printed by Brown, in his supplementary volume to the Fasciculus Rerum Explet. et Fugienti, p. 102, and is entitled, De Septem Statibus Ecclesiæ—De Authoritate Ecclesiæ et de ejus Reformatione.—R.]

Pius II. better known as Æneas Sylvius, of the noble family of Piccolomini, born 1405; went to Sienna in 1423, where he studied the poets and orators, and then the civil law; in 1431 he went to the council of Basil, where for ten years he was one of the most active and efficient in restricting the papal power, and urging a reform of the church. In 1439 he became a counsellor to pope Felix V. and in 1442 privy counsellor and secretary of state to the emperor Frederick III. Here he slowly turned with the emperor to the side of Eugene IV. and was made a bishop in 1447, yet continued to serve the emperor in public business. In 1452 he was made legate for Bohemia and the Austrian dominions, was honoured with a cardinal's hat in 1456, and in 1458 was created pope, reigned nearly seven years, and died at Ancona when ready to embark in an expedition against the Turks, Aug. 14th, 1464. His works are numerous and written with much ability (for he was perhaps the best scholar that ever wore the triple crown), but those written before he was pope are contradictory to those written afterwards, and are marked in the Index Expurgatorius. He wrote Bulla Retractoris Omnium ab eo olim contra Eugenium Papam in Concilio Basiliensi Gestorum, de Gentis Concilio Basiliensis, de Coronatione Felicii V. de Ortu, Regione, ac Gentis Bohemorum (a history of the Bohemians, from their origin to A.D. 1458, often printed, e.g. Amberg, 1593, 4to), an Abridgment of Flav. Blondus' Roman history, Cosmographia Liber Primus (on Asia Minor), Cosmographia Liber Secundus (on Europe in his age), a commentary on the history of Alphonsus, king of Aragon. 432 epistles, and several other tracts. All the above published, Basil, 1551, and Helmst. 1700, fol.

John Gobelinus, counsellor to pope Pius II. A.D. 1458. His name is annexed to the Commentarius de Rebus Gestis Pii II. Papæ, which it is supposed Pius himself composed, and left with his secretary to correct and publish; printed, Franef. 1614, fol.

Jacobus Piccolominus, counsellor to Callistus III. and Pius II. a cardinal in 1462, died in 1487, aged 57. He wrote Commentarius de Rebus toto orbe per Quinquennium Gestis (from A.D. 1464 to 1469), also 782 epistles, both printed, Franef. 1614, fol.

Andrews Barbatus or Barbatias, a celebrated jurist of Sicily A.D. 1460, who taught and died at Bologna. He commented on the canon law, and wrote on the offices of cardinal and legate à latere, and on some other parts of ecclesiastical law.

Gregory de Helmburg, a learned German jurist, active in the council of Basil, and much esteemed by Æneas Sylvius, a decided and firm opposer of the papal pretensions. His friend Sylvius when pope persecuted him for his adherence to the views they had both held.

His tracts against papal usurpations were printed, Franef. 1608, 4to. [Ullmann considers this person as another forerunner of Luther. See his Reformatoren vor der Reformation, vol. i. p. 212, &c. A number of his smaller pieces are in Brown's Fasciculus Rer. Explet. et Fugienti, vol. ii. p. 114, &c.; and Pope Pius the Second's bull of excommunication against him is given by Melchior Adamus in his Vita Germanorum Jurconsultorum, Frank. 1795, folio, p. 2.—R.]

Roderic Sinecus de Arevalo, a Spanish jurist, bishop, counsellor to the king of Castile, &c. flourished 1466. He wrote a History of Spain from the earliest times to A.D. 1469, some law tracts, and Speculum Humane Vitæ (on the duties of all classes of people as immortal beings).

Alexander de Imola, called Tartagnus, a famous Italian jurist who lectured on both civil and canon law with vast applause for thirty years at Pavia, Ferrara, and Bologna, and died A.D. 1487, aged 54, leaving much-esteemed commentaries on civil and canon law.

Jacobus Perezus, a Spanish Augustinian monk and bishop who died in 1491. He wrote allegorical commentaries on the Psalms, the Canticles, and the Cantica Officialia, and a tract against the Jews, most of them printed together, Venice, 1568, 4to.

Petrus Natalis or de Natalibus, a Venetian and bishop in that territory, A.D. 1470. He wrote Historia sive Catalogus Martyrum et Sanctorum, often printed.

Gabriel Barletta, an Italian Dominican monk and distinguished preacher, A.D. 1470. His two volumes of sermons were printed 1470, Venice, 1585, 8vo.

Martin surnamed Magister, rector of the college of St. Barbara at Paris, and a celebrated teacher of moral philosophy there, who died in 1482, aged 50. He wrote Questiones Morales de Fortitudine (Paris, 1489, folio), De Temperantia, &c.

Rudolphus Agrícola, born 1442 near Groningen, studied at Groningen, Paris, and in Italy, became an elegant scholar, learned in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, a sound theologian and a good philosopher. He taught a few years at Groningen, and then at Worms and Heidelberg, where he died Oct. 1485, aged 42. He wrote on Logical Invention, several orations and epistles, translations from the Greek, and comments on the Latin classics. Most of his works were printed, Cologne, 1539, fol. He opposed the corruptions of Rome. [The curious reader will find an account of him in Melchior Adamus, Vita Germanorum Philosophorum, p. 6.—R.]

Bartholomew Platina (of Pladina in Cremona), an Italian, a soldier in his youth, then a man of letters employed by cardinal Bessarion, and by Pope Pius II. who gave him valuable benefices. Paul II. discarded and imprisoned him, put him to the rack, and left him in poverty and disgrace. Sixtus IV. raised him again to honour and disservice, and made him keeper of the Vatican library. He died A.D. 1481, aged 60. He wrote Historia de Vitis Pontificum (from the Christian era to A.D. 1471, continued by Onuphrius Panvinus to A.D. 1565, frequently printed, e.g. Cologne, 1611, 4to), De Honestæ Voluptatis et Valetudine, De Falso et Vero Bono, De Optimo Cive, De Naturæ Rerum, De Vera Nobilitate, a Panegyric on Bessarion, a number of letters and other tracts, all collected, Cologne, 1574, fol. besides several pieces published separately.

Robert Fleming, an Englishman, educated at Oxford, resided some time at Rome, became dean of Lincoln where he died. While in Italy A.D. 1477, he wrote a fulsome poetic Eulogy on Sixtus IV. entitled Lucubrations Tiburtine, printed, Rome, 1477, 8vo.

John Raulin, educated at Paris, president of the college of Navarre, A.D. 1481, became a Cluniacian monk in 1497, was learned and pious, died at Paris A.D. 1501, aged 71, leaving many sermons and addresses, and 53 letters, published, Antwerp, 1612, 6 vols. 4to.

Augustinus Patricius, a canon of the church of Sienna and secretary to Cardinal Francis Piccolomini, by whose direction he composed A.D. 1480 a History of the Councils of Basil and Florence, published in the Concilium.

Matthæus Marescalcus de Bappenheim, a German jurist and canon of Augsburg, flourished A.D. 1480. He wrote Chronicon Australe (of Europe from A.D. 852 to 1327), Chronicon Augustanum (of Augsburg from A.D. 973 to 1104), and Chronicon Etwangense (from A.D.

1095 to 1477), published by Freher, Scriptores Rerum Germanicarum, tom. i.

Hermolaus Barbarus, a Venetian patrician, born A.D. 1454, an elegant Greek and Latin scholar, envoy to the pope in 1491, who created him patriarch of Aquileia without the consent of the senate of Venice. This involved him and his whole family in trouble, in banishment, and confiscation of property. He died at Rome A.D. 1494, aged 59. He corrected several of the Greek and Latin classics, translated some, and wrote a number of orations, poems, and tracts.

Baptista Salvis or de Salis, an Italian Franciscan A.D. 1480. He wrote Summa Casuum Conscientie, usually called Baptistiana, printed, Paris, 1499.

Angelus de Clavasio, an Italian Franciscan, vicar general of the Observants, a distinguished theologian and jurist, died 1495. He wrote Summa Casuum Conscientie, Nurnib. 1588, fol. and De Restitutibus and Area Fidei, Alcalá, 1562, 4to.

Baptista Trovante, an Italian Franciscan resident at Louvain A.D. 1480. He wrote Summa Casuum Conscientie, Paris, 1515, 8vo.

Bernardinus Aquilinus, an Italian Franciscan, a learned jurist and court preacher at Rome A.D. 1480. He wrote, besides sermons, several tracts on practical subjects and on points of canon law.

Antonius de Balacho or de Vercellis, an Italian regular Observant Franciscan, and an eloquent preacher A.D. 1480. He left several sermons and religious tracts.

Bernardinus Tomitatus, surnamed Parvus from his diminutive stature, an Italian Franciscan in high repute at Rome, eminent for piety and eloquence. He died at Pavia, Sept. 28, 1494, leaving several Italian sermons, and a tract, De Modo Confutendi.

Bernardinus de Busto, an Italian Franciscan preacher, learned and superstitious. He died after A.D. 1500, leaving several series of sermons and offices for the festivals of the conception of Mary and the name of Jesus.

Robert Caraccolus de Licio, an Italian Franciscan preacher of very moving address. He died A.D. 1495, having preached fifty years, and left numerous sermons, printed, Venice, 1490, 3 vols. folio.

Michael de Mediolano (or de Carcano, according to Wadding), a celebrated Italian Franciscan preacher A.D. 1480, who has left numerous printed sermons.

Andreas, a Dominican and a cardinal, eminent for sanctity, eloquence, and zeal for reformation. Finding the pope and cardinals opposed to a reformation of morals, in 1482 he applied to the emperor Frederick III. went to Basil, endeavoured to assemble a general council there, was anathematized by the pope, seized, imprisoned, and strangled. Several of his letters and tracts on this subject are annexed to Hottinger's Hist. Bædæ, Næd., xv.

Marcellus Ficinus, a Florentine, patronized by Lorenzo de Medici. He was a good classic scholar, the great reviver of Platonic philosophy, a good theologian and (after hearing Savonarola) a pious man and good preacher. He died A.D. 1499, leaving numerous works illustrative of the classic authors, the Platonic philosophy, and the principles of sound piety. His Epistles contain many solid and devout essays. His collected works were often printed, e.g. Paris, 1641, in two vols. folio.

Wernerus Rollwinck de Locr, a Westphalian and Carthusian monk at Cologne, died A.D. 1502, aged 77. He wrote Fasciculus Temporum, embracing all the ancient Chronicles, and coming down (in different copies) to A.D. 1470, 1474, 1480, and continued by John Linturius to A.D. 1514; in Pistorius, Rerum Germanicarum, tom. ii. De Westphalia Situ et Laudibus, Questiones pro Sac. Theol. Studiosis, and some other things.

Jacobus Gruytrodius, a Carthusian monk and a prior near Liege, A.D. 1483. He wrote Speculum Quintuplex Prælatorum, Subditorum, Sacerdotum, Secularium Hominum et Senum (on the duties of each).

John Pious, a prince of Miranda and Concordia, born 1463, became a very finished scholar, a great linguist and philosopher, a great disputant, and then a sober theologian, and at last an humble and zealous Christian; resigned his office, retired from the world, and was cut off prematurely A.D. 1494, aged 32. Besides his early disputations, he wrote Precepts for a Holy Life, on the 15th Psalm, on the Kingdom of Christ and the Vanity of the World, on the Lord's Prayer, epistles, &c. all published, Basil, 1601, fol. [See more of him in Hallam's Intro. to the Liter. of Europe, vol. i. p. 281-85.—R.]

John Trithemius, or de Tritenheim near Treves, born in 1462, educated at Treves and Heidelberg, became a Benedictine monk A.D. 1484, presided over the monastery of Spanheim A.D. 1485—1505, and over that at Würzburg from 1506 till his death A.D. 1518. He was a man of vast reading, and a very voluminous writer. He wrote Chronologia Mystica, De Origine Gentis et Regum Francorum (from the year 433 A.C. to A.D. 1514), Chronicon Ducum et Comitum Palatinorum, Catalogus Scriptorum Germanicarum, Catalogus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum (a work of much labour embracing 970 articles), Chronicon Cænobii Hirsaugiensis, Chronicon Monasterii Scti Martini Spanheimensis, Epistolæ Familiæ 140. The preceding were published, Francf. 1601, 2 vols. fol. Some other Chroniconæ, sermons, tracts, and letters, compose another folio, printed at Mentz, 1604. Other pieces appeared, Cologne, 1624, 8vo. He also wrote Polygraphia, Steganographia, De Providentia Dei, Historia Belli hæcæci anno 1504 Gesti, and Tractatus Chymici.

Carolus Foranius of Bruges, a professor at Paris, 1486, and a Benedictine monk. He wrote De Animi Tranquillitate, De Immaculata B. Virginis Conceptione, Collationes Monasticæ, Speculum Disciplinæ Monasticæ, De Observat. Regula Benedictinæ.

Ælius Antonius Nebrissenis (Antonio de Lebrija, an Andalusian), a Spaniard, born in 1444, travelled in Italy, became a finished scholar, did much for the cause of polite learning in Spain, aided cardinal Ximenes in his literary labours, wrote much, and died at Alcalá A.D. 1522, aged 77. He was a learned editor of classical and religious works, wrote the history of Ferdinand and Isabella to A.D. 1509, on the War of Navarre A.D. 1512, a Lexicon of Civil Law, a Medical Lexicon, a Latin-Spanish and Spanish-Latin Lexicon, a Latin Grammar, and several other things.

Aurelius Brandolinus of Florence, a distinguished theologian, poet, and preacher, and at last an Augustinian hermit, died at Rome A.D. 1498.

Henry Bebelius, a German, an elegant scholar, poet-laureat, teacher of Belles Lettres at Tübingen A.D. 1497. He wrote much, chiefly on rhetoric and poetry. His collected works were published, Strasb. 1813, fol.

Gaufridus Bousardus, D.D. educated at Paris, chancellor there, travelled in Italy, bishop of Le Mans A.D. 1518, died there A.D. 1520, aged 81. He wrote on the Marriage of the Clergy, on the Mass, and on the Seven Penitential Psalms.

Donatus Bossius of Milan, flourished A.D. 1489. His Chronicon (or universal history from the creation to his own times) and Chronicon de Episcopis et Archiepiscopis Mediolanensibus (to A.D. 1489) were both printed, Milan, 1492, fol.

Marcus Antonius Coccius Sabellicus, a schoolmaster at Rome and Utino, historiographer to the state of Venice, died A.D. 1506, aged 70. He wrote Rhapsodia Historiarum (from the creation to A.D. 1504), De Rebus Gestis Venetorum (from the founding of the city to A.D. 1487), Exempla, De Aquileia Antiquitate, De Venetæ Urbis Situ, De Venetis Magistratibus, De Prætoris Officio, De Officio Scribæ, Epistolæ, besides orations and poems, collected, Basil, 1560, 4 vols. fol.

Bonifacius Simoneta of Milan, a Cistercian monk and abbot of Placentia A.D. 1450. He wrote on the persecutions of the Christians and the history of the pontiffs from St. Peter to Innocent VIII. in 275 letters, divided into six books, Basil, 1509.

Petrus Apollonius Collatus, a presbyter of Novara in Italy, probably lived about A.D. 1490. He wrote De Excidio Hierosolymorum (a Tite), in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xii. Some refer him to the seventh century.

Robert Guaguinus of Belgium, educated at Paris, a monk of the order of the Holy Trinity for the Redemption of Captives, general of his order in 1473, and envoy of Lewis XII. of France to Italy, Germany, and France, died at Paris, A.D. 1501. He wrote Annales Rerum Gallicarum, on the immaculate conception, De Arte Metrorum, orations, poems, &c.

Fellinus Sandeus, L.L.D. of Ferrara, professor of Canon Law at Pisa, A.D. 1464—1481, then prefect of the Rota at Rome, and bishop of Lucca in 1499, died 1503. He wrote largely on Canon Law, and an abridged History of Sicily. His works in several folios were printed, Venice, 1576.

John Geller of Kayserberg, born A.D. 1445, educated at Erlburg and Basil, an eminent preacher and religious man. He preached at Erlburg, Würzburg, and for 30 years at Strasburg, where he died in 1510. His name rous sermons are excellent for that day, and have been frequently printed. See a critique upon them, with his biography, in Ammon's Geschichte der Homilistik, Götting. 1804, p. 217–268 [with Ammon's Gedanken von Kaiserbergs Leben, Lehren, und Prädigten, Erlang. 1826, 8vo. See an account of his life and writings, with some of his pointed sayings against the monks, in Melchior Adamus, Vita Germanorum Theologorum, p. 3.—H.]

John Reuchlin, in Greek Cappio, born in Swabia Jan. 1st, 1454, educated at Haden, Paris, Basil, and Orleans, and retired to Germany in 1481 a finished scholar. He next accompanied the count of Württemberg to Rome, and returning was sent envoy to the imperial court. Here he studied Hebrew under a Jew, but perfected himself in that language at Rome. He was an elegant Latin and Greek scholar, a great patron of the liberal arts in Germany, learned in the Hebrew, and a zealous promoter of Hebrew learning. His censures of the ignorance and stupidity of the clergy drew on him their persecution. They attacked him as being inclined to Judaism, and also as one poisoned by the Greek and Latin poets. He opposed them with ridicule and sarcasm, particularly in his Litteræ Obscurorum Virorum. The quarrel became serious, but at length was merged in that greater contest between the Romanists and Protestants. He wrote De Arte Caballistica, De Verbo Mirifico (on the absurdities of Greek, Hebrew, and Christian philosophy), a Version of the Eight Penitential Psalms from the Hebrew, De Arte Coniunctionis, an Judeorum Talmud sit Supprimendum? Breviloquium (a concise Latin dictionary), a Hebrew Lexicon and Grammar (Basil, 1554, fol.). Rudiments of the Hebrew language, on the accents and orthography of Hebrew, and a few other things. [The life of this, the most distinguished scholar of the 15th century, has been at length presented to the English reader in Barham's Life and Times of John Reuchlin, London, 1843, 12mo, which is founded principally on Mayerhoff's Johann Reuchlin und Seine Zeit, Berl. 1830. See also the admirable sketch of Reuchlin in Ranke's History of the Reformation, Mrs. Austin's transl. vol. i. p. 297, &c. The principal publications and documents in the celebrated Reuchlinian controversy with the Dominicans are given by Von der Hardt in the second part of his Historia Literaria Reformationis, Franc. 1717, fol. It is now generally admitted that Reuchlin had no hand in the composition of the Litteræ Obscurorum Virorum. The question of the authorship of this well-known satire is very fully discussed in a valuable article in the Edinburgh Review, vol. liii. p. 180, &c. from the pen of Sir Wm. Hamilton of Edinburgh.—R.]

Jacobus Wimpfelingus, born in Alsace A.D. 1449, studied theology at Friburg, Basil, Erfurt, and Heidelberg, became an eloquent preacher, settled at Spire A.D. 1494, and after several years removed to Heidelberg, where he wrote and instructed youth. He died A.D. 1528, aged 80. He was a pious man and laboured for a reformation of morals, but shuddered at the conclusions produced by the reformers. He wrote many historical, devotional, and literary pieces, which were published separately. [See a brief notice of him in Melchior Adamus, Vita German. Theolog. p. 10.—R.]

Oliver Maillard of Paris, a Franciscan general of his order, and a noted preacher, died A.D. 1502. He published his sermons and tracts, Lyons, 1499, fol.

Antonius Bonfinius, an Italian, a fine Latin and Greek scholar, highly esteemed by Matthias Corvinus, king of Hungary, by whose suggestion he wrote Res Hungaricæ (a history of Hungary, from the earliest times to A.D. 1495), repeatedly printed, e.g. Hanover, 1606, fol.

John Jovian Pontanus, born in Umbria, spent his life at the court of Naples, where he became epistolary secretary to the king, and died 1503, aged 78. He was a fine Latin scholar, and a poet, orator, and historian, but exceedingly sarcastic, and rather a pagan than Christian moralist. He wrote largely on particular virtues and vices, De Sermonibus, De Bello Neapolitano (between Ferdinand of Naples and John, Duke of Angers), some dialogues, and numerous poems, all collected, Basil, 1556, in 4 vols. 8vo.

Nicolaus Simonis, a Carmelite monk of Haerlem, who died at an advanced age A.D. 1511. He wrote sermons on Canon Law, and on the power of the popes and councils.

James Sprenger, a Dominican monk of Cologne, provincial of his order, A.D. 1495, inquisitor-general for Germany. He wrote Maleficarum (against witchcraft), Francf. 1580, 8vo.

John Naulcherus, LL.D. professor of Canon Law at Tübingen, flourished A.D. 1500. He wrote Chronicon Universale (from the creation to A.D. 1500), enlarged and revised by Melancthon, often published.

The preceding writers belong to the 15th century. The following of the 16th century and before Luther are inserted to make the list reach to the time of the Reformation.

John Ludovius Vives, born in Spain, studied there, and at Paris and Louvain. In the latter place, he became an elegant Latin and Greek scholar, and a teacher of the liberal arts. He aided Erasmus in editing the Fathers, and commented on Augustine's Vitas Dei, went to England to be tutor to Mary, daughter of Henry VIII. returned and lived at Bruges till his death, A.D. 1537. His works on education, on the classics, and on devotional subjects, were collected, Basil, 1555, two vols. fol.

John Ludovicus Vivaldus, a Dominican, born in Piedmont, bishop in Dalmatia, A.D. 1519. He wrote several tracts on experimental religion, printed, Lyons, 1558.

Baptista Mantuanus, of Spanish extract, born in Mantua, Italy, A.D. 1448, became a Carmelite, general of his order, A.D. 1513, died in 1516, aged 68, a prolific poet, biographer of saints, and religious writer. His works were printed, Antwerp, 1576, 4 vols. 8vo.

Peter Martyr Anglerius, born at Milan, went to Spain, A.D. 1487, served the king in various offices, was sent envoy to the Sultan of Egypt, A.D. 1501, and died after A.D. 1525. He wrote De Navigatione Oceani (describing Columbus's recent discoveries, written A.D. 1502), Paris, 1587, 8vo; De Legatione sua Babylonica (printed with the preceding), Epistolæ (nearly a complete history of Europe, from 1488 to 1526, in 813 letters), Amsterdam, 1670, fol.

Pelbartus Osvaldus, a Hungarian Franciscan, flourished A.D. 1501. He wrote Aurum S. Theologie Rosarium, juxta Quat. Sententiarum Libros (Hagencnau, 1508, 2 vols. fol.) and many sermons printed at different times.

John Meder, a German Franciscan, preacher at Basil A.D. 1501. He wrote sermons for the year, on the parable of the prodigal son, Paris, 1511, 8vo.

Mauritius de Torti Fildæus, of Irish birth; his Irish name was Ophilla. [?] From his early childhood he lived about 40 years in Italy, was a Franciscan and taught theology at Pavia, flourished A.D. 1505. Pope Julius II. made him archbishop of Tuam. He was at the Lateran council in 1513, and died A.D. 1514, not quite 50 years old. He was a distinguished theologian of the school of Scotus, whose principles he illustrated in a series of works.

Nicolaus Dionysii or De Nyse, a French Franciscan, prior of the convent of Rouen, and provincial of his order, A.D. 1501, died at Rouen A.D. 1509, wrote Resolutio Theologorum, or comments on the Four Books of Sentences, and many sermons.

James Almah, a French scholastic divine of Paris, a Scotist, and defender of the superiority of councils over popes, a lecturer on dialectics, philosophy, and theology, in the college of Navarre, flourished in 1502, and died in 1515. His lectures were published, also tracts on morals, on the authority of councils, reply to cardinal Cajetan, &c. Paris, 1516.

Finus Hadrianus, an Italian of Ferrara, secretary of the treasury of the duke. In 1503, being then in years, he wrote Flagellus aduersus Judeos, printed, Venice, 1538, 4to.

Albert Crantz, born at Hamburg, doctor of canon law and theology, A.D. 1450, rector of the university of Rostock, dean of Hamburg, died Dec. 7, 1517. He ardently desired a reformation of the church, but despairing of it used to say to Luther—"Brother, brother, go to your cell and say, 'The Lord be merciful.'" He wrote Metropolis (a history of the German churches, especially in Saxony, founded in the age of Charlemagne), Cologne, 1574, 8vo. Historia Saxonica, Francf. 1575, Historia Fandolica, Francf. 1575, Chronicon Gentium Septentrionalium (Denmark, Sweden, and Norway), Francf. 1575. All these are prohibited by the Index Expurgatorius till purged of their heresy.

John Stella, a Venetian priest, wrote, in the year 1505, Commentarium de Vita et Moribus Pontificum Romanorum, from St. Peter to A.D. 1505, printed,

CHAPTER III.

HISTORY OF RELIGION AND THEOLOGY.

1. THAT the public religion of the Latins no longer contained anything to recommend it to the esteem of the pious and well-disposed, is a fact so well attested that even Venice, 1507, and 1650, 24mo. He dared not tell all he knew.

Damianus Crassus, a Dominican of Lombardy, published A.D. 1506, a prolix commentary on Job, with several theological essays. He died A.D. 1516.

Francis Ximenes, a Spaniard, reputedly born A.D. 1436, and educated at Salamanca. After visiting Italy and filling some minor ecclesiastical offices, he forsook the world, became a Franciscan monk at Toledo, retired to a sequestered spot, became an abbot, confessor to queen Isabella in 1492, provincial of his order, archbishop of Toledo, A.D. 1495, high chancellor of the empire, inquisitor-general of Spain, founded the university of Alcalá (Complutum) in 1500, was regent of the prince and protector of the empire in 1506, cardinal in 1507, ruled all Spain from A.D. 1515, and died 7th Novem. 1517, aged 80. He was learned and a great promoter of learning, an austere monk, a staunch Catholic, an able statesman, and a benefactor of his country. His great work was the Complutensian Polyglot Bible, in 6 vols. fol. printed at Alcalá between the years 1502—1517, on which he expended, 50,000 crowns, employed a great number of the best scholars, and had the best manuscripts from the Vatican library. See Prescott's Ferdinand and Isabella, vol. ii. p. 373, &c. vol. iii. p. 296, &c. 404, &c.

Alphonsus Zamora, a Spanish Jew and rabbi, converted to Christianity, and employed by cardinal Ximenes on his Polyglot Bible. He flourished A.D. 1506. He was the chief writer of the sixth volume of the Polyglot, containing the Apparatus for understanding the Hebrew, Chaldee, and Samaritan of the Old Testament. He also wrote another Hebrew Grammar, a concise Lexicon, and a treatise on the Hebrew points, together with a letter to the Jews, all printed at Alcalá, 1526, 4to.

Philippus Decius, LL.D. a famous Italian professor of canon law at Pisa and other places, who died A.D. 1535, aged above 80. In 1511 he gave an opinion that a general council may be called without the consent of the pope, an opinion which he defended at length. He wrote also extensive commentaries on canon law which were printed.

Thomas Radinus, called Todiscus, an Italian Dominican of Piacenza, an acute theologian, and a distinguished poet and orator, flourished A.D. 1510. He wrote De Pulchritudine Animæ, Abyssus Sideratis, an Oration against Luther, and another against Melancthon.

Cyprianus Benetus, a Spanish Dominican, professor of theology at Paris, A.D. 1511. He wrote several tracts respecting the papal power, and some other things.

Marcus Vigorus, a Ligurian Dominican, professor of theology at Padua and Rome, bishop of Sulgaglia, and a cardinal, died A.D. 1516, aged 70. He wrote various treatises respecting the death of Christ, printed, Douay, 1607, two vols.

John Aventinus, born in Bavaria A.D. 1446, studied at Ingolstadt and Paris, became a finished scholar, taught the classics at Vienna, Ingolstadt, and Munich, intimate with Erasmus. At the instigation and expense of the princes of Bavaria, he wrote Annales Boiorum (from the earliest times to A.D. 1460). Ingolst. 1554, fol. and enlarged, Basil, 1580, fol. He died A.D. 1534, aged 68. His Annals are prohibited by the Index Expurgatorius, till purged of their heresies.

Peter Galatinus, an Italian converted Jew, a Franciscan, doctor of theology, and Apostolic penitentiary, flourished A.D. 1516, died after A.D. 1532. He wrote a Dialogue between Galatinus, Capnio [Reuchlin], and Hochstraten, entitled Opus de Arcanis Catholice Fidei, chiefly borrowed from Raymund Martini's Pugio Fidei, printed often, e.g. Francf. 1672, fol.—Mur.

those who have the strongest inclination to gainsay dare not deny it. And among the Greeks and Orientals the state of religion was not much better. Nearly the whole worship of God consisted in ceremonies, and those in a great measure puerile and silly. The sermons which were occasionally addressed to the people were not only destitute of taste and good sense, but also of religion and piety, and were stuffed with fables and nauseous fictions.¹ And among the Latins he was accounted a well-informed and pious Christian who revered the clergy and especially the head of that body, the Roman pontiff; who secured the favours of the saints by frequent offerings to them, that is, to their temples and to their priests; who attended the stated rites and ceremonies; and who had moreover money enough to buy remission of sins from the Romish venders. If beyond this a person now and then practised some severity towards his body, he was accounted eminently a child of God. Very few were able or disposed to acquire just views of religion; to bring their hearts to accord with the precepts of Christ, and to make the holy Scriptures their counsellor; and those who did so, with difficulty escaped with their lives.

2. The wise and religious, in nearly all the countries of the West, perceived this lamentable state of things, and endeavoured though in different ways to make it better. In England and Scotland, the followers of Wickliffe, who were branded with the odious name of Lollhards, continued to censure the decisions of the pontiffs and the conduct of the clergy.² The Waldenses, though oppressed and persecuted on all sides, did not cease to proclaim aloud from their remote valleys and hiding-places that succour must be afforded to religion and piety, now almost extinct. Even in Italy itself Jerome Savonarola, among others, asserted that Rome was a second Babylon, and had many to support him. But as most of the priests together with the monks well understood that every diminution of the public ignorance, superstition, and folly, would prove an equal diminution of their emoluments and honours, they strenuously opposed all reformation, and by fire and sword enjoined silence and inaction on these troublesome censors.

3. The religious dissensions and controversies in Bohemia, which originated from

¹ For a full account of the preachers, and the subjects and modes of preaching in this century, see Ammon's Geschichte der Homiletik, vol. i. Götting. 1804, 8vo, also with the title Gesch. der Praktischen Theologie.—Mur.

² See Wilkin's Concilia, tom. iv.; Wood's Antiq. Oxon. tom. i. p. 202, 204, &c.

John Huss and Jacobellus de Misa, broke out into a fierce and deadly war, after the lamentable death of Huss and Jerome of Prague at Constance. The friends of Huss and the defenders of the [sacramental] cup, being variously persecuted by the adherents to the Roman pontiffs, selected a high and rugged mountain in the district of Bechin, where they held their religious meetings and celebrated the Lord's Supper in both elements. This mountain they called Tabor from the tents under which they lived there at first, and afterwards adorned it with fortifications and a regular city. And now proceeding further they put themselves under Nicholas of Hussinetz, lord of the place where Huss was born, and the celebrated John Ziska, a knight of Bohemia, and a man of great valour; that under these leaders they might avenge the death of John Huss and Jerome upon the friends of the Roman pontiff, and might obtain the liberty of worshipping God in a different manner from that prescribed by the statutes of the Romish church. Nicholas died in the year 1420, and left Ziska alone to command this continually augmenting company. Amid the first conflicts and at the commencement of greater evils A.D. 1419, the Bohemian king and emperor, Wenceslaus, was removed by death.

4. His successor, the emperor Sigismund, employed edicts, arms, and penal statutes to bring this war to a close; and he put many of the Hussites to a miserable death. Hence in the year 1420 the Bohemians revolted from him, and under John Ziska made war upon him; and Ziska, though blind, so managed the war as to render his very name terrible to his foes. On the death of Ziska A.D. 1424, a large part of the Hussites chose Procopius Rasa for their leader, who was likewise an energetic man and successfully managed the cause of his party. On both sides many things were done ferociously and cruelly, and altogether inhumanly. For the combatants, though they differed in most of their opinions in regard to religion and religious worship, yet both of them held the common principle that the enemies of true religion might justly be assailed with arms, and be extirpated with fire and sword. The Bohemians in particular, who contended that Huss had been unjustly committed to the flames at Constance, still admitted in general that corrupters of religion and heretics ought to be subjected to capital punishments; Huss however they maintained was no heretic. In this war there was on both sides so great ferocity, that it is difficult to say which exceeded in cruelty and in the multitude of abominable deeds.

5. All the avengers of the death of Huss were in harmony at the commencement of the war; at least they had the same views and made the same demands. But when their number was increased and multitudes of all sorts of persons had joined their standard, great dissension arose among them on many points; and in the year 1420 this produced an open schism, dividing the body into two principal factions, the Calixtines and the Taborites. The former or Calixtines, who derived their name from the cup (calix) which they wished to have restored in the eucharist, were of more moderate views, and did not wish to have the old constitution and government of the church overturned, or the religion of their progenitors changed. All that they required was comprehended in these four demands:—I. That the word of God might be preached to the people in its purity and simplicity. II. That the sacred supper might be administered in both the elements. III. That the clergy might be reclaimed from the pursuit of wealth and power, to a life and conduct becoming the successors of the apostles. IV. That the greater or mortal sins might be duly punished. Yet those who confined themselves within these limits were not free from disagreements. In particular there was a great contest among them respecting the Lord's Supper. For James de Misa, the author of the doctrine that the sacred supper should be administered in both kinds, maintained that the sacramental elements should be presented to infants, and many followed his views; but others were for refusing infants the sacred supper.¹

6. The Taborites, who derived their name from Mount Tabor, made far more extensive demands. For they would have both religion and the government of the church restored to their original simplicity, the authority of the pontiff put down, and the Romish form of worship abolished; in short, they wished for an entirely new church and commonwealth, in which Christ himself should reign and everything be conducted according to divine dictation. In this their principal teachers, Martin Loquis, a Moravian, and his associates, were so extravagant as to indulge themselves in fanatical dreams and to disseminate and teach publicly that Jesus Christ was about to descend, to purge away the corruptions of the church with fire and sword, and other similar reveries. On this party alone rest all the horrid deeds, the murders, plunderings, and burnings which have been charged upon the Hussites and upon their leaders, Ziska and Procopius. At least a great portion of this class had imbibed ferocious sentiments, and breathed nothing but war and slaughter against their enemies.¹

¹ See Byzlinus, Diarium Belli Hussitici, p. 130, &c.

7. The council of Basil A.D. 1433, attempted to put an end to the dreadful war in Bohemia, and for this purpose invited the Bohemians to the council. They appeared by their envoys, among whom their general Procopius was one.² But after much discussion the Bohemians returned home, nothing being accomplished. The Calixtines were not averse from peace, but the Taborites could not be moved at all to yield. Afterwards Æneas Sylvius, who with others was sent by the council into Bohemia, managed the matter more successfully. For by granting the use of the cup to the Calixtines, which was the chief object of their wishes, he reconciled them to the Roman pontiff. But with the other party, the Taborites, neither the shrewdness and eloquence of Sylvius nor the numberless menaces, sufferings, and persecutions to which they were afterwards exposed, could avail anything. From this time however they regulated both their religion and their discipline more discreetly and more suitably, abandoned war, discarded those tenets which were at variance with genuine Christianity, and rejected and excluded all those who were either beside themselves or of base lives and conduct.³ These are those Bohemian Brethren, or as they were called by their enemies Piccards, i.e. Beghards, who at the time of the reformation entered into alliance with Luther and his associates, and whose posterity still exist in Poland and in some other countries.⁴

8. In most of the interpreters of the sacred volume, of whom this age produced an abundance, there is nothing to be commended except their good intentions. Those who relied upon their own resources, or did not plunder from the writings of their predecessors, amused or rather beguiled their readers with what are called mystical, analogical, and allegorical contemplations. At the head of all the interpreters stood Alphonsus Tostatus, bishop of Avila, whose ponderous volumes on the holy Scriptures are extant, but contain nothing remarkable except a prodigious mass of reading. Laurentius Valla, in his little book of critical and grammatical Notes on the New Testament, did more for the cause of sacred literature; for he there showed subsequent interpreters how to remove the difficulties which attend the reading and understanding of the sacred books.⁵ It is proper to add here that in most of the countries of Europe, as in France, Italy, Germany, and Britain, the holy Scriptures were translated into the vernacular languages, which portended a great change in the prevailing religion and a reformation of it, derived from these sources of religious knowledge.

9. The schools of theology were almost exclusively occupied by those who had loaded their memories with dialectical terms and distinctions, in order to dispute in a formal manner on divine subjects, which however they did not understand. There were few remaining of that class of theologians who chose to demonstrate the doctrines and precepts of religion by the declarations of the sacred volume and of the ancient fathers. Yet there were wise and learned men who did not fail to discern

¹ I will here transcribe some of the Taborite sentiments which Byzinius has faithfully stated, in his Diary. Hussit. p. 203, &c.: "All the opposers of Christ's law ought to perish with the seven last plagues, to inflict which the faithful are to be called forth. In this time of vengeance, Christ is not to be imitated in his mildness and pity towards those sinners, but in his zeal and fury and just retribution. In this time of vengeance, every believer, even a presbyter, however spiritual, is accused if he withholds his material sword from the blood of the adversaries of Christ's law, for he ought to wash and sanctify his hands in their blood." From men of such sentiments, who could expect anything of equity, justice, or kindness? On this most calamitous war, besides the ancient writers, Sylvius, Theobaldus, Cochleus, and others, Lenfant has written an appropriate work, Histoire de la Guerre des Hussites, Amsterdam, 1731, 2 vols. 4to. But to this should be added a work which Lenfant did not consult, Byzinius, Diarium Belli Hussitici; a tract written with great fidelity, and published, though mutilated, by Ludewig in his Reliquiæ Manuscriptorum, tom. vi. and also Beausobre's Supplément à l'Hist. de la Guerre des Hussites, Lausanne, 1745, 4to.

² The Bohemians appeared at Constance to the number of 300 men on horseback; among whom besides Procopius were William Cosca, John Rockysaurs a Calixtine priest, Nicholas Galaccus a Taborite priest, and Peter Anglicus. In the name of their countrymen they proposed the four following articles: I. Whoever would be saved must receive the eucharist in both kinds. II. Temporal authority is forbidden to the clergy by the divine law. III. The preaching of the word of God should be free to every man. IV. Public crimes must by no means go unpunished. On these points, four Bohemian divines and four members of the council disputed for fifty days. Their speeches may be seen in Harduin's Concilia, tom. viii. p. 1653, &c. The council answered their demands so equivocally, that they deemed it expedient to break off the negotiation and return home.—Schl.

³ See Adrian Regenvolscius, Hist. Eccles. Provinciar. Slesoniar. lib. ii. cap. 8, p. 165; Camerarius, Historica Narratio de Fratrum Ecclesii in Bohemia, Moravia, &c. Polonia, Heidelberg, 1605, 4to; Lastius, Historia Fratrum Bohemicorum, which I have before me in manuscript, the 8th book of it was printed at Amsterdam, 1649, 8vo. [See also Elsner's Dissertations relative to the creed, usages, and history of the Bohemian Brethren, in Gerdes, Miscellanea Groningana, tom. vi. vii. and viii.—Mur.]

⁴ A fuller account of these protracted contests, drawn as usual from an independent examination of the original sources, may be seen in Gieseler's Lehrbuch, &c. Cunningham's tranel, sections 150 and 151, vol. iii. p. 355, &c. with which this account by Mosheim ought to be compared.—R.

⁵ Of the character and merits of Valla as a biblical expositor, see Davidson's Sacred Hermeneutics, p. 179.—R.

the faults of the prevalent mode of teaching, and who pronounced it destructive to religion and piety. Hence various plans were formed by different persons for either abolishing or reforming it; and the scholastics had no small number of enemies. The mystics, of whom we are presently to speak, were of opinion that all this kind of wisdom ought to be banished from the Christian church. Others who were more moderate thought that it ought not to be wholly suppressed, but that vain and idle questions should be excluded, the delirious rage for wrangling and disputation be restrained, and the scholastic subtlety be seasoned and tempered with the mystic simplicity. This was the opinion of the great John Gerson, who is known to have been assiduous in correcting the faults of the scholastic tribe.¹ Of the same opinion was Nicholas Cusanus, whose tract on learned ignorance is still extant; and likewise Peter de Alliaco, Savonarola, and others.

10. The restorers of the belles lettres and elegant composition were no less hostile to the wrangling tribe.² Yet they did not all entertain the same views. For some of them treated the discipline of the schools with ridicule and contempt, and thought it deserved to be banished altogether, as being nugatory and pernicious to the culture of the mind. But others thought it might indeed be suffered to exist, but that it ought to be exhibited with the charms of eloquence and a purer diction. Of this class was Paul Cortesius, who composed a splendid work on the Sentences, in which as he says he united eloquence with theology, and explained the principal subtleties of the scholastics in a polished style of composition.³ But the designs of all these persons were resisted by the very powerful influence of the Dominicans and Franciscans, who excelled in this species of learning, and who would not suffer the glory they had acquired by wrangling and disputation to become tarnished.

11. While the scholastics were thus sinking in the estimation of men of genius, the mystics were gaining strength and obtaining many friends and supporters. And there were among them several excellent men, who can be taxed with but few of the faults of that mystic theology which they followed; such as Thomas à Kempis, author of the Theologia Germanica, which was commended by Luther himself, Laurence Justinian, Jerome Savonarola, and others. Yet there were other mystics, as Vincent Ferrerius, Henry Harphius, and Bernardino of Sienna, in whom we must carefully separate from the precepts of divine wisdom those things which they derived from an over-excited imagination, or from that Dionysius whom all the mystics held in reverence. The mystics were aided against the attacks of the dialecticians partly by the Platonists who were now in high credit in several places, and partly by certain wise and religious men who were themselves ornaments to the schools. For the former extolled Dionysius as being of their way of thinking; and some even commented upon him, as Marsilius Ficinus, that high ornament of the Platonic school. The latter advised and in fact attempted a conjunction of the two kinds of theology, as John Gerson, Nicholas Cusanus, Dionysius the Carthusian, and others.

12. Men of talents now laboured much more than before to confirm and establish the truth and divinity of the Christian religion in general, against all the assaults of its adversaries. This is evinced by the works produced; such as the treatise On the Truth of the Christian Religion by Marsilius Ficinus, the Triumph of the Cross by Jerome Savonarola, the Natural Theology of Raymund de Sabunde, and other tracts of similar character. Against both the Jews and the Saracens, Alphonso de Spina contended in his Fortalium Fidei; against the former only, James Perezius and Jerome de St. Foi, and against the latter only, John de Turrecremata. And that these labours were needed, will not be questioned by one who is aware that the Aristotelians in Italy had not a little unsettled the foundations of all religion in their schools, that the senseless jangling of the scholastics had produced in the minds of the more crafty a contempt for all religion, and that the Jews and Saracens lived intermingled in one place and another with the Christians.

13. Of the vain and fruitless endeavours of the Greeks and Latins to terminate their disagreements we have already spoken. After the council of Florence and the violation of the agreement by the Greeks, Nicolaus V. again exhorted them to a union; but they turned a deaf ear, and three years after this last letter, Constantinople was taken by the Turks. And the pontiffs in all their consultations on the subject of a union since the overthrow of the Greek empire, have ever found the Greek bishops more obdurate and untractable than they were before. For there had grown up in the minds of the Greeks a hatred of the Latins, and especially of the pontiffs; because they believed that the evils they experienced from their Turkish tyrants might have been repelled, if the Latin pontiffs and kings had not refused to send them assistance against the Turks. As often therefore as they deplore their misfortunes, so often also they throw blame on the Latins for their insensibility and their fatal tardiness to afford them succour in distress.

¹ Simon's Lettres Choisies, tome ii. p. 269, and Crit. de la Biblioth. Eccles. par M. Du Pin, tome i. p. 491; Thomastus, Origines Histor. Philos. p. 86, and especially Gerson's Methodus Theologiam studendi, in Launo's Hist. Gymnasii Navarren. in his Opp. tom. iv. par. i. p. 830, &c.

² It was printed, Rome, 1512, and Basil, 1513, fol. [He was of Dalmatia, protosynarchus apostolicus under Alexander VI. and Pius III. and bishop of Urbino, and died in 1510. Besides his commentary on the Sentences of Lombard, he wrote a Dialogue concerning learned men, which was first printed at Florence, 1734.

—Schl.

14. Among the Latins, not to mention several minor contests, there sprang up again the celebrated controversy respecting the blood of Christ and the worship of it, which had been agitated between the Dominicans and the Franciscans in the preceding century, A.D. 1351, at Barcelona, and which had not been decided by Clement VI.¹ James of Marchia, a celebrated Franciscan A.D. 1462, taught publicly at Brixen in a sermon to the people that the blood shed by Christ was distinct from his divine nature; and of course that it ought not to receive divine honours or the worship called latria. The contrary opinion was espoused by the Dominicans. Hence James of Brixen, the inquisitor, arraigned that Franciscan upon a charge of heresy. The pontiff Pius II. attempted in vain to suppress this controversy at the outset, and therefore he ordered it to be investigated by some select theologians. But there were many obstacles, especially the power and influence of the two orders who made this a party question between them, which prevented any final decision. Therefore after many altercations and disputes, Pius II. in the year 1464 imposed silence on the two contending parties, declaring that both opinions might be tolerated until the vicar of Christ should have leisure and opportunity for examining the subject, and determining which was the most correct opinion. Such an opportunity the pontiffs have not yet found.²

CHAPTER IV.

HISTORY OF RITES AND CEREMONIES.

1. With what rites the Greeks thought God should be worshipped, may be learned from the treatise of Simeon of Thessalonica

*On Heresies and Rites.*³ From this book it is evident that true religion being lost, a sort of splendid shadow was substituted in its place; and that every part of worship was calculated for show or to gratify the eyes and the senses of the people. They indeed offered reasons for all the ceremonies and regulations which were called sacred. But in all these expositions of the reason of the ceremonies, though there is something of ingenuity and acuteness, yet there is little or nothing of truth and good sense. The origin of the numerous rites by which the native beauty of religion was obscured rather than adorned, is doubtful and not very creditable; and those who attempted to add splendour to them by taxing their own ingenuity, were commonly forsaken by their wits at the time of the attempt.

2. Among the Latins, though all good men wished for a diminution of the multitude of ceremonies, feast-days, sacred places, and other minutiae, yet the pontiffs considered it their duty to enact new laws and regulations respecting them. In the year 1456, Calixtus III. in perpetual remembrance of the raising of the siege of Belgrade by the Turkish emperor Mahomet II. ordered the festival of Christ's transfiguration which had previously been celebrated in some provinces by private authority, to be religiously observed over the whole Latin world.⁴ In the year 1476, Sixtus IV. by a special edict promised remission of sins to those who should religiously keep from year to year the memorial of the immaculate conception of the blessed Virgin. No preceding pontiff had thought proper to ordain anything on the subject.⁵ The other additions which were made to the worship of the holy Virgin,⁶ to the public and private

³ The contents of it are stated by Fabricius, Biblioth. Græca, vol. xiv. p. 54.

⁴ This festival had been observed as early as the seventh century by the Greeks. The day for it was the sixth of August; and because on that day the Turks raised the siege of Belgrade, therefore this festival must be everywhere celebrated through all future time.—Mur.

⁵ The doctrine of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary, that is, of her being herself born free from original sin, was first advanced in the twelfth century by Peter Lombard. Thomas Aquinas disputed the doctrine, but Scotus maintained it and gave it general currency. The festival of her birth commenced as early as the eleventh century, and was then observed by certain bishops, as by Anselm of Canterbury. By other bishops of that age it was opposed.—Mur.

⁶ It was in this century that, among many other impious impostures connected with the worship of the Virgin Mary, the well-known legend of the transportation of her house by angels from Nazareth to Loreto took its rise, which Moore, in his View of Society and Manners in Italy, Lond. 1781, vol. i. p. 334, has so happily ridiculed. The original authorities for this silly story, which was first circulated between 1450 and 1490, may be seen in Gieseler's Lehrbuch, &c. Cunningham's transl. vol. iii. p. 314.—R.

¹ Wadding's Annales Minor. tom. xiii. p. 68, &c.; Echard's Scriptores Prædicat. tom. i. p. 660, &c.

² Wadding's Annales Minorum, tom. xiii. p. 206, &c.; Natalis Alexander, Hist. Eccles. sæc. xv. p. 17.

prayers, to the sale of indulgences, &c.¹ are better omitted than enumerated particularly. For there is no need of proof that in this century religion was made to consist chiefly in mimic shows and trifling.²

CHAPTER V.

HISTORY OF HERESIES.

1. NEITHER the edicts of the pontiffs and emperors nor the vigilance and cruelty of the Inquisitors, could prevent the ancient sects from still lurking in many places, or even new sects from starting up. We have already seen the Franciscans waging war against the Romish church. In Bosnia and the neighbouring countries the Manichæans or Paulicians, the same as those called Cathari in Italy, organised their societies without molestation. Stephen Thomasius indeed, the king of Bosnia, abjured the heresy of the Manichæans, received baptism from John Carvaialus a Romish cardinal, and then expelled the Manichæans from his kingdom.³ But he soon after changed his mind; and it is certain that this sect continued to inhabit Bosnia, Servia, and the adjacent provinces, till the end of the century. The Waldenses collected friends and adherents in various countries of Europe, in lower Germany, and particularly in the territories of Brandenburg, Pomerania, Meeklenburg, and Thuringia. Yet it appears from unpublished documents that very many of them were seized by the Inquisitors, and delivered over to the secular authorities to be burned.⁴

2. The Brethren and Sisters of the Free Spirit, or the Beghards and Schwestrones, as they were called in Germany, or Turlupins as in France, that is, persons whose mystical views had thrown them into a species of frenzy, did not cease from wandering in disguise over certain parts of France, Germany, and the Netherlands, and especially of Swabia and Switzerland, beguiling the minds of the people. Yet few of their teachers escaped the eyes and the hands of the Inquisitors.⁵ Upon the

¹ The popes now caused indulgences to be preached in all the provinces. The ordinary price was five ducats. They promised to apply the money to a Turkish war; but they often expended it in wars against their Christian enemies, in enriching their family connexions, and supporting their voluptuous extravagance. Neither intelligent princes nor the clergy looked upon this sale of indulgences with approbation. They accordingly made ordinances of various kinds against it. For instance, the council of Solissons in the year 1456 say: "Prohibemus quibuscunque questionibus ne in hac provincia, prætextu indulgentiarum, prædicant verbum Dei—aut nihil in suo sermone questionum exponant." In the council of Constance A.D. 1476, the clergy complained of the sale of indulgences as a grievance, and said of it: "Absurda et plarum aurium offensiva in cancellis, verbum Dei evangelisando committunt." And they enacted, "ut delinceps questores ad ambores ecclesiarum non admittantur—et omnes debent quartam partem rectoribus et plebanis solvere." And in Harzheim's Concilia, tom. v. Suppl. p. 945, it is said of these vendors of indulgences: "Tales collectores emunt et mercatorum collecturas ab ecclesiis, x. xlii. libris denariorum, et per annum xl. l. accumulantes—multo ampliores pecunias colligunt; facinora et scandala committunt, bibunt, noctu ludunt, blasphemant, in tabernis per noctes integras turpiter consumentes, quod ad Dei honorem fideles porrexerunt."—Schl.

² To elucidate this by a single example, I adduce the following from the Anecdotes Ecclesiastiques, Amsterd. 1771, 8vo, ad ann. 1499. Among the statutes of the cathedral church of Toul, there is an article with the title Septuaginta Halleluia. It is well known that during the seasons of fasting, Halleluia, as being an expression of joy, was not sung in the ancient church. Hence to honour this Halleluia, which in time of the fasts was in their dead, a solemn funeral was instituted. On the Saturday night before Septuagesima Sunday, children carried through the chancel a kind of coffin to represent the dead Halleluia. The coffin was attended by the cross, incense, and holy water. The children wept and howled all the way to the cloister, where the grave was prepared. A custom equally ridiculous was introduced into a cathedral church near Paris. On the same day a boy of the choir brought into the church a top (toupie) around which was written Halleluia in golden letters. And when the hour arrived that Halleluia was sung for the last time, the boy took a whip in his hand and whipped the top along the floor of the church quite out of the house. And this was called the Halleluia whip, fouetter l'Halleluia. So trifling was the character of the church ceremonies of that age, that they could even profane the churches by the plays of children.—Schl.

³ See Raph. Volaterranus, Comment. Urbanus, lib. viii. fol. 289, &c.; Aneas Sylvius, De Statu Europæ sub Frederico III. cap. x. in Frcher's Scriptores Rer. German. tom. ii. p. 104, &c.

⁴ The proffer of indulgences to those who hunted down heretics contributed much to this. Boniface VIII. had already promised an indulgence to every one who should deliver over a heretic to the Inquisition; and he ordained that this should be considered as equally meritorious with a crusade to the Holy Land. This ordinance was renewed by the council of Pavia. See Harduin, Concilia, tom. viii. p. 1013, &c. So the provincial council of Constance A.D. 1483, promised indulgences to all those who should lend their personal aid against the heresies of Wickliffe and Huss. See Harzheim's Concilia German. tom. v. p. 546.—Schl.

⁵ Felix Malleolus or Hämmerlein in his Descriptio Lollhardorum, which is subjoined to his book Contra Validos Mendicantes, Opp. signat. c. li. a. has drawn up a catalogue, though an imperfect one, of the Beghards burned in Switzerland and the adjacent countries during this century. This Felix in his books against the Beghards and Lollhards (either intentionally or being deceived by the ambiguity of the terms), has confounded the three classes of persons on whom the appellation of Beghards or Lollhards was usually bestowed—namely (1) the Tertiaries of the more rigid Franciscans, (2) the Brethren of the Free Spirit, and (3) the Cellite Brethren or Alexians. The same error occurs in countless other writers. [See also Harzheim's Concil. German. tom. v. p. 464, where there is an ordinance of the provincial council of Constance, A.D. 1463, and another A.D. 1476, against the Lullhards and Beguttas and especially the Tertiarii. Here doubtless belongs what John Nieder states in his Formicarium, lib. iii.:—"Fuit Fratricellus seu Beghardus secularis, qui in eremo austera vitam vixit, et durissimam regulam tenuit.—a Constantino episcopo capta per inquisitorem judicio seculari traditus et incineratus fuit. Alius fuit, qui velut Beghardus infra Rhenum—tandem Viennæ in Pictaviensi diocesi incineratus est. Dicebat, 'Christum in se, et se in Christo esse.' Currit in partibus Sueviæ, inter personas utriusque sexus, seculares et ecclesiasticas, hæresis et hypocrisis tam enormis, ut eam ad plenum exprimere non audeam. Omnia licere; non jejunant, occulte laborant in festis ecclesiæ; ceremonias omnes, tanquam animalium hominum, spernunt; virginitatem—superstitiones esse; pro minimo ducunt, non obediæ papæ aut pastoribus aliis. Sacerdos quidam feminis persuasit, verecundiam breaking out of the religious war in Bohemia between the Hussites and the adherents of the pontiffs in the year 1418, a company of these piously-infatuated people, of whom one John was the leader, went into Bohemia; and they held their secret meetings first at Prague, afterwards in other places, and lastly in a certain island. It was one of the tenets of this sect, as has been already stated, that those instincts of nature, bashfulness and modesty, indicate a mind not duly purified and not yet brought back to the divine nature whence it originated; and that those only are perfect and in close union with God who are unmoved by the sight of naked bodies, and who can associate with persons of a different sex in a state of nudity or with no clothing, after the manner of our first parents before their apostasy. Hence these Beghards who, by a slight change in the pronunciation of the name conformably to the harder utterance of the Bohemians, were called Picards, ordinarily went to their prayers and their religious worship without clothing. For this precept, so entirely accordant with their religion, was frequently upon their lips: They are not free (that is, not duly rescued from the bonds of the body and converted to God) who wear clothing, and especially breeches. Although these people in their assemblies committed no offence against chastity, yet as might be expected they fell under the greatest suspicion of extreme turpitude and unchastity. And John Ziska, the fierce general of the Hussites, giving credit to these suspicions, attacked the unhappy company of these absurdly religious and delirious people, in the year 1421, slew some of them and wished to commit the rest to the flames. The unhappy men submitted to execution cheerfully in the manner of their intrepid sect, which looked upon death with astonishing indifference.¹ These people were also called Adamites, because they wished to follow the example of Adam in his state of innocence. The ignominious name of Beghards, or as the Bohemians pronounced it Picards,² which was the appropriate designation of this little company, was afterwards transferred by their enemies to all those Hussites and Bohemians who contended with the Romish church; for these as is well known were called by the common people the Picard Brethren.

3. In Italy, the new sect of the White Brethren or the Brethren in White (Fratres Albati seu Candidi) produced no little excitement among the people. Near the beginning of the century a certain unknown priest descended from the Alps, clad in a white garment, with an immense number of people of both sexes in his train, all clothed like their leader in white linen; whence their name of the White Brethren.³ This multitude marched through various provinces, following a cross borne by the leader of the sect; and he by a great show of piety so captivated the people, that numberless persons of every rank flocked around him. He exhorted them to appease the wrath of God, inflicted on himself voluntary punishments, recommended a war against the Turks who were in possession of Palestine, and pretended to have divine visions. Boniface IX. fearing some plot, ordered the leader of this body to be apprehended and committed to the flames.⁴ After his death the multitude gradually dispersed. Whether the man died in innocence or in guilt is not ascertained. For some writers of the greatest fidelity assert that he was by

[See especially Æneas Sylvius, Historia Bohemica, cap. xli.—Schl.

² The Germans also frequently pronounced the word Beghard, Pyckard. See Menkenius, Scriptores Germani, tom. ii. p. 1521.

³ Theodorico de Niem tells us that it was from Scotland that this sect came, and that their leader gave himself out for the prophet Elias. Sigonius and Platina inform us that this enthusiast came from France; and that he was clothed in white, carried in his aspect the greatest modesty, and seduced prodigious numbers of people of both sexes and of all ages; that his followers (called penitents), among whom were several cardinals and priests, were clothed in white linen down to their heels, with caps that covered their whole faces except their eyes; that they went in great troops of ten, twenty, and forty thousand persons from one city to another, calling out for mercy and singing hymns; that wherever they came they were received with great hospitality and made innumerable proselytes; that they fasted or lived upon bread and water during the time of their pilgrimage, which continued generally nine or ten days. See Annal. Mediol. ap. Muratori.—Niem, lib. ii. cap. xvi.—Macl.

⁴ What Mosheim hints but obscurely here is further explained by Sigonius and Platina, who tell us that the pilgrims mentioned in the preceding note stopped at Viterbo, and that Boniface, fearing lest the priest who headed them designed by their assistance to seize upon the pontificate, sent a body of troops thither who apprehended the false prophet, and carried him to Rome where he was burned.—Macl.

abnegandam; coram clericis talibus se denudarunt, sed sine cultu—conjabant clericis uno lecto, nec ad lapsum carnis procedebant. De alta perfectione loquuntur—stiliu librorum subtilissimorum in nostro vulgari periculose, ut verore, scriptorum didicerunt—ceremonias, festivitates, missas, contemnunt." &c.—Schl.

¹ See Lasitius, Hist. Fratrum Bohemorum Manuscripta, lib. ii. sec. lxxvi. &c. who shows fully that the Hussites and the Bohemian brethren had no connexion with these Picards. The other writers on the subject are mentioned by Beausobre, Dissert. sur les Adamites de Bohême, annexed to Lefant's Hist. de la Guerre des Huss. This very learned author takes the utmost pains to vindicate the character of the Bohemian Picards or Adamites, who he supposes were Waldenses, and holy and excellent men falsely aspersed by their enemies. But all his efforts are vain. For it can be demonstrated from the most unexceptionable documents that the fact was as stated in the text; and any one will readily think so who has a fuller knowledge of the history and the sects of those times than this industrious man possessed, who was not well versed in the history of the middle ages, nor altogether free from prepossessions.—

no means a bad man, and that he was put to death from envy; but others say he was convicted of the most atrocious crimes.¹

4. In the year 1411 there was discovered in the Netherlands, and especially at Brussels, a sect which was projected and propagated by Ægidius Cantor, an illiterate man, and William of Hildenissen, a Carmelite, and which was called that of the Men of Understanding. In this sect there were not a few things deservedly reprehensible, which were derived perhaps in great measure from the mystic system. For these men professed to have divine visions, denied that any one can correctly understand the holy Scriptures unless he is divinely illuminated, promised a new divine revelation better and more perfect than the Christian, taught that the resurrection had taken place already in the person of Christ, and that another of the bodies of the dead was not to be expected, maintained that the internal man is not defiled by the deeds of the external, and inculcated that hell itself will have an end, and that all, both men and devils, will return to God and attain to eternal felicity. This sect appears to have been a branch of the Brethren and Sisters of the Free Spirit; for they asserted that a new law of the Holy Spirit and of spiritual liberty was about to be promulgated. Yet there were opinions held by its members which show that they were not entirely void of understanding. They inculcated for example—I. that Jesus Christ alone had merited eternal life for the human race, neither could men acquire for themselves future bliss by their own deeds; II. that presbyters to whom people confess their iniquities cannot pardon sins, but that only Jesus Christ forgives men their sins; III. that voluntary penances are not necessary to salvation. Yet these and some other tenets, Peter de Alliaco, the bishop of Cambridge who broke up this sect, pronounced to be heretical, and commanded William of Hildenissen to abjure.²

¹ See Lenfant's Hist. du Concile de Pise, tome i. p. 109; Foggius, Hist. Florentina, lib. iii. p. 122; Sabellicus, Enneades Rhapsodie Historice, Enneas IX, lib. ix. Opp. tom. ii. p. 839, Basil, 1560, fol.

² See the records in Baluze's Miscellanea, tom. ii. p. 277, &c. [The mystical principles of these people are evinced by a passage of these records, in which Ægidius is said to have taught: "Ego sum salvator hominum; per me videbitur Christum, sicut per Christum Patrem," and also by their coincidence with the Brethren of the Free Spirit, as teaching that the period of the old law was the time of the Father, the period of the new law the time of the Son, and the remaining period that of

5. In Germany, and particularly in Thuringia and Lower Saxony, the Flagellants were still troublesome; but they were very different from those earlier Flagellants who travelled in regular bands from province to province. These new Flagellants rejected almost all [practical] religion and the external worship of God, together with the sacraments, and founded all their hopes of salvation on faith and flagellation; to which perhaps they might add some strange notions respecting an evil spirit, and some other things which are but obscurely stated by the ancient writers. The leader of the sect in Thuringia and particularly at Sangerhausen was one Conrad Schmidt, who was burned in the year 1414 with many others, by the zeal and industry of Henry Schönefeld, a famous Inquisitor at that time in Germany.³ At Quedlinburg, one Nicholas Schaden was committed to the flames. At Halberstadt A.D. 1481, Berthold Schade was seized, but escaped death it appears by retracting.⁴ And from the records of those times a long list might be made out of Flagellants who were committed to the flames in Germany by the Inquisitors.

the Holy Ghost or Elias. Yet it is manifest from these records that William of Hildesheim or Hildenissen, being a man of learning, would have been able to state his tenets more clearly and distinctly.—Schl.

³ Excerpta Monachi Pinenis, in Menkenius, Scriptores Rer. German. tom. ii. p. 1521; Chronicon Monasterii in Matthæus, Analecta Veter. Ævi, tom. v. p. 71; Chronicon Magdeb. in Melbomius, Scriptores Rer. German. tom. ii. p. 362, &c. I have before me sixteen Articles of the Flagellants, which Conrad Schmidt is said to have copied from the manuscript at Walkenried, and which were committed to writing by an Inquisitor of Bradenborch, A.D. 1411. The following is a concise summary of these articles. All that the Romish church teaches respecting the efficacy of the sacraments, purgatory, prayers for the dead, and the like, are false and vain. On the contrary, whoever believes simply what is contained in the Apostles' Creed, frequently repeats the Lord's prayer and the Ave Maria, and at certain periods lacerates his body with scourging, and thus punishes himself for the sins he commits, will attain eternal salvation. [The same thing appears also from the fifty Articles of this Flagellant, which were condemned in the council of Constance, and may be seen in Von der Hardt's Acta Concilii Constant. tom. i. par. i. p. 127. In the same Acta (tom. iii. p. 92, &c.) we find a letter of John Gerson addressed to Vincent Ferrerius, who was much inclined towards the sect of the Flagellants, dated July 9th, 1417. This letter is also in the works of Gerson published by Du Pin, tom. ii. par. iv. together with his tract, Contra Sectam Flagellantium.—Schl. [See several of the doctrines of the Flagellants in Gieseler's Lehrbuch, &c. Cunningham's transl. vol. iii. p. 133, &c. He refers to a work by Förstemann, entitled Die Christ. Geistesgesellschaften, Halle, 1828, royal 8vo, as the most recent on this fanatical sect.—R.

⁴ The records of this transaction were published by Kappius, in his Relatio de Rebus Theologicis Antiquis et Novis, A.D. 1747, p. 475, &c.

BOOK IV.

FROM THE REFORMATION BY LUTHER

TO

THE YEAR A.D. 1700.

CENTURY SIXTEENTH.

INTRODUCTION.

1. IN narrating the ecclesiastical affairs of modern times, the same order cannot be followed which was pursued in the preceding periods. For the state of the Christian world having undergone a great change in the sixteenth century, and a much greater number of associations than formerly being found among the followers of Christ, differing widely in doctrines and institutions and regulating their conduct by different principles, all the various transactions among professed Christians can by no means be exhibited in one continued series, or so as to form one well-arranged picture. On the contrary, as the bond of union among Christians was severed, their history must be distributed into compartments corresponding with the division of the Christian world into its principal sects.

2. Yet many events occurred which affected the whole Christian world and the state of religion generally, or were not confined to any particular community. And as the knowledge of these general facts throws much light on the history of the particular communities, as well as on the general state of the Christian world, they ought to be stated separately and by themselves. Hence the work before us will be divided into two principal parts; the one, the general history of the Christian church, and the other, the particular.

3. The general history will embrace all those facts and occurrences which may be predicated of the Christian religion as such, or absolutely considered, and which in some sense affected the whole Christian world, rent unhappily as it was by divisions. Of course, we shall here describe the enlargement of the boundaries of Christendom or their contraction, without regard to the particular sects which were instrumental in these changes. Nor shall we omit those institutions and doctrines which were received by all the Christian communities, or by the principal part of them, and which thus produced changes very extensive and general.

4. In the particular history, we shall take a survey of the several communities into which Christians were distributed. And here we may properly make two classes of sects. First, we may consider, what occurred in the more ancient communities of Christians, whether in the East or in the West. Secondly, what occurred in the more recent communities, that is, those which arose after the reformation of both doctrine and discipline in Germany. In describing the condition and character of each particular sect, we shall pursue as far as practicable the method pointed out in the general Introduction to these Institutes. For according to our conceptions, the less a person recedes from this method, the less will he probably omit of what is necessary to a full knowledge of the history of each individual community.

5. The most important of all the events which occurred among Christians after the fifteenth century—nay, the greatest of all events affecting the Christian world since the birth of the Saviour—was that celebrated religious and ecclesiastical revolution called the Reformation. Commencing from small beginnings in Saxony, it not only spread in a short space of time over all Europe, but also affected in no slight degree the other quarters of the globe; and it may be justly regarded as the first and principal cause of all those great ecclesiastical and even those civil revolutions and changes, which have rendered the history of the subsequent times to the present day so interesting and important. The face of all Europe was changed after that event; and our own times are experiencing, and future times will experience both the inestimable advantages which arose from it, and the serious evils to which it gave occasion.¹ The history of such an event, therefore—an event from which all others in a measure took their rise—demands a distinct and a prominent place. We now proceed to give a compendious view of the modern history of the Christian church, according to the method here proposed.²

¹ See Villiers, Essai sur l'esprit et l'influence de la Réformation de Luther, Paris, 1804, 8vo, of which there are two translations into English, one by James Mill, Esq. with copious notes, Lond. 1805, 8vo, and the other by Lambert, Lond. 1807, 8vo. — R.

² Mosheim still proceeds by centuries. On the sixteenth century, he divides his history into three Sections. I. The history of the Reformation, in four chapters. II. The general history of the church, in a single chapter. III. The particular history of the several sects or communities, in two parts. Part first embraces the ancient communities, viz. the Latin and the Greek or Oriental churches, in distinct chapters. Part second includes, in separate chapters, the history of the Lutheran, the Reformed, the Anabaptist or Mennonite, and the Socinian churches. On the seventeenth century, he makes but two sections. I. The general history, in a single chapter. II. The particular history, divided into Parts and Chapters, as in the preceding century; except that among the modern sects, he assigns distinct chapters to the Arminians, the Quakers, and an additional chapter to several minor sects. — Mus.

SECTION I.

HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION.

ARRANGEMENT OF THIS SECTION.

THE history of the Reformation, as it is called, is too extensive to be comprehended in one unbroken narrative without wearying the student. For the convenience, therefore, of those who are just entering on the study of church history, and to aid their memories, we shall divide this section into four chapters.

THE FIRST CHAPTER will describe the state of the Christian church at the commencement of the Reformation.

THE SECOND will detail the history of the Reformation to the presentation of the Augsburg Confession to the emperor.

THE THIRD will continue the history from that period to the commencement of the war of Smalcald.

THE FOURTH will carry it down to the peace granted to the friends of the Reformation A.D. 1555.—This distribution arises naturally from the history itself.¹

¹ The historians of the Reformation, as well the primary as the secondary, and both the general and the particular, are enumerated by Hane, (who is himself to be ranked among the better writers on this subject), in his Historia Sacrorum a B. Luthero emendatarum, par. i. cap. i. p. 1, &c. and by Fabricius, in his Catibolium Lutherianum, par. ii. cap. 187, p. 863, [also by Walch, Biblioth. Theol. tom. iii. p. 618]. The principal of these historians must be consulted by those who desire proof of what we shall briefly relate in this section. For it would be needless to be repeating every moment the names of Sleidan, Seckendorf, and the others, who stand pre-eminent in this branch of history. [The following works on the general history of the German Reformation have appeared since Hane, Fabricius, and Walch compiled their catalogues of similar works: Planck, Geschichte der Entstehung, der Veränderungen, u. der Bildung unseres Protest. Lehrbegriffs, Leip. 1781—1800, six vols. It brings the history down to the year 1555, and though rationalistic in its tendency, is a valuable work. Marheineke, Gesch. d. teutschen Reformation, Berl. 1816—34, 4 vols. It closes at the year 1552, is full of extracts from the original sources, and though the author is an Hegelian in philosophy, he professes to be evangelical, and this work is the best we have by a German divine. Menzel, Neuere Gesch. d. Deutschen von der Reformation bis zur Bundesacte, Bresl. 1826—39, 8 vols. Hagenbach, Vorlesungen über Wesen u. Gesch. der Reformation, Leipz. 1834—42, 5 vols. The author is an esteemed evangelical professor in Basil, and his views are orthodox. Ranke, Deutsche Geschichte im Zeitalter der Reformation, Berl. 1839—43, 5 vols. This is by far the most valuable work we possess on the German Reformation, whether viewed politically or religiously. Archdeacon Hare has truly described it as "written with a thorough knowledge of the facts, a clear insight into the principles and characters which shaped and controlled the events, and with a German love of truth." Mission of the Comforter, Notes, p. 668. It is in course of being translated into English by Mrs. Austin, Lond. 1845—47, 3 vols.; 2 remaining volumes have yet to appear. To this admirable work should be added another equally valuable, and perhaps containing more original matter, by the same eminent

CHAPTER I.

STATE OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH WHEN THE REFORMATION COMMENCED.

1. WHEN the century began, no danger seemed to threaten the pontiffs. For those grievous commotions which had been raised in the preceding centuries by the Waldenses, the Albigenses, the Beghards, and others, and afterwards by the Bohemians, had been suppressed and extinguished by the sword and by crafty management. The Waldenses who survived in the valleys of Piedmont fared hard, and had few resources; and their utmost wish was, that they might transmit as an inheritance to their posterity that obscure corner of Europe which lies between the Alps and the Pyrenees. Those Bohemians who were displeased with the Romish doctrines, from their want of power and their ignorance, could attempt nothing; and therefore were rather despised than feared.

2. Complaints indeed were uttered, not only by private persons but by the most powerful sovereigns and by whole nations, against the haughty domination of the Roman pontiffs, the frauds, violence, avarice, historian, entitled, Die römischen Päpste, ihre Kirche u. ihr Staat im 16 u. 17 Jahrhundert, Ebd. 1834—36, which has been also translated by Mrs. Austin, Lond. 1840, 3 vols. Fürstmann, Neues Urkundenbuch zur Geschichte Evangel. Kirchen Reformation, Hamb. 1842, 4to, not yet completed. Neudecker, Gesch. d. deutschen Reformation von 1517—1532, nach d. älteren u. neuesten Quellen, Leipz. 1843. Merle D'Aubigné, Histoire de la Réformation du seizième Siècle, Paris, 1838—47, 4 vols. not yet completed; and embracing not only the German, but the Swiss and French reformations, and expected to include the English and Scottish. There are several translations of this popular work into English, but the preferable one is that published with the sanction of the author by Oliver and Boyd, Edin. 1846, 4 vols. We have but few British works of authority on the continental reformation. I need only specify the following, which include both the German and the French Reformations: Milner's account in the concluding volumes of his History of the Church; Scott's Continuation of Milner to the death of Calvin, Lond. 1826—31, 3 vols. The Rev. George Stebbing has also compiled another continuation of Milner, Lond. 1839—42, 3 vols. but of no great merit; and he is the author of a History of the Reformation, Lond. 1836, 2 vols. forming part of Lardner's Cyclopaedia; Waddington's History of the Reformation on the Continent, Lond. 1841, 3 vols. carefully compiled to the death of Luther, from the original sources. Works on the Reformation in the other countries of Europe, and the principal biographies of the leading reformers, will be carefully specified in subsequent notes.—R.

and injustice of the court of Rome, the insolence, tyranny, and extortion of the papal legates, the crimes, ignorance, and extreme profligacy of the priests of all orders and of the monks, and finally of the unrighteous severity and partiality of the Romish laws; and desires were now publicly expressed, as had been the case in generations long gone by, that there might be a reformation of the church in its head and in its members, and that the subject might be taken up in some general council.¹ But these complaints the pontiffs could safely set at defiance. For the authors of them entertained no doubts of the supreme power of the sovereign pontiffs in matters of religion; nor did they themselves attempt the work they so much desired, but concluded to wait for relief either from Rome itself or from a council. Yet it was manifest that so long as the power of the pontiffs remained inviolate, the opulence and corruptions of the church and clergy could not be diminished in any considerable degree.

3. Nor were the pontiffs any more alarmed by the happy revival of learning in many countries of Europe, and the consequently vast increase of well-informed men. The revival of learning by dissipating the clouds of ignorance, awakened in many minds the love of truth and of liberty; and among the learned were many who, as appears from the example of Erasmus and others, facetiously ridiculed and satirized the perverse conduct of the priests, the superstitions of the times, the corruptions of the court of Rome, and the rustic manners and barbarism of the monks. But the root of all the evil and of the public calamity, namely, the jurisdiction of the pontiffs which was falsely called canonical, and the inveterate prejudice respecting a vicegerent of Christ located at Rome, no one dared resolutely attack. And the pontiffs very justly concluded that so long as these ramparts remained entire, their sovereignty and the tranquillity of the church would be secure, whatever menaces and assaults some persons might offer. Besides, they had at their disposal both punishments with which to coerce the refractory, and honours and emoluments with which to conciliate the more daring and contentious.

4. Hence the bishops of Rome reigned securely and free from all fear; and they indulged their lusts and all their vicious propensities, as freely as their innate depravity demanded. Alexander VI. a monster of a man and inferior to no one of the most abandoned tyrants of antiquity, marked the commencement of the century with his horrid crimes and villanies. He died suddenly, A.D. 1503, from poison which he had prepared for others, if the common report is true; or from old age and sickness, if others are to be believed.² His successor, Pius III. died at the end of twenty-six days, and was followed by Julian de Roveria, under the name of Julius II. who obtained the pontificate by fraud and bribery.

5. That this Julius II. possessed, besides other vices, very great ferocity, arrogance, vanity, and a mad passion for war, is proved by abundant testimony. In the first place, forming an alliance with the emperor and the king of France, he made war upon the Venetians.³ He next laid siege to Ferrara. And at last, drawing the Venetians, the Swiss, and the Spaniards to engage in the war with him, he made an attack upon Lewis XII. the king of France. Nor, so long as he lived, did he cease from embroiling all Europe. Who can doubt that under a vicar of Jesus Christ frequenting camps and ambitious of the fame of a great warrior, everything both in church and state must have gone to ruin, and both the discipline of the church and the very spirit of religion have become prostrate?

6. Yet amid these evils, there appeared some prospect of the ardently and long-wished-for reform. For Lewis XII. king of France, published a threat stamped upon the coins he issued, that he would completely overthrow the Romish power, which he designated by the name of Babylon.⁴ Moreover some cardinals of

¹ See Gordon's Life of Alexander VI. Lond. 1729, fol.; also another life of him by a very learned and ingenious man, written with more candour and moderation, and together with a Life of Leo X. subjoined to the first volume of the Histoire du Droit Public Ecclesiastique Français, par Mr. D. B. Lond. 1752, 4to.

² See Du Bos, Hist. de la Ligue du Cambray, Hague, 1710, 2 vols. 8vo.

³ See Liebe's Commentatio de numis Ludovici XII. epigrapho, "Feridam Babylonis Numm." in insignibus, Lips. 1717, 8vo. Compare however the Theaurus Epistolicus Crozianus, tom. i. p. 238, 243; Colonia's Hist. Liter. de la Ville de Lyon, tome II. p. 443, &c. and others; for it is well known that there has been much dispute respecting these coins and the object of them. [Liebe has given engravings of these coins. On the one side was the king's likeness and his title, on the other side, the arms of France, surrounded with the inscription -

¹ These accusations have been collected in great abundance by the most learned writers. See, among many others, Löschner's Acta et Documenta Reformationis, tom. i. cap. v. &c. p. 105, &c. cap. ix. p. 181, &c. and Cyprian's Preface to Tenzel's Historia Reformat. Lips. 1717, 8vo. The complaints of the Germans in particular respecting the wrongs done by the pontiffs and the clergy, are exhibited by Georgius, in his Grammata Imperatoris et Nationis German. adversus sedem Roman. cap. vii. p. 251, &c. Nor do the more intelligent and candid among the adherents to the pontiffs at this day deny that the church, before Luther arose, was grossly corrupt.

the Romish court, relying on the authority of this king and of the emperor, summoned a council at Pisa in the year 1511, to curb the madness of the pontiff, and to deliberate on measures for a general reformation of the inveterate corruptions in religion. But Julius, relying on the power of his allies and on his own resources, laughed at this opposition. Yet not to neglect means for frustrating these designs, he called another council to meet in the Lateran palace, A.D. 1512.⁴ In this body

Perdam Babillonis (instead of Babylonis) Nomen, or also simply, Perdam Babillonem. Harduin understood Babylon here to denote the city of Cairo in Egypt; and he explained the coin of a military expedition which Lewis contemplated against the Turks. But Liebe has fully confuted this ingenious Jesuit, and has shown that Babylon means Rome together with the pope, and that the threatened vengeance was aimed by the king against the pontiff. And that the French church was not opposed to the designs of the king appears from the conclusions of the council of Tours mentioned in the following note. See Du Pin's Nouv. Biblioth. des Auteurs Ecclesiast. tome xlii. p. 13, 14, and Gerdes, Historia Reformationis, tom. iv. Append. No. 1.—Schl.

⁴ Harduin's Concilia, tom. ix. p. 1559, &c. [Lewis XII. was not an enemy to be despised. He made preparations for a war against the pope, which were certainly great and imposing. He assembled the clergy of France first at Orleans and then at Tours, (see Harduin, ubi supra, p. 1555), and proposed to them the following questions.—I. Is it lawful for the pope to make war upon temporal princes, whose territories do not belong to the church? No. II. May the prince in such a case lawfully oppose force to force, and fall upon the territories of the church, not to conquer and retain them but to disable the pope from carrying on the war? Yes. III. May a prince refuse obedience to a pope who is his enemy and who makes unjust war upon him? Yes: so far as is necessary for his own security and that of his people. IV. In that case, how are these affairs to be conducted which ordinarily are referred to the decision of the pontiff? Answer: in the manner proscribed by the Pragmatic Sanction. V. May a Christian prince defend with arms another prince who is under his protection, against the assaults of the pope? (This question referred to the duke of Ferrara who was involved in war with the pope.) Yes. VI. If the pope and prince disagree, whether a case between them belongs to the ecclesiastical or the civil jurisdiction, and the prince wishes to leave it to referees, and the pope will not consent but draws the sword, may the prince stand on the defensive and call on his allies to help him? Yes. VII. If a pope pronounces an unjust sentence against a prince, [with whom he is at variance, and who cannot safely appear at Rome to defend his cause], is that sentence binding? No. VIII. If the pope in such a case should lay the prince and his realm under an interdict, what is to be done? Answer: Such an interdict would be itself a nullity. [See the questions and answers at full length, in Gerdes Historia Reformationis, tom. iv. Append. No. 1.—Mur.] After these preparatory steps, Lewis went still farther, and purposed to have a general council called against the pope. The emperor Maximilian united in the measure, and three cardinals lent their aid to the business. The council was opened at Pisa, A.D. 1511, and after a few sessions removed to Milan. The pope was cited by the fathers to appear at Milan, and was afterwards suspended. But as the pope had now brought about a reconciliation with the emperor, and as nearly all the assembled prelates were from France, the decrees of this council were nowhere received except in France. The council assembled by the pope in the Lateran church at Rome, to oppose that of Pisa, was somewhat larger than the other, yet quite too small for a general council, and besides was composed almost exclusively of Italians. It may therefore be regarded rather as a provincial than as a general council. It held eleven sessions in all. In the first, it was determined to take up the subjects of the division the acts of the assembly at Pisa were indignantly condemned and annulled; and severe anathemas would undoubtedly have followed against Lewis and others, if death had not overtaken this most audacious pontiff in his preparatory steps, A.D. 1512.

7. His successor Leo X. of the family of Medici, who was elected in the year 1513, was of a milder disposition, but no better guardian of religion and piety. The friend of learned men and himself learned according to the standard of that age, he devoted a part of his time to conversation with literary men, but a larger portion of it to the gratification of his appetites and to amusements, and was averse from all cares and business, prodigal, luxurious, and vain; perhaps also, according to a current report, positively infidel. Yet he did not neglect the interests and the grandeur of the Romish see. For he took good care that nothing should be sanctioned in the Lateran council which Julius had assembled and left sitting, favourable to the long-wished-for Reformation; and at Bologna A.D. 1515, he persuaded Francis I. king of France to allow the abrogation of the ordinance called the Pragmatic Sanction, which had long been odious to the pontiffs, and to cause another called the Concordate to be imposed on his subjects, notwithstanding their extreme indignation.¹

8. Besides the intolerable thirst for dominion and for oppressing everybody which tormented these pontiffs, they had an insatiable craving for money, which they caused to flow from every province of the Christian world towards Rome, in order to support their power and to purchase friends. It caused by the council of Pisa, the reformation of the church, a pacification among Christian princes, and a war against the Turks. In the second, the convention at Pisa was declared to be irregular. In the third, the emperor having now sided with this council, severe bulls were issued against France. In the fourth, the abrogation of the Pragmatic Sanction was taken up. In the fifth, among in the election of popes was forbidden, and the French church cited to appear on the subject of the above-named Sanction. Soon after, Julius died; and in the sixth and seventh sessions, the council was adjourned both by the new pope Leo X. and by the votes of its members. In the eighth session, Lewis XII. was present by his envoys; and the pope forbade the studying of philosophy more than five years, without proceeding to theology and jurisprudence. The ninth and tenth sessions were devoted to trivial matters, which did not satisfy the expectations raised concerning a reformation of the church. At length the council closed in its eleventh session, May 16th, 1516.—Schl.

¹ The Pragmatic Sanction of the French is extant in Harduin's Concilia, tom. viii. p. 1949. The Concordate is in the same work, tom. ix. p. 1867; also in Leibnitz, Antiqua Codicis Diplomat. par. 1. p. 158, &c. Add par. ii. p. 358, &c. For a history of the Pragmatic Sanction and of the Concordate which succeeded it, see Burnet's History of the Reformation of England, vol. iii. p. 3; Buleau, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. vi. p. 61—109; Du Clos, Hist. de Louis XI. Hist. du Droit Eccles. Français, tome i. Diss. ix. p. 415. Add Menagiana, tom. iii. p. 285. [See also p. 534, note 1.—Mur.

would seem not preposterous or unsuitable for the heads of the Christian republic to demand tribute from their subjects. For who can deny that the sovereign ruler of a commonwealth (and such the pontiffs claimed to be) is entitled to a revenue from the whole state? But as the term tribute was too offensive, and would excite the indignation of the temporal sovereigns, the pontiffs managed the affair more discreetly, and robbed the unwary of their money by various artifices concealed under an appearance of religion.¹ Among these artifices, what were called indulgences—that is, liberty to buy off the punishments of their sins by contributing money to pious uses—held a distinguished place. And to these recourse was had as often as the papal treasury became exhausted, to the immense injury of the public interests. Under some plausible but for the most part false pretext, the ignorant and timorous people were beguiled with the prospect of great advantage by the hawkers of indulgences, who were in general base and profligate characters.²

¹ Whoever would learn the whole art and mystery of the financial concerns of the Romish court, may consult Le Brut's Magazine for Civil and Ecclesiastical History and the Ecclesiastical Laws of Catholic States, vol. ii. p. 605, and vol. iii. p. 3, where is an essay entitled History of the Romish Chancery Regulations; and also an essay by a learned Neapolitan on the Romish chancery regulations and the reservation of benefices. And if any one wishes to form an idea of the productiveness of these chancery regulations, he need only compute the part of them relating to Annats. Of these Luther made a computation in his tract entitled Legatio Adriani Pape, &c. which contains an essay on the nature of Annats, Wittemb. 1538, 4to. A still fuller account may be seen in the tract published by Silber, at Campo Fiore near Rome, 1514, under the title of Taxa Cancellariæ Apostolicæ et Taxa Sanctæ Penitentia, and which was republished at Cologne by Colini, 1515, and at Paris, 1520, and afterwards in the Supplement to the Councils, vol. vi. It occurs also in the Oceanus Juris or the Tractatus Tractatum, tom. xv. par. i. p. 368, &c. [It was frequently published, with notes and comments, and some diversity in the text; whence the Catholics placed it in the list of books prohibited, as being perverted by the Protestants. See Bayle's Dictionnaire, articles Pinet and Bank (Lawrence).—Mur.] It contains the tariff of dues to be paid to the papal chancery for all absolutions, dispensations, &c. According to this book, a dean may be absolved from a murder for twenty crowns. A bishop or abbot for three hundred livres may commit a murder whenever he pleases. And for one-third of that sum, any clergyman may be guilty of unchastity under the most abominable circumstances. The Ingenious French Catholic divine, Claude Espence, in his Comment. in Epist. ad Titum, Opp. tom. i. p. 479, indignantly wrote concerning this book: "There is a book extant, which like a venal prostitute appears openly before the public here at Paris and is now for sale, as it long has been, entitled Taxa Camere seu Cancellariæ Apostolicæ; from which more crimes can be learned than from all the writings concerning the vices, and in which license is promised to very many and absolution offered to all purchasers."—Schl.

² The German princes and states, both Catholic and Lutheran, assembled in the diet at Nuremberg A.D. 1522, complained loudly of the papal indulgences, as exhausting the resources of the country and subverting piety and good morals, in their Centum Gravamina Nationis Germanicæ, No. 4, &c.—Mur.

9. But although the reverence for the sovereign pontiffs was extremely high, yet the more intelligent, especially among the Germans, French, English, and Flemings, denied their entire exemption from error and their superiority to all law. For after the period of the councils of Constance and Basil, the belief prevailed among all except the monks, the Romish parasites, and the superstitious vulgar, that the pontiff's authority was inferior to that of a general council, that his decisions were not infallible, and that he might be deposed by a council, if he was guilty of manifest errors and gross crimes, or plainly neglected the duties of his station. And hence arose those high expectations and those intense desires for a general council in the minds of the wiser portions of the age, and those frequent appeals to such a future council, whenever the Romish court committed offences against justice and piety.

10. The subordinate rulers and teachers of the church eagerly followed the example of their head and leader. Most of the bishops, with the canons their associates, led luxurious and jovial lives in the daily commission of sins, and squandered in the gratification of their lusts those funds which the preceding generations had consecrated to God and to the relief of the poor. Most of them likewise treated the people subject to their control much more rigorously and harshly than the civil magistrates and princes treated their dependants. The greater part of the priests, on account of their indolence, their unchastity, their avarice, their love of pleasure, their ignorance, and their levity, were regarded with utter contempt, not only by the wise and the good but likewise by the common people.³ For as sacred offices were now everywhere bought and sold, it was difficult for honest and pious men to get possession of any good living in the church, but very easy for the vicious and unprincipled.

11. The immense swarms of monks produced everywhere great grievances and complaints. Yet this age, which stood midway between light and darkness, would patiently have borne with this indolent throng if they had only exhibited some show of piety and decorum. But the Benedictines and the other orders which were allowed to possess lands and fixed revenues, abused their wealth and rushed headlong into every species of vice, regardless altogether of the rules they professed. The

³ See, beside others, Gaudanus, Apocalypsis seu Visio Mirabilis super Miserabili Statu Matris Ecclesie, in Burmann's Analecta Historica de Hadriano VI. p. 246, &c. Utrecht, 1727, 4to.

Mendicant orders, on the contrary, and especially those who professed to follow the rules of Dominic and Francis, by their rustic impudence, their ridiculous superstition, their ignorance and cruelty, their rude and brutish conduct, alienated the minds of most people from them. They all had a strong aversion to learning, and were very unfriendly to the proceedings of certain excellent men who laboured to improve the system of education, and who assailed the barbarism of the times both orally and in their writings. This is evident from what befel Reuchlin, Erasmus, and others.¹

12. No order of monks was more powerful and influential than that of the Dominicans. For they filled the highest offices in the church, they presided everywhere over the terrible tribunal of the Inquisition, and in the courts of all the kings and princes of Europe they had the care of souls, or in popular language held the office of confessors. Yet about this time they incurred very great odium among all good men by various things, but especially by their base artifices and frauds (among which the tragedy at Berne A.D. 1509 stands conspicuously),² likewise by persecuting the learned and the good, and branding them as heretics; and also by extending their own privileges and honours at the expense of others, and most unjustly oppressing their adversaries.³

tion of some pontiffs and others in purgatory for having persecuted the deniers of that doctrine; and promised Jetzer that St. Barbara should appear to him and give him farther instruction. Accordingly the sub-prior assumed a female garb on a succeeding night and appeared to Jetzer. She revealed to him some parts of his secret history, which the preacher his confessor had drawn from him at his confessions. Jetzer was completely duped. St. Barbara promised that the Virgin Mary should appear to him. She, on the sub-prior personating her, did so; and assured him that she was not conceived free from original sin, though she was delivered from it three hours after her birth; that it was a grievous thing to her to see that erroneous opinion spread abroad. She blamed the Franciscans much as being the chief cause of this false belief. She also announced the destruction of the city of Berne because the people did not expel the Franciscans, and cease from receiving a pension from the French king. She appeared repeatedly, gave Jetzer much instruction, and promised to impress on him the five wounds of Christ, which she declared were never impressed on St. Francis or any other person. She accordingly seized his right hand and thrust a nail through it. This so pained him that he became restive under the operation, and she promised to impress the other wounds without giving him pain. The conspirators now gave him medicated drugs which stupefied him, and then made the other wounds upon him while senseless. Hitherto the subprior had been the principal actor; but now the preacher undertook to personate St. Mary, and Jetzer knew his voice and from this time began to suspect the whole to be an imposition. All attempts to hoodwink him became fruitless; he was completely undeceived. They next endeavoured to bring him to join voluntarily in the plot. He was persuaded to do so. But they imposed upon him such intolerable austerities, and were detected by him in such impious and immoral conduct, that he wished to leave the monastery. They would not let him go, and were so fearful of his betraying their secret, which was now drawing crowds to their monastery and promised them great advantage, that they determined to destroy him by poison. Jetzer by listening at their door got knowledge of the fact, and was so on his guard that they could not succeed, though they used a consecrated host as the medium of the poison. He eloped from the monastery and divulged the whole transaction. The four conspirators were apprehended, tried for blasphemy and profaning holy ordinances, delivered over to the civil power, burned at the stake in 1509, and their ashes cast into the river near Berne. Such is an outline of the story which the Franciscan narrator has drawn out to a tedious length, with great minuteness and not a little esprit du corps.—Mur. [A full account of these shocking scenes may also be seen appended to the first volume (p. 491) of Ruchat's Histoire de la Réformation de la Suisse, new edit. by Vulliamin, Nyon, 1835-38, 7 vols. 8vo. This valuable work is not only a reprint of Ruchat's original edition which appeared at Geneva in 1721, but also contains in the last three volumes its continuation from 1536 to the year 1566, which had previously remained in MS. in the archives of Berne.—R.

² See Pirckheimer's Epistle to the pontiff Hadrian VI. De Dominicenorum Flagitiis, in his Opp. p. 372, whence Gerdes copied it, in his Historia Reformationis, tom. I. Append. p. 170. [This learned and candid civilian and Catholic of Nuremberg, who corresponded with all the leading men of Germany, both Catholics and Protestants, a few years before his death (which was in 1530), wrote a respectful and excellent letter to Pope Adrian VI. in which he endeavoured to acquaint him with the true state of things in Germany. The grand cause of all the commotions there he supposed to be the Dominicans, who by their persecution of Capnio and of all literary men, and by their pride and insolence and base conduct, particularly in trumpeting the papal indulgences, alienated almost all the intelligent and honest from the church, and then by their violent measures drove them to open opposition to the pontiffs.—Mur.

¹ Reuchlin or Capnio was the great promoter of Hebrew and Rabbinic learning in Germany. The Dominicans of Cologne, to bring it into disgrace, prompted John Pfoeffkorn, a converted Jew, to publish a work on the blasphemies contained in the books of the Jews. This induced the emperor Maximilian in the year 1509 to order all Jewish books to be burned, which however Reuchlin happily prevented from taking place. Erasmus published the Greek New Testament as well as many works of the fathers, by which the ignorant monks represented him as sinning against the Holy Ghost.—Schl. [See the notice of Reuchlin in p. 547, above.—R.

² On the notorious imposition of the monks of Berne see, among many others, Hottinger's Historia Eccles. Helvet. tom. I. p. 334, &c. [Hist. Eccles. Nov. secul. xvi. par. i. p. 334, &c. The narrative there inserted was drawn up by a Franciscan monk of Berne in the year 1509. The substance of it is this:—A Dominican monk named Wigand Wirt, preaching at Frankfurt A.D. 1507, so violently assailed the doctrine of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary (the favourite doctrine of the Franciscans), that he was summoned to Rome to answer for his conduct. His brethren of the Dominican order in their convention at Wimpfen formed a plan to aid him, and to convince the world that the Franciscan doctrine of the immaculate conception was false. Berne was selected for the scene of their operations. The prior, sub-prior, preacher, and steward of the Dominican cloister at Berne undertook to get up miracles and revelations for the occasion. A simple honest rustic by the name of John Jetzer, who had just entered upon his novitiate in the monastery, was selected as their tool. The sub-prior appeared to him one night dressed in white, and pretending to be the ghost of a friar who had been a hundred and sixty years in purgatory. He walled and entreated of Jetzer to afford him aid. Jetzer promised to do it as far as he was able, and the next morning reported his vision to his superiors. They encouraged him to go on and to confer freely with the ghost if he appeared again. A few nights after the ghost made his appearance, attended by two devils, his tormentors, and thanked Jetzer for the relaxation of his sufferings, in consequence of Jetzer's prayers, fasting, &c. He also instructed Jetzer respecting the views entertained in the other world concerning the immaculate conception, and the deten-

It was these friars especially who prompted Leo X. to the imprudent step of publicly condemning Martin Luther.

13. Many of the Mendicant monks held the principal chairs in the universities and schools; and this was the chief reason why the light of science and polite learning, which had begun to diffuse itself through most countries of Europe, could not more effectually dispel the clouds of ignorance and stupidity. Most of the teachers of youth, decorated with the splendid titles of artists, grammarians, philosophers, and logicians, in a most disgusting style loaded the memories of their pupils with a multitude of barbarous terms and worthless distinctions; and when the pupil could repeat these with volubility, he was regarded as eloquent and erudite. All the philosophers extolled Aristotle beyond measure, but no one followed him, indeed none of them understood him. For what they called the philosophy of Aristotle was a confused mass of obscure notions, sentences, and divisions, the import of which not even the chiefs of the school could comprehend. And if among these thorns of scholastic wisdom there was anything which had the appearance of fruit, it was crushed and destroyed by the senseless altercations of the different sects, especially the Scotists and Thomists, the Realists and Nominalists, from which no university was free.

14. How perversely and absurdly theology was taught in this age, appears from all the books it has transmitted to us, which are remarkable for nothing but their bulk. Of the biblical doctors or expounders of the precepts of the Bible, only here and there an individual remained. Even in the university of Paris, which was considered as the mother and queen of all the rest, not a man could be found when Luther arose competent to dispute with him out of the Scriptures.¹ Those who remained of this class neglected the literal sense of the Scriptures, which they were utterly unable to investigate, on account of their ignorance of the sacred languages and of the laws of interpretation, and foolishly wandered after concealed and hidden meanings. Nearly all the theologians were Positivi and Sententiarii, who deemed it a great achievement both in speculative and practical theology, either to overwhelm the subject with a torrent of useless quotations from the fathers, or to analyse it according to the laws of dialectics. And whenever they had occasion to speak of the meaning of any text, they appealed invariably to what was called the Glossa Ordinaria; and the phrase Glossa dicit was as common and decisive in their lips, as anciently the phrase ipse dixit in the Pythagorean school.

15. These doctors, however, disputed among themselves with sufficient freedom on various articles of religion, and even upon those which were considered essential to salvation. For a great many points of doctrine had not yet been determined by the authority of the church, or as the phrase was, by the holy see; and the pontiffs were not accustomed, unless there was some special reason, to make enactments which would restrain liberty of opinion on subjects not connected either with the sovereignty of the holy see or the privileges and emoluments of the clergy. Hence many persons of great eminence might be named, who safely, and even sometimes with applause, advanced the same opinions before Luther's day which were afterwards charged upon him as a crime. And doubtless Luther might have enjoyed the same liberty with them, if he had not attacked the system of Roman finance, the wealth of the bishops, the supremacy of the pontiffs, and the reputation of the Dominican order.²

16. The public worship of God consisted almost wholly in a round of ceremonies, and those for the most part vain and useless; being calculated not to affect the heart but to dazzle the eye. Those who delivered sermons (which many were not able to do) filled or rather beguiled the ears of the people with pretended miracles, ridiculous fables, wretched quibbles, and similar trash, thrown together without judgment.³ There are still extant many examples of such discourses, which no good man can read without indignation. If among these declaimers there were some inclined to be more grave, for them certain commonplace arguments were prepared and arranged, on which they vociferated on almost all occasions by the hour; such for instance as the authority of the holy mother church and the obedience due to it, the influence of the saints with God and their virtues and merits, the dignity, glory, and kindness of the Virgin Mary, the efficacy of relics, the enriching of churches and monasteries, the necessity of what they called good works in order to salvation, the intolerable flames of purgatory, and the utility of indulgences. To preach to the people nothing but Christ Jesus our Saviour and his merits, and that pure love of God and men which springs from faith, would have added little to the treasures and emoluments of good mother church.

¹ Or, as Erasmus humorously expressed the same truth to the Elector of Saxony at Cologne, in 1520: "Lutherus peccavit in duobus, nempe quod tetigit coronam pontificis et ventres monachorum." Seeckendorf, Historia Lutheranismi, p. 125, 126, Franckf. 1692, folio.—R.

² The Easter sermons in particular are proof of this, in which the preachers were emulous to provoke laughter among the audience by repeating ludicrous stories, low jests, and whimsical incidents. This was called emphatically Easter laughter, and it still has its admirers in some portions of the Catholic church. John Ecolampadius, in the year 1518, published at Basil a tract of 32 pages 4to entitled, De Ritu Paschali, Ecolampadii ad W. Capitonem Theologum Epistolæ. See Fussli's Beiträge zur Kirchen-Reformationsgesch. des Sweitzerlandes, vol. v. p. 447, &c.—Schl.

³ This was not strange. Many of the doctors of theology in those times had never read the Bible. Carlstadt expressly tells us this was the case with himself. Whenever one freely read the Bible, he was cried out against as one making innovations, a heretic, and as exposing Christianity to great danger by making the New Testament known. Many of the monks regarded the Bible as a book which abounded in numerous errors.—Von Ein.

17. From these causes there was among all classes and ranks in every country, an amazing ignorance on religious subjects, and no less superstition united with gross corruption of morals. Those who presided over the ceremonies willingly tolerated these evils, and indeed encouraged them in various ways, rather than strove to stifle them, well knowing that their own interests were depending upon them. Nor did the majority think it advisable to oppose strenuously the corruption of morals; for they well knew that if the crimes and sins of the people were diminished, the sale of indulgences would also decrease, and they would of course derive much less revenue from absolutions and other similar sources.¹

¹ Schlegel here inserts the following history of popish indulgences according to the views of Mosheim, derived undoubtedly from his public lectures, which Schlegel himself had heard and has frequently referred to.—Mur. [The origin of indulgences must be sought in the earliest history of the church. In the first centuries of the Christian church, those Christians who were excluded from the communion, on account of their relapses in times of persecution or on account of other heinous sins, had to seek a restoration to fellowship by a public penance, in which they entreated the brethren to forgive their offence, standing before the door of the church clothed in the garb of mourning. This ecclesiastical punishment, which was regarded as a sort of satisfaction made to the community and was called by that name, and which prevented much irregularity among Christians, was afterwards moderated, and sometimes remitted in the case of infirm persons, and this remission was called indulgentia, indulgentia. Originally therefore indulgences were merely the remission of ecclesiastical punishments, imposed on the lapsed and other gross offenders. When persecutions ceased, and the principal ground for this ecclesiastical regulation no longer existed, these punishments might have been laid aside. [Not so, for relapsing into idolatry was only one among the many offences for which penance was imposed; and as persecutions ceased and the church became rich and corrupt, other sins were multiplied, so that the ground for inflicting church censures rather increased than diminished.—Mur.] They continued, and the doctrine gradually grew up that Christ had atoned for the eternal punishment of sin, but not for its temporary punishment. The temporal punishment they divided into that of the present life, and that of the future life or of purgatory. It was held, that every man who would attain salvation must suffer the temporary punishment of his sins, either in the present world or in the flames of purgatory; and that the confessor to whom a man confessed his sins had the power to adjudge and impose this temporary punishment. The punishment thus imposed consisted of fasting, pilgrimages, flagellation, &c. But among the persons liable to such punishments, were frequently persons of distinction and wealth. And for these the principle of admitting substitutes was introduced. And there were monks, who for compensation paid them, would endure these punishments in behalf of the rich. But as every man could not avail himself of this relief, they at last commuted that penance into a pious mulct, pia mulcta. Whoever, for instance, was bound to whip himself for several weeks, might pay to the church or to the monastery a certain sum of money or give it a piece of land, and then be released from the penance. Thus Pepin of France, having, with the consent of the pope, dethroned the lawful monarch of that country, gave to the church the patrimony of St. Peter. As the popes perceived that something might be gained in this way, they assumed wholly to themselves the right of commuting canonical penances for pecuniary satisfactions, which every bishop had before exercised in his own diocese. At first they released only from the punishments of sin in the present world, but in the fourteenth century they extended this release also to the punishments of purgatory. Jesus, they said, has not removed all the punishments of sin. Those which he has not removed are either the punishments of this world, that is, the penances which confessors enjoin, or the punishments of the future world, that is, those of purgatory. An indulgence frees a person from both these. The first, the pope remits by his papal power as sovereign lord of the church, just as the sovereign of a country can commute the corporal punishment which the inferior judges decree into pecuniary mulcts. The last he remits, (as Benedict XIV. says in his bull for the jubilee), jura suffragii, that is, by his prevalent intercession with God, who can deny nothing to his vicergerent. Yet this release from the punishments of sin cannot be bestowed gratis. There must be an equivalent, that is, some money, which is given to the pope for religious uses. Princes indeed never release a man from corporal punishment unless he petitions for it. But the vicergerent of Christ is more gracious than other judges, and causes his indulgences to be freely offered to the whole church, and to be proclaimed aloud throughout the Christian world. These principles carried into operation drew immense sums of money to Rome. When such indulgences were to be published, the disposal of them was commonly farmed out. For the papal court could not always wait to have the money collected and conveyed from every country of Europe. And there were rich merchants at Genoa, Milan, Venice, and Augsburg, who purchased the indulgences for a particular province, and paid to the papal chancery handsome sums for them. Thus both parties were benefited. The chancery came at once into possession of large sums of money, and the farmers did not fail of a good bargain. They were careful to employ skilful hawkers of the indulgences, persons whose boldness and impudence bore due proportion to the eloquence with which they imposed upon the simple people. Yet that this species of traffic might have a religious aspect, the pope appointed the archbishops of the several provinces to be his commissaries, who in his name published that indulgences were to be sold, and generally selected the persons to hawk them, and for this service shared the profits with the merchants who farmed them. These papal hawkers enjoyed great privileges, and however odious to the civil authorities, they were not to be molested. Complaints indeed were made against these contributions levied by the popes upon all Christian Europe Kings and princes, clergy and laity, bishops, monasteries, and confessors, all felt themselves aggrieved by them; the former, that their countries were impoverished under the pretext of crusades which were never undertaken, and of wars against heretics and Turks; and the latter, that their letters of indulgence were rendered inefficient, and the people released from ecclesiastical discipline. But at Rome all were deaf to these complaints, and it was not till the revolution produced by Luther that unhappy Europe obtained the desired relief.—Schl.

18. Yet the more ruinous the evils pre-

valent throughout the church, the more earnestly was a reformation longed for by all who were governed either by good sense and solid learning or by a regard to piety. Nor was the number of these in the whole Latin world by any means small. The majority of them did not indeed wish to see the constitution and organization of the church altered, nor the doctrines which had become sacred by long admission rejected, nor the rites and ceremonies abrogated; but only to have some bounds set to the power of the pontiffs, the corrupt morals and the impositions of the clergy corrected, the ignorance and errors of the people dispelled, and the burdens imposed on the people under colour of religion removed. But as none of these reforms could be effected without first extirpating various absurd and impious opinions which gave birth to the evils, or without purging the existing religion from its corruptions, all those may be considered as implicitly demanding a reformation of religion, who are represented as calling for a reformation of the church both in its head and in its members.

19. What little of real piety still remained existed, as it were, under the patronage of those called Mystics. For this class of persons, both by their tongues and pens, avoiding all scholastic disputations and demonstrating the vanity of mere external worship, exhorted men to strive only to obtain holiness of heart and communion with God. And hence they were loved and respected by most of those who seriously and earnestly sought for salvation. Yet as all of them associated the vulgar errors and superstitions with their precepts of piety, and many of them were led into strange opinions by their excessive love of contemplation, and were but little removed from fanatical delirium, more powerful auxiliaries than they were necessary to the subjugation of prejudices now become inveterate.

CHAPTER II.

HISTORY OF THE COMMENCEMENT AND PROGRESS OF THE REFORMATION, TO THE PRESENTATION OF THE AUGSBURG CONFESSION [OR FROM A.D. 1517—1530].

1. WHILE the Roman pontiff supposed all was safe and tranquil, and the pious and good were everywhere despairing of the much longed-for reformation of the church, Martin Luther, an obscure and insignificant monk of Eisleben in Saxony, a province of Germany, born of reputable but humble parentage, of the order of the Augustinian

Eremites one of the four Mendicant orders, and a professor of theology in the university of Wittenberg, which Frederick the Wise, elector of Saxony, had established a few years before, unexpectedly and with astonishing intrepidity opposed himself alone to the whole Romish power. It was in the year 1517, when Leo X. was at the head of the church, Maximilian I. of Austria governed the German Roman empire, and Frederick, for his great wisdom surnamed the Wise, ruled over Saxony. Many applauded the courage and heroism of this new opposer; but almost no one anticipated his success. For it was not to be expected that this light-armed warrior could inflict any injury on a Hercules, whom so many heroes had assailed in vain.

2. That Luther was possessed of extraordinary talents, uncommon genius, a copious memory, astonishing industry and perseverance, superior eloquence, a greatness of soul which rose above all human weaknesses, and consummate erudition for the age in which he lived, even those among his enemies who possess some candour do not deny. In the philosophy then taught in the schools he was as well versed as he was in theology, and he taught both with great applause in the university of Wittenberg. In the former, he followed the principles of the Nominalists which were embraced by his order, that of the Augustinians; in the latter, he was a follower for the most part of St. Augustine. But he had long preferred the Holy Scriptures and sound reason before human authorities or opinions. No wise man indeed will pronounce him entirely faultless; yet if we except the imperfections of the times in which he lived and of the religion in which he was trained, we shall find little to censure in the man.¹

¹ All the writers who have given the history of Luther's life and achievements are enumerated by Fabricius, in his Centifolium Lutheranism, of which the first volume appeared at Hamburg in 1728, and the second volume in 1730, 8vo. [Melancthon, De Vita Lutheri, ed. Heumann, Gotting, 1741, 4to; Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reformation, vol. i. p. 106, &c.; Milner's Church History, cent. xvi.; Bower's Life of Luther, Edinb. 1813, and numerous others; among which the following are particularly recommended by Schlegel.—Mur. Walch's Ausführliche Nachricht von D. Mart. Luther, prefixed to the 24th vol. of his edition of Luther's works, p. 1—875, which exceeds all others in fulness and learned fidelity. The earlier work of Keil, Merkwürdige Lebensumstände D. Mart. Luther's, Leipzig, 1764, 4 vols. contains much that is good with some things which are censurable. Also from its historical connexion, Walch's Gesch. der Frau Catharina Von Bora, Martin Luther's Ehegattin, 3 vols. Gotting. 1753—54, 8vo, and Schroeckh's Life of Luther, in his Abbildungen der Gelehrten. From these writings we adduce these principal circumstances:—Luther's father was a miner of Mansfeld. He was born at Eisleben, A.D. 1483. After attending the schools of Magdeburg and Eisenach, he studied scholastic philosophy and jurisprudence at Erfurt, and at the same time read the ancient Latin authors. But his intimate friend being killed and himself completely stunned by a clap of thunder, he joined himself, much against the will of his father, to one of the most rigid orders of Mendicants, that of the Augustinian Eremites. In this situation he so conducted himself, that his superiors were well satisfied with his industry, good temper, and abilities. In the year 1508, John von Staupitz, his vicar-general, sent him from Erfurth to Wittenberg, contrary to his inclinations, to be professor of philosophy. He now applied himself more to biblical theology, discovered the defects of the scholastic philosophy, and began to reject human authorities in matters of religion; and in these views, his baccalaureate in theology, which he took in the year 1509, confirmed him still more. A journey to Rome, which he undertook in the year 1510 on the business of his order, procured him knowledge and experience, which were afterwards of great use to him. After his return, he took in the year 1512 his degree of doctor in divinity; and he now applied himself diligently to the study of the Greek and Hebrew languages. All these pursuits were preparations for that great work which Divine Providence intended to accomplish by him; and they procured him a degree of learning which was great for those times. He was not inept in philosophy, and he understood the Bible better than any other teacher in the Catholic church; he had critically read the writings of the fathers, and had studied, among the modern writers, especially William Oecam and John Gerson, together with the Mystics of the two preceding centuries, and particularly John Tauler; and from the two former (Oecam and Gerson), he learned to view the papal authority differently from the mass of people; and from the latter (the Mystics), he learned many practical truths relating to the religion of the heart, which were not to be found in the ordinary books of devotion and piety. Of church history he had so much knowledge as was necessary for combating the prevalent errors and for restoring the primitive religion of Christians. In the Belles Lettres also he was not a novice. He wrote the German language with greater purity, elegance, and force, than any other author of that age; and his translation of the Bible and his hymns still exhibit proof how correctly, nervously, and clearly, he could express himself in his native tongue. He possessed a natural, strong, and moving eloquence. These acquisitions and talents resided in a mind of uncommon ardour, and of heroic virtue in action; and he applied them to objects of the greatest utility, both to mankind at large and to the individual members of society. He saw religion to be disfigured by the most pernicious errors, and reason and conscience to be under intolerable bondage. He chased away these errors, brought true religion and sound reason again into repute, rescued virtue from slavish subjection to human authorities, and made it obedient to nobler motives, vindicated the rights of man against the subverters of them, furnished the state with useful citizens by removing obstructions to marriage, and gave to the thrones of princes their original power and security. By what means he gradually effected all this good for mankind will appear in the course of this history. It is true, the man who performed these heroic deeds for Europe had his imperfections; for heroes are but men. But his faults were not the faults of a corrupt heart, but of a warm, sanguine, choleric temperament, and the effects of his education and of the times in which he lived. He answered his opposers, even when they were kings and princes, with too great acrimony, with passion, and often with personal abuse. He acknowledged this as a fault, and commended Melancthon and Brentius, who exhibited more mildness in their conversation and writings. But it was his zeal for the truth which enkindled his passions, and perhaps they were necessary in those times; perhaps also they were the consequence of his monastic life, in which he had no occasion to learn worldly courtesy. And were not the harsh and passionate terms which he used towards his opposers, the controversial language of his age? We do not say this to justify Luther; he was a man and he had human weaknesses, but he was clearly one of the best men known in that century. This is manifest, among other proofs, from his writings; the most important of which we shall here enumerate. Theses de Indulgentiis, pro Disputatio pro Declaratione Virtutis Indulgentiarum, 1517. A sermon on Indul-

3. The first occasion for publishing the truths he had discovered was presented to this great man by John Tetzel, a Dominican monk void of shame, whom Albert the archbishop of Mentz and Magdeburg had hired on account of his impudence, to solicit the Germans in the name of the Roman pontiff Leo X. to expiate with money their own sins and those of their friends, and future sins as well as past ones, or in other

gences and grace, 1518. Resolutiones Thesium de Indulgentiis. Among his exegetical writings, his Commentary on the epistle to the Galatians, and that on Genesis, are the most important. In his own estimation, his best work was his Postilla, which were published in 1527. His essays, De Libertate Christiana, De Captivitate Babylonica, and De Potestate Monastica, are very polemic; as also his book against Erasmus, De Sero Arbitrio, in which he closely follows Augustine in the doctrine concerning grace, while the earliest among the reformed defended universal grace. His translation of the Bible, which was first published by parcels and appeared entire for the first time in 1534, his larger and smaller Catechisms, the seventeen Articles of Schwabach, the Articles of Smalcald, and his Letters, are very important. The best edition of his writings is that of Halle, 1737-53, in twenty-four volumes, to which the immortal counsellor Walch has imparted the greatest possible perfection.—Schli. [To the works on the Life of Luther enumerated in the beginning of this note may be added the following later ones: Ulert, Luther's Leben, Gotha, 1817, chiefly literary; Scheibel, Ueber Luther's Christlich. Frömmigkeit, Breslau, 1817; Pfäzer, Luther's Leben, Stuttgart, 1836, translated into English by Williams, with an introductory essay by Isaac Taylor, Lond. 1840, but the translation has omitted Pfäzer's Introduction, and the entire chapter entitled, Luther's peccities; Stang, M. Luther, sein Leben u. Wirken, Stuttg. 1838; Meurer, Luther's Leben aus den Quellen erzählt, Dresd. 1842, not yet completed. The following life of Luther is now in course of publication at Leipzig: Karl Jürgen's, Luther's Leben. It promises to be a very full biography, as the first volume of 700 pages extends only to 1517. But by far the most important publication for illustrating the life of Luther with which we have been recently furnished, and the value of which it is impossible to overrate, is the complete edition of his letters which has been published by De Wette in his work entitled, Luther's Briefe, Sendschreiben, u. Bedenken, Berlin, 1825-28, five vols. 8vo. These letters were previously dispersed in at least six different collections, some of which were of extreme rarity; they are all collected in this work, and many pieces previously unpublished have been added, and the whole is carefully edited and illustrated with notes. To these biographies of Luther may be added the following, recently published by Roman Catholic laymen: Audin, Histoire de la Vie, des Ecrits, et des Doctrines de M. Luther, latest edition, Paris, 1841, 2 vols. translated into English, Lond. 1843. This is a singular work; for while the author has a profound admiration for Luther as a man of genius and endowed with talents of a high order, he nevertheless, like all other Romanists, represents him as actuated by low, selfish, and even licentious principles throughout the whole of his opposition to the papal corruptions. Michelet, Mémoires de Luther, écrits par lui-même, Paris, 1837, 2 vols. As the title intimates, the author, who has since rendered himself so well known by his powerful exposures of the Jesuits in France, makes Luther as far as practicable his own biographer, by giving extracts from his letters and other works in his own words. But his range of quotations is rather limited, and too many of them are taken from that unauthentic source, Luther's Tischreden. I may add that a new edition of Luther's entire works has been in course of publication at Erlangen, the Lutheran University of Bavaria, since 1826, to be completed in 60 volumes, of which little more than the one-half is yet published. It is known as Irmischer's edition, and I believe is expected to surpass that of Halle.—Z.

words, to preach indulgences.¹ This fraudulent declaimer conducted the business not only in dereliction of all modesty and decency, but in a manner which impiously detracted from the merits of Jesus Christ. Hence Luther, moved with just indignation, publicly exposed at Wittenberg, on the thirty-first day of October,² A.D. 1517, ninety-five propositions, in which he chastised the madness of these indulgence-sellers generally, and not obscurely censured the pontiff himself for suffering the people to be thus diverted from looking to Christ.³ This was the beginning of that great war which extinguished no small portion of the pontifical grandeur.⁴

¹ The writers who give an account of Tetzel and of his base methods of deluding the multitude are enumerated by Fabricius, in his Constitutum Lutherianum, par. i. p. 47, and par. ii. p. 530. What is said of this vile man by Echarid and Quesif, in their Scriptores Ordinis Predicatorum, tom. ii. p. 40, betrays immoderate and disgraceful partiality. [See also Gerdes' Historia Reformationis, vol. i. p. 80, where a most characteristic print of this infamous monk is given.—R.]

² Mosheim says Luther posted his propositions, — pride Kalendarum Octobris, i.e. on the 30th of September, and MacLaine so translated the phrase; but Dr. Murdock renders it — "the first of October." Mosheim evidently intended to say Novembris for Octobris, because it is quite clear from other sources that the day in question was the eve of All Saints' Day or 1st of November, a high day in the Schloss Kirche of Wittenberg which was dedicated to all the saints, and it was on its doors that the paper was first posted to meet the eyes of the crowds of pilgrims who resorted thither from all parts on that festival. I have accordingly placed the right day in the text. I may add that this church is still standing and occupied, though the doors are renewed; and it is in its central aisle that both Luther and Melancthon are buried.—R.]

³ A copy of these propositions is given by Gerdes in his Hist. Reform. vol. i. App. p. 114—122. It differs slightly from the original copy, which was printed on one side of the paper for posting on the doors of the university and churches in Wittenberg, and for distribution among his friends. I fortunately possess one of these original broadsides, now very rare and peculiarly interesting as being Luther's first appearance in print!—R.]

⁴ The pope offered as a pretext for this new spiritual tax the completion of the church of St. Peter, which had been commenced by Julius II. and he appointed for his first commissary in Germany Albert, archbishop of Mentz and Magdeburg and margrave of Brandenburg, who from the expensiveness of his court had not yet paid the fees for his pall, and was to pay them out of his share of the profits of these indulgences. The second commissary was Jo. Angelus Arimbold. In Saxony John Tetzel, who had before been a successful preacher of papal indulgences, was appointed to this service. He was a profligate wretch, who had once fallen into the hands of the Inquisition in consequence of his adulteries, and whom the elector of Saxony rescued by his intercession. He now cried up his merchandise in a manner so offensive, so contrary to all Christian principles, and so acceptable to the inconsiderate, that all upright men were disgusted with him; yet they dared to sigh over this unclerical traffic only in private. He pursued it as far north as Zerbst and Jüterbock, and selected the annual fairs for its prosecution. He claimed to have power to absolve not only from all church censures, but likewise from all sins, transgressions, and enormities, however horrid they might be, and even from those of which the pope only can take cognizance. He released from all the punishments of purgatory, gave permission to come to the sacraments, and promised to those who purchased his indulgences that the gates of hell should be closed and the gates of paradise and bliss open to them. See

4. This first controversy between Luther and Tetzel was in itself of no great importance, and might have been easily settled if Leo X. had possessed either the ability or the disposition to treat it prudently; for it was the private contest of two monks respecting the limits of the power of the Roman pontiffs in remitting the punishment of sins. Luther acknowledged that the pontiff could remit the human punishments for sin, or those appointed by the church or the pontiffs, but denied his power to absolve from the divine punishments either

Von der Hardt, Hist. Liter. Reformat. par. iv. sect. vi. xiv. &c. Some Wittenbergers who had purchased his wares came to Luther as he was sitting in the confessional of his cloister, and acknowledged to him very gross sins. And when he laid upon them heavy ecclesiastical penances, they produced Tetzel's letters of indulgence and demanded absolution. But he declined giving them absolution unless they submitted to the penance, and thus gave some evidence of repentance and amendment; and he declared that he put no value upon their letters of indulgence. These sentiments he also published in a discourse from the pulpit; and he complained to the archbishop of Mentz and to some of the bishops of this shameful abuse of indulgences, and published his theses or propositions against Tetzel, in which he did not indeed discard all use of indulgences, but only maintained that they were merely a release by the pope from the canonical penances for sin as established by ecclesiastical law, and did not extend to the punishments which God inflicts; that forgiveness of sins was to be had only from God through real repentance and sorrow, and that God requires no penance or satisfaction for them. The enemies of the Reformation tell us that Luther was actuated by passion, and that envy between the Dominicans and the Augustinians was the moving cause of Luther's enterprise. They say the Augustinians had previously been employed to preach indulgences, but now the Dominicans were appointed to this lucrative office; and that Luther took up his pen against Tetzel by order of John von Staupitz [provincial of the order], who was dissatisfied because his order was neglected on this occasion. The author of this fable was John Cocheilus (in his Historia de Actis et Scriptis Mart. Lutheri, p. 3, 4, Paris, 1665, 8vo), and from this raving enemy of Luther it has been copied by some French and English writers, and from them by a few German writers of this age. But the evidence of this hypothesis is still wanting. It is still unproved that the Augustinians ever had the exclusive right of preaching indulgences. (See Kraft, De Luthero contra Indulgentiarum Nundinatores hucusqu岸 per Invidiam Disputante, Gotting, 1749, 4to.) Luther was far too openhearted not to let something of this envy appear in his writings, if he really was urged on to action by it; and his enemies were far too sharp-sighted, if they had even the slightest suspicion of it, not to have reproached him with it in his lifetime. Yet not one of them did this. For what Cocheilus has said on this subject did not appear till after Luther's death. [See a long and well-written note on this subject in MacLaine's translation of Mosheim on this paragraph, and which Villiers has subjoined, as an Appendix to his Essay on the Reformation by Luther; Pallavicini, in his Historia Concilii Trident. par. i. lib. i. cap. iii. sec. vi. &c.; Graveson, Historia Eccles. sæcul. xvi. p. 26, and other Catholics, though enemies of the Reformation, expressly deny and confute this charge against Luther. —Mur.] Others tell us with as little evidence of truth, that Luther was prompted to take this step by the court of Saxony, which had a design to draw into its own coffers the religious property situated in Saxony; an objection which the whole series of subsequent events will refute. Luther at first had no thought of overthrowing the papal hierarchy; and Frederick the Wise, who was opposed to all innovations in ecclesiastical or religious matters, would evidently be one of the last persons to form such a plan.—Schl.]

of the present or the future world; and maintained that those divine punishments must be removed either by the merits of Jesus Christ or by voluntary penance endured by the sinner. Tetzel on the contrary asserted that the pontiff could release also from divine punishments, and from those of the future as well as of the present life. This subject had in preceding times been often discussed, and the pontiffs had passed no decrees about it. But the present dispute, being at first neglected and then treated unwisely, gradually increased, till from small beginnings it involved consequences of the highest importance.

5. Luther was applauded by the best part of Germany, who had long borne very impatiently the various artifices of the pontiffs for raising money, and the impudence and impositions of the pontifical tax-gatherers. But the sycophants of the pontiffs cried out, and none more loudly than the Dominicans, who in the manner of all monks considered their whole order as injured by Luther in the person of Tetzel. In the first place, Tetzel himself forthwith attacked Luther in two disputations at the university of Frankfort-on-the-Oder, upon occasion of his taking his degree of doctor in theology. The following year, A.D. 1518, two celebrated Dominicans, the one an Italian named Sylvester Prierias, the general of his order at Rome, and the other a German, James Hochstraten of Cologne, assailed him with great fury. They were followed by a third adversary, a great friend of the Dominicans, John Eck, a theologian of Ingolstadt. To these adversaries Luther replied with spirit, and at the same time he addressed very modest letters to the Roman pontiff himself and to some of the bishops, to whom he endeavoured to evince the justice of his cause, and promised to change his views and correct his opinions, if they could be shown to be erroneous.¹

6. Leo X. at first disregarded this controversy; but being informed by the emperor Maximilian I. that it was an affair of no little consequence and that Germany was taking sides in regard to it, he summoned Luther to appear at Rome and take his trial.² Against this mandate of the pontiff Frederick the Wise elector of Saxony interposed, and requested that Luther's cause might be tried in Germany, according to the ecclesiastical laws of the country. The pontiff yielded to the wishes of Frederick, and ordered Luther to appear before his legate, cardinal Thomas Cajetan [Thomas de Vio of Gæta], then at the diet of Augsburg, and there defend his doctrines and conduct. The Romish court here exhibited an example of the greatest indiscretion which appeared in the whole transaction. For Cajetan being a Dominican, and of course the enemy of Luther and an associate of Tetzel, a more unfit person could not have been named to sit as judge and arbiter of the cause.

7. Luther repaired to Augsburg in the month of October A.D. 1518, and had three interviews with Cajetan the pontifical legate.³ But if Luther had been disposed to yield, this Dominican was not the person to bring a high-spirited man to accomplish such a purpose. For he treated him imperiously, and peremptorily required him humbly to confess his errors without being convinced of them by argument, and to submit his judgment to that of the pontiff.⁴

¹ Here is undoubtedly a slip of the memory. Before Maximilian's letter arrived at Rome, Leo had cited Luther to appear within sixty days at Rome, and take his trial before Jerome bishop of Ascoli and his enemy Sylvester Prierias, as his judges. See Serkenдорff's Hist. Lutheranismi, p. 41, and Luther's Works, vol. xv. p. 527, &c. Maximilian was himself friendly to Luther, but was now pushed on by some of his courtiers.—Schl.

² Of Cajetan a full account is given by Quetif and Echard, in their Scriptores Ordin. Prædicator. tom. II. p. 14, &c. (He was born A.D. 1469 at Gæta, in Latin Cajeta (whence his surname Cajetanus), in the territory of Naples; at the age of twenty-nine he wrote a book to prove that a general council could not be called without the authority of a pope; and was rewarded with the bishopric of Gæta, and then with the archbishopric of Pisa, and in 1515 with a cardinal's hat. In 1522 he was papal legate to Hungary, and died A.D. 1534, aged 65. Cajetan was fond of study and wrote much on the Aristotelian philosophy, scholastic theology, and in the latter years of his life extensive commentaries on the Scriptures.—Mur.

³ Cajetan's proceedings with Luther were unsatisfactory even to the court of Rome. See Paul Sarpi's Historia Concilii Trident. lib. I. p. 22. Yet Echard apologizes for Cajetan in his Scriptores Ordin. Prædicator. tom. II. p. 15, but I think not very wisely or solidly. The court of Rome however erred in this matter as much as Cajetan. For it might have been easily foreseen that a Dominican would not have treated Luther with moderation. [Cajetan was one of the most learned men of his church; but he was a scholastic divine, and undertook to confute Luther by the canon law and the authority of Lombard. The electoral court of Saxony proceeded very circumspectly in this affair. Luther was not only furnished with a safe conduct, but was attended by two counsellors who supported him with their legal assistance. The cardinal required Luther to revoke in particular two errors in his theses, namely, that there was not any treasury of the merits of saints at Rome, from which the pope could dispense portions to those who obtained indulgences from him; and that without faith no forgiveness of sin could be obtained from God. Luther would admit of none but

¹ Luther attended the general convention of the Augustinians at Heidelberg in the year 1518; and in a discussion there he defended his Paradoxes (so he entitled his propositions) with such energy and applause that the seeds of evangelical truth took deep root in that part of the country. See Bucer's Relatio de Disputatione Heidelbergensi, in Gerdes, Append. ad tom. I. Hist. Reformationis, No. 18, p. 175, &c. After his return from Heidelberg he wrote to the pope in very submissive terms. See his works, ed. Halle, vol. xv. p. 496. He also wrote to Jerome Souletus, bishop of Brandenburg, to whose diocese Wittenberg belonged, and likewise to Staupitz, using in both instances very modest language.—Schl.

And as Luther could not bring himself to do this, the result of the discussion was that Luther previously to his departure from Augsburg, in perfect consistency with the dignity of the pontiff, appealed from the pontiff ill-informed to the same when better informed.¹ Soon after on the 9th of November, Leo X. published a special edict requiring all his subjects to believe that he had power to forgive sins. On learning this, Luther perceiving that he had nothing to expect from Rome appealed at Wittenberg November 28, from the pontiff to a future council of the whole church.

8. The Romish court seemed now to be sensible of its error in appointing Cajetan. It therefore about the same time appointed another legate, who was not a party in the case and who possessed more knowledge of human nature, to attempt to reconcile Luther to the pontiff. This was Charles von Miltitz, a Saxon knight who belonged to the court of Leo X. a discreet and sagacious man. The pontiff sent him into Saxony to present to the electoral prince Frederick the consecrated golden rose, which the pontiffs sometimes gave to distinguished men whom they were disposed to honour; and also to negotiate with Luther for terminating his contest with Tetzel or rather with the pontiff himself. And he managed the business not without some success. For immediately in his first interview with Luther at Altenburg in the month of January, 1519, he prevailed on him to write a very submissive letter to Leo X. dated March 3d, in which he promised to be silent provided his enemies would also be silent. Miltitz had other discussions with Luther in October of this year in the castle of Liebenwerda; and in the following year 1520, October 12th, at Lichtenberg.² Nor was the prospect utterly hopeless that these threatening commotions might be stilled.³

Scripture proofs; and as the cardinal, who was no biblical scholar, could not produce such proofs, Luther held fast his opinions; and when the cardinal began to be restless and to threaten ecclesiastical censures, Luther appealed "a Pontifice male informato ad melius informatum,"—a legal stop which was nowise harsh, and one which is resorted to at the present day by persons who do not question the infallibility of the pope. By this appeal he recognised the jurisdiction of the pope, and at the same time secured this advantage, that the cardinal as a delegated judge had no longer jurisdiction of the case.—Schli.

¹ See Borner's Diss. de Colloquio Lutheri cum Cajetano, Lips. 1722, 4to.; also among his Dissertations collected in one volume; Löschner's Acta et Documenta Reformat. tom. iii. cap. xi. p. 435, &c.; and Wach's Nachricht von Luther, in the Halle edition of Luther's works, vol. xxiv. p. 409, &c.

² The documents relating to the embassy of Miltitz were first published by Cyprian, in his Additiones ad Tausenii Historiam Reform. tom. i. et ii. They are also contained in Löschner's Acta Reformat. tom. ii. cap. xvi. and tom. iii. cap. ii. &c.

³ Leo X. himself wrote a very kind letter to Luther

But the insolence of Luther's foes and the haughty indiscretion of the court of Rome, soon afterwards dissipated all these prospects of peace.

9. The incident which caused the failure of Miltitz's embassy was a conference or disputation at Leipsic in the year 1519, from the 27th of June to the 15th of July. John Eck, the celebrated papal theologian, disagreed with Andrew Carlstadt a friend and colleague of Luther, in regard to free will. He therefore challenged Carlstadt, according to the custom of the age, to a personal dispute to be held at Leipsic; and also invited Luther against whom he had before wielded the pen of controversy. For the martial spirit of our ancestors had made its way into the schools and among the learned; and heated dissentients on points of religion or literature were accustomed to challenge one another to such single combats like knights and warriors. These literary combats were usually held in some distinguished university, and the rector of the university with the masters were the arbiters of the contest and adjudged the victory. Carlstadt consented to the proposed contest, and on the day appointed he appeared on the arena attended by Luther. After Carlstadt had disputed warmly for many days with Eck before a large and splendid assembly in the castle of Pleissenburg, on the powers of free will, Luther engaged with the same antagonist in a contest respecting the supremacy and authority of the Roman pontiff.⁴ But the dis-

In the year 1519, which memorable document was published by Löschner in his Unschuldige Nachrichten, 1742, p. 133. It appears clearly from this epistle, that no doubt of a final reconciliation was entertained at Rome.

⁴ Eck or Eckhus was a great talker, and one of the most ready disputants of his times. In one of his theses proposed for discussion, he had asserted that the pope was by divine right universal bishop of the whole church, and that he was in possession of his spiritual power before the times of Constantine the Great. In this disputation Luther maintained the contrary from passages of Scripture, from the testimony of the fathers and from church history, and even from the decrees of the council of Nice. And when from the subject of the pope they came to that of indulgences, Luther denied their absolute necessity; and so of purgatory, he acknowledged indeed that he believed in it, but said he could find no authority for it in the Scriptures or in the fathers. In fact, it was in the year 1530 that Luther first pronounced purgatory to be a fable. The dispute with Carlstadt related to freedom in the theological sense or to the natural power of man to do the will of God. Carlstadt maintained that since the fall the natural freedom of man is not strong enough to move him to that which is morally good. Eck on the contrary asserted that the free will of man, and not merely the grace of God, produces good works; or that our natural freedom co-operates with divine grace in the production of good works, and that it depends on man's free power whether he will give place to the operations of grace or will resist them. It thus appears that Carlstadt defended the doctrine of Augustine in regard to divine grace. Eck claimed the victory and gave a very unjust account of this dispute, which occasioned many controversial pamphlets to be published. The

putants accomplished nothing, nor would Hoffmann the rector of the university of Leipsic take upon him to say which party was victorious; but the decision of the cause was referred to the universities of Paris and Erfurth.¹ Eck however carried away from this contest feelings entirely hostile to Luther, and to the great detriment of the pontiff and the Romish church, was resolved on ruining him.

10. Among the witnesses and spectators of this dispute was Philip Melancthon, professor of Greek at Wittenberg, who had hitherto taken no part in the controversies, and from the mildness of his temper and his love of elegant literature was averse from such disputes; yet he was friendly to Luther and to his efforts for rescuing the science of theology from the subtleties of the Scholastics.² As he was doubtless one of those who went home from this discussion more convinced of the justice of Luther's cause, and as he afterwards became, as it were, the second reformer next to Luther, it is proper here to give some brief account of his talents and virtues. All know and even his enemies confess that few men of any age can be compared with him, either for learning and knowledge of both human and divine things, or for richness, suavity, and facility of genius, or for industry as a scholar. He performed for philosophy and the other liberal arts what Luther performed for theology; that is, he freed them from the corruptions which they had contracted, restored them, and gave them currency in Germany. He possessed an extraordinary ability to comprehend and to express in clear and simple language, the most abstruse and difficult subjects and such as were exceedingly complicated. This power he so happily exerted on subjects pertaining to religion, that it may be truly said no literary man by his genius and erudition has done more for their benefit. From his native love of peace, he was induced most ardently to wish that religion might be reformed without any public schism, and that the visible brotherhood among Christians might remain entire. And hence it was that he frequently seemed to be too yielding. Yet he by no means spared great and essential errors; and he inculcated with great constancy that unless these were clearly exposed and plucked up by the roots, the Christian cause would never flourish. In the natural temperament of his mind there was a native softness, tenderness, and timidity. And hence when he had occasion to write or to do anything, he pondered most carefully every circumstance, and often indulged fears where there were no real grounds for them. But, on the contrary, when the greatest dangers seemed to impend and the cause of religion was in jeopardy, this timorous man feared nothing and opposed an undaunted mind to his adversaries. And this shows that the power of the truth which he had learned had diminished the imperfections of his natural temperament without entirely eradicating them. Had he possessed a little more firmness and fortitude, been less studious to please everybody, and been able wholly to cast off the superstition which he imbibed in early life, he would justly deserve to be accounted one of the greatest of men.³

¹ There is a Life of Melancthon written by Joach. Camerarius, which has been often printed. But the cause of literature would be benefited by a more accurate history of this great man, composed by some impartial and discreet writer; and also by a more perfect edition of his whole works than we now possess. [This great man [whose German name was Schwartzzer], in Greek Melancthon.—Mur.] was born at Bretten in the lower Palatinate, A.D. 1497, studied at Heidelberg, and was a lecturer at Tübingen, when he was invited A.D. 1518, by Reuchlin and Luther, to become professor of Greek at Wittenberg. He taught, wrote, and disputed, in furtherance of the same objects with Luther, but with more mildness and gentleness than he. He composed so early as 1521 the first system of theology which appeared in our schools, under the title of Loci Communes Rerum Theologicarum [which passed through sixty editions in his lifetime.—Mur.] and greatly helped forward the Reformation. He also composed the Augsburg Confession and the Apology for it. During the Reformation he rendered service to many cities of Germany. He was also invited to France and England, but declined going. In the latter years of his life, from his love of peace he manifested more indulgence towards the Reformed than was agreeable to the major part of the divines of our church; and his followers were therefore called Philippists, to distinguish them from the more rigid Lutherans. In the year 1530 he did not entertain such views. There is a letter of his to John Lachmann, a preacher at Heilbronn, in which he warns him to beware of the leaven of Zwingli, and says:—Ego non sine maximis tentationibus didici, quantum sit vitil in dogmate Cingli. Scis mihi veteram cum Cœcolampadio amicitiam esse. Sed optarim eum non incidisse in hanc conjurationem. Non enim vocari alter libet, quia pretextu ejus dogmatia vides quos tumultus excitent Helvetii. See Büttlinghausen's Beiträge zur Pflanzlichen Geschichte, vol. ii. p. 188, &c. But the death of Luther, correspondence with Calvin, his own timid and mild character, and perhaps also political considerations, rendered him more indulgent. Among the superstitious notions imbibed in his chief advantage he gained was, that he drew from Luther assertions which might hasten his condemnation at Rome's assertions, which a man of more worldly cunning than Luther would have kept concealed a long time. But still Eck lost much of his popularity by this discussion, and on the other hand the truth gained more adherents and Luther's zeal became more animated.—Schl.

¹ A very full account of this dispute at Leipsic is in Löschner's Acta et Documenta Reformat. tom. iii. cap. vii. p. 203. [The English reader will find the best summary of this disputation in Merle D'Aubigné's Hist. of the Reformation, book v. vol. ii. p. 1, &c. and more succinctly in Ranke's Hist. of the Reformation, vol. i. p. 441, &c.—R.]

² See his letter on this conference in Löschner's Acta et Documenta Reformat. tom. iii. cap. viii. p. 215 [and in Gerdes, Historia Reform. tom. i. Append. p. 203—209. It exhibits a lucid and candid statement of the whole proceeding.—Mur.]

11. While the empire of the pontiffs was thus tottering in Germany, another mortal wound was inflicted on it in the neighbouring Switzerland, by the discerning and erudite Ulrich Zwingli, a canon and priest of Zurich. The fact must not be disguised that he had discovered some portion of the truth, before Luther openly contended with the pontiff. But afterwards being excited and instructed by the example and the writings of Luther, he not only expounded the Holy Scriptures in public discourses, but in the year 1519 successfully opposed Bernardin Samson of Milan, who was impudently driving among the Swiss the same shameful traffic which had awakened Luther's ire.¹

youth and of which he could not wholly divest himself, was his credulity in regard to premonitions and dreams, and his inclination towards astrology, with which he even infected some of his pupils. (The most learned men of that age, Melancthon, Chemnitz, Neander, were believers in this art; indeed, such as were not, could scarcely pass for learned men. Henke's Kirchengesch. vol. iii. p. 580.) He died in 1560. His works were published, collectively, a.d. 1562 and onward in 4 vols. fol. See also Strobel's Melancthoniana, Altdorf, 1771, 8vo.—Schl. [German literature is singularly deficient in works on this most distinguished ornament of their Vaterland. All parties appear to have contented themselves with successive editions of the meagre life of Melancthon or Melancthon, as he in later life preferred to write his Greek name, compiled by Camerarius and first published in 1566. Of late however some steps have been taken to supply this deficiency, which may probably lead to a biography worthy of the subject. There has been recently published, Matthes, P. Melancthon, sein Leben u. Werke, aus den Quellen dargestellt, Altenb. 1841. But by far the most important preparation for such a work is the edition of his writings now in course of publication at Halle, edited by Bretschneider of Gotha, under the rather ambitious title, not likely to be realised, of Corpus Reformatorum; for though 14 volumes do have appeared since 1834, or one every year, only a portion of the works of only one of the Reformers, to wit, Melancthon, has yet been overtaken. Of these volumes, nine and part of the tenth contain his voluminous correspondence, arranged chronologically like Luther's, illustrated with notes, and containing many letters from unpublished sources, thus forming an invaluable collection for the future biographer of this eminent scholar, reformer, and divine. The only attempt in our language is Cox's Life of P. Melancthon, Lond. 1815, 8vo, but it is meagre and superficial.—R.

¹ See Hottinger's Helvetische Reformationsgeschichte, p. 28, &c. or his Helvetische Kirchengeschichte, tom. i. lib. vi. p. 28, &c. For the former (which is often published separately) differs very little from the latter, though it is often sold as being the first part of the latter work. [Also his Hist. Eccl. N. Test. Sæcul. xv. par. ii. p. 198, &c.—Mur.] Ruchat's Histoire de la Réformation de la Suisse, tome i. livr. i. p. 4, &c. p. 66, &c.; Gerdes, Hist. Reformationis, tom. ii. p. 284, &c. [or rather tom. i. p. 99, &c.—Mur.] Fueslin's Beiträge zu der Schweizer-Reformations Geschichte, in 5 parts or volumes. [Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reformation, vol. i. p. 103, &c. and Henke's Allgem. Geschichte der Christl. Kirche, vol. iii. p. 74, ed. Brunswick, 1806.—Luther and his followers had long and severe contests with Zwingli and the Reformed, respecting the corporeal presence of Christ in the eucharist; and this caused much alienation and prejudice between the two bodies during the whole of the sixteenth century, nor has entire harmony been restored between them to this day. Hence for more than two centuries, the Lutherans and the Reformed contended whether Luther or Zwingli was entitled to the honour of leading the way to the Reformation. Mosheim manifestly gives the precedence to Luther. Hottinger, Gerdes, and others, give it to Zwingli. Schroeckh, Henke, Schlegel, Von Elm, and others of the Lutheran church, now divide the praise between them. The facts appear to be these. Zwingli discovered the corruptions of the church of Rome at an earlier period than Luther. Both opened their eyes gradually, and altogether without any concert, and without aid from each other. But Zwingli was always in advance of Luther in his views and opinions, and he finally carried the reformation somewhat farther than Luther did. But he proceeded with more gentleness and caution not to run before the prejudices of the people; and the circumstances in which he was placed did not call him so early to open combat with the powers of the hierarchy; Luther therefore has the honour of being the first to declare open war with the pope, and to be exposed to direct persecution. He also acted in a much wider sphere. All Germany and even all Europe was the theatre of his operations. Zwingli moved only in the narrow circle of a single canton of Switzerland. He also died young, and when but just commencing his career of public usefulness. And these circumstances have raised Luther's fame so high, that Zwingli has almost been overlooked. Luther doubtless did most for the cause of the Reformation, because he had a wider field of action, was more bold and daring, and lived longer to carry on the work. But Zwingli was a more learned and a more judicious man, commenced the Reformation earlier, and in his little circle carried it farther.—Ulrich Zwingli was born at Wildhausen, district of Togenburg, and canton of St. Gall, a.d. 1484. At the age of ten he was sent to Basel for education, and afterwards to Berne. Here the Humanists endeavoured to allure him into their order, to prevent which his father sent him to Vienna. Returning to Basel at the age of eighteen he became a schoolmaster, and prosecuted theology at the same time under Thomas Wittenbach, who was not blind to the errors of the church of Rome, and who instilled principles of free inquiry into his pupils. He preached his first sermon in 1506, and was the same year chosen pastor of Glarus, where he spent ten years. He had been distinguished in every branch of learning to which he had applied himself, and particularly in classical and elegant literature. He now devoted himself especially to Greek and Hebrew, and had no respect for human authorities in theology, but relied wholly on the Scriptures, which he read and explained to his people from the pulpit with great assiduity. His fame as a preacher and divine rose high. In 1516, he was removed to the abbey of Einsiedeln, as a field of greater usefulness. He had before cautiously exposed some of the errors of the Romish church, and he now more openly assailed the doctrines of monastic vows, pilgrimages, relics, offerings, and indulgences. The next year he was chosen to a vacancy in the cathedral of Zurich; and before he accepted the office, stipulated that he should not be confined in his preaching to the lessons publicly read, but be allowed to explain every part of the Bible. He continued to read the best Latin and Greek classics, studied diligently the more eminent fathers, as Augustine, Ambrose, and Chrysostom, and prosecuted the study of Hebrew and the kindred dialects. He now publicly expounded the Scriptures, as the Gospels, the Epistles of Paul and Peter, &c. and inculcated that the Bible is the only standard of religious truth. While he was thus leading the people gradually to better views of religion, in the year 1518 Samson came into Switzerland to sell indulgences; and the year following, on his arrival at Zurich, Zwingli openly opposed him and procured his exclusion from the canton. The progress of the people in knowledge was rapid, and the Reformation went forward with great success. Luther's books were circulated extensively and by Zwingli's recommendation, though he chose not to read them himself, lest he should incur the charge of being a Lutheran. He was however assailed by the friends of the hierarchy, and at length accused of heresy before the council of Zurich, Jan. 1523. He now presented sixty-seven doctrinal propositions before the council, containing all the fundamental doctrines since held by the Reformed church, and offered to defend them by Scripture against all opposers. His enemies wished to bring tradition and the schoolmen to confute him. But the council declared that the decision must rest on the Scriptures. Zwingli of course triumphed, and the council decreed that he should be allowed to preach as heretofore, unmolested; and that no preacher

This was the first step towards purging Switzerland of superstition. Zwingli now vigorously prosecuted the work he had begun; and having obtained several learned men educated in Germany for his associates and fellow-labourers in the arduous work, he with their assistance brought the greatest part of his fellow-citizens to renounce their subjection to pontifical domination. Yet Zwingli proceeded in a different way from Luther; for he did not uniformly oppose the employment of force against the pertinacious defenders of the old superstitions, and he is said to have conceded to magistrates more authority in religious matters than is consistent with the nature of religion.¹ But in general he was an upright man, and his intentions are worthy of the highest praise.

12. We now return to Luther. While Miltitz was negotiating with him for a peace,

In the canton should inculcate any doctrine but what he could prove from the Scriptures. The next year, 1524, the council of Zurich reformed the public worship according to the advice of Zwingli. Thus the reformation of that canton was now completed. Zwingli continued to guide his flock, and to lend aid to the other portions of the church, till the month of Oct. 1531; when a Catholic force from the popish cantons marched against Zurich, and Zwingli, according to the usage of his country, bore the standard amid the citizens who attempted to repel them. The enemy were victorious, and Zwingli was slain near the commencement of the battle, and his body cut to pieces and burned to ashes. See the writers before referred to, particularly Hottinger, Gerdes, and Schroeckh; also the article Zwingli, in Rees' Cyclopaedia.—His works were printed, Zurich, 1544–45, 4 vols. fol.—Mur. [In addition to the works mentioned in the beginning of this note on the Swiss reformation, the following may be added: The continuation of Ruehat, Hist. de la Reform. mentioned in note 3, page 562; Wirz, Neuere Helvetische Kirchenges. continued by Kirchhofer, Zur. 1813–19, 2 vols.; Hess, Ursprung, Gang, u. Folgen der in Zurich Glaubensverbesserung, &c. Zur. 1819, 4to. There are several lives of Zwingli. One by Hess in French, translated into English by Lucy Aikin, Lond. 1812. A much better one by Schuler, entitled, Huldreich Zwingli, Geschichte seiner Bildung zum Reformator des Vaterlandes, Leip. 1818. The same writer, a Swiss pastor, in connexion with Professor J. Schulthess of Zurich, have been for some years engaged in publishing a new edition of Zwingli's works, the first volume of which appeared at Zurich in 1825 and the eighth or last volume in 1843. The seventh volume contains the Latin letters of Zwingli, with those addressed to him by his correspondents, arranged chronologically; but they are not edited with the same care as those of Luther or Melancthon. M. Kirchhofer, mentioned above as the continuator of Wirz's history, has published lives of the following Swiss reformers; Bertold Haller, oder die Reformation von Bern, Zur. 1828; Das Leben W. Farelis aus den Quellen bearbeitet, Zur 1831–33, 2 vols. translated and abridged by the London Tract Society, in one volume, 12mo. Lond. 1836. To these biographies of German Swiss Reformers may be added the following, which supplies a long felt want in that department; Herzog, Das Leben Johannes Oekolampadi und die Reformation der Kirche zu Basel, Basil, 1843, 2 vols. We still want a complete edition of the collected works of this eminent reformer, who was not inferior to any of his contemporaries though much less known. The Reformers in French Switzerland will be noticed afterwards.—R.

¹ This charge against Zwingli in both parts of it appears to be wholly groundless. See Gerdes, Hist. Reform. tom. i. p. 287, Supplementa.—Mur.

and with some prospect of success, John Eck burning with rage after the debate at Leipsic, hurried away to Rome in order to hasten his destruction. Taking as associates the most powerful Dominicans in the pontifical court, and particularly their two first men, Cajetan and Prierias, he pressed Leo to excommunicate Luther forthwith. For the Dominicans most eagerly thirsted to avenge the very great injury which they conceived Luther had done to their whole order, first in the person of their brother Tetzel and then in that of Cajetan. Overcome by their importunate applications and by those of their friends and abettors, Leo X. most imprudently issued the first bull against Luther on the 15th of June, 1520, in which forty-one of his tenets were condemned, his writings adjudged to the flames, and he was commanded to confess his faults within sixty days and implore the clemency of the pontiff, or be cast out of the church.²

13. As soon as Luther heard of this first sentence of the pontiff, he consulted for his own safety by renewing his appeal from the pontiff to the supreme tribunal of a future council. And foreseeing that this appeal would be treated with contempt at Rome, and that as soon as the time prescribed by the pontiff was elapsed he would be excommunicated by another bull, he soon formed the resolution to withdraw from the Romish church before he should be excommunicated by the new rescript of the pontiff. In order to proclaim this secession from the Romish community by a public act, on the 10th of December, 1520, he caused a fire to be kindled without the walls of the city, and in presence of a vast multitude of spectators, committed to the flames the bull issued against him together with a copy of the pontifical canon law. By this act he pub-

² The friends of the pontiff's confess that Leo erred greatly in this matter. See Mayer's Diss. de Pontificis Leonis X. processum acaeris Lutherum Improbitibus, which is a part of the work he published at Hamburg, 1698, 4to, with the following title: Ecclesia Romana Reformationis Lutherana Patrona et Client. And there were at that time many wise and circumspect persons at Rome who did not hesitate publicly to avow their disapprobation of the violent counsels of Eckius and the Dominicans, and who wished to wait for the issue of Miltitz's embassy. [See Riederer's Nachrichten zur Kirchen-Gelehrten- und Buchergeschichte, Stück ii. n. 18, p. 178, where there is an anonymous letter from Rome to Pirkeheimer, saying: Scias neminem Romae esse, si saltem sapiat, qui non certo certius sciat et cognoscat, Martinum in pluribus veritatem dicere, verum boni ob tyrannidis metum dissimulat, mali vero, quia veritatem audire coguntur, insanunt. Inde illorum oritur indignatio pariter et metus; valde enim timeant, ne res latius serpat. Hæc causa fuit, cur bulla tam atrox emanaverit, multis bonis et prudentibus viris reclamantibus, qui suadebant maturius consulendum, et Martino potius modestia et rationibus quam detestationibus occurrendum esse, hoc enim decere mausuetudinem, illud vero tyrannidem sapere, et rem mali exempli videri.—Schl.

licely signified that he would be no longer a subject of the Roman pontiff, and consequently that the second decree which was daily expected from Rome, would be nugatory. For whoever publicly burns the statute-book of his prince, protests by so doing that he will no longer respect and obey his authority; and one who has excluded himself from any society cannot afterwards be cast out of it. I must suppose that Luther acted in this matter with the advice of the jurists. Luther withdrew however only from the Romish church which looks upon the pontiff as infallible, and not from the church universal, the sentence of which pronounced in a legitimate and free council he did not refuse to obey. And this circumstance will show why wise men among the papists who were attached to the liberties of Germany, looked upon this bold act of Luther without offence.¹ Before one month after this heroic deed of Luther had elapsed, on the 4th day of January, 1521, the second bull of Leo against Luther was issued, in which he was expelled from the bosom of the Romish church for having contemned the authority of the pontiff.²

14. When these severe bulls had been issued against the person and doctrines of Luther and his friends, nothing remained for him but to attempt to found a new church opposed to that of Rome, and to establish a system of doctrine consonant to the holy Scriptures. For, to subject himself to the dominion of his most cruel enemy, would have been madness; and to return again contrary to the convictions of his own mind, to the errors he had opposed and rejected, would have been base and dishonest. From this time therefore he searched for the truth with redoubled ardour, and not only revised and confirmed more carefully the doctrines which he had already advanced, but likewise boldly attacked the very citadel of the pontifical authority and shook it to its foundation. In his heroic enterprise he had the aid of other excellent men in various parts of Europe, as well as of the doctors at Wittenberg who joined his party, and especially of Philip Melancthon. And as the fame of Luther's wisdom and heroism and the great learning of Melancthon, drew a vast number of young men to Wittenberg, the principles of the Reformation were spread with amazing rapidity through various nations.³

15. In the mean time [January 12th, 1519] the emperor Maximilian I. died, and his grandson Charles V. king of Spain was elected his successor on the 28th of July, A.D. 1519. Leo X. accordingly reminded the new emperor of the office he had assumed of advocate and defender of the church, and called upon him to inflict due punishment upon that rebellious member of the church Martin Luther. On the other hand, Frederick the Wise of Saxony counselled him not to proceed rashly and improperly against Luther, but to conduct the whole business according to the rights of the Germanic churches and the laws of the empire. Charles was under greater obligations to Frederick than to any other of the German princes. For it was principally by his efforts and zeal that Charles had obtained the imperial dignity, in preference to his very potent rival Francis I. king of France.⁴ In order therefore to gratify both this friend (to whom he owed everything) and likewise the pontiff, he determined to give Luther a hearing before the diet to be assembled at Worms, prior to the passing of any decree against him. It may seem strange and contrary to ecclesiastical law, for an ecclesiastical cause to be discussed and subjected to examination before a diet. But it must be recollected that as the archbishops, bishops, and some of the abbots had seats among the princes, those Germanic diets were at the same time provincial councils of the German nation, to which, according

¹ Some modern jurists, as Schlegel tells us, have condemned this act of Luther as being a treasonable act against the established laws of the land. But it was not so in that age. For the canon law contained enactments only of the popes and councils, with which the civil powers were supposed to have no concern. It was the statute-book of a foreign and spiritual sovereign, who claimed jurisdiction equally over the temporal sovereigns of Germany and over their subjects. To burn this book therefore was treason against that foreign sovereign the pope; but not so against the temporal sovereigns of Germany. Luther's motives for this act he himself stated in a tract on the subject. Among them were these—first, that his enemies had burned his books and he must burn theirs in order to deter the people from reverencing them and being led astray by them; and secondly, that he had found thirty abominable assertions in the canon law, which rendered the book worthy of the flames.—Mur.

² Both these bulls are in the Bullarium [ed. Cherub. Luxemb. 1742, tom. i. p. 610, &c. p. 614, &c.—Mur.] and also in Pfaff's Hist. Theol. Liter. tom. ii. p. 42, &c. [The excommunicating bull was an attack upon the rights of the German churches. For Luther had appealed to an ecclesiastical council, and in consequence of this appeal the pope could no longer have jurisdiction of the case. Hence the number of Luther's friends increased the more after the publication of this bull.—Schl.

³ On the rapid progress of the Reformation in Germany Gerdes treats particularly in his Hist. Reform. tom. ii.; also Grosch, in his Vertheidigung der Evangelischen Kirche gegen Arnold, p. 156, &c.

⁴ During the six months of the Interregnum, Frederick had been at the head of the Germanic empire, had refused the imperial crown offered to himself, and had greatly exerted himself to secure the election of Charles.—Mur. [On all these politico-religious incidents, the most satisfactory information is in Ranke's Hist. of the Reformation.—R.

to ancient canon law, the trial of such causes as that of Luther properly belonged.

16. Luther therefore appeared at Worms, protected by a safe conduct from the emperor, and on the 17th and 18th of April boldly pleaded his cause before the diet. Being called upon and admonished to renounce the opinions he had hitherto defended, and to become reconciled to the pope, he replied with great constancy that he would never do so, unless first convinced of error by proofs from the Holy Scriptures or from sound reason. And as neither promises nor menaces could move him from his purpose, he obtained indeed from the emperor the liberty of returning home unmolested, but after his departure on the 27th of May, by the joint voices of the emperor and the princes, he and his adherents were proscribed and declared to be enemies of the Roman-Germanic empire. His prince Frederic foreseeing this storm, caused him to be intercepted on his return near Eisenach by persons in disguise, and to be conducted to the castle of Wartburg (perhaps with the privity of the emperor); and in that castle, which he called his Patmos, he lay concealed ten months, beguiling the time very profitably with writing and study.¹

¹ See the writers mentioned by Fabricius, Criticismum Lutheranismum, par. i. cap. xliii. p. 79—84, and par. ii. p. 563, &c. [This journey to Worms was a very perilous undertaking for Luther. His friends advised him not to go; and even the electoral prince, his sovereign, did not allow him to go till he had obtained for him a safe conduct from the emperor. This safe conduct however would have afforded him no protection against the operations of the papal bulls and the snares of his enemies. If the high-minded emperor had been willing to listen to those who whispered in his ear the humane and unchristian maxim, that a man is not to keep his promise to a heretic. But the emperor had nobler views; and Luther himself was so unshaken, that he would let nothing deter him from the journey; so that when he arrived in the territory of Worms and some persons in the name of his friend Spalatini warned him of his danger, he replied that he would go thither. If there were as many devils there as tiles on the roofs of their houses. [See the exact expression in Ranke's Hist. of the Reform. v. i. p. 533.—R.] He therefore proceeded fearlessly to Worms, and when there showed indomitable fortitude. He was conducted in his monkish dress from his lodgings to the assembled diet, by the marshal of the empire, Von Happenheim; and two questions were now put to him by the official of the archbishop of Treves, namely, whether he acknowledged those books which were laid upon a bench before him, to be his productions; and whether he would recall the opinions contained in them. To the first question, Luther was on the point of answering at once affirmatively; but Dr. Jerome Schurf, a jurist of Wittenberg who had been assigned to him as his counsellor, reminded him that he should first ascertain whether there were not some books among them that were not his. So he heard the titles read over; and then answered to the first question, Yes. But to the second question, at the suggestion of his counsellor, he requested to be allowed till the next day to consider of his answer. The following day he appeared, and the question being repeated he answered by making distinctions. Some of his writings, he said, treated of a Christian's faith and life, others were directed against the papacy, and others against private individuals who

17 From this his Patmos Luther returned to Wittenberg in the month of March, 1522, without the knowledge or consent of the elector Frederic; being influenced by the commotions which, he was informed, Carlstadt and others were exciting, hurtful to religion and the commonwealth. For in Luther's absence Andrew Carlstadt a doctor of Wittenberg, a man of learning and not ignorant of the truth, whom the pontiff at the instigation of Eck had excommunicated in conjunction with Luther, but a man of precipitancy and prone to an excess of ardour, had begun to destroy images and had put himself at the head of a fanatical sect who in several places greatly abused, defended the Romish tyranny and assailed his holy doctrines. As for the first, he could not renounce them, because even his enemies admitted that they contained much good matter; nor could he renounce the second, because that would be lending support to the papal tyranny; in those of the third class, he freely acknowledged that he had often been too vehement; yet he could not at once renounce them, unless it were first shown that he had gone too far. As the official now demanded of him a categorical answer, whether he would renounce, or not; he replied, that he could not, unless he was first convicted of error either by Scripture or by reason. And the official alleging that he must have erred, because he had contradicted the pope and the councils; he answered: The pope and ecclesiastical councils have often erred and have contradicted themselves. He at last closed with this declaration—Here I stand; I can say no more; God help me. Amen. After this, Luther appeared no more before the diet; but the emperor caused him to be informed that as he would not be reconciled to the church, the emperor would do as law required; he must however repair to his usual residence within twenty-one days. On the eighth of May, the bill of outlawry was drawn up against him; and it was published a few days after his departure. [Pallavicini says, Hist. concil. Trident. lib. i. c. xxviii. sec. vii. that the bill was drawn up May 25th, and signed May 26th, but dated back to May 8th. The reason it was said was, that the bill was passed at the close of the diet and when many of the members had retired, and it was wished to disguise that fact.—Mur.] By virtue of this bill, after the twenty-one days of the safe conduct expired, no man might harbour or conceal Luther on pain of treason; but whosoever might find him in any place, was to apprehend him and deliver him up to the emperor; and all his adherents were to be seized in the public streets, imprisoned, and stripped of all their goods. This arbitrary decree of the emperor contravened all the laws of humanity, as well as the rights of the German churches. For it required a man to renounce what he was not convinced was wrong; and on the assumption of the infallibility of the pope, condemned him against an intervening appeal to a council. This bill of outlawry however produced very little effect; and indeed the emperor does not seem to have been much in earnest in respect to it. For although the perplexed state of his affairs, the political movements of Europe, and the internal quietude of his private territories, might call his attention to very different subjects from the execution of the edict of Worms, yet it is difficult to comprehend how Luther could safely return to Wittenberg, and there preach, and write, and teach, if the emperor did earnestly wish to give him trouble. Nay, he might easily have discovered his retreat at the Wartburg. But probably the emperor took no pains to discover him, in order to avoid collision either with the pontiff or the elector of Saxony. At the Wartburg Luther prosecuted the study of the Hebrew and Greek languages, commenced his German translation of the Scriptures, expounded some portions of the Bible, composed his Postills, and some other works.—Schl.

as usual, the dawning of liberty.¹ He therefore first energetically repressed the impetuosity of this man, wisely declaring that errors must first be extirpated from people's minds, before the objects of those errors can be advantageously removed. And to establish this principle by facts and by his own example, inviting certain learned men to aid him, he proceeded gradually to perfect and to finish the German translation of the Bible which he had commenced.²

¹ Andrew Bodenstein, born at Carlstadt in Franconia and hence called in Latin Carolostadius, was a doctor of biblical learning, a canon, and archdeacon of the church of All Saints at Wittenberg, and professor of the university there. He supported Luther in the work of reformation, as appears from the history of the conference at Leipsic, and was highly esteemed by him, and is mentioned with praise in his writings. But in respect to the manner of effecting the reformation, these two men had very different views. Carlstadt would have the abuses of popery abolished at once, but Luther preferred a gradual process. The monks of Luther's fraternity at Wittenberg, the Augustinians, had, during his absence, begun to reform their monastery and to abolish the mass; and they now wished to effect the same reform in the city. But the court were afraid lest it should give offence both to other princes and cities and also to the citizens themselves; and the elector therefore called for the opinion of the professors at Wittenberg. Their opinion was in favour of abolishing the mass; but this did not satisfy the court. Luther, whose opinion was also asked, assumed the rational principle, that the reformation should commence not with the pictures nor with other external things, among which he accounted the mass, but with the understandings of the people; and to his opinion all the professors now subscribed, except only Carlstadt. He gathered around him the common people; and as soon as he thought himself strong enough, he broke out, and with a throng of enthusiastic followers rushed into the cathedral church, destroyed the pictures and the altar, and hindered the clergy from any longer saying mass. Melancthon was too timid to control this uproar. Luther therefore came forward, preached against these violent innovations, and restored tranquillity. From that time onward, there was a coldness between Luther and Carlstadt, which at length broke out into hostilities that were no honour to either of them.—Schl. [Luther has been taxed with opposing Carlstadt from motives of ambition, or from unwillingness that another should take the lead in anything. And this censure is repeated by Maelstine, Bower, &c. But Seckendorf (Historia Lutheranaica, lib. i. sec. cxvi. p. 197, 198), seems to have confuted the charge; which has no support except a single sentence in one of Luther's letters, in which he charges Carlstadt with wishing to be foremost; a charge, which Melancthon advanced in quite as strong terms. For an account of Carlstadt prior to 1522, see Gerdes, Miscellan. Groning. tom. i. p. 1. &c.—Mur. (Gerdes's work is entitled, Sermonum Antiquarium sive Miscellanæ Groningæ, in 4 vols. 4to, and contains a number of important papers. In the 4th vol. p. 221. &c. Gerdes has also collected fifty-one letters of Carlstadt addressed to Spalatin between the years 1516 and 1521, which throw further light on his character.—R.]

² A history of Luther's German translation of the Holy Scriptures, which contributed more than anything else to establish the Lutheran church, was published by Mayer, Hamb. 1701. 4to. A much fuller history was long expected from Kraft, than whom no one laboured upon the subject with greater care, assiduity, and success, during many years. But a premature death frustrated our expectations. Compare Fabricius, Censuræ Lutheranae, par. i. p. 147, &c. and par. ii. p. 617, &c. [What Kraft was prevented by a premature death from accomplishing, has since been performed by Palma, in his Historie der deutschen Bibelübersetzung Luthers; which was published with notes by Götzke, Halle, 1772, 4to; and Giese, Historische

The event confirmed the excellence of his plan, for the parts of this work being successively published and circulated, the roots of inveterate errors were soon extirpated from the minds of vast numbers.

18. In the mean time Leo X. died, A.D. 1522. Hadrian VI. of Utrecht succeeded him by the aid of Charles V. whose tutor he had been. He was an honest man, and so ingenuous as to confess that the Christian church laboured under ruinous maladies, and to promise readily that he would correct them.³ By Francis Chieregato, his legate to the diet of Nuremberg A.D. 1522 and onward, he indeed earnestly intreated that the punishment decreed against Luther and his adherents by the edict of Worms might no longer be delayed; but at the same time he showed himself ready to correct the evils which had armed so great an enemy against the church. The German princes, deeming this a favourable opportunity while the emperor was absent in Spain, demanded a free council, which should be held in Germany and should deliberate in the ancient manner on a general reformation of the church. They also exhibited a list of one hundred grievances of which the Germans complained as proceeding from the Romish court; and they passed a decree forbidding any further innovations in religious matters, till the council should decide what ought to be done.¹ For so long as the princes of Germany were ignorant of the plans under consideration in Saxony for establishing a new church in opposition to that of Rome, they were pretty well united in opposing the pontifical power, which they all felt to be excessive; nor were they much troubled about Luther's controversy with the pontiff, which they regarded merely as a private affair.

Nachricht von dieser Bibelübersetzung, published by Kelderer, Altdorf, 1771, 8vo.—Schl.

³ See Burmann's Hadrianus VI. sine Analecta historica de Hadriano VI. Papa Romano; Utrecht, 1727, 4to. [This is a collection of historical papers relating to the life of this pope. Hadrian was of humble parentage, but of great attainments in scholastic theology; and therefore had long filled the office of a professor at Louvain. He had a natural aversion to pomp, extravagance, and luxury, and a very upright disposition. He therefore did not grasp the fire and sword in order to still the complaints of the Germans, but commenced with the reformation of his own court, curtailed his own table, dismissed all superfluous servants, and required of the cardinals a more retired life, and retrenchment in their expenses. But this was so displeasing to the Romans that they not only lampooned him much during his life-time, but spoke very ill of him after his death. Indeed it has been suspected that they were instrumental to his death. So gratifying to the Romish populace was his decease, that the night after it took place the front door of his principal physician was decorated with a wreath of flowers, surmounted with the inscription.—For the deliverer of his country.—Schl. [This pontiff was deeply sensible of vast corruption in the Romish church, and he was sincerely resolved to reform it as fast as possible. In his instructions to his legate to the diet of Nuremberg A.D. 1522, he authorized him to say: *Scimus in hac sancta sede aliquot jam annis multa abominanda fuisse, abusum in spiritualibus, excessum in mandatis, et omnia denique in perversum mutata. Nec mirum si egritudo in capite in membra a summis pontificibus in alios inferiores prælatos descendit. Omnes nos (the prælates) et ecclesiasticæ declinavimus, unusquisque in vias suas, nec fuit jam diu, qui faceret bonum, non fuit usque ad nunc. See Raynald's Annales Eccles. ad ann. 1522, sec. 70.—Mur. {See Ranke's very favourable estimate of Adrian's character, and his view of the difficulties by which this pope was surrounded, in his History of the Popes of Rome, &c. Austin's transl. v. i. p. 92.—R.]*

19. The honest pontiff Hadrian, after a short reign [of two years and eight months], died [September 24th] in the year 1523; and was succeeded, on the 19th of November, by Clement VII. a man less ingenuous and open hearted.² By another legate Lorenzo Campeggi in the same diet A.D. 1524, Clement censured immoderately the lenity of the princes in tolerating Luther, at the same time craftily suppressing all notice of the promise of a reformation made by Hadrian. The emperor seconded the demands of Campeggi, requiring by his minister that the decree of Worms should be confirmed. Overcome by these remonstrances, the princes changed indeed the language of the decree, but in reality corroborated it. For they engaged to enforce the edict of Worms to the extent of their power, but at the same time renewed their demand for a council, and referred all other questions to the next diet to be held at Spire. After the diet the pontifical legate retired with a number of the princes, most of whom were bishops, to Ratisbon; and from them he obtained a promise, that they would enforce the edict of Worms in their territories.

20. While the religious reformation by Luther was thus daily gathering strength in almost all parts of Europe, two very serious evils arose to retard its progress, the one internal and the other external. Among those whom the Romish bishop had excluded from the privileges of his community, a pernicious controversy respecting the manner in which the body and blood of Christ are present in the sacred supper, produced very great disunion. Luther and his adherents, while they rejected the dogma of the Romish school that the bread and wine are transmuted into the body and blood of Christ, yet maintained that persons coming to the sacred supper participated truly, though in an inexplicable manner, of the body and blood of Christ together with the bread and the wine.³ His colleague Carlstadt held a different opinion.⁴ And after him, Ulrich Zwingli much more fully and ingeniously maintained in his publications that the body and blood of the Lord are not present in the holy supper, but that the bread and the wine are merely symbols or emblems, by which people should be excited to commemorate the death of Christ and the blessings resulting to us from it.⁵

³ Luther denied transubstantiation, that is, a transmutation of the substance of the bread and wine into the flesh and blood of Christ; yet he held consubstantiation, that is, a real and corporeal presence of the body and blood of Christ in, under, or along with, the bread and wine; so that the sacramental substances after consecration, became each of them twofold; namely, the bread became both bread and the flesh of Christ, and the wine became both wine and the blood of Christ. Sometimes however he represented the union of the two substances in each element as constituting but one substance, just as the union of the divine and human natures in Christ, still constituted but one person. The ubiquity of Christ's body was an obvious consequence of his doctrine, and one which he did not hesitate to admit. See Hospinian's Historia Sacramentaria, par. ii. p. 5, &c.—Mur.

⁴ Carlstadt supposed that when Christ said, This is my body, he pointed to his body; so that the affirmation related solely to his real body and not to the sacramental bread. His foes charged him with denying any kind of presence of Christ in the sacrament, even a spiritual or sacramental presence. See Hospinian, ubi supra, p. 50, &c.—Mur.

⁵ See Lœschner's Hist. Motuum inter Lutheranos et Reformatos, par. i. lib. i. cap. ii. p. 55; and on the other side, Scultetus, Annales Evangelici, in Von der Hardt's Hist. Literar. Reformat. p. 74, &c.; Hospinian [Hist. Sacrum, par. ii.], and the others among the Reformed, who give account of the origin and progress of the controversy. [The Romish doctrine of the real or corporeal presence of Christ in the eucharist, which was brought into the church principally by the efforts of Paschasius Radbert in the ninth century, (see above, p. 312, &c.), but which was warmly contested by Berengarius in the eleventh century, (see above, page 360, &c.), and openly denied by Wickliffe in the fifteenth (see above, page 498), was too absurd not to engage the attention of the Reformers. As early as A.D. 1513, Conrad Pelican and Wolfgang Fabricius Capito, in a private interview disclosed to each other their conviction of the absurdity of this doctrine. (See Gerdes, Hist. Reform. tom. i. p. 113.) Luther however while he denied the Romish doctrine of transubstantiation, yet maintained the real presence in the way called consubstantiation. Most of the other Reformers, especially in southern Germany and Switzerland, disbelieved the real or corporeal presence of Christ, and maintained only a spiritual presence. Yet they did not think it expedient to write or preach on the subject, till the public mind should be ripe for such a discussion. Indeed they were not fully settled in their own minds what form to give to the doctrine, or what interpretation to put upon the texts relied on in proof of the real presence. In the month of January, 1524, Zwingli offered to the senate of Zurich 67 doctrinal theses; in No. 18 of which he declared the eucharist to be not a sacrifice (non esse sacrificium), but a commemoration of the sacrifice once offered on the cross, and a seal of the redemption by Christ (sed sacrificii in cruce semel oblatis commemorationem et quasi sigillum redemptionis per Christum). (See Gerdes, ubi supra, Append. p. 223.) These theses were cordially adopted by the senate of Zurich, and they met the general approbation of the Reformed in that vicinity. As early as the year 1521

¹ See Georgius, Gravamina Germanorum adversus sedem Roman. lib. ii. p. 327. [The Gravamina are also inserted in Flacius, Catalogus Testium veritatis, No. 187.—Schl.]

² See Ziegler's Historia Clementis VII. in Schellhorn's Amicitiae Hist. Eccles. tom. ii. p. 210, &c. [Clement VII. was a kind of Leo X. and was previously called Julius de Medici. He was of a very different spirit from Hadrian, was crafty and faithless, and made it his great aim through his whole reign to advance the interests of the pontifical chair. He therefore took all pains to thwart the designs of the Germans in regard to a general council for reforming the abuses of the papal court. See Walch's Hist. der Römischen Päpste, 379, &c.—Schl. [See also Ranke's Hist. of the Popes of Rome, v. i. p. 98.—R.]

As this doctrine was embraced by nearly all the Swiss, and by not a few divines in Upper Germany, and as Luther and his friends on the other hand strenuously contended for his doctrine, a long and painful controversy commenced in the year 1524, which at last, after many fruitless attempts at a compromise, produced a lamentable schism among those who seceded from the papal jurisdiction.

Cornelius Hone, a learned Dutch jurist, in a letter which was privately circulated, explicitly denied the corporeal presence and maintained that the word is, in the declaration of Christ, This is my body, is equivalent to, represents or denotes. (See the Letter, in Gerdes, ubi supra, Append. p. 228—240.) This letter Zwingli first read in 1524, and approving of it perfectly he the next year caused it to be published. In the same year, 1524, Zwingli wrote a letter to a friend in which he fully declares his belief that the bread and wine were merely emblems or representatives of Christ's body and blood; but he charged his friend not to make the letter public, lest it should produce commotion. The letter however was published the next year. At Wittenberg, Carlstadt was the first to reject and impugn the doctrine of the real presence. After his rebuke from Luther (for destroying the altars and images at Wittenberg in 1522), he retired to Orlamund not far from Leipzig, and there becoming a parish minister, he inveighed against images and the mass, and denied the doctrine of the real presence. The people fell in with his views to the great dissatisfaction of the elector and Luther. Therefore in August, 1524, Luther was sent to reclaim the wandering people. At Jena he declaimed against the innovators with great warmth. Carlstadt was present, and feeling himself injured by this public attack, went to Luther's lodgings and complained of his abuse. Harsh words were used on both sides. Carlstadt taxed Luther with erroneous doctrine, particularly in regard to the real presence. Luther challenged him to a public controversy on the subject. Carlstadt accepted the challenge; but being soon banished from Saxony, and retiring first to Strasburg and then to Basil, it was from the last of those places he issued his first publication. (See the account of the dispute at Jena, in Luther's works, vol. ii. fol. 446, &c. ed. Jena, 1580.) Among the tracts here published by Carlstadt, one was entitled: On the words of Christ, This is my body. He supposed Christ to have pointed to his body when he uttered these words, and to have intended to indicate that the sacramental bread was an emblem of his body. Luther now wrote to the Strasburgers against Carlstadt. Capito and Bucer both published tracts on the dispute between Luther and Carlstadt, endeavouring to exhibit the difference in doctrine as not material, and to stop controversy on the subject. But early the next year, 1525, Luther issued his full and keen reply to Carlstadt, entitled, Against the Heavenly Prophets, in two parts. Œcolampadius, Zwingli, and others in South Germany and Switzerland, viewed Carlstadt as substantially correct in doctrine, but not happy in his statements and reasonings. Zwingli compared him to a new recruit who did not know how to put on his armour. And as the subject of the eucharist was now under discussion, and the writings of both Luther and Carlstadt circulating around them, they deemed it proper to engage in the controversy, and endeavour to enlighten and guide their people to right conclusions. Both Œcolampadius and Zwingli, therefore, published their views of the controversy. [In November, 1524, Zwingli first published his opinion on this question in a letter to a parish priest at Reutlingen.—R.] And in March, 1525, Zwingli published his Commentarius de vera et falsa Religione; in which he distinctly but concisely stated his views of the eucharist. And in June following, he enlarged on that point in his Solidium de Eucharistia. Œcolampadius's principal publication was in the form of a letter addressed to his friends in Swabia, and entitled, "A Genuine Exposition of the Words of our Lord, 'This is my body,' according to the most ancient authors." Zwingli and Œcolampadius both maintained the bread and wine to be mere symbols or representatives of Christ's body and blood. But they differed as to the interpretation of the words, "This is my body." Zwingli adopted Hone's opinion, that the word is, is used catachrestically for represents; but Œcolampadius placed the trope on the word body, supposing it to be used metonymically for memorial or emblem of my body. Bugenhagen of Wittenberg, now wrote against Zwingli and Œcolampadius, and Zwingli replied to him. In the year 1526, Brentius and fourteen other ministers of Swabia replied to Œcolampadius, in a work entitled, Syngrmma Suevicum; which was soon translated into German, and published with a harsh preface by Luther. Œcolampadius and Zwingli both replied to Luther's preface. Luther now published his sermon against the Enthusiasts, to which Zwingli wrote two letters in reply. Martin Bucer also wrote to Brentius and the other Swabians, censuring their indiscreet zeal. On the other side, Bugenhagen of Wittenberg published a letter against Zwingli and the Reformed; to which Zwingli and also Michael Collarius of Augsburg replied. Conrad Pellican and Leo Juda appeared on the side of the Reformed; and Erasmus, Bilanus, and Oslander, on that of the Lutherans. In the year 1527, Zwingli addressed a work to Luther entitled, Amica Ezegetis, id est, Expeditio Eucharistice Negotii. And about the same time Luther published his very severe German work, entitled, "That the Words of Christ, 'This is my body,' still stand fast, against the enthusiastic splits." Œcolampadius replied, and also Zwingli; the latter, in a German work entitled, "That the words of Christ, &c. will ever have their ancient and only meaning, and that M. Luther, in his last work, has not substantiated his and the pope's sense." In this year, Bugenhagen, Pirkheimer, Clichtovius, and bishop Fisher of England, came out against the Reformed; but Regius and Billicanus espoused their cause. In 1528, Luther published his most methodical work on this subject, entitled a Confession of Faith respecting the Lord's Supper; to which both Œcolampadius and Zwingli replied; the latter in a long and elaborate work, addressed to John elector of Saxony and Philip landgrave of Hesse. Bucer also replied to it. And Œcolampadius wrote to Melancthon, requesting him to use efforts for moderating the hostility of the Lutherans towards the Reformed, who only claimed toleration and brotherly affection. In 1529, several letters passed between Œcolampadius and Melancthon. The Strasburgers and Erasmus also exchanged polemical letters on the doctrine. In September of this year, Philip landgrave of Hesse, invited the Lutheran and Reformed champions to a friendly conference at Marburg. The Lutherans reluctantly attended, being resolved not to make peace with those who should deny the real presence, and despairing of convincing the Reformed on that subject. Luther, Melancthon, and Justus Jonas, from Saxony, Andrew Oslander of Nuremberg, Brentius of Halle in Swabia, and Stephen Agricola of Augsburg, were present on the side of the Lutherans. On the side of the Reformed, Zwingli, Œcolampadius, Bucer, and Hedlo, attended without hesitation. In the discussion, Luther and Œcolampadius were pitted against each other; and also Zwingli and Melancthon. They agreed perfectly on fourteen essential articles of faith, but could not agree respecting the real presence. The landgrave wished them nevertheless to view each other as brethren. Zwingli and his friends heartily consented, but Luther refused. In November of this year the Lutheran states entered into an alliance, called the league of Smalcald; but refused to admit the Strasburgers and the other reformed cities and states into it. In 1530, the Lutherans, the Strasburgers, and also Zwingli, severally presented confessions of their faith to the diet of Augsburg; all drawn up with moderation and care. The princes perceived their agreement in all essential points, and were disposed to admit the Reformed to the league. But Luther and Melancthon opposed it, and prevailed. Philip however, landgrave of Hesse, entered into a league with the Reformed for mutual defence against the papists. And Strasburg, Zurich, Basil and Berne formed an alliance for the same purpose, for fifteen years. In this year, Melancthon published his testimonies from the fathers in favour of the real presence; and Ecclampadius replied elaborately in the form of a dialogue. In 1531, Zwingli and Ecclampadius both died; and the Reformed, weakened by the loss of these two great men and pressed with danger from the papists, against whom their Lutheran brethren would not befriend them so long as they denied the real presence, began to waver and try to swallow the Lutheran creed. Ilucor led the way, and the Strassburgers followed him. The controversy subsided in a great measure. Yet the Swiss and numerous others continued to deny the real corporeal presence of Christ in the eucharist. It was this controversy which produced the division of the Protestants into the two great bodies of Lutherans and Reformed. See, for the facts here condensed, the authors mentioned at the beginning of this note, and Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reform., vol. i. p. 331, &c. and p. 420, &c.—Mur. (See Ranke's account of the commencement of this unhappy controversy, Hist. of the Reform. vol. iii. p. 88, &c.; of the conference at Marburg, p. 189, &c.; and of Butzer's (Bucer's German name) attempt at reconciliation, p. 381, &c. Much additional light is cast upon these incidents by this candid and philosophic historian.—R.

21. Unconnected with the Lutheran community there arose in the year 1525, like a sudden tornado, an innumerable multitude of seditious and delirious fanatics in various parts of Germany, who declared war against the laws and the magistrates, and spread rapine, conflagration, and slaughter through the community. The greatest part of this furious rabble consisted of peasants, who were discontented under the government of their lords; and hence this calamity has been commonly called the war of the peasants.¹ Yet it is manifest there were not a few persons of various descriptions engaged in it; some were fanatics, others vicious and idle persons allured by the hope of living comfortably on the fruits of other people's labour. This sedition at its commencement was altogether of a civil nature, as appears from the paper published by them; for these peasants only wished to be relieved of some part of their burdens and to enjoy greater freedom.

¹ Such insurrections of the peasants had been very common before the time of Luther, as appears from numerous examples. Hence the author of the Chronicon Danicum, published by Ludewig, Reliquie Manuscriptorum, tom. ix. p. 59, calls them the common evil (commune malum). See also p. 80 and 133. This will not appear strange, if it be recollected that the condition of the peasants in most places was much more insupportable than at the present day; and that the oppression of many of the barons, prior to the reformation, was really intolerable. [In many places the peasants were treated as slaves or serfs, and bought and sold with the lands to which they were attached. And the landlords, the barons, bishops, abbots, and priests, were generally disposed to oppress and grind their tenants to the utmost. Hence they were perpetually rebelling in one place or another. Thus A.D. 1492, the Netherlands peasantry appeared in arms to the number of 6,000; and about the same time, there was an insurrection against the abbot of Kempton in Swabia. In the bishopric of Spire there was another in 1503, and one at Wittenberg in 1514. The next year there was one in the Austrian dominions, in which 2,000 peasants were slain. It spread into Hungary and some other countries, 400 of the nobility and gentry were butchered by the insurgents; and the whole number that perished on both sides was estimated at 70,000. In 1517 there was another on the borders of Austria and Croatia. See Seckendorf's Comment. De Lutheranismis, lib. ii. sec. 1.—Mur.

Respecting religion there was no great dispute. But when the fanatic Thomas Munzer, who had before deceived several by his fictitious visions and dreams, and some other persons of a similar character, had joined this irritated multitude, from being a civil commotion it became, especially in Saxony and Thuringia, a religious or holy war. The sentiments however of this dissolute and infuriate rabble were very different. Some demanded an unintelligible freedom from law and the abrogation of all lordships; others only wished to have their taxes and their burdens as citizens made lighter; others contemplated the formation of a new and perfectly pure church and pretended to be inspired; and others again were hurried away by their passions and their hatred of the magistrates, but without having any very definite object in view. Hence though it must be admitted that many of them misunderstood Luther's doctrine concerning Christian liberty, and thence took occasion to run wild, yet it is a great mistake to ascribe to the influence of Luther's doctrines all the blame of this phrensy. Indeed Luther himself sufficiently refuted this calumny by publishing books expressly against this turbulent faction. The storm subsided after the unfortunate battle of the peasants with the army of the German princes at Mulhausen A.D. 1525, in which Munzer was taken prisoner and subjected to capital punishment.²

² Gnodallus, Historia de Seditione Repentina Vulgi, precipue Rusticorum A.D. 1525, tempore verno, per Universam fere Germaniam Exorta, Basil, 1570, 8vo. See also Cyprian's additions to Tenzel's Hist. Reform. tom. ii. p. 331, &c. [This commotion of the peasants commenced in the year 1524, and in Swabia where some subjects of the spiritual princes, civil dukes, and nobles complained of their heavy burdens and feudal services, and demanded a relaxation. Their lords repulsed them harshly, cast some of them into prison, and even put some to death. This enkindled their rage, and presently a host of peasants were to be seen in Swabia and Franconia, who roamed from one district to another and united the disaffected to their standard. Their rulers now gave them kind words, but it was too late; and they refused to lay down their arms till certain articles were conceded to them. Among these the first was, the right of electing their own preachers. And this was the only article which related to religion. They wished for preachers who would have no respect of persons. Yet they afterwards dropped this demand. They demanded further the abolition of personal slavery. The title of produce they were willing to pay; but it must go to the support of the preachers and the poor, and to promote the public interests of the people and the country. From the tithe of cattle or the lesser tithe, they demanded to be made free. They also demanded that hunting and fishing should be free in the public forests, seas, and rivers, and the cutting of timber, and required a diminution of the personal services to be rendered to their landlords, and a reduction of the fines and penalties imposed, &c. At the same time they declared that they would withdraw their demands and return to obedience to their lords, if it could be shown that their demands were unreasonable; for they were not insensible that the Scriptures required obedience to magistrates. [See their own statement of their grievances in Luther's works, ed. Jena, 1580, vol. iii.

22. When this alarming insurrection was at its height Frederick the Wise, Elector of Saxony, died A.D. 1525. While he lived he had been a kind of mediator between the Roman pontiff and Luther; nor would he give up the hope that a righteous and honourable peace might finally be established between the contending parties, without the formation of separate communities under different regulations. Hence he did not thwart but even favoured Luther's designs of purifying and reforming the church; yet he took little pains to organise and regulate the churches in his territories. John his brother and successor was of a very different character. Being fully satisfied of the truth of Luther's doctrines, and clearly perceiving that either those doctrines must be sacrificed or the papal authority be discarded, he assumed to himself the entire jurisdiction in religious matters, and had no hesitation to establish and organise a church totally distinct from that of the pontiff. He therefore caused regulations in regard to the constitution and government of the churches, the form and mode of public worship, the official duties and salaries of the clergy, and other things connected with the interests of religion, to be drawn up by Luther and Melancthon, and to be promulgated in the year 1527 by his deputies; and he likewise took care that pious and competent teachers should be placed over all the churches, and that unsuitable ones should be excluded. His example was soon followed by the other princes and states of Germany who had cast off the dominion of the Roman pontiff; so that nearly the same institutions as he had introduced were adopted by them. This prince may therefore not improperly be considered the second parent and founder of the Lutheran church, since he it was who gave it salutary regulations and the supports of law, and separated it wholly from the Romish church. But it was from the time of this elector John that the dissensions of the German princes in regard to religious and ecclesiastical subjects had their commencement, having previously been very slight. The prudence of Frederick the Wise had kept their minds under restraint and in a good degree united. But when the various proceedings of John made it obvious that he designed to separate the churches of his territory entirely from the church of Rome, instantly the minds of the princes who had heretofore moved in tolerable harmony became at variance, some preferring the old religion of their fathers and others the reformed religion.

23. The patrons of the old religion, without much disguise, consulted together respecting an attack to be made upon the Lutheran party by force of arms. And they would undoubtedly have carried their plans into operation, if they had not been prevented by the troubled state of Europe. The leading men among those who embraced the reformed religion, perceiving the designs of the other party, began also to consult together about forming an alliance among themselves.¹ The diet of Spire in 1526, at

fol. 111, followed by Luther's comments and exhortations to the peasants.—Mur.] They named Luther for their arbiter; and he endeavoured to enlighten them by his sermons and writings. But the rulers themselves were the cause of the spread and prevalence of the insurrection. Fair promises were made to those who would lay down their arms, but the promises were not fulfilled; nay, many were violently seized and put to death. In this state of things fanatics came among them and prompted the irritated multitude to renew their first demand, to aim higher, and to wage war against the clergy and nobility with the greatest cruelty. The most prominent of these fanatics were Thomas Munzer and one Pfeiffer, a renouncing Premonstratensian monk. Munzer was a friend of those visionaries, Nicholas Stork, Mark Stubner, and Martin Cellarius, who had commenced the disturbances at Wittenberg under the patronage of Carlstadt, but who were expelled from Wittenberg on Luther's return thither from Wartburg. He had been a preacher at Zwickau and at Altstadt, and had clearly shown by his writings and his sermons that he was not satisfied with Luther's reformation. (See Lœschner's Stromata, sec. x. p. 218, &c.; and Fuesslin's Lehrzüge, vol. v. p. 136, 410.) He wished to abolish all distinctions of rank and all subordination, and to introduce a perfect equality in society; and he believed that Christ himself would soon come and set up the heavenly Jerusalem on the earth, in which there would be no civil laws, no penalties, no burdens imposed, &c. As he met with resistance generally in Saxony, he travelled over Thuringia, Franconia, and Swabia, as far as the boundaries of Switzerland; and he blew the fire of insurrection everywhere by his influence, until it finally burst into a flame.—Schl. [Meeting opposition at the south, he returned to the north and headed the insurgents of Thuringia, hoping for co-operation from those of Swabia. But the Swabian insurgents were attacked and slaughtered in their several camps to the number, it is said, of 70,000. In the mean time those of Thuringia, to the number of 8,000, were assembled at Mulhausen, with Munzer for their prophet and leader. The neighbouring princes offered them capitulation which they refused, relying on the assurance of Munzer that God would miraculously destroy their adversaries and preserve them. In the battle 4,000 of the peasants (some say more) were slain. Munzer and Pfeiffer were taken and beheaded. Thus ended this war of the peasants in the summer of 1525, in which, according to some, near 130,000 persons lost their lives. See Seckendorf, Comment. de Lutheran. lib. ii. sec. i. &c.; Schroëckh, Kirchengesch. seit d. r. Reform. vol. i. p. 339, &c.; and Arnold's Kirchen- und Ketzer Historie, part ii. b. xvi. chap. ii. vol. i. p. 626—630, ed. 1741.—Mur.] [No one in this country can well understand this distressing episode in German history who has not read Ranke's exposition of its causes, and his account of its progress and issue, in his Hist. of the Reform. vol. ii. p. 202, &c. See also Mrs. Sinnett's Bye-words of History, Lond. 1847, 2 vols. The second volume of which is devoted to the history of this insurrection and an exposition of its causes.—R.]

¹ The war of the peasants had caused repeated consultations between the neighbouring princes. And when the danger from that source began to diminish, the indications of a combination among the Catholic princes under the countenance of the emperor, led the Lutheran princes and states to hold correspondence and conventions, and at length to form alliances. In the winter of 1526 the elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Hesse invited the senate of Nuremberg to meet

which Ferdinand the emperor's brother presided, had a more favourable issue for the Lutheran cause than could have been anticipated. The emperor by his envoys required that all contentions respecting religious subjects should cease, and that the edict of Worms against Luther and his associates should be confirmed. But many of the princes declared that it was not in their power to carry this edict into operation, or to pass any definite decisions on the subject until a general council duly assembled should have examined and judged the case; for to such a body it pertained to take cognizance of such matters. This sentiment prevailed after long and various discussions; and a unanimous resolve was passed that a petition should be presented to the emperor, urging him to call a free council without delay; and that in the mean time every one should be at liberty to manage the religious concerns of his own territory in the manner he saw fit, yet under a due sense of his accountability to God and to the emperor for the course he might pursue.

24. Nothing could have taken place more favourable to the cause of those who deemed a religious reformation necessary than this decree. For the emperor was so occupied and perplexed with his French, Spanish, and Italian affairs, that during several years he could not give much attention to the affairs of Germany, and especially to the difficult subject of religion. And if he had been able to do something favourable to the pontifical interests during the religious disputes in Germany, he doubtless lacked the inclination. For the Roman pontiff Clement VII. after Francis I. the king of France had been vanquished, dreading the power of the emperor in Italy, entered into an alliance with the French and the Venetians against him; and this so inflamed the resentment of Charles that he abolished the pontifical authority throughout Spain, made war upon the pope in Italy, captured the city of Rome in 1527 by his general Charles of Bourbon, besieged the pontiff himself in the castle of St. Angelo, and permitted him to be treated with much personal abuse and indignity.¹ The professors of the reformed religion therefore improved this opportunity them at Torgau for such a consultation. The senate excused itself; but the two princes met on the 4th of May, and entered into an alliance for mutual defence, much the same as the league of Smalcald a few years after. They also invited other Lutheran states to come into this alliance, which was renewed at Magdeburg on the 12th of June of the same year. See Seckendorf, Comment. de Lutheranis; mo. lib. ii. sec. xv. addit. ii.—Mur.

¹ See Robertson's History of Charles V. vol. ii. (book iv.); Sleidan's Commentar. de Statu Relig. et Reipubl. lib. iv. and others.—Schl.

and [the liberty given by] the edict of Spire with great advantage for strengthening and extending their cause. Some whom the fear of punishment had hitherto restrained from attempting any innovations, now unhesitatingly banished the old superstition from their territories, and caused that system of religion and those forms of worship to be introduced which had been adopted in Saxony. Others, though they did not themselves attempt anything against the papal interests, yet gave no molestation to those who persuaded their people to renounce the pontiff; nor did they oppose the assembling in private of such as had withdrawn from his allegiance. And all those in Germany who had before rejected the Romish authority, now carefully employed the liberty afforded them to strengthen their cause and to regulate properly their religious affairs. During this period Luther and his associates, especially those who resided with him at Wittenberg, by their writings, their preaching, their admonitions, and their refutations, added courage to the irresolute and imparted light and animation to all.²

* It was in this interval, or from A.D. 1526, that the elector of Saxony caused the noted visitation of the churches throughout his dominions. Luther being sick, Melancthon with the aid of two or three civilians drew up the instructions to the visitors. The elector's territories were divided into four districts, and different sets of visitors appointed for each, consisting of one or two clergymen and three or more civilians. Luther was the clerical visitor for Saxony Proper, and Melancthon was a visitor for Misnia. The visitors were to take account of the state of all the parishes, monasteries, schools, and cathedrals. They were to examine into the character and conduct of all the clergy, the monks, and school teachers, with power to remove improper men, to supply vacancies, and to assign and regulate the salaries of all. They were also to appoint superintendents, who were to be competent clergymen, commissioned to examine all young ministers and to watch over the clergy within certain limits, to admonish the unfaithful, and if they did not reform to report them to the civil authorities that the sovereign might call them to account or dismiss them as he saw fit. The visitors were also to see that schools were set up in all the parishes and provided with competent teachers, to assign the salaries of the masters, and to prescribe rules and regulations for the schools. They were directed not to spare the vicious and profligate, but to deal tenderly with the ignorant, the aged, and infirm, and such as laboured under honest prejudices. They must cause the true faith and sound practical religion to be everywhere preached; and if they found any who conscientiously desired other preaching, they were to afford them every facility to remove to places where they could enjoy it. Similar visitations were instituted by other Lutheran princes. On his return from this visitation Luther was so impressed with the ignorance of both the clergy and laity in a large part of the country, that he sat down to write his catechisms for their use. See an account of this visitation in Seckendorf's Comment. de Lutheranis. lib. ii. sec. xxxvi. xxxvii. p. 100.—108.—Mur. [It was at the very commencement of this favourable interval, or immediately after the Diet of Spire, that the enterprising Landgrave of Hesse effected the reformation of his principality, and was the first to constitute a national church in conformity with the newly recovered doctrines, under the guidance of Francis Lambert. The Hessian church constitution, which was organized and established so early as October 1526, is a very remarkable one, not only as being the

25. This tranquillity was interrupted by the second diet of Spire in 1529, which the emperor called in the spring after settling in some measure the disquieted affairs of his empire, and coming to a compromise with the pontiff Clement VII. For a decree was passed by a majority, by which the power granted three years before to every prince to regulate religious matters in his own territories as he saw fit until the meeting of a general council, was revoked; and all changes in the public religion were declared to be unlawful until the decision of the council should take place. This decree could not fail to appear grievous and insupportable to the Elector of Saxony, the Landgrave of Hesse, and the other patrons of the Reformation. For no one could be so ignorant as not to know that the promises of a council to be soon assembled, were intended only to soothe their feelings; and that anything could be sooner obtained of the Roman pontiff than a legitimate and free council. Therefore when they found that their arguments and reasonings made no impression upon Ferdinand, the emperor's brother who presided in the diet, and upon the adherents to the old religion who were guided by the pontifical legate, they publicly remonstrated against this decree, or, in the language of the jurists, they protested against it on the 19th of April and appealed to the emperor and to a future council. Hence originated the name of Protestants, borne from this time onward by those who have forsaken the communion of the Roman pontiff.¹

first which emanated from the Reformation, but still more so, as being based on the most popular principles. In its foundation it was congregational, but its superstructure was presbyterian; and that too of a freer and more scriptural type than what was afterwards established by Calvin in Geneva. Both it and its founder, Lambert, deserve to be better known than they are in this country.—R.

¹ The princes and states which joined in this protest were, the elector John of Saxony, the margrave George of Brandenburg, Onolzbach and Culmbach, the dukes Ernest and Francis of Luneburg, the landgrave Philip of Hesse, Wolfgang prince of Anhalt, and fourteen imperial cities—namely, Strasburg, Ulm, Nuremberg, Constance, Reutlingen, Windsheim, Memmingen, Lindau, Keimpten, Heilbron, Isny, Weissenburg, Nordlingen and St. Gall. They appealed to the emperor, to a future general or free council of the German nation, and lastly to every impartial judge. For they believed that a majority of votes in a diet could decide a secular question, but not a spiritual or religious question. They appealed to the emperor, not as recognising him as their judge in a matter of religion, but merely that he might allow their appeal to a council to be valid. And they subjoined the appeal to a council because, according to the ecclesiastical law of Germany, religious controversies are not to be decided by decrees of a diet, but by a national council. We may also here remark that this was not the first protest; but that in the year 1523, at the diet of Nuremberg, the elector of Saxony and the evangelical dukes and imperial cities protested against the decree of the diet. See Walch's Diaz. Historica de Liberta Imperii Civitatis a pace Religionis nunquam exclusis, Götting, 1755, 4to.—Schl.

26. The protectors of the reformed churches, or the Protestant princes as they were called, immediately despatched envoys to the emperor then on his way from Spain to Italy, to acquaint him with the stand they had taken at the diet of Spire. But these envoys fulfilling their commission in a manly style, and daring to manifest the same firmness as those who sent them, were put under arrest by order of the emperor and were held in that situation for a number of days. The princes anxious for the Reformation, on learning this fact, concluded that their own safety depended wholly on their union and their power to defend themselves; and therefore they held several conventions at Rothach, Schwabach, Nuremberg, Smalcald, and other places, for the purpose of entering into a closer alliance for repelling the attacks of their enemies. But nothing definite was agreed upon, in consequence of the diversity of their opinions and views.²

27. Among the hinderances to a cordial union among those who withdrew from the Romish church, the greatest was the disagreement between the Saxon and Helvetic reformers respecting the Lord's Supper. Hence in order to bring this controversy to a close, Philip landgrave of Hesse appointed a conference between Luther and Zwingli and some other principal doctors of both parties, to be held at Marburg in 1529, with a view to a compromise. But this truly magnanimous prince, as he was properly styled, was disappointed in his expectations. The assembled theologians disputed in presence of the landgrave four days, or from the first day of October till the fourth, and particularly Luther with Œcolampadius and Melancthon with Zwingli, on the various allegations against the Helvetians. For Zwingli was regarded by the Saxons as not only teaching falsely respecting the Lord's Supper, but as holding erroneous views respecting the divinity of the Saviour, the efficacy of the divine word, original sin, and some other subjects. Zwingli and his companions replied to these accusations in such a manner as to satisfy Luther in regard to most of them. But the disagreement respecting the Lord's Supper could not be at all removed, both parties firmly persisting in their respective opinions.³

² See Salig's History of the Augsburg Confession, written in German, vol. i. book II. chap. i. p. 128; but especially Muller's Historie von der Evangelischen Stände Protestation gegen den Spyrerischen Reichsabschied von 1529, Appellation, &c. Jena, 1705, 4to.

³ Læschner's Historia Motuum inter Lutheranos et Reformatos, tom. i. lib. i. cap. vi. p. 143, &c.; Bullinger's Historia Colloquii Marpurgensis, in Fueslin's Beiträge zur Schweizer Reformat. Geschichte, vol. III. p. 156; also Fueslin's Preface, p. 80; Scultetus,

The only advantage therefore derived from the conference was, that the parties entered into a kind of truce, and depended on God and the influence of time to heal the dissension.

28. The ministers of the churches which embraced the doctrines of Luther were preparing a new embassy to the emperor, when it was announced that he was coming into Germany, and intended to examine and decide the controversies respecting religion at the diet to be held at Augsburg. For the emperor, after learning the opinions of wise men respecting the momentous business, had become softened down in his feelings, and had laboured with great earnestness first at Bologna to persuade the pontiff of the necessity of calling a council. But being utterly unable to prevail, and the pontiff urging in return that it was the emperor's duty to succour the church, and to punish without delay the perverse faction of the heretics, he came to the conclusion that it would be unjust and a violation of the imperial laws of Germany, to condemn worthy citizens unheard and to make war upon them. At that time there was not extant any good formula of the religion professed by Luther and his friends, from which might be learned clearly what were their views on religious subjects, and what the grounds of their opposition to the Roman pontiffs; and as the approaching solemn investigation of the whole subject rendered such a paper exceedingly necessary, John the elector of Saxony directed Luther and some other of the most eminent doctors, to draw up a brief summary of the doctrines of the reformed religion. Luther conceived that the seventeen articles agreed to in the convention at Schwabach in the year 1529, were sufficient; and accordingly he exhibited them to the elector at Torgau, whence they were called the Articles of Torgau.¹ From these articles as the basis, Philip Melancthon by order and authority of the princes drew up and put into more free and agreeable language partly at Coburg and partly at Augsburg holding consultation all the while with Luther, that confession of faith which is called the Augsburg Confession.²

23. During these transactions there was scarcely any part of Europe on which the light of the religious reformation by Luther did not shed its radiance, and likewise animate with the hope of regaining its liberty. Some of the more important countries also had now openly rejected the Romish institutions and laws. The Romish bishop therefore had sufficient reason to represent to the emperor the necessity of hastening the destruction of the factious people, and to fear the overthrow of his whole empire. Not long after the commencement of Luther's attack upon the Romish church, Olaus Petri a disciple of Luther first imbued the Swedes with a knowledge of the truth. His efforts were nobly seconded by Gustavus Vasa, whom the Swedes, after expelling Christian king of Denmark, had created king [A.D. 1523—1561] and who was a heroic prince and very zealous for the public good. He had been in exile while Christian was laying waste his country, and had acquired at Lubee some knowledge of the Lutheran religion, which he considered not only as the true religion of the Scriptures but also as salutary for Sweden in its present state. That he might not appear to do anything rashly, while the minds of the people were distracted between the old religion and the new, and not to depart from the principles of the Lutheran religion, he determined to proceed gradually and with caution. He therefore first invited learned men from Germany who were competent teachers, and directed them to instruct the people in a knowledge of the Bible; and he caused the Holy Scriptures as translated by Olaus Petri to be published and disseminated. He next in the year 1526 directed this translator of the Swedish Bible, to hold a public discussion on religious subjects at Upsal with Peter Gallius a strenuous defender of popery. And Gallius being vanquished in the discussion, he at length in the assembly of the states at Westeras A.D. 1527, so powerfully and ju-

Annales Reformat. ad ann. 1529; Hospinian's Historia Sacramentaria, par. ii. p. 72, &c. [See above, p. 577, note 5. Hospinian's History contains (par. ii. p. 123, &c. ed. Geneva, 1681) the whole proceedings of the conference by Rodolph Collin, a schoolmaster of Zurich who attended Zwingli to Marpurg, took minutes of all the discussions, and then drew them out into a regular account; likewise accounts of this conference, given in private letters to their friends, by Melancthon (p. 132 and 134), by Luther (p. 135), by Ecclampadius (p. 137), and by Bucer (p. 138); also a report of the ministers of Zurich A.D. 1544, to false reports respecting the conference.—Mur.]

¹ See Heumann's Dis. de Lenitate Augustanae Confess. in the Sylloge Dissert. Theologicar. tom. i. p. 14, &c.; Müller's Historie von d. evang. Stände, &c. and most of the historians of the Reformation and of the Augsburg Confession. [For instance, Walch's Introductio in Libros Eccles. Luth. symbolicos, lib. i. c. iii. sec. 2—9 — Mur

² On the whole of the previous history of the Reformation up to the close of the diet at Augsburg, the reader should consult Merle D'Aubigné's Hist. of the Reformation, whose fourth or last published volume closes the narrative of the German Reformation with this diet. See also on the Diet and Confession of Augsburg, Ranke's admirable account, in his Hist. of the Reformation, vol. iii. p. 254, &c. The Confession itself may be seen in any of the collections of the symbolical books of the Lutheran or Evangelical (i. e. the modern Prussian) church by Walch, Tittmann, Hase, and others — R ditionally recommended the reformed religion of Luther to the representatives of the nation, that after long discussions and strenuous opposition from the bishops, it was harmoniously decreed that the reformed religion should be introduced. This decision was the effect especially of the firmness and resolution of the king; who declared publicly that he would rather resign his crown and retire from the kingdom, than rule over a people subjected to the laws and the authority of the Roman pontiff, and more obedient to their bishops than to their king.¹ From this time onward therefore the whole power of the Roman pontiffs among the Swedes was entirely prostrate.

30. Christian II. commonly called Christiern, king of Denmark [A.D. 1513—1523], who was either from natural temperament or from the influence of bad counsels an oppressive and cruel monarch, endeavoured to imbue the Danes with a knowledge of the Lutheran religion as early as the year 1521. For he first invited Martin Reynhard a disciple of Carlstadt from Saxony in the year 1520, and made him professor of theology at Copenhagen; and on his leaving the kingdom in 1521 he invited Carlstadt himself to Denmark, who however soon returned to Germany. The king even invited Luther to come to Denmark but without success, and he adopted other measures calculated to subvert the authority of the Roman pontiff in his territories. But in all this Christiern was not actuated by zeal for true religion, but by the desire of increasing his own power and grandeur. At least it seems evident from his conduct that he patronised the Lutheran religion in order to obtain by it absolute dominion, and to wrest from the bishops their possessions and their power.² But his projects were unsuccessful. For the different orders of the realm conspired against him in 1523, and deposed and banished him from the kingdom on account of his various acts of cruelty and oppression, and particularly for his attempts to destroy the liberties of Denmark and to abolish the established religion.³ In place of him Frederic duke of Holstein and Sleswick, uncle to Christiern, was called to the throne.

31. This Frederic the successor of Christiern [A.D. 1523—1533] proceeded with more prudence and moderation. He permitted George Johanson [Johannis], Jo. Tausan, and others publicly to preach in the realm the doctrines they had learned from Luther:⁴ but he did not venture to change the ancient government and constitution of the church. He moreover greatly aided the progress of the reformed religion, by procuring a decree of the senate at the diet of Odensee A.D. 1527, by which the citizens were left at liberty either to continue in the old religion or to embrace the new. For under the protection of this decree the preachers of the reformed religion discharged their functions with so much success, that the greatest part of the Danes at length abandoned the Roman pontiff. Yet the glory of delivering Denmark altogether from the Roman bondage was reserved for Christian III. [A.D. 1534—1559], a king of distinguished piety and prudence. For after stripping the bishops of their odious power, and restoring to their rightful owners a great part of the possessions which the church had got into her hands by base arts, he called John Bugenhagen from Wittemberg, and with his aid regulated the religious affairs of the whole realm in an enlightened and judicious manner; and then in the assembly of the states at Odensee in 1539, persuaded Lutheranum haereticis pululatores contra jus pietatemque, in regnum nostrum Catholicum introduxit, Doctorem Carolostadium, fortissimum Lutheri athletam, enutrivit. [The grounds of the Reformation were much the same in Denmark as in Sweden. The interests of the state demanded a depression of the clergy. Denmark was an elective monarchy; and the power of the kings was greatly limited by the council of the state, which consisted partly of clergymen and partly of civilians. The civil counsellors were from the highest nobility, the clerical were archbishops and bishops. The revenues of the kings were small, and the clergy were in possession of the most important castles and fortresses. Hence there was constant jealousy between the nobility and the clergy, and the former wished to see the latter humbled. Christiern so dexterously availed himself of this jealousy, that by it he stripped the clergy of their power, and introduced the Reformation into the kingdom. He forcibly took from the papal preacher of indulgences, Arcimbold, a large sum of money collected by the sale of indulgences; and he caused a Danish translation of the New Testament to be made. After his deposition he heard Luther preach in Germany with great pleasure; yet as he was hoping for succour from Charles V. he did not openly profess the Lutheran doctrines. But his queen Isabella, sister to the emperor Charles V. professed it and died in it with great constancy in the year 1525.—Schl. [Ranke represents Christiern as an adherent of Luther up to the eve of the Diet at Augsburg, when he met the emperor at Innsbruck, and returned to popery in order to secure the imperial countenance and support, Hist. & the Reform. vol. ii. p. 257.—R.

⁴ See Möller, Cimbria literata, tom. ii. p. 886, &c. Olavius, Vita Pauli Elie, p. 108, &c.; Pontoppidan's Annales eccles. Danica, tom. iii. p. 139, &c.

¹ Baaz, Inventarium Ecl. Sueo-Gothorum, Lincoping, 1642, 4to. Scultetus, Annales Evangelii reformati; in Von der Hardt's Historia liter. Reformat. pars. v. p. 83 and 110, &c.; Raynal's Anecdotes Histor. politiques, militaires, tom. i. par. ii. p. 1, &c. and others. [Gördes, Historia Reformationis, tom. iii. p. 277, &c. Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reform. vol. ii. p. 3, &c.—Mur.

² See Gramm's Diss. de Reformatione Danica a Christierno tentata; in tom. iii. Scriptor. Societ. scientiar. Hafniensis, p. 1—90.

³ See the causes which induced the states of Denmark to renounce subjection to king Christiern, in Ludewig's Reliquia Manuscriptor. tom. v. p. 315, &c. where those states thus express themselves, p. 321

the chiefs of the nation to sanction the begun reformation in religion.¹

32. In regard to the Reformation however both in Sweden and Denmark, we should carefully discriminate between a reformation or change of religion, and a reformation of the bishops; two things nearly related indeed, yet so distinct that either may exist without the other. For the religion of a people might be reformed, while the rank and power of the bishops remained the same; and on the other hand, the bishops might be deprived of a portion of their wealth and authority, and yet the old religion be retained. In the reformation of religion and worship [in these countries] there was nothing that deserved censure, for no violence or imposition was practised, but everything was done in a reasonable and religious manner. But in the reformation of the bishops and clergy, there appears to have been something defective. For violent measures were adopted; and the bishops, against their wills and their efforts to the contrary, were deprived of their honours, prerogatives, and possessions. Yet this reformation of the clergy in both those northern kingdoms was not a religious, but a mere civil and secular transaction; and it was so necessary that it must have been undertaken, if no Luther had arisen. For the bishops had by corrupt artifices got possession of so much wealth, so many castles, such revenues, and so great authority, that they were far more powerful than the kings, and were able to govern the whole realm at their pleasure; indeed they had appropriated to themselves a large portion of the patrimony of the kings and of the public revenues. Such therefore was the state both of the Danish and the Swedish commonwealths in the time of Luther, that either the bishops who shamefully abused their riches, prerogatives, and honours, must be divested of the high rank they held in the state, and be deprived of a large portion of their ill-gotten wealth; or the ruin of those kingdoms, the irreparable detriment of the public safety and tranquillity, and the sinking of their kings into contempt with an utter inability to protect the people, must have been anticipated.

33. In France, Margaret [born 1492, died 1549] queen of Navarre and sister to Francis I. king of France, the perpetual enemy and rival of Charles V. was pleased with the light of the reformed religion; and hence several pious men well acquainted with the Scriptures and sustained by her protection, ventured to teach this religion and to form religious societies in various places. It appears from documents of unquestionable authority that as early as the year 1523, there were in most of the provinces of France a multitude of persons opposed to the principles and the laws of the Romish church; and among them were men of high character and even prelates. As this number continually increased, and as religious commotions took place here and there, the king and the magistrates protected the ancient religion by the sword and by penal inflictions, and a large number of pious and good persons were cruelly put to death.² But this cruelty advanced rather than retarded the progress of the new religion. The friends of reformation however in France experienced various fortunes, sometimes adverse and sometimes tolerable, during the reign of Francis I. [A.D. 1515—1547]. For the king, being either of no religion or of a dubious one, conducted himself towards them just as his own advantage or state policy seemed to require. When he wished to conciliate the good-will of the German Protestants, and by them inflict a wound upon his enemy Charles V. he was mild, humane, and equitable towards them; but on a change of circumstances, he assumed a different character and showed himself implacable towards them.

¹ See Beza's Histoire des Eglises Réformées de France, tom. i. livr. i. p. 5, &c.; Benoit's Histoire de l'Édit de Nantes, tome i. livr. i. p. 6, &c.; Sallé's Histoire der Augsburgischen Confession, vol. ii. p. 190, &c. and others. [Gerdes, Hist. Reform. tom. iv. p. 1, &c. Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reform. vol. ii. p. 208, &c.—"France was the first country, where the reformation which commenced in Germany and Switzerland, very soon and under the severest oppressions found many adherents. No country seems to have been so long and so well prepared for it as this; and yet here it met the most violent opposition, and nowhere was it later before it obtained legal toleration. Nowhere did it occasion such streams of blood to flow, nowhere give birth to such dreadful and deadly civil wars. And no where have state policy, court intrigue, political parties, and the ambition of greatness, had so powerful an influence on the progress and fortunes of the Reformation, as in France."—Schroeckh. The friendship of Francis I. to the sciences, and his attachment and generosity to learned men induced many persons of genius who were favourable to the Reformation to take up their residence in France; and thus the writings of the Reformers, which were in general better compositions than the books of the papists, were introduced extensively into France, and were there eagerly read; and by these writings such as had before taken no part in the religious contests, were convinced of the necessity of a reformation, and brought to desire it. The university of Paris indeed had already in 1521 declared expressly against Luther and his writings. (See the Determinatio Facult. Theol. Paris. super doctrina Lutherana; in Gerdes, Hist. Reform. tom. iv. Append. No. ii. p. 10, 11.) Yet the doctrine of Luther and Melancthon from the first had many friends in France; indeed, there was a time when Francis I. to gratify the wishes of his sister, Queen Margaret, was disposed to invite Melancthon to take up his residence in France. The first movement with a direct view to produce a reformation was at Meaux, where the devout and learned bishop William Brissonet gave support and protection to James le Pevre, William Farrell, and Gerard Roussel, and permitted them openly to preach against the idol superstitions and abuses of the Romish church, and to gather a small congregation. But as soon as the thing became extensively known, the parliament in the year 1533 ordered a rigorous investigation of the subject. John le Clerc, a woollen-spinner, but who had become a preacher to the new congregation at Meaux, published in this year a letter against indulgences in which the

² Pontoppidan's Concise History of the Reformation in Denmark, written in Danish, Lubec, 1784, 8vo, and his Annales ecclesiæ Danicæ, tom. ii. p. 798, &c. tom. iii. p. 1, &c.; Mühlus, De Reformatione, religionis in vicinis Daniæ regionibus et potissimum in Cimbris; in his Disert. Historico-Theologicæ, p. 24, &c. Kiel, 1716, 4to. [Also Gerdes, Historia Reformationis, tom. iii. p. 338, &c.; Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reform. vol. ii. p. 59, &c. A still better account may be expected in the Ecclesiastical History of Denmark, now preparing, and partially published by Fr. Münter, bishop of Seeland.—Mur. [It is entitled, Kirchengeschichte von Dänemark und Norwegen, Leip. 1823-33, 8 vols.—K.]

34. The other countries of Europe did pope was represented as Antichrist. He was therefore beaten with rods, branded with a hot iron, and banished; and afterwards died a martyr at Metz. The congregation were dispersed all over France. Brissonet, terrified by the resentment of the king, drew back, and now condemned the doctrines he had hitherto approved. Farrell went to Switzerland, reformed Mûmpelgard, and adhered firmly to the reformed doctrines till his death. Le Fevre and Roussel betook themselves to Navarre to Queen Margaret, where they did not indeed openly break with the Romish church, yet greatly promoted the spread of pure doctrine. In the mean time, the reformed party multiplied exceedingly in Bearn and Guienne, through the protection of Margaret. Francis therefore being prompted by the bishops sent for this queen, and rebuked her for suffering these innovations to take place. She promised him she would go no farther in this thing, provided the following concessions were granted her: 1st, That no mass should be said unless there were persons to receive the eucharist. 2d, That the elevation of the host should cease. 3d, The worship of it also. 4th, That the eucharist should be administered in both kinds. 5th, That in the mass there should be no mention made of Mary and the saints. 6th, That common, ordinary bread should be taken, broken, and distributed. And 7th, That the priests should not be compelled to a life of celibacy. But these propositions were rejected; and the preachers she had brought with her to Paris were thrown into prison, and with great difficulty, at her intercession, set at liberty. At last cardinal Tournon so far wrought upon the king by his fierce persecuting zeal, that he strictly commanded his sister to avoid all innovations in religious matters; and notwithstanding the intercession of the Protestant princes of Germany, he caused the evangelical to be punished in the most cruel manner. Gallows were erected and the flames kindled against the professors of the reformed doctrine; and yet they were so far from being exterminated that their number increased continually. The persecution became still heavier in the year 1534, when some inconsiderate persons in their rash zeal posted up satirical papers against the popish mass in various places, and even on the royal palace. The blood of the unhappy Protestants now smoked till the death of the king. Especially the honest Waldensians in the mountains of Provence, at Merindol and Cabrières, became the victims of a most cruel persecution. Merindol was destroyed, and its inhabitants, who had chiefly taken refuge at Cabrières, were either butchered, or burned alive, or sent to the galleys. Cardinal Tournon was the instigator, and Oppeda the president of the parliament of Aix was the chief actor in the bloody scene. Yet all was done with the consent of the king; though in the end he could not approve of all that had taken place, but execrated that worse than barbarian deed, and on his deathbed enjoined upon his successor to subject it to an investigation.—Schl. [On the early portion of the history of the Reformation in France the most accessible work is Merle D'Aubigné's Hist. of the Reformation, in the third volume of which he treats of this branch of the history from 1500 to 1526.—R.

not exhibit so many and so clear indications of a defection from the Romish institutions and customs, prior to the presentation of the confession of Augsburg. And yet it can be proved by the most credible testimonies, that Spain,¹ Hungary,² Bohemia,³

¹ The emperor Charles V. being king of Spain, and carrying on extensive wars in Italy, Germany, and Spain, his Spanish and German subjects of all ranks and professions were necessarily brought into close contact. Many Spanish officers and soldiers, and also statesmen and theologians of course learned something of the reformed religion, and not a few of them embraced it. Yet the rigours of the Inquisition and the complete ascendancy of popery in Spain, induced the evangelical Spaniards for a long time either to conceal their religious sentiments or to propagate them in the most covert manner. Yet before the year 1550, the Protestants had become so numerous in Spain that they ventured to appear openly. They could number a great many persons of distinction, and had increased so rapidly that it seemed as if the whole nation would soon embrace the reformed religion. But the Catholics taking the alarm, a most violent persecution ensued, which raged till not a heretic dared to show his head in that country. See Michael Geddes, Martyrology of Protestants in Spain, in his Miscellaneous Tracts, vol. i. p. 345, &c. and Latin, in Mosheim's Disert. Hist. Eccles. vol. i. p. 603, &c.; Gonsalvus (or Gonzalez de Montes), Relatio de Martyribus Protestantium in Hispania, in Gerdes's Miscellanea Groning. tom. iv. p. 681, &c.; and Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reform. vol. II. p. 791, &c.—Mur. [These earlier authorities are now superseded by McCrele's History of the Progress and Suppression of the Reformation in Spain, Edin. 1829.—R.

² Hungary is one of the countries which early received some light from the Reformation, but in which it was resisted so strenuously that it never absolutely triumphed, and never became the religion of the state. As early as 1522, several Hungarians educated at Wittenberg introduced the Lutheran doctrines into their native country. These doctrines spread rapidly, and other Hungarians trained in the school of Luther became successful preachers to their countrymen. But persecution commenced in 1525, and was renewed from time to time with such success as nearly to destroy the reformed churches. There were some Moravian or Hussites in the country before the time of Luther, and likewise some Waldensians. Mary, widow of Lewis II. and sister to Charles V. was friendly to the Lutherans; and she checked the persecuting zeal of king Ferdinand, who was her brother. In the year 1530 five free cities in the northern part of Hungary declared for Lutheranism, and presented a confession of their faith to the king. The next year Matthias Devay, the Luther of Hungary, began his career. The most rapid increase of the reformed was about the year 1550. In the year 1555 the five above-named free cities, and also twelve market towns in the county of Zilp, with a few towns in Lower Hungary and several noblemen, obtained liberty to practise the reformed religion. See Schroeckh, ubi supra, vol. II. p. 723, &c.—Mur.

³ As early as the year 1519 the Hussites in Bohemia opened a friendly correspondence with Martin Luther, and exhorted him to persevere in the good work, assuring him there were very many in Bohemia who prayed night and day for the success of his cause. (Luther's Lat. Works, ed. Jena, tom. I. p. 365, &c.) The intercourse continued free, and was salutary both to the Bohemians and the Lutherans till the year 1525, when it was suspended for ten years in consequence of some slanderous reports respecting Luther propagated in Bohemia. But in 1535 the intercourse was renewed, evangelical doctrines spread in the country, and the Hussites corrected their former creed without entirely abandoning it. The evangelical were divided among themselves and were exposed to persecution, yet they multiplied greatly and finally obtained free toleration. See Regenvolsius (or Wengierski), Systema Historico-Chronolog. Ecclesiar. Slavonicar. lib. I. cap. ix. p. 54, &c.; and Elsner's Brevis Conspectus Doctrinae Fratrum Boemorum, in Gerdes's Miscellanea Groning. tom. vi. par. I. p. 381, &c.—Mur.

Britain,¹ Poland,² and the Netherlands,³ now abounded in great numbers of friends

¹ In England, the Wickliffites, though obliged to keep concealed, had not been exterminated by 150 years' persecution. Luther's writings were early brought into England, and there read with avidity. This quickened persecution, and six men and one woman were burned at the stake in Coventry on Passion Week, A.D. 1519. In 1522, king Henry VIII. wrote a confutation of Luther's doctrines, but to no purpose. Bilney, Latimer, and others at Cambridge, formed a society which read and circulated Luther's books, as early as 1523. William Tyndal made an English translation of the New Testament, which he printed at Antwerp and circulated in England in 1526. The next year, king Henry began to question the legality of his marriage with his brother's widow, and proceeded to solicit from the pope a divorce. The negotiation was protracted till the king was out of all patience, and he proceeded without the pope's consent to divorce his queen. The pope censured his conduct, and a quarrel ensued, the result of which was, that Henry with the consent of the parliament abolished the papal authority in England, A.D. 1533. During this period, though persecution had been kept up, the number of the Reformed had greatly increased, and the nation was ripe for a secession from Rome. See Burnet's History of the Reformation, book i. ii.; Gerdes, Historia Reformationis, tom. iv. p. 172, &c.; Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. seit d. Ref. vol. ii. p. 505, &c.—Through England some of the writings of the early Reformers might reach Scotland, then sunk in ignorance, superstitiously devoted to its priests, and still more passionately attached to its nobles, the heads of the Scottish clans. Patrick Hamilton, a young nobleman and abbot of Ferne, eager to know more of the reformed religion, went to Germany and studied some time at Marburg. Returning with one of his three companions to Scotland, he began to preach the doctrines of the Reformers. The priests arraigned him for heresy, convicted him, and he was burned alive at St. Andrews, February, 1528, in the 24th year of his age. From this time the Protestant doctrines made a slow but constant progress amid ever-wakeful persecution in Scotland, till the year 1547, when the famous Scottish reformer, John Knox, arose. See Schroeckh, ubi supra, p. 435, &c.; Robertson's History of Scotland, b. ii.; Gerdes' Hist. Reform. vol. iv. p. 210, &c. 229, 234, 291, &c. 304, &c. 321.—Mur. [The history of the Reformation in Scotland may be best learned from the early volumes of Calderwood's Hist. of the Kirk of Scotland, Wodrow Society edit. Edin. 1812-48, 8 vols.; Knox's History of the Reformation of Religion in Scotland, Wodrow Society edit. Edin. 1847—only one volume of this valuable edition has yet been published; Cook's Hist. of the Reformation in Scotland, Edin. 1819, 3 vols.; and McCre's Life of Knox, Edin. 1818, 4th edit. 2 vols.—R.

² Before the Reformation, a considerable body of Hussites had removed from Bohemia to Poland, where their doctrines spread considerably especially among the nobility, and roused the spirit of persecution. Luther's writings at once circulated among the dissenters from the church of Rome, corrected their views, and strengthened their opposition to popery. Even some of the bishops favoured evangelical doctrines; and as early as 1525, there were several evangelical preachers in Poland, and also in Polish Prussia. But so vigorous a persecution was kept up, that Protestant worship could be maintained only in private till near the middle of the century. See Regensvolsius, Systema Hist. Chronol. Ecclesiar. Slavonicar. lib. i. c. xiii. p. 71, &c.; Schroeckh, ubi supra, vol. ii. p. 666, &c.—Mur. [See also a recent work by Count Valerian Krasinski, entitled, Historical Sketch of the Rise, Progress, and Decline of the Reformation in Poland, Lond. 1838-40, 2 vols.—R.

³ The seventeen Belgian provinces composing the Netherlands were a part of the hereditary dominions of Charles V. which he governed by his viceroys. Here, from the fourteenth century, various religious reformers had appeared, as Gerhard Groot, John Wesselius, Thomas à Kempis, John Goech, and Cornelius Grapheus. Here also wrote the famous Erasmus. The writings of Luther were early and eagerly read by the Netherlands. The Catholics were alarmed;

to the doctrines inculcated by Luther, some of whom repaired to Wittenberg, for the sake of enjoying the instructions of so great a master and guide. Some of these countries afterwards made themselves wholly free from the Romish yoke; in others, numerous congregations arose which rejected the decrees of the pontiff, and which have existed down to the present times, though amid various molestations; in others, the most cruel persecutions and inhuman laws after a short time extinguished the knowledge of the reformed religion, which had been obtained and widely circulated. It may be unhesitatingly asserted,—for the adherents of the Roman pontiffs themselves admit it,—that the entire fabric of the Romish church would have been quickly demolished, had not its defenders opposed the multitude of assailants, already in the breach, with fire and sword.

CHAPTER III.

HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION, FROM THE PRESENTATION OF THE AUGSBURG CONFESSION [1530] TO THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE WAR OF SMALCALD [1546].

1. CHARLES V. made his entry into Augsburg on the 15th of June [1530], and on the 20th of the same month the diet was opened. As the members had agreed that the religious affairs should be despatched before discussing the subject of a Turkish war, the Protestant members present received permission from the emperor to exhibit a summary view of the religion they professed, in the session of the princes on the 25th of June. Accordingly, in the palace of the bishop of Augsburg, that confession of faith, which from the place where it was exhibited was called the Augsburg Confession, was read in German by Christian Bayer, the chancellor of Saxony. There was not one of the princes who did not listen to it with eager attention; and some of them, who before did not correctly understand the religious views and through their instigation, the government introduced the Inquisition in the year 1522, and kept up a hot persecution of the Reformed for a long course of years. It was computed that in these provinces, during the reign of Charles V. not less than 50,000 persons lost their lives, in consequence of their defection from the church of Rome. Yet the number of the Reformed continually increased; and when at length seven of these provinces revolted and became an independent state, they adopted the Protestant religion. See Gerdes, Hist. Reformationis, tom. iii. p. 1, &c.; Schroeckh, ubi supra, vol. ii. p. 348, &c.—Mur. [To these works may be added Brand's History of the Reformation in the Low Countries, Lond. 1720-23, 4 vols. folio, translated from the Dutch. It extends from the eighth century to the Synod of Dort.—R.

of Luther, expressed approbation of the purity and innocence of the doctrines. John elector of Saxony, and four princes of the empire, viz. George marquis of Brandenburg, Ernest duke of Luneburg, Philip landgrave of Hesse, and Wolfgang prince of Anhalt, with the two imperial cities, Nuremberg and Reutlingen, subscribed their names to the copies [the one Latin, the other German] delivered after the reading to the emperor, in testimony of the accordance of the doctrines there expressed with their own views.¹

2. As the Augsburg Confession was adopted as a public standard of faith by the whole body of [Lutheran] Protestants, no one of them should be ignorant of its character and contents. The style is Philip Melancthon's; which is as much as to say, it was drawn up in polished, perspicuous language, well adapted to the subject. The matter or contents, it is certain, were supplied principally by Luther, who was at Coburg, a town not far from Augsburg, at the time of the diet, and who examined and approved the form and style which Melancthon gave to it.² It was comprised in twenty-eight articles; of which twenty-one stated distinctly the religious faith of those who had receded from the church of Rome, and the other seven recounted the errors or abuses as they were called, on account of which they had separated from the Romish community.³

* The articles in this Confession, or as it might be called Apology, are of very unequal length. Some are in the form of answers to slanders against the Lutherans, others are short essays, most of them include proofs or argumentation, and several of them are followed by renunciations of the opposite tenets held by heretics ancient or modern. As this celebrated creed is not accessible in English, the following summary of its contents is here subjoined:—

Art. 1st treats of God and the Trinity, in accordance with the Nicene Creed.

Art. 2d affirms that all men since the fall are born with sin—that is, destitute of faith and the fear of God, and with corrupt propensities; for which hereditary sin they are exposed to eternal death, until they are regenerated by baptism and the Holy Spirit. It rejects the Pelagian doctrine, and denies man's ability to obtain justification by his own works.

Art. 3d treats of the person and mediation of Christ, in accordance with the Apostles' Creed.

Art. 4th asserts justification to be, solely, on the ground of Christ's righteousness imputed to the believer, and not on the ground of his personal righteousness, agreeably to Rom. chap. iii. iv.

Art. 5th asserts that the word, preaching, and the sacraments, are the medium through which God imparts the Holy Spirit to whom he will, in consequence of which they believe unto righteousness. It rejects the doctrine of the Anabaptists, that men can obtain the Holy Spirit by their own efforts and without the means above stated.

Art. 6th asserts that true faith always produces good works; which every man is bound to perform, yet must not rely upon them for salvation.

Art. 7th affirms the existence of a holy Catholic church consisting of all the faithful, and which is known not by a uniformity in ceremonies, but by the efficacious preaching of the word and the administration of the sacraments in their purity.

Art. 8th asserts that the Christian church, though composed of saints, yet has hypocrites in it; and that the efficacy of the sacraments is not destroyed by hypocrisy in the administrators.

Art. 9th asserts that baptism is necessary, and is a means of grace, and that infants are to be baptized.

Art. 10th asserts that the real body and blood of Christ are truly present in the eucharist under the elements of the bread and wine, and are distributed and received.

Art. 11th retains private confession of sins to the pastors, and absolution by them; but denies the necessity of a particular enumeration of all sins.

Art. 12th maintains that those who sin after baptism, if they repent, should always be restored by the church; that repentance consists in sorrow and regret for sin and reliance on Christ for pardon, and is productive of good works. It denies sinless perfection in this life, the Novatian error of refusing absolution to the penitent, and all dependence on our own satisfactions for sin.

Art. 13th asserts that the sacraments are not merely significant signs, but are tokens and evidence of God's gracious disposition towards us, calculated to awaken and strengthen our faith, and requiring faith to a worthy receiving of them.

Art. 14th asserts that no one should preach publicly and administer the sacraments unless duly called.

Art. 15th. Rites of human institution, so far as they are not sinful and tend to peace and good order in the church (as certain feasts, fasts, &c.) are to be observed. But all human institutions designed to appease God, are contrary to the Gospel.

Art. 16th. Civil government is ordained of God, and Christians may lawfully hold offices, civil and military, and may pursue the various occupations of citizens; contrary to the views of the Anabaptists, and such as deem all worldly business inconsistent with a truly religious life.

Art. 17th asserts that at the last day Christ will come, will raise the dead, and will adjudge the believing and elect to eternal life, and wicked men and devils to hell and eternal torment. It rejects the Anabaptist notion of a final restoration of devils and the damned;

¹ A history of this diet, in a large folio volume, by George Costeino [a Lutheran], was published at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, in 1577. Histories of the Augsburg Confession were composed by Chytraeus, and by others; and especially in the eighteenth century by Cyprian, and by Salig, in the German language. Salig's work is prolix, and is more properly a history of the Reformation than a history of the Augsburg Confession. Cyprian's history is more concise and dense, and is corroborated by well-selected documents. It therefore deserves to pass to a third edition. [Webber's Critical History of the Augsburg Confession, Frankfort-on-Mayne, 1783, &c. 2 vols. 8vo. The original subscribers to the confession are mentioned in the text. Before the diet rose, the cities Kempten, Heilbronn, Windsheim, and Weissenburg, also subscribed, and afterwards many more. It was immediately printed and soon spread all over Europe, and was translated into various foreign languages. It thus became of great service to the Protestant cause; for it was a very able document, and was drawn up in a most judicious manner. See Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reform. vol. i. p. 445, &c.—Mur.

² Ranke has, as usual, given an admirable sketch of the proceedings and results of this memorable diet, comprising additional matter from unpublished sources, in his Hist. of the Reformation, Mrs. Austin's transl. vol. iii. p. 254, &c. Dr. Merle D'Aubigné has devoted an entire book to the proceedings of this Diet (Hist. of the Ref. Edin. edit. vol. iv. p. 193–200); and at this point he proposes to close his account of the German Reformation. Milner's History of the Church also terminates at this period—the opening of the Diet at Augsburg. Scott, the continuator of Milner, opens his first volume with a detailed account of this Diet and an elaborate analysis of the confession. See also the excellent work of Dean Waddington on both these points—the Diet and the Confession; and also on Luther's views and sentiments at Coburg during that eventful period. History of the Reformation, vol. iii. chap. xxxv.—xxxi.—R.

3. The friends of the pontiff present at the diet drew up a confutation of the Protestant Confession, of which, John Faber afterwards bishop of Vienna, with the aid of John Eck and John Cochleus, is said to have been the composer. This confutation being likewise read before the diet on the 3d of August, the emperor required the Protestants to acquiesce in it, and to abandon their whole cause and controversy. But they declared themselves not satisfied with this answer of the papal divines, and wished to have a copy of it that they might point out its fallacies. The emperor, more obedient to the exhortations of the pontiff's legate and his companions than to the demands of right and equity, refused their request and would not allow the controversy to be protracted by any new writings about it. Nevertheless the Protestants caused an answer to be drawn up by Philip Melanand also the Jewish notion of a temporal reign of Christ on the earth prior to the resurrection.

Art. 15th asserts that men have some free will to live reputably, to choose among objects which their natural reason can comprehend; but that without the gracious aids of the Holy Spirit they cannot please God nor truly fear him, exercise faith, or overcome their sinful propensities, 1 Cor. ii.

Art. 19th asserts that God is not the cause and author of sin; but that the perverse wills of ungodly men and devils are the sole cause of it.

Art. 20th maintains that the Reformers do not discourage good works, though they inculcate the doctrine of justification by faith alone; but only discourage useless works, as the rosary, worshipping saints, pilgrimages, monastic vows, stated fasts, &c.; and it evinces at considerable length, from Scripture and the fathers, that a man cannot be justified by works.

Art. 21st admits that the saints are to be respected, and to be imitated as patterns of piety; but denies that they are to be worshipped, prayed to, or regarded as mediators.

Such for substance (say they) is the doctrine taught in our churches; and being the doctrine of the Bible, we cannot but hold to it. All should embrace it.

The abuses (they say) which have crept into the church, and which we could not conscientiously endure, are chiefly the following:—

Art. 22d. Denying the sacramental cup to the laity, contrary to Scripture and early Christian practice.

Art. 23d. Imposing celibacy on the clergy, contrary to reason and Scripture and the practice of the purer ages, and with very injurious consequences.

Art. 24th. The Protestants are falsely taxed with abolishing the mass. They only purified it, and discarded the idea of its being a work of merit, an offering for the sins of the living and the dead, which militates with the scriptural doctrine that Christ's sacrifice is the only sin-offering.

Art. 25th. The Protestants had not abolished private confession, for they made it a necessary preparation for the eucharist. Yet they did not consider it a sacrament, nor require a particular enumeration of sins.

Art. 26th censures the multitude of fasts and other ceremonies of human invention, and the undue stress laid upon them as meritorious acts; thus obscuring the doctrine of salvation by faith, holding these human prescriptions more sacred than the commands of God, and burdening the consciences of men with them.

Art. 27th represents the whole system of monkery as a great abuse, and exceedingly injurious to piety.

Art. 28th discriminates between civil and ecclesiastical power, and allows neither to infringe upon the other. The spiritual or episcopal power is limited to preaching, administering the sacraments, and loosing and binding sins. If bishops teach contrary to the Scriptures, they are and must be treated as false prophets. If allowed to try causes relating to marriage and tithes, it is only as civil officers. They have no legislative power over the church; and they can bind the conscience only by showing that the Gospel enjoins what they inculcate. As to Sundays and other holy days and rites and forms of worship, bishops may and should appoint such as are convenient and suitable, and the people should observe them, not as divine ordinances, but as conducive to good order and edification.

Though the Lutherans expressed their doctrine of consubstantiation in the most inoffensive terms which would be explicit, yet the Reformed or Zwinglians could not subscribe to the Augsburg Confession. Hence the imperial cities of Strasburg, Constance,

Lindau, and Memmingen, offered a separate confession called the Confession of the Four Cities, Confessio Tetrapolitana. It agreed substantially with the Augsburg Confession, except in regard to the corporeal presence. They maintained a real yet a spiritual or sacramental presence, a presence which the devout soul could feel and enjoy, but which implied no physical presence of Christ's body. Yet they expressed themselves in terms which need not have given offence to the Lutherans. They say: "All that the evangelists, Paul, and the holy fathers have written respecting the venerable sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, our preachers teach, recommend, and inculcate, with the greatest fidelity. Hence, with singular earnestness, they constantly proclaim that goodness of Christ towards his followers, whereby, no less now than at his last supper, to all his sincere disciples as oft as they repeat this supper, he condescends to give, by the sacraments, his real body and his real blood, to be truly eaten and drunken as the food and drink of their souls, by which they are nourished to eternal life, so that he lives and abides in them and they in him." This confession they presented to the emperor in Latin and German, but he would not allow it to be read in public. Yet when the popish priests had made out a confutation of it, he called them before him to hear that confutation read; and then, without allowing discussion or permitting them to have a copy of the confutation, demanded of them submission to the church of Rome. They refused. This confession of the four cities, which was drawn up by Martin Bucer and had been adopted by the senate and people of Augsburg, was the confession of that city for a number of years. But afterwards the four cities, feeling the necessity of a union with the Lutherans lest their popish enemies should swallow them up, brought themselves to believe that the Lutherans and they differed more in words than in reality; and therefore they subscribed to the Augsburg Confession, and became a part of the Lutheran church. See Hospius's Historia Sacramentaria, par. ii. p. 162, &c.—At the same Diet Zwingli presented his private confession, which is a long and elaborate performance. He says: "Grace is conferred along with the sacraments, but not by them as the channels; or in other words, that the Holy Spirit imparts grace to the devout communicants in the ordinance; but does not annex the grace to the sacrament, so that it may go along with it as water through a channel, or by a physical process." And respecting the Lord's Supper he says: "I believe that in the holy eucharist or supper of thanksgiving, the real body of Christ is present to the eye of faith (fidei contemplatione); that is, to those who thank the Lord for the benefits conferred on us in Christ his Son, acknowledge that he assumed a real body, truly suffered in it, and washed away our sins in his own blood; and thus the whole that Christ has done is, as it were, present to the eye of their faith. But that the body of Christ in substance and reality, or that his natural body is present in the supper, and is received into our mouth and masticated by our teeth—as the papists and some who look back upon the fleshpots of Egypt represent—that I not only deny but unhesitatingly pronounce an error and contrary to the word of God." He subjoins elaborate proofs from the Scripture, reason, and the fathers, in support of these views. To this confession Eck, the Catholic divine, replied; and Zwingli on the 27th of August defended himself in a letter addressed to the emperor and to the Protestant princes. See Hospius, ubi supra, p. 167, &c.—Mur. (See also on this Confession the works of Scott and Waddington referred to in the preceding note.—R.) thon, to so much of the pontifical confutation as the theologians had been able to gather from hearing it read; and on the 22d of September they presented it to the emperor, who refused to receive it. This answer (though afterwards corrected and enlarged by Melancthon upon obtaining a copy of the pontifical confutation) is that Apology for the Augsburg Confession, which was afterwards published in the year 1531, and which constitutes a part of the symbolical books of the Lutheran church.¹

4. Three modes of getting rid of these very troublesome contentions remained. One was, to allow those who would not obey the mandates of the pontiff to enjoy their own sentiments on religion, and to worship God as they saw fit, without allowing the public tranquillity to be thereby destroyed. Another was, to compel them by force of arms to cease from dissenting from the Romish church, and make them return to the spurned friendship of the Roman prelate. A third was, to attempt an honourable and equitable compromise, by each party's relinquishing some portion of what it considered as its just claims. The first method was accorded with reason and justice, and would meet the wishes of the wise and good; but it was totally repugnant to the arrogant claims of the pontiff and to the ignorance of the age, which abhorred all liberty of opinion concerning religion. The second accorded with the customs and views of the age, and with the violent counsels of the Romish court; but it was opposed to the prudence, the moderation, and the equity, both of the emperor and of all good men. The third therefore was adopted, and met the approbation of all who were solicitous for the good of the empire; nor did the sovereign pontiff himself seem to be wholly averse from it. Hence various consultations were held between select individuals of both parties, and every means was adopted which seemed calculated to allay mutual hatred, and bring discordant minds to harmonize. But the parties were too wide apart in their first principles, for any thing to be effected. In these discussions the character of Philip Melancthon, whom, as the principal doctor among the Protestants, the adherents to the pontiff took special pains to conciliate, very clearly appeared. He seemed easy of access, and ready to make concessions when his opposers dealt in compliments and promises; but when they would terrify him by threats and denunciations, he seemed quite another man, bold, courageous, and regardless of life and fortune. For in this great man, a mild and tender spirit was united with the strictest fidelity and an invincible attachment to what he regarded as the truth.

5. This middle course having been tried in vain for a sufficient length of time,² it was resolved, in order to terminate these religious controversies, to resort to the method so repugnant to reason and to the principles of Christianity, but which the perverseness of the times recommended. Accordingly on the 19th of November, a severe decree was passed by command and authority of the emperor, in the absence of the two leaders of the Protestants, the landgrave of Hesse and the elector of Saxony; in which there was nothing that could solace the Protestants, except an equivocal and deceptive promise of a council to be called within six months by order of the pontiff. For, the dignity and excellence of the old religion were extravagantly extolled; new energy was imparted to the edict of Worms against Luther and his followers; the religious reformations entered upon in one place and another were severely censured; and the princes and cities which had been alienated from the pontiff were admonished to return to their duty within some months, unless they wished to incur the vengeance of the emperor, as the patron and protector of the church.³

6. On learning the sad issue of the diet, the elector of Saxony and his associates, in the year 1530 and the year following, assembled at Smalcald and afterwards at Frankfort, and formed a league among themselves, for their mutual protection against the evils which the edict of Augsburg portended, but excluding all offensive operations against any one. They also

¹ The conferences continued, with repeated changes of the delegates, from the second day of August till the end of the month.—Mur.

² See, in addition to the authors before mentioned, Müller's Histoire der Protestation und Appelation der Evangelischen Stände, b. k. iii. chap. xlviii. p. 997.

³ The first meeting of the Protestants subsequently to the diet, was held at Smalcald on the 22d of December, 1530. But it was found that many of the representatives of cities had received no instruction in regard to a confederacy, and that many other cities were to be invited to join them. As the emperor had entered into a coalition with the Catholic states against them, they assembled again in the following year on took measures to bring the kings of France, England, and Denmark, as well as other princes and states, into the confederacy.¹ When things began to wear this warlike aspect, the electors of Mentz and the Palatinate interposed as mediators between the parties. And the emperor Charles V. for various reasons was very anxious for peace. For the Protestants would not afford their aid to a Turkish war which the emperor exceedingly needed; and they also contended that Ferdinand, the emperor's brother, who had been created king of the Romans by the major part of the princes

¹ Melancthon composed the Apology in Latin, but afterwards Justus Jonas translated it into German, in which language it was published in the first collection of all the symbolical books of the Lutheran church, Dresden, 1580, fol. 21—134. The Augsburg Confession in German immediately precedes it, fol. 3—20. See Waich's Introductio in Libros Symbolicos, lib. i. cap. iv. p. 409, &c.—Mur.

